
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

GoogleTM books

<https://books.google.com>

This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

GoogleTM books

<https://books.google.com>

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO
LIBRARY

THE ACADEMY
July 25, 1908

THE ACADEMY

JANUARY—JUNE
1908

VOLUME LXXIV

PUBLISHING OFFICE
67 LONG ACRE, W.C.

1908

f402.116
v. 74

Y7200 3HT
70 Y7200
Y7200 000000

CONTENTS OF VOL. LXXIV

ARTICLES

	PAGE
Academy, The Royal	758, 736, 854
Aladdin's Lamp, by Richard Middleton	738
All we like Sheep, by Christopher St. John	735
Also Sprach Campbell, by Arthur Machen	463
Amazing Canon, The, by Arthur Machen	509
Apologia Pro Angul, by W. M. Leadman	883
Art Club, The New English, by E. K.	931
Art Galleries (Municipal), The Administration of, by Frank Rutter	394
Arundel Club, The, by F. S. S.	710
Bible Teaching, Simple, by Arthur Machen	639
Booklovers' Mecca, The, by T. Michael Pope	336
Broad and Long	832
Burns's Home Spun, by J. P. Park	488
Can You Not Manage? (Mr. B. Shaw v. Lord Alfred Douglas)	830
Carmelite Wolf, The	666
Cataloguer Incomplete, A, by E. D. Farrar	513
Censorship of Plays, The, by St. J. H.	514
Chesbe Pageant, The	858
Christmas Eclogue, The, by L. L. A. S.	375
Concerts and Programmes, by Howard Bayles	343
Corsican Saint's Day, A, by E. Hamilton Moore	443
Counsel for the Claimant	882
Cowley, Abraham, by C. L. Marson	881
Cromer's Lord, Book: Its Personal Aspect, by Wilfrid Scawen Blunt	534, 557
Dearmer's Mrs., New Book, by A. D.	662
Dickens, the Art of, by Arthur Machen	664
Dignity and Pictures, by Frank Rutter	712
Discovery, The, by Arthur Eckersley	761
Dissenting Logic, by Arthur Machen	783
Dreamland, in Defence of, by Wilfrid L. Randall	416
Dreams, On, by Pamela Tennant	441
Education, Political Obstacles	486
Edward and Eliza: A Sentimental History, by A. L. Ellis	418
Fairies, The Peril of the, by Richard Middleton	343
Fairy Tales, Japanese, by Pamela Tennant	415
Fanatics, The, by Ernest D. Lee	618
February Fill-Dyke, by Pamela Tennant	467
First Aid to Listeners, by H. C. C.	538
Folk Song, English, by H. C. C.	641
Forecast, A, by Arthur Machen	341
For Shame, Mr. Shaw	806
Fraternité, by C. H. Collins Baker	442
Freemasonry and the Schools, by Archibald J. Dunn	859
From a Notebook, by Arthur Machen	927
Gambetta, The Heart of, by Rowland Strong	560
Grey Socks	907
Happiness and Horror, by Arthur Machen	561
Hidden Mystery, The, by A. Machen	856
Hogmanay, by W. W. Skeat	394
Hootawa Vandeyck, The, An Old Master's Tragedy, by Robt. Ross	339
Horbury, George: Recollections, by E. S. M.	736
International, The, by Frank Rutter	467
Israel, Winston and Molony	782
Jefferies, Richard, by T. Michael Pope	617
Jews in England, The, by Rowland Strong	614
Journalist, The Gentle, by X.	928
Limit, The, by A. D.	563
Madness of Spring, The, by Richard Middleton	787
Man Friday	734
May-Day, London's Lost, by G. M. Godden	762
Menander, by Walter Headlam	416
Mirabeau, by Rowland Strong	361
Modernism, by Arthur Machen	687
Morland, George, by Randall Davies	442
Musical Comedy, by Richard Middleton	490
Naphtha, by W. W. Skeat	643
"Nation, The," Reprint from, by X.	906
Nave, La, or the Cloaca Massima, by R. E.	491
News and Nonsense, by W. L. R.	929
Novel, On Unbending Over a, by S. Squire Sprigge	413
Novel, The French of To-day, by Rowland Strong	760
Paris, Old, by Rowland Strong	511
Patmore, Coventry, The Ideas of, by John Freeman	879
Persimmon, by W. W. Skeat	482
Personality, the Sincerity of Plural, by A. V. Montgomerie	512
Pictures, Irish, by Frank Rutter	564
Print, The Craving for, by Edgar Jepson	319
Richard, The Late Cardinal, by Rowland Strong	439
River and the Sea, The, by John Freeman	810
Romance, The Matter of, by T. Michael Pope	467
Sad, Happy Race, by Arthur Machen	903
Sakons, The Psychology of the, by Rowland Strong	832
Sea, The Etymology of, by W. W. Skeat	643
Secret Trial, The Truth about the, by T. A. C.	663
Shaving of Patshaw, The	855
Socialism and Suffragitism, by A. D.	831
Socialism, Theoretical, by P. S.	759
Sotto Voce, by John Ayscough	619
Spirit of Man, The, by Wilfrid L. Randall	690
Spitch-Cocked, by W. W. Skeat	713
Spy, The English, by Rowland Strong	709
Stage Children: An Impression and a Moral, by Richard Middleton	689

ARTICLES—continued.

	PAGE
Suffragist and the Socialist, The	902, 926
Swinburne's Tragedy, Mr.	685
Symbols, by Arthur Machen	808
Tantame Animis Celestibus Iraz, by A. D.	538
Tartan, by Walter W. Skeat	881
Theology of Newton Hall, The, by C. L. Marson	642
Threshold of Music, The, by H. C. C.	834
Three Notes, by Arthur Machen	317
"Times," Mr. Murray and Mr. Wilfrid Blunt	781
Toil and Trouble, by M. A.	615
Vaughan, Father, The Vanities of, by X.	878
Veneremur, by G. M. Godden	367
Venus, The Passing of, by Frank Rutter	739
Vers Length, The Limits of, by T. S. O.	711
Verstegan, Richard, by W. W. Skeat	365
Villon, Francois, by A. D.	638

BOOKS RECEIVED

Pages 326, 350, 373, 402, 425, 450, 474, 498, 570, 626, 650, 673, 698, 721, 746, 770, 794, 817, 842, 866, 890, 914, 938

CORRESPONDENCE

Pages 325, 347, 373, 399, 423, 447, 471, 495, 520, 543, 567, 624, 647, 671, 694, 718, 743, 769, 792, 815, 839, 863, 888, 913, 934

DRAMA

	PAGE
Actresses, On Two French, by X. Marcel Boulestin	838
Arms and the Man, The Revival of, by A. D.	324
Beloved Vagabond, The, at His Majesty's Theatre, by A. C.	447
Cupid and Common Sense, at the Stage Society, by H. de S.	422
Diana of Dobson's, at the Kingsway Theatre, by A. C.	495
Edwin Drood, at His Majesty's Theatre, by A. C.	346
Explorer, The, at the Lyric Theatre, by A. C.	912
Gates of the Morning, The, at the Stage Society, by A. C.	542
Hannele, at the Scala Theatre, by A. C.	693
House, The, and Mrs. Bill, at the Court Theatre, by A. C.	567
Lanval	814
Links, at the Stage Society, by A. C.	862
Midsummer Night's Dream, A, by Arthur Eckersley	542
Nan, by H. de S.	863
Rosmersholm, at Terry's Theatre, by A. C.	471
Shylock, at His Majesty's Theatre, by A. C.	670
Sicilian Players, The, by M. A.	519
Stingaree, at the Queen's Theatre, by A. C.	446
Thunderbolt, The, at the St. James's Theatre, by A. C.	792
Vielles Gloires, at His Majesty's Theatre, by X. M. B.	912

FICTION

	PAGE
Absolution. Clara Viebig	837
Actor's Love Story, An. A. M. Diehl	743
Admiral Eddy. Oliver Onions	346
Adventures of Count O'Connor, The. Henry Stae	446
Aitken, R. The Golden Horseshoe	541
Albanesi, Madame. Drusilla's Point of View	790
Anchorage, The. W. H. Koebel	541
Ancient Law, The. Ellen Glasgow	767
Anne Page. Netta Syrett	767
Annesley, M. The Wine of Life	420
Appleton, G. W. The House on the Thames	372
Ashes. Grazia Deledda	910
Askew, A. and C. Not Proven	693
— The Plains of Silence	421
— The Orchard Close	913
Ayscough, J. Marotz	766
Barr, Robt. Young Lord Strangleigh	861
Bartlett, E. Ashmead. Richard Langhorne	668
Bazin, René. The Nun	565
— Redemption	910
Beau Brocade. Baroness Orczy	566
Before Adam. Jack London	934
Benson, E. F. Sheaves	493
Birkhead, Alice. The Master Knot	669
Biss, G. The White Rose Mystery	421
Blue Lagoon, The. H. de Vere Stacpoole	518
Blyth, James. Rubina	470
— The Diamond and the Lady	911
— The Shadow of the Unseen	323
— The Weaning	718
Bohemian, The Adventures of a Respectable. E. P. Ramsay Laye	398
Bond Woman, The. H. Maxwell	887
Bowen, M. The Sword Decides	789
Buchanan, A. She Loved Much	647
Burning Cresset, The. Howard Pease	718
Burton, J. Bloundelle. The Last of Her Race	470
— A Woman from the Sea	669
Cable Man, The. Weatherby Chesney	623
Captain Dallington. K. S. Macquoid	445

FICTION—continued.

	PAGE
Captain Spink. Morley Roberts	669
Cardinal and Lady Susan, The. Lucas Cleeve	790
Case for Compromise, A. Henry Stace	933
Chambers, R. W. The Tree of Heaven	791
Charming Girl, A. Esme Stuart	669
Chesney, W. The Cable Man	623
— The Romance of a Queen	718
Chichester Intrigue, The. Thomas Cobb	566
Child of Chance, The. Maxime Formont	886
Churchill, Winston. Mr. Crewe's Career	861
Cleeve, Lucas. The Cardinal and Lady Susan	790
Clementina's Highwayman. R. N. Stephens	623
— and G. H. Westley	566
Cobb, T. The Chichester Intrigue	566
Coke, Desmond. The Pedestal	910
Come and Find Me. Elizabeth Robins	566
Comedy of Mammon, A. Ina Garvey	791
Comedy of Moods, A. G. H. Tempary	617
Conqueress, The. Georges Ohnet	372
Conrad, J. The Secret Agent	413
Cooke, W. B. For King and Love	470
Corry Thorndike. Winifred Crisp	862
Cottage on the Fells, The. H. de Vere Stacpoole	742
Courlander, A. Eve's Apple	470
Coutts, T. The Prodigal City	887
Coward Behind the Curtain, The. Richard Marsh	790
Crawford, F. Marion. The Primadonna	768
Crespigny, Mrs. P. Champion de. The Spanish Prisoner	422
Crispe, W. Corry Thorndike	862
Crossriggs. Mary and Jane Findlater	742
Crossways, Diana. A Melton Monologue	612
Cullum, R. The Watcher of the Plains	862
Cunninghame, A. The Love Story of Giraldu	324
Cynthia in the Wilderness. Hubert Wales	398
Dan Riach, Socialist. The Author of Miss Molly	717
Daudet, E. His Father's Wife (La Marquise de Sardes)	911
Daughter, The. Constance Smedley	692
Dawe, Carlton. One Fair Enemy	518
Dawson, A. J. The Gentle A.B.	324
Death Man, The. Benjamin Swift	622
Deledda, G. Ashes	910
Demos Awake. David Christie Murray	494
Deventer, E. M. van. The Doverfields' Diamonds	372
Devil's Bargain, A. Florence Warden	421
Diamond and the Lady, The. James Blyth	911
Diehl, A. M. An Actor's Love Story	743
Donovan, Dick. A Gilded Serpent	742
Douglas, J. The Unpardonable Sin	420
Doverfields' Diamonds, The. E. M. van Deventer	372
Drelma. G. Whiteley Ward	934
Drusilla's Point of View. Mme. Albanesi	790
Duke's Motto, The. Justin H. McCarthy	693
Eddy, The. Riccardo Stephens	345
Edge of Beyond, The. Gertrude Page	911
Emotional Moments. Sarah Grand	789
Enchantress, The. Edwin Pugh	700
Eve's Apple. A. Courlander	470
Explorer, The. William Somerset Maugham	324
Farrington, H. M. The Gates That Shall Not Prevail	768
Father Alphonsus. H. A. Hinkson	517
Fifth Queen Crowned, The. Ford Madox Hueffer	766
Finances of Sir John Kynnersley. A. C. Fox-Davies	742
Findlater, M. and J. Crossriggs	742
FitzMaurice, G. Mrs. FitzMaurice on Leave	933
Fletcher, J. S. Mothers in Israel	494
— Paradise Court	742
— The Ivory God	790
Fly on the Wheel, The. K. Cecil Thurston	717
Forbes, Mrs. W. R. D. Leroux	742
Forefront of the Battle, The. Andrew Loring	837
For King and Love. W. Bourne Cooke	470
Formont, M. The Child of Chance	886
Forster, R. H. A Jacobite Admiral	518
Fourth Ship, The. Ethel Colburn Mayne	932
Fox-Davies, A. C. The Finances of Sir John Kynnersley	742
Fruit of the Tree, The. Edith Wharton	345
Galatea, The New. Samuel Gordon	87
Gang, The. David Whitelaw	560
Garvey, Ina. A Comedy of Mammon	791
Gaskell, Lady Catherine. Prose Idylls of the West Riding	718
Gates That Shall Not Prevail, The. H. M. Farrington	768
Gentle, A.B., The. A. J. Dawson	324
Gentleman of London, A. Morice Gerard	712
George, H. The Master of Means	670
Gerard, D. Restitution	909
Gerard, Morice. A Gentleman of London	742
Gibbs, Philip. The Individualist	493
Gilded Serpent, A. Dick Donovan	742
Giraldu, The Love Story of. Alice Cunningham	324
Glasgow, E. The Ancient Law	767
Gleig, C. Julian Winterson	623
Golden Horseshoe, The. Robert Aitken	541

FICTION—continued.

	PAGE
Gordon, S. The New Galatea	837
Grain Carriers, The. Edward Noble	517
Grand, Sarah. Emotional Moments	789
Grey Night, The. Mrs. Hy. de la Pasture	767
Griffiths, Major A. Thrice Captive	813
Grosvenor, Mrs. N. The Thornton Device	398
Hal, Sir Roger Delaney of Meath	813
Hales, A. G. Marozia	768
Half Smart Set, The. Florence Warden	693
Halidom, M. Y. Zoe's Revenge	911
Halo, The. Baroness von Hutten	397
Hamilton, Lillias. A Nurse's Bequest	470
Hand on the Strings, The. Ralph Rodd	743
Harding, E. The Woman Who Vowed	934
Hawtreys, Valentina. Rodwell	516
Haylar, F. Nepenthes	445
Heart of the Northern Sea, The. Alvide Prydz	398
Heart's Banishment, The. Ella Macmahon	371
Hekking, Avis. A King of Mars	836
Heriot, R. The Human Element	324
Hinkson, H. A. Father Alphonsus	517
His Father's Wife (La Marquise de Sardes).
Ernest Daudet	911
His Final Flutter. Henry Potts	887
House on the Thames, The. G. W. Appleton	372
Hueffer, Ford Madox. The Fifth Queen Crowned	766
Human Element, The. Robert Herriot	324
Hume, Fergus. The Sacred Herb	421
Hunt, Violet. White Rose of Weary Leaf	716
Huttin, Baroness von. The Halo	397
Imbeciles, The. L. Lockhart Lang	494
Imperial Brown of Brixton. Reginald Turner	540
Individualist, The. Philip Gibbs	493
Innes, J. W. B. Morag the Seal	717
Iota. The Magic of May	837
Isle Raven. Owen Vaughan	646
Ivory God, The. J. S. Fletcher	790
Jacobite Admiral, A. R. H. Forster	518
Julian Steele. Constantine Ralli	814
Julian Winterston. Charles Reig	623
King of Mars, A. Avis Hekking	836
Kiss of Helen, The. Charles Marriott	646
Koebel, W. H. The Anchorage	541
Lady in the Car, The. William Le Queux	743
Lady Lee. Florence Warden	887
Lang, L. L. The Imbeciles	494
Larkins, W. A. Where Passion Swayed	768
Last of Her Race, The. J. Bloundelle Burton	470
Lathbury, Eva. The People Downstairs	814
Laye, E. P. R. The Adventures of a Respectable Bohemian	398
Leroux. Hon. Mrs. W. R. D. Forbes	742
Levenson, Ada. Love's Shadow	909
Little God's Drum, The. Ralph Straus	861
London, Jack. Before Adam	934
Loring, A. The Forefront of the Battle	837
Louis, G. Through Life Unto Death	324
Love and the Minor. Rathmell Wilson	494
Love's Shadow. Ada Levenson	909
Lowndes, Mrs. Belloc. The Pulse of Life	460
Lucas, St. John. The Marble Sphinx	372
McCarthy, Justin H. The Duke's Motto	693
Macmahon, Ella. The Heart's Banishment	371
Macnaughtan, S. Three Miss Graces	742
Macquoid, K. S. Captain Dallington	445
Magic of May, The. Iota	837
Malvery, O. C. The Speculator	814
Many Junes. Archibald Marshall	646
Marble Sphinx, The. St. John Lucas	372
Marguerite, Paul and Victor. Vanity	323
Maroltz, John. Ayscough	766
Marozia. A. G. Hales	768
Marriott, C. The Kiss of Helen	646
Marsh, Richard. The Coward Behind the Curtain	790
Marshall, Archibald. Many Junes	646
Master Knot, The. Alice Birkhead	669
Master of Means, The. Herbert George	670
Maugham, W. Somerset. The Explorer	324
Maxwell, H. The Bondwoman	887
Mayne, E. C. The Fourth Step	932
Meadows, A. M. The Moth and the Candle	933
Melton Monologue, A. Diana Crossways	692
Missioner, The. E. Phillips Oppenheim	741
Mr. Crew's Career. Winston Churchill	861
Mrs. Barrington's Atonement. Violet Tweedale	372
Mrs. Fitzmaurice on Leave. Gabrielle Fitzmaurice	933
Mitford, C. Guise. The Paxton Plot	693
Morag the Seal. J. W. Brodie Innes	717
Moth and the Candle, The. Alice Maud Meadows	933
Mother, The. Eden Phillpotts	445
Mothers in Israel. J. S. Fletcher	494
Murray, David Christie. Demos Awakes	494
Nepenthes. Florence Haylar	445
Noble, E. The Grain Carriers	517
Norris, W. E. Pauline	933
Not Proven. Alice and Claude Askew	693
Nun, The. René Bazin	565
Nurse's Bequest, A. Lillias Hamilton, M.D.	470
Ohnet, Georges. The Conquerors	372
One Fair Enemy. Carlton Dawe	518
Onions, Oliver. Admiral Eddy	346
Pedar's Pack	838
Oppenheim, E. Phillips. The Missioner	741
Orchard Close, The. Alice and Claude Askew	933
Orczy, Baroness. Beau Brocade	566
Page, G. The Edge of Beyond	911
Pain, Barry. The Shadow of the Unseen	323
Paradise Court. J. S. Fletcher	742
Partners of Providence. Charles D. Stewart	421
Pasture, Mrs. Hy. de la. The Grey Night	767
Pauline. W. E. Norris	933
Paxton Plot, The. C. Guise Mitford	693
Pease, Howard. The Burning Cresset	718
Pedestal, The. Desmond Coke	910
Pedar's Pack. Oliver Onions	838
People Downstairs, The. Eva Lathbury	814
Pest, The. W. Teignmouth Shore	494
Phillpotts, Eden. The Mother	445
Plains of Silence, The. Alice and Claude Askew	421
Potts, H. His Final Flutter	887

FICTION—continued.

	PAGE
Prague, J. Vincenzo's Vendetta	623
Primadonna, The. F. Marion Crawford	768
Prodigal City, The. Tristram Coutts	887
Prophet's Reward, The. E. H. Strain	717
Prose Idylls of the West Riding. Lady Catherine Gaskell	718
Prydz, A. The Heart of the Northern Sea	398
Pugh, E. The Enchantress	790
Pulse of Life, The. Mrs. Belloc Lowndes	460
Queen's Friend, The. Helene Vacaresco	541
Queen, The Romance of a. Weatherby Chesney	718
Queux, Wm. le. The Lady in the Car	743
— The Woman in the Way	346
Ralli, C. Julian Steele	814
Redemption. René Bazin	910
Restitution. Dorothea Gerard	909
Richard Langhorne. Ellis Ashmead Bartlett	668
Ring, The. Beryl Tucker	741
Roberts, Morley. Captain Spink	669
Robins, E. Come and Find Me	566
Rodd, R. The Hand on the Strings	743
Rodwell, Valentina. Hawtreys	516
Romance of Three, A. Edward Scott	670
Rubina. James Blyth	470
Sacred Herb, The. Fergus Hume	421
Sally Bishop. E. Temple Thurston	494
Scarlet Runner, The. C. N. and A. M. Williamson	838
Scott, E. A Romance of Three	670
Secret Agent, The. Joseph Conrad	413
Shadow of the Unseen, The. Barry Pain and James Blyth	323
Shakespeare's Sweetheart. Sarah H. Sterling	397
Sheaves. E. F. Benson	493
She Loved Much. Alfred Buchanan	647
Shore, W. Teignmouth. The Pest	494
Sir Roger Delaney of Meath. Hal	813
Smedley, Constance. The Daughter	692
Spanish Prisoner, The. Mrs. Philip Champion de Crespigny	422
Speculator, The. Olive Christian Malvery	814
Splendid Coward, The	837
Stace, H. The Adventures of Count O'Connor	446
— A Case For Compromise	933
Stacpoole, H. de Vere. The Blue Lagoon	518
— The Cottage on the Fells	742
Stephens, R. The Eddy	345
— R. N. Clementina's Highwayman	623
Sterling, S. H. Shakespeare's Sweetheart	397
Stuart, Esme. A Charming Girl	669
Stewart, C. D. Partners of Providence	421
Strain, E. H. A Prophet's Reward	717
Straus, R. The Little God's Drum	861
Swift, B. The Death Man	622
Sword Decides, The. Marjorie Bowen	789
Syrett, Netta. Anne Page	767
Tempany, G. H. A Comedy of Moods	647
Their Marriage. Curtis Yorke	518
Thornton Device, The. Hon. Mrs. N. Grosvenor	398
Three Miss Graces. S. Macnaughtan	741
Thrice Captive. Major Arthur Griffiths	813
Through Life unto Death. George Louis	324
Thurston, E. Temple. Sally Bishop	494
— K. Cecil. The Fly on the Wheel	717
Thorn and the Amazon, The. George Turner	660
Tracy, Louis. The Wheel of Fortune	887
Traitor's Wife, The. W. H. Williamson	768
Tree of Heaven, The. R. W. Chambers	791
Tucker, Beryl. The Ring	741
Turner, George. The Toad and the Amazon	660
— R. Imperial Brown of Brixton	540
Tweedale, V. Mrs. Barrington's Atonement	372
Unpardonable Sin, The. James Douglas	420
Vacaresco, H. The Queen's Friend	541
Vanity, Paul and Victor. Marguerite	323
Viebig, Clara. Absolution	837
Vincenzo's Vendetta. Joseph Prague	623
Vaughan, O. Isle Raven	646
Wales, H. Cynthia in the Wilderness	398
Ward, G. W. Dreima	934
Warden, Florence. A Devil's Bargain	421
— Lady Lee	887
— The Half Smart Set	693
Watcher of the Plains, The. Ridgwell Cullum	862
Weaning, The. James Blyth	718
Westworth-James, G. de S. The Wild Widow	622
Westley, G. H. Clementina's Highwayman	623
Wharton, E. The Fruit of the Tree	345
Wheel of Fortune, The. Louis Tracy	887
Where Passion Swayed. W. Ashley Larkins	768
Whitelaw, D. The Gang	566
White Rose Mystery, The. Gerald Biss	421
White Rose of Weary Leaf. Violet Hunt	716
Wild Widow, The. Gertrude de S. Westworth James	862
Williamson, C. N. and A. M. The Scarlet Runner	838
— W. H. The Traitor's Wife	768
Wilson, R. Love and the Minor	494
Wine of Life, The. Maud Annesley	420
Woman from the Sea, A. J. Bloundelle Burton	669
Woman in the Way, The. William Le Queux	346
Woman Who Vowed. Ellison Harding	934
Yorke, Curtis. Their Marriage	518
Young Lord Straneigh. Robert Barr	861
Zoe's Revenge. M. Y. Halidom	911

THE LIBRARY TABLE

Adrian IV., Pope. J. Duncan Mackie	323
A Pocketful of Sixpences. G. W. E. Russell	460
Arnold, E. C. A Bird Collector's Medley	396
Austin, Alfred. The Garden That I Love	492
Bird Collector's Medley, A. E. C. Arnold	396
Black Mount, The High Tops of. Marchioness of Breadalbane	323
Bland, H. The Happy Moralist	419
Boigne, The Comtesse de. Memoirs of	444
Book of Fair Women, The. Fedrico Luigino of Udine	370
Bowles, F. G. New Songs	419

LIBRARY TABLE—continued

	PAGE
Brahmans, Theists, and Muslims of India. J. Campbell Oman	370
Breadalbane, The Marchioness of. The High Tops of Black Mount	323
Bussy, D. Eugene Delacroix	322
Call of the Homeland, The. R. P. Scott and K. T. Wallis	419
Cecil, Hon. Mrs. Evelyn. London Parks and Gardens	345
Colles, R. The Complete Poetical Works of George Darley	492
Collignon, M. Scopes et Praxitele	515
Cox, J. C. Memorials of Old Derbyshire	516
Darley, George. The Complete Poetical Works of Ramsay Colles	492
Dawson, N. Goldsmiths' and Silversmiths' Work	443
Delacroix, Eugene. Dorothy Bussy	322
Derbyshire, Memorials of Old. Rev. J. Charles Cox	516
Devonshire Characters and Strange Events. S. Baring Gould	516
Dobell, B. Shelley's Letters to Elizabeth Hitchener	539
Farrer, R. My Rock Garden	371
France, Old, In the Track of R. L. Stevenson, and Elsewhere in. J. A. Hammerton	539
Garden, My Rock. Reginald Farrer	371
Garden That I Love, The. Alfred Austin	492
Glade in the Forest, and other Stories, The. Stephen Gwynn	444
Goldsmiths' and Silversmiths' Work. Nelson Dawson	443
Goodyear, W. H. The Widening Refinement in Rheims Cathedral	468
Gould, S. Baring. Devonshire Characters and Strange Events	516
Gwynn, Stephen. The Glade in the Forest, and other Stories	444
Hackwood, F. W. Old English Sports	493
Hammerton, J. A. In the Track of R. L. Stevenson, and Elsewhere in Old France	539
Hutchinson, H. G. Nature's Moods and Tenses	344
Hyatt, A. H. The Charm of London	515
India, the Game Animals of. R. Lydder	369
Jerrold, W. The Book of Living Poets	419
Junto, The. Teresa Merz	371
Lang, Andrew. Tales of Troy and Greece	370
London Parks and Gardens. Hon. Mrs. Evelyn Cecil	345
London, The Charm of. A. H. Hyatt	515
Luigino, F. The Book of Fair Women	370
Lydder, R. The Game Animals of India	369
Mackie, J. D. Pope Adrian IV.	323
McMahan, A. B. With Shelley in Italy	370
Maneaters of Tsavo, The. Lieut.-Col. J. H. Patterson, D.S.O.	540
Manucci, Nicolas. Storia del Mogor	420
Mayer, E. von. Pompeii as an Art City	468
Merz, T. The Junto	371
Mogor, Storia del. Nicolas Manucci	420
Moralist, The Happy. Hubert Bland	419
Museum of Fine Arts, Boston, Handbook of the Nature's Moods and Tenses. Horace G. Hutchinson	344
New Songs. Fred G. Bowles	419
Oman, J. C. The Brahmans, Theists, and Muslims of India	370
Paris and Vienna, Society Recollections in. An English Officer	345
Patterson, Lieut.-Col. J. H. The Maneaters of Tsavo	540
Plato's Psychology in its Bearing on the Development of Will. Mary Hay Wood	496
Poets, The Book of Living. Walter Jerrold	419
Pompeii as an Art City. E. von Mayer	468
Regency, Vignettes of the. William Toynbee	344
Rheims Cathedral, The Widening Refinement in. William H. Goodyear	468
Russell, G. W. E. A Pocketful of Sixpences	460
Scopes et Praxitele. Maxime Collignon	515
Scott, R. P. The Call of the Homeland	419
Schumann, Robert. Letters of	444
Sewell, Elizabeth M., An Autobiography. Eleanor M. Sewell	444
Shelley in Italy, With. A. B. McMahan	370
Shelley's Letters to Elizabeth Hitchener. Bertram Dobell	539
Sports, Old English. F. W. Hackwood	493
Studia Sinaitica, No. XII.	345
Toynbee, William. Vignettes of the Regency	344
Troy and Greece, Tales of. Andrew Lang	370
Wallis, K. T. The Call of the Homeland	419
Wood, M. H. Plato's Psychology in its Bearing on the Development of Will	396

LIFE AND LETTERS

Pages 307, 331, 355, 379, 407, 431, 455, 479, 503, 527, 551, 607, 631, 655, 679, 703, 727, 751, 775, 799, 823, 847, 871, 895, 919

POETRY

Abandonata. G. M. de l'Aubiniere	433
Ad Extremas Tenebras. Anna Bunston	849
A Dream. X. Y. Z.	308
A Song Against Care. Olive Douglas	633
A Song of Devon. Wilfrid L. Randall	733
At St. Nicholas in Prislac. A. Hugh Fisher	849
Beauty and the Hunter. A. D.	505
Bethlehem, the House of Bread. E. D. Farrar	333
Brown-tailed Filly. Noel Somers	457
Cicero's Island. M. Jourdain	825
Corpus Christi. Evelyn Underhill	825
Crocuses. Isidore G. Ascher	681
Evening Faces. Randal Charlton	729
Giving Place. Michael Field	873
Imitation from Maurice Maeterlinck. M. A.	381
Insomnia. H. C.	609
In Time of Mourning. A. T.	897

POETRY—continued.

	PAGE
La Mécanicité de la Nature. André Turquet	381
Nameless Grief. John Freeman	705
Night and Day. St. John Lucas	357
Seleucus of Lesbos. M. Jourdain	777
Singing. A. Stevenson Nicol	505
Spikenard. John Ayscough	681
Swinburne. Ethel Talbot	633
The Bride's Welcome. Alice Fleming	357
The Destroyer. Laurence Binyon	553
The Flutes of Silence. M. Jourdain	873
The Journey.	675
The Poet. Wilfrid Wilson Gibson	529
The Vision. Olive Douglas	529
The Watch Below. Vincent O'Sullivan	409
To a Cuckoo Interrupting Prayer. Michael Field	801
To a Dancer. Mabel Dearmer	729
Waste Ground at Aldwych. A. Hugh Fisher	481
Wilford. Pamela Tennant	921

SHORTER REVIEWS.

Adcock, A. St. John. The World that Never Was	835
Ange, Michel, Vie de. Romain Rolland	765
Austen, Jane. Northanger Abbey	622
Autobiography of a Super Tramp. The. W. H. Davies	836
Automobilist Abroad. The. Francis Miltoun	813
Balzac, Honoré de. Les Chouans ou La Bretagne en 1799	811
Bazaine, L. de. Pekin to Paris	813
Beylié, L. de. Promé et Samara	850
Bible Beautiful. The. Estelle M. Hurl	645
Birds, A Book of. W. P. Pycraft	716
Bone, G. Children's Children	565
Bourdillon, F. W. Preludes and Romances	886
Britain, Over-sea. E. F. Knight	875
Brooke, C. F. T. The Shakespeare Apocrypha	873
Browning, Robert. The Life and Letters of. Mrs. Sutherland Orr	884
Burns, Robert. Notes on Scottish Song by	811
Carlisle, R. H. Fox-hunting, Past and Present	908
Children's Children. Gertrude Bone	565
Chouans ou La Bretagne en 1799. Les. Honoré de Balzac	811
Christmas Faith and Fact. Agnes L. Illingworth	645
Church, Rev. A. J. Memories of Men and Books	875
Civilisation, History of Medieval and of Modern to the End of the Seventeenth Century. Charles Seignobos	565
Clarke, William. A Collection of His Writings	886
Clérigh, A. Ua. The History of Ireland to the Coming of Henry II.	740
Common Sense, The Philosophy of. Frederic Harrison	642
Confessio Medici	740
Crane, W. Indian Impressions	668
Davies, W. H. The Autobiography of a Super-Tramp	836
Discoveries. W. B. Yeats	621
Doctrine of the Trinity. The. J. R. Illingworth	787
Edward VI., King. Sir Clements R. Markham	667
Embroidery, or the Craft of the Needle. W. G. Paulson Townsend	621
E. V. B. The Peacock's Pleasance	877
Familiar Faces. Harry Graham	716
Family Chronicle, A. Derived from Notes and Letters selected by Barbarina, the Hon. Lady Grey	565
Ferrar, Nicholas, The Life and Times of. H. P. K. Skipton	860
Florence and the Cities of Northern Tuscany, with Genoa. Edward Hutton	621
Fotheringham, D. R. War Songs of the Greeks, and other Poems	644
Fox-hunting, Past and Present. R. H. Carlisle	908
Gibbs, Philip. The Romance of George Villiers, First Duke of Buckingham, and Some Men and Women of the Stuart Court	692
Gordon, W. J. Round About the North Pole	788
Graham, David. The Grammar of Philosophy	931
Graham, Harry. Familiar Faces	716
Graham, H. G. Literary and Historical Essays	885
Greece, The Archipelago, Constantinople, the Coasts of Asia Minor, Crete, and Cyprus. Guide to	908
Gribble, Francis. Montreux	836
Haile, M. James Francis Edward, the Old Chevalier	716
Harrison, F. The Philosophy of Common-Sense	642
Hertfordshire Cottage, From a. W. Beach	877
Holiday in the Happy Valley, A. Major T. R. Swinburne	812
H.M.I. E. M. Sneyd Kynnersley	789
Hurl, E. M. The Bible Beautiful	645
Hutton, E. Florence and the Cities of Northern Tuscany, with Genoa	621
Illingworth, A. L. Christmas Faith and Fact	645
— The Resurrection and the Life	645
— J. R. The Doctrine of the Trinity	787
India Impressions. Walter Crane	668
India's Saint and the Viceroys. S. S. Thorburn	859
India, the Real. J. D. Rees, M.P.	875
Indian Countryside, The. Percival O'Connor	860
Ireland, The History of, to the Coming of Henry II. Arthur Ua Clérigh	740
Israel. Lotus Leaves from Africa and Covent Garden	781
Italy, Ancient. Ettore Pais	620
James Francis Edward, the Old Chevalier. Martin Haile	716
Johnson, H. The Life and Voyages of Joseph Wiggins, F.R.G.S., Modern Discoverer of the Kara Sea Route to Siberia	645
Kafir Socialism. Dudley Kidd	765
Kenealy, Edward Vaughan, Memoirs of. Arabella Kenealy	882
Kidd, D. Kafir Socialism	765

SHORTER REVIEWS—continued.

Knaves or Fools. C. E. Wheeler	714
Knight, E. F. Over Sea Britain	875
Kynnersley, E. M. Sneyd. H.M.I.	789
Lake, Viscount, Baron Lake of Delhi and Laswaree, 1744-1808, Memoir of the Life and Military Services of. Colonel Hugh Pearse	932
Land of Pearl and Gold, The. Alexander Macdonald	885
Languages, The Oceanic, Their Grammatical Structure, Vocabulary, and Origin. D. Macdonald	691
Layard, G. S. Suppressed Plates	668
Leaves from a Life	644
Lewis, T. H. and M. H. Montreux	836
Literary and Historical Essays. Henry Grey Graham	885
Lotus Leaves from Africa and Covent Garden. Israel	789
Lungo, I. del. Women of Florence	764
McCurdy, E. The Thoughts of Leonardo da Vinci as Recorded in his Notebooks	740
Macdonald, A. The Land of Pearl and Gold	885
— D. The Oceanic Languages, their Grammatical Structure, Vocabulary and Origin	691
MacKinder, H. J. The Rhine: Its Valley and History	908
Maitland, Frederic William. A. L. Smith	835
Maitres Sonneurs, Les. Georges Sand	622
Mare au Diable, La. Georges Sand	622
Markham, Sir Clements R. King Edward VI.	667
Maxwell, Mrs. J. Miller. The Stories of the Trees	668
Men and Books, Memories of. Rev. A. J. Church	874
Miltoun, F. The Automobilist Abroad	713
Montreux. T. H. and M. H. Lewis and Francis Gribble	836
Moon, Tramps Round the Mountains of the, and Through the Back Gate of the Congo State. T. Broadwood Johnson	622
My Life in the Open. Will H. Ogilvie	622
Nations, Modern, the Growth of. Henri de Tourville	667
Northanger Abbey. Jane Austen	622
North Pole, Round About the. W. J. Gordon	788
O'Connor, P. The Indian Countryside	860
Ogilvie, W. H. My Life in the Open	622
Okey, T. The Old Venetian Palaces and Old Venetian Folk	644
One City and Many Men. Rt. Hon. Sir Algernon West	932
Orr, Mrs. Sutherland. The Life and Letters of Robert Browning	884
Pearse, Colonel Hugh. Memoir of the Life and Military Services of Viscount Lake Baron Lake of Delhi and Laswaree, 1744-1808	932
Pais, Ettore. Ancient Italy	620
Parliament, The Spirit of. Duncan Schwann, M.P.	691
Peacock's Pleasance, The. E. V. B.	877
Pekin to Paris. Luigi Barzini	813
Philology, Classical, Harvard Studies in.	715
Plates, Suppressed. G. S. Layard	668
Poets of Our Day. N. G. Royde Smith	875
Portugal, H. Morse Stephens	714
Preludes and Romances. Francis William Bourdillon	886
Promé et Samara. General L. de Beylié	860
Purbeck, The Isle of, In and Around. Ida Woodward	861
Pyecraft, W. P. A Book of Birds	716
Philosophy, The Grammar of. David Graham	931
Records of Stirring Times, 1726-1822	764
Rees, J. D. The Real India	875
Resurrection and the Life, The. Agnes L. Illingworth	645
Rhine, The, Its Valley and History. H. J. MacKinder	908
Rolland, R. Vie de Michel Ange	765
Saints in Art, The. Margaret E. Tabor	764
Sand, Georges. La Mare au Diable	622
— Les Maitres Sonneurs	622
Schwann, Duncan, The Spirit of Parliament	691
Secrets of the Past. Allen Upward	812
Shakespeare Apocrypha, The. C. F. Tucker Brooke	873
Singer, Rev. S. Lectures and Addresses of	788
— Sermons and Memoir of	788
— Sermons to Children of	788
Skipton, H. P. K. The Life and Times of Nicholas Ferrar	860
Smith, A. L. Frederic William Maitland	835
Smith, N. G. Royde. Poets of Our Day	875
Socialist Movement in England, The. Brougham Villiers	835
Sport and Life on the Pacific Slope. Horace A. Vachell	908
Stephens, H. Morse. Portugal	714
Swinburne, T. R. A Holiday in the Happy Valley	812
Sword and Blossom Poems	812
Tabor, M. E. The Saints in Art	764
Thomas, W. Beach. From a Hertfordshire Cottage	877
Thorburn, S. S. India's Saint and the Viceroys	859
Thyriss and Fausta. Rosalind Travers	885
Tourville, H. de. The Growth of Modern Nations	667
Townsend, W. G. Paulson. Embroidery, or the Craft of the Needle	621
Travers, R. Thyriss and Fausta	885
Trees, The Stories of the. Mrs. J. Miller Maxwell	668
Upward, A. Secrets of the Past	812
Vachell, Horace A. Sport and Life on the Pacific Slope	908
Venetian Palaces and Venetian Folk, The Old. Thomas Okey	644
Villiers, Brougham. The Socialist Movement in England	835
Vinci, Leonardo da. The Thoughts of, as Recorded in his Notebooks. Edward McCurdy	740

SHORTER REVIEWS—continued

Villiers, George, First Duke of Buckingham, and some Men and Women of the Stuart Court, the Romance of. Philip Gibbs	692
War Songs of the Greeks, and other Poems. D. R. Fotheringham	644
West, Right Hon. Sir Algernon. One City and Many Men	932
Wheeler, C. E. Knaves or Fools	714
Wiggins, Joseph, F.R.G.S., Modern Discoverer of the Kara Sea Route to Siberia, Life and Voyages of. Henry Johnson	645
Women of Florence. Isidora del Lungo	764
Woodward, Ida. In and Around the Isle of Purbeck	861
World that Never Was, The. A. St. John Adcock	835
Yeats, W. B. Discoveries	621

REVIEWS

Abercrombie, Lascelles. Interludes and Poems	578
Adam Cast Forth. Charles M. Doughty	634
Acton, Lord. Historical Essays and Studies	508
Æschylus, The Eumenides of	705
Anglican Liberalism. Twelve Churchmen	897
Alexander, Lieut. Boyd. From the Niger to the Nile	460
All Fools, and the Gentleman Usher. George Chapman	336
Apologia Diffidentis. W. Compton Leith	505
Arabia, Wanderings In. Charles M. Doughty	531
Art, A History of. Dr. G. Carotti	922
Artist's Reminiscences. Walter Crane	312
Asia, Eastern, The Coming Struggle In. B. L. Putnam Weale	661
Asia, The Pulse of. Elsworth Huntington	636
Athens, The Annual of the British School at	337
Atkinson, E. A Garden of Shadows	334
Avery, E. McKendree. A History of the United States and its People	901
Avilion and other Poems. Zachary Edwards	334
Bagshot, The Comments of	357
Bailey, J. C. The Claims of French Poetry	311
Baily, J. T. H. Francesco Bartolozzi, R.A.	410
Barbados, Past and Present. F. R. B.	320
Barker, J. E. British Socialism	807
Bartolozzi Francesco, R.A. J. T. H. Baily	410
Bell, Mrs. A. G. The Royal Manor of Richmond	850
Bible, The Literary Man's. W. L. Courtney	339
Bléochowsky, A. The Life of Goethe	852
Birch, W. de Gray. Seals	610
Birds of the Loch and Mountain. Seton P. Gordon	612
Birrell, A. Browning	849
Birt, H. N. The Elizabethan Religious Settlement	462
Blank Verse Pastels. Clinton Scollard	611
Bleackley, Horace. The Story of a Beautiful Duchess. Life and Times of Elizabeth Gunning, Duchess of Hamilton and Argyll	338
Bonacine, C. Preludes and Harmonies	437
Book of the Duke of True Lovers. Christine de Pisan	333
Boscawen, A. S. T. Fourteen Years in Parliament	411
Bone, G. Children's Children	615
Bourne, George. Memories of a Surrey Labourer	707
Boussett, W. What is Religion?	386
Bower, F. O. The Origin of a Land Flora	756
Bragança, Catherine of. Lillias Campbell Davidson	708
Brazier, A. W. Music and Light, and other Verses	611
Britain, Ancient, and the Invasions of Julius Caesar. T. Rice Holmes	730
Brooke's Romeo and Juliet. Edited by J. J. Munro	657
Brown, H. F. Studies in the History of Venice	383
Browning. Augustine Birrell	849
By Many Streams. Elizabeth Gibson	334
Cadogan, E. The Life of Cavour	382
Caine, Hall. Cobwebs of Criticism	778
Cain, G. Promenades dans Paris	827
Canada, Protection in, Sixty Years of. Edward Porritt	553
Cardinals, English, Story of the. Rev. C. S. Isaacson	613
Carotti, Dr. G. A History of Art	922
Castberg, P. H. Production, A Study in Economics	638
Cavour, The Life of. Edward Cadogan	382
Censor, The Stage. G. M. G.	412
Chapman, George. All Fools and the Gentleman Usher	336
Chatelaine of Vergi, The. Translated by Lucy Kempe-Welche	531
Children's Children. Gertrude Bone	615
Children's Encyclopedia, The	666
China, The Native Fiction of. J. R. C.	369
Church, Christian, A History of the, Since the Reformation	409
Claude, M., Chief of Police under the Second Empire, Memoirs of	529
Coleridge, M. E. Poems	437
Coleridge's Literary Criticism	732
Collins, The Poems of	851
Colton, A. Harps Hung up in Babylon	437
Colum, Padraic. Wild Earth	611
Comedy of Errors, The	562
Conolly, Edward. Nugæ Latine	611
Constitution, The Dawn of the: The Reign of Henry III. and Edward I. Sir James H. Ramsay	923
Conway, R. S. Virgil's Messianic Eclogue	315
Courtney, W. L. The Literary Man's Bible	359
Cowan, S. The Royal House of Stuart	681
Cradle of the Deep, The. Frederick Treves	825
Crane, Walter. An Artist's Reminiscences	312
Crescent versus the Cross, The. Halil Halid	433, 483
Crete, The Palaces of Crete and their Builders. Angelo Mosso	363
Crime, The Story of, from the Cradle to the Grave	529
Critical Essays of the Seventeenth Century. Edited by J. C. Spingarn	729

REVIEWS—continued

Criticism, Cobwebs of. Hall Caine	778
Dalrymple, C. In the Footsteps of Marco Polo	636
Davidson, A. M. Campbell. Present Day Japan	609
Infanta of Portugal and Queen Consort of England	708
Day's Journey, The. C. Lewis Hind	611
Diary of a Looker-on, The. C. Lewis Hind	780
Doughty, C. M. Adam Cast Forth	634
Wanderings in Arabia	531
Doyle, A. Conan. Through the Magic Door	385
Drake, A. E. Discoveries in Hebrew, Gaelic, Gothic, Anglo-Saxon, Latin, Basque, and other Caucasian Languages	660
Drama, Tragic, Types of. C. E. Vaughan	633
Drayton, Michael. Minor Poems of	330
Duchess, The Story of a Beautiful, being an account of the Life and Times of Elizabeth Gunning, Duchess of Hamilton and Argyll, by Horace Blackley	338
Dynasts, The. Thomas Hardy	353
Dyott's Diary, 1783-1845. R. W. Jeffrey	805
Education, Personality and Crime. Albert Wilson	807
Edwards, Zachary. Avilion and other Poems	334
Egypt and Western Asia in the Light of Recent Discoveries. L. W. King and H. R. Hall	337
Ellis, Havelock. The Soul of Spain	754
England, The Government of. Professor A. Lawrence Lowell	924
England, The History of, during the Reign of Victoria, 1837-1901. Sidney Low and Lloyd C. Sander	757
Eothen, A. W. Kinglake	778
Epic, Greek, The Rise of the. Gilbert Murray	458
Essays and Studies, Historical, by the First Lord Acton	508
Ethics, of Revolt, The. Greville Macdonald	708
Ethics, The New. J. Howard Moore	437
Etymology, Significant. The Very Rev. J. Mitchell	734
Evans, C. S. Swords and Ploughshares	334
Eyck, Van. Hubert and John: Their Life and Work. W. H. J. Weale	658
Fair Penitent and Jane Shore, The. Nicholas Rowe	336
Field, Michael. Wild Honey	437
Fleet, Champions of the. Edward Fraser	557
Flora, The Origin of a Land	756
Flosculi Græci Boreales sive Anthologia Græca	755
Aberdonensis. Joannes Harrower	613
Flower Grouping. Margaret Waterfield	433
Folk Lore of the Holy Land. J. E. Hanauer	433
Forster, Right Hon. H. O. Arnold. English Socialism of To-day	807
Fowler, W. W. Virgil's Messianic Eclogue	315
Fox-hunting Recollections. Sir Reginald Graham	829
Fraser, D. The Marches of Hindustan	754
Fraser, E. Champions of the Fleet	557
F. R. B. Barbauld. Past and Present	320
From the Shadow. Elizabeth Gibson	437
Fyfe, W. Hamilton. Tacitus: Dialogus Agricola	779
Germany	613
Gardening for Women. Hon. Frances Wolsey	334
Garden of Shadows. Ethel Atkinson	613
Garden Pests, The Book of. Hooper Pearson	334
Gibson, Elizabeth. By Many Streams	437
From the Shadow	437
Gibson, J. P. S. R. Shakespeare's Use of the Supernatural	657
Gibson, W. W. On the Threshold	437
The Web of Life	611
G. M. G. The Stage Censor	412
Goethe's Poetry and Truth	778
Goethe, The Life of. Albert Bielowowsky	852
Goodchild, W. Precious Stones	684
Gordon, S. P. Birds of the Loch and Mountain	612
Graham, Sir R. Fox-hunting Recollections	829
Graves, C. J. Humours of the Fray	334
Greece and the Ægean Islands. P. S. Marden	660
Greene's Pandosto. Edited by P. G. Thomas	657
Greenwood, G. G. The Shakespeare Problem	900
Restated	900
Gregorovius, Ferdinand, 1852-1874. The Roman Journals of	382
Grey, Sir George. Pioneer of Empire in Southern Lands. George C. Henderson	358
Griffiths, W. E. The Japanese Nation in Evolution	609
Guides, The Story of the. Colonel G. J. Young-husband	829
Gurney, Mrs. Archer. Poems by	611
Gunning, Elizabeth, Duchess of Hamilton and Argyll. An Account of the Life of. Horace Blackley	388
Hadfield, The Proposal	334
Halid, Halil. The Crescent versus the Cross	433
Hall, H. R. Egypt and Western Asia in the Light of Recent Discoveries	337
Hall, H. Fielding. The Inward Light	438
Hanauer, J. E. Folk Lore of the Holy Land	433
Hardy, Thomas. The Dynasts	555
Harps Hung Up in Babylon. Arthur Colton	437
Harrison, J. National and Social Problems	804
Harrower, J. Flosculi Græci Boreales, sive Anthologia Græca Aberdonensis	755
Hearn, Lafcadio. Letters from the Raven	580
Henderson, G. C. Sir George Grey, Pioneer of Empire in Southern Lands	358
Hendon, G. M. Windsor	898
Herodotus, Books VII., VIII., and IX. Reginald W. Macan	802
Hind, C. Lewis. The Diary of a Looker-on	780
Hindustan, The Marches of. David Fraser	754
Holland, C. Old and New Japan	609
Hollard, Sir R. R. Windsor	898
Holmes, T. R. Ancient Britain and the Invasions of Julius Cæsar	730
Howarth, E. G. West Ham. The Report of the Outer London Inquiry Committee	706
Hume, M. The Court of Philip IV.	313
Humours of the Fray. C. L. Graves	334

REVIEWS—continued

Hunt, The Condition of. Nimrod	829
Huntington, E. The Pulse of Asia	636
Hulton, Mary. The Tain: An Irish Epic	437
Hyde Park: Its History and Romance. Mrs. Alec Tweedie	732
Hydromel and Rue. F. Kappey	334
Ibsen, Henrik. The Collected Works of	577
Ibsen, Edmund Gosse	577
Inward Light, The. H. Fielding Hall	438
Isaacson, C. S. Story of the English Cardinals	136
Itinerary, An. Fynes Moryson Gent	336
Japanese Nation in Evolution. William E. Griffiths	609
Japan, Old and New. Clive Holland	609
Japan, Present Day. A. M. Campbell Davidson	609
Jeffery, R. W. Dyott's Diary, 1783-1845	805
Jones, H. S. The Roman Empire	925
J. R. C. The Native Fiction of China	369
Kappey, F. Hydromel and Rue	334
Kempe-Welch, A. Of the Tumbler of Our Lady, and other Miracles	413
The Chatelaine of Vergi	331
Kinglake, A. W. Eothen	778
King Over the Water, The. A. Shield and Andrew Lang	506
King, L. W. Egypt and Western Asia in the Light of Recent Discoveries	337
Labourer, Memoirs of a Surrey. George Bourne	707
Lamb, Charles. Specimens of English Dramatic Poets, Notes	336
Laneham, Robert, Letters. Edited by F. J. Furnivall	657
Lang, A. The King Over the Water	506
Languages, Discoveries in Hebrew, Gaelic, Gothic, Anglo-Saxon, Latin, Basque, and other Caucasian. A. E. Drake	660
Laud, William, Life of. Rev. W. L. Mackintosh	683
Lawson, W. R. John Bull and His Schools	579
Lee, Vernon. The Sentimental Traveller	384
Legouis, Emile. Dans les Sentiers de la Renaissance Anglaise	381
Leith, W. C. Apologia Difidentis	505
Letters from the Raven. Being the Correspondence of Lafcadio Hearn with Henry Watkin. Edited by Milton Bronner	580
Life, The Prolongation of. Elle Metchnikoff	309
Lillo, G. The London Merchant and Fatal Curiosity	336
Literature, European, Periods of. The later Nineteenth Century. George Saintsbury	481
Literature, The Symbolist Movement in. Arthur Symons	613
Lomas, J. In Spain	754
London in the Forties. Memories of. David Masson	922
London Merchant and Fatal Curiosity, The. George Lillo	336
Low, Sidney. The History of England during the Reign of Victoria, 1837-1901	757
Lowell, A. L. The Government of England	924
Lucas, E. V. A Swan and her Friends	337
Lucretius, Epicurean and Poet. John Masson	361
Lucy, H. W. Memories of Eight Parliaments	804
Macan, R. W. Herodotus, Books VII., VIII., and IX.	802
Macaulay, G. C. James Thomson	460
Macdonald, Greville. The Ethics of Revolt	708
Mackenzie, M. C. Poems	437
Mackintosh, W. L. Life of William Laud	683
Magnus, Laurie. Religio Laici Judaici, the Faith of a Jewish Layman	433
Mallock, W. H. A Critical Examination of Socialism	759
Marco Polo, In the Footsteps of. Major C. Dalrymple	636
Marden, P. S. Greece and the Ægean Islands	660
Masson, D. Memories of London in the Forties	922
J. Lucretius, Epicurean and Poet	361
Mayor, J. M. Virgil's Messianic Eclogue	315
Metchnikoff, Elle. The Prolongation of Life	309
Milton, F. Dumas' Paris	827
Mirabeau, the Demi-God. W. R. H. Trowbridge	365
Mitchell, J. Significant Etymology	734
Molmenti, Pompeo. Venice: Its Individual Growth from the Earliest Beginnings to the Fall of the Republic	486
Monteiro, Mariana. The Life of St. Jerome	753
Moore, J. H. The New Ethics	437
Mosso, Angelo. The Palaces of Crete and their Builders	363
Morgan, William de. Somehow Good	507
Murray, Gilbert. The Rise of the Greek Epic	458
Music and Light and other Verses. A. W. Brazier	611
Music in England. A History of. Ernest Walker	314
Mythologies of Ancient Mexico and Peru, The. Lewis Spence	554
National and Social Problems. Frederic Harrison	804
Nature Biographies, Some. John J. Ward	612
Navy, the Royal. Norman Wilkinson. H. L. Swinburne	557
New Worlds for Old. H. G. Wells	759
Niger to the Nile, From the. Lieut. Boyd Alexander	460
Nimrod. The Condition of Hunters	829
Nugie, Latine. Edward Conolly	611
Of the Tumbler of Our Lady and Other Miracles. Translated by Alice Kempe-Welch	413
On the Threshold. Wilfrid Wilson Gibson	437
Osmaston, F. P. B. Poems and Lyrics	437
Owl and the Nightingale, The	336
Painting, Fifty Years of. Modern, Corot to Sargent. J. G. Phythian	635
Pandosto, Greene's. Edited by P. G. Thomas	657
Parerga, Canon Sheehan	826
Paris, Dumas', Francis Miltoun	827
Paris, Promenades dans. Georges Cain	827
Parliament, Fourteen Years in. A. S. T. Griffiths-Boscawen	411

REVIEWS—continued.

Parliaments, Memories of Eight. Henry W. Lucy	804
Pearson, H. The Book of Garden Pests	613
Philip IV., The Court of. Martin Hume	313
Phythian, J. G. Fifty Years of Modern Painting: Corot to Sargent	635
Pisan, Christine de. The Book of the Duke of True Leans	333
Plumptre, Dean. The Tragedies of Sophocles	684
Poetry, The Claims of French. John C. Bailey	311
Poets, English. Hazlitt's Lectures on the	778
Porritt, E. Sixty Years of Protection in Canada	553
Preludes and Harmonies. Conrad Bonacina	437
Production, A Study in Economics. P. H. Castberg	808
Proposal, The. J. Hadfield	334
Ramsay, Sir James H. The Dawn of the Constitution. The Reigns of Henry III. and Edward I.	923
Rambling Recollections. Right Hon. Sir Henry Drummond-Wolf	484
Religio Laici Judaici. The Faith of a Jewish Layman. Laurie Magnus	433
Religion? What is. Wilhelm Bousset	386
Religious Settlement, the Elizabethan. Henry Norbert Birt	462
Renaissance Anglaise, Dans les Sentiers de la. Emile Legouis	381
Revue Germanique	381
Richmond, The Royal Manor of. Mrs. A. G. Bell	880
Robbins, H. Verses, Fancies, and Facts	611
Romeus and Juliet, Brooke's. Edited by J. J. Munro	657
Roman Empire, The. H. Stuart Jones	925
Rossi, L. Melano. The Santuario of the Madonna di Vici	335
Rowe, Nicholas. The Fair Penitent and Jane Shore	336
Rushton, W. L. Shakespeare's Legal Maxims	657
Sabin, A. K. The Wayfarers	334
St. Jerome. The Life of. Mariana Monteiro	753
Saintsbury, George. Periods of. European Literature: The Later Nineteenth Century	481
Sanders, Lloyd C. The History of England during the Regency of Victoria, 1837-1901	757
Santuario of the Madonna di Vici. L. Melano	335
Schools, John Bull and His. W. R. Lawson	579
Soellard, Clinton. Blank Verse Pastels	611
Sculpture, A History of. Ernest A. Short	434
Seals, W. de Gray Birch	610
Sentimental Traveller, The. Vernon Lee	384
Shakespeare, Les Sonnets de	381
Problem Restated, The. G. G. Greenwood	900
The Elizabethan: Love's Labour's Lost, The Merchant of Venice. Edited by William Henry Hudson	657
Shakespeare's Legal Maxims. William Lowes	657
Rushton	657
Use of the Supernatural. Paul S. R. Gibson	657
Youth. The Rogues and Vagabonds of. Edited by Edward Viles and F. J. Furnevall	657
Sheehan, Canon. Paregia	826
Shield, The King Over the Water	506
Short, E. A. History of Sculpture, A.	434
Smith, L. P. The Life and Letters of Sir Henry Wotton	360
Socialism. A Critical Examination of. W. H. Mallock	759
British. J. Ellis Barker	807
English of To-day. Right Hon. H. O. Arnold Forster	807
Somehow Good. William de Morgan	507
Sophocles, The Tragedies of. Dean Plumptre	684
Spain, In. John Lomas	754
Spain, The Soul of. Havelock Ellis	754
Spence, L. The Mythologies of Ancient Mexico and Peru	554
Spingarn, J. E. Critical Essays of the Seventeenth Century	729
Stones, Precious. W. Goodchild	684
Stuart, The Royal House of, from its Origin to the Accession of the House of Hanover. Samuel Cowan	681
Swan and Her Friends, A. E. V. Lucas	337
Swinburne, H. L. The Royal Navy	557
Swords and Ploughshares. E. S. Evans	334
Symons, A. The Symbolist Movement in Literature	613
Tacitus. Dialogus Agricola, Germania. W. Hamilton Fyfe	779
Tain, The. An Irish Epic. Translated by Mary Hulton	437
Tennyson, The Works of	457
Thomson, James. G. C. Macaulay	460
Through the Magic Door. A. Conan Doyle	385
Trench, Herbert. New Poems	578
Treves, Sir Frederick. The Cradle of the Deep	825
Trowbridge, W. R. H. Mirabeau, The Demi-God	365
Tweedie, Mrs. Alec. Hyde Park: Its History and Romance	732
Tynan, Katherine. Poems by	437
United States and its People, A History of the. Elroy McKendree Avery	901
Utopia of Sir Thomas More. The	777
Vaughan, C. E. Types of Tragic Drama	633
Venice. Its Individual Growth from the Earliest Beginnings to the Fall of the Republic. Pompeo Molmenti	486
Venice, Studies in the History of. Horatio F. Brown	383
Verses, Fancies, and Facts. Harold Robbins	611
Virgil, Death of, etc. T. H. Warren	563
Virgil's Messianic Eclogue. J. M. Mayor, W. W. Fowler, R. S. Conway	315
Voltaire, Montesquieu and Rousseau in England	801
Walker, Ernest. A History of Music in England	314
Wantage, Lord. A Memoir by his Wife	333

REVIEWS continued		REVIEWS— continued		REVIEWS— continued
	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Ward, J. J. Some Nature Biographies	612	Web of Life, The. W. W. Gibson	611	Wilson, Mona. West Ham : The Report of the
Warren, T. H. The Death of Virgil	563	Wells, H. G. New Worlds for Old	759	Outer London Inquiry Committee	706
Waterfield, M. Flower Grouping	613	West Ham : The Report of the Outer London		Windsor, George M. Henton and Sir Richard
Waterloo, Before and After. Letters from		Inquiry Committee. Edward G. Howarth and		Rivington Holmes	898
Edward Stanley, J. H. Adams, and M. Grenfell	484	Mona Wilson	706	Wolsley, Hon. F. Gardening for Women ..	613
Wayfarers, The. A. K. Sabia	334	Wild Earth. Padraic Colum	611	Wolff, Right Hon. Sir Henry Drummond.
Weale, B. L. P. The Coming Struggle in Eastern		Wild Honey. Michael Field	437	Rambling Recollections	482
Asia	661	Wilkinson, N. The Royal Navy	557	Younghusband, Col. G. J. The Story of the
Weale, W. H. J. Hubert and John Van Eyck :		Wilson, A. Education, Personality and Crime	807	Guides	829
Their Life and Work	658

SUPPLEMENTS

EDUCATION.

(January 25)

	PAGE
Education : A Glance at Practice. B. P. S.	391
The Schoolmaster's Dream. ARTHUR MACHEN	387
School Books	390

SPRING ANNOUNCEMENTS

(March 21)

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1861

JANUARY 4, 1908

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

UNIVERSITY OF WALES.

MATRICULATION EXAMINATION, 1908.

THE University Court will shortly APPOINT MATRICULATION EXAMINERS as follows:—

SUBJECTS.	PRESENT EXAMINERS.
English Language and the History of England and Wales	*The Rev. T. A. Walker, Litt.D., Litt.D., M.A. Alfred J. Wyatt, M.A. *J. H. Grace, M.A. W. H. Young, M.A., Sc.D., F.R.S.
Mathematics	*Frank Ritchie, M.A. Professor C. Flamstead Walters, M.A.
Latin	V. S. Vernon Jones, M.A.
Greek	*The Rev. Robert Williams, M.A.
Welsh	Professor Ernest Weekes, M.A.
French	Professor A. W. Schuddekopf, Ph.D., M.A.
German	William Watson, D.Sc., F.R.S.
Dynamics	William Watson, D.Sc., F.R.S.
Experimental Mechanics and Heat	H. O. Jones, M.A.
Chemistry	*Professor Michael Cressi Potter, M.A.
Botany

The Examiners whose names are marked with an asterisk have served for the full period of five years.

Particulars will be given by the Registrar of the University, University Registry, Cathays Park, Cardiff, to whom application must be sent on or before January 7th, 1908.

J. MORTIMER ANGUS,
Registrar of the University.
December, 1907.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.

Ynys Prifathrofaol Deheudir Cymru a Mynwy, Caerdydd.

The Council of the College invites applications for the post of ASSISTANT LECTURER IN GREEK.

Further particulars may be obtained from the undersigned, to whom applications with testimonials (which need not be printed) must be sent on or before Friday, January 10th, 1908.

J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A.,
Registrar.
December 31st, 1907.

THE MOSHER BOOKS

THE NEW CATALOGUE FOR 1907 is now ready, and will be sent free on request to booklovers anywhere that can be reached by mail. This Catalogue, like those that preceded it, is not made up of old and hackneyed quotations concerning books. You are not wearied by "a little good book" jingle and that sort of thing, but you are treated to some very genuine prose and verse not seen in every cut and decidedly tied anthology.

THOMAS B. MOSHER, PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

QUEEN SQUARE CLUB.

A social club for men and women interested in politics, literature or art. Lectures, entertainments, chess and bridge. An exquisite Queen's club-house, close to the British Museum, and Russell Square Station. Inexpensive lunch and dinner. Subscription two guineas.—Apply Secretary, 9 Queen Square, Bloomsbury.

NOTICE.

All communications to the Editor should be addressed to 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

All business communications must be sent to The Manager of "The Academy," 95 Fetter Lane, E.C.

Education

KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON (UNIVERSITY OF LONDON).

DEPARTMENT FOR TRAINING TEACHERS FOR SECONDARY SCHOOLS.

Theory, Practice, and History of Education.—J. W. ADAMSON, B.A., Professor (Head of the Department).

Ethics.—Reverend A. CALDECOTT, D.Litt., D.D., Professor.

Psychology.—C. S. MYERS, M.A., M.D., Professor. W. BROWN, B.A., Lecturer.

The Department is recognised by the Board of Education as a Training College for Secondary Teachers under the Teachers' Registration Regulations.

The Course, which includes Practical Work in Secondary Schools, extends over one academical year, beginning in October or January. It is suitable for those who are preparing to take the Teachers' Diploma, University of London, and for the Certificate of the Teachers' Training Syndicate, University of Cambridge.

The Fee is £20 for the year, if paid in advance, or 8 guineas per term (three terms in the year).

Application should be made to

PROF. ADAMSON,
King's College, Strand, W.C.

Books for Sale

ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA, a set in half-morocco, 35 vols., issued by the Times, for nine guineas net; good condition.—Apply W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

ARCTIC EXPLORATION. SVERDRUP (OTTO). Four Years in the Arctic Regions. 2 vols., well illustrated; maps; bound in buckram as issued; published by Longmans, 36/- net, for 9/-; new.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

BOOKS AT ONE-THIRD COST.—

Thousands of the Best Books at from 25 to 80 per cent. below the original prices. Largest and best Stock of Secondhand and New Remainder Books in the World. Write for our January Catalogue.—W. H. SMITH & SON, Library Department, 186 Strand, London, W.C.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical Advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley, Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A Furnished House in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds of Typewriting carefully done at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

MS. TYPED with care, 8d. per 1000 words. MS. Circulars duplicated from 2s. 6d. per 100 (testimonials). Shorthand.—Mrs. JACKSON, 37 Constantine Road, Hampstead, N.W. (late of Rosebery Square Buildings).

Books, etc., Wanted

WILL PURCHASE AT ANY TIME. ILLUMINATED MANUSCRIPTS, from the earliest times till the beginning of the XVIth Century; Incunabula and other Early Printed Books; Illustrated Books, Prints, from the XVth and the beginning of the XVIth Century. Rare Old Books and Prints.—JACQUES ROSENTHAL, Munich, Bavaria. 10, Karlstr. 10.

Art

EXHIBITION OF FURNITURE, Metal Work and Modelled Ceilings, by ERNEST W. GIMSON.—DEBENHAM & FREEBODY'S ART GALLERIES, WIGMORE STREET, W.

THE PONGO PAPERS AND THE DUKE OF BERWICK.

By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS.

With Illustrations by DAVID WHITELAW. 2s. 6d. net.

VANITY FAIR.

"The Duke of Berwick" is the kind of poetry we would like to read when we are sick or sorrowful, for it is pure art unstained by any trace of human emotion or of that sickly business called living. . . .

"The 'Pongo Papers' . . . are a brilliant satire. . . . This is a book which everyone must read."

THE TRIBUNE.

"Lord Alfred Douglas writes a clever preface for a clever little book . . . he exhibits the very difficult art of being utterly foolish. . . . We are very grateful to him. . . . There is real laughter in the 'Pongo Papers'."

COUNTRY LIFE.

"The Duke of Berwick" is delightfully witty and satirical. . . . No one will deny that the finish and execution of Lord Alfred Douglas's work is extraordinary. . . ."

THE OBSERVER.

"Lord Alfred Douglas's entertaining whim of associating inappropriate ethical qualities with various undistinguished members of the brute creation reappears in the 'Pongo Papers.' . . . It is all in the best style of 'nonsense verse,' which consists largely in conveying the minimum of useful information with the maximum of craftsmanship."

THE PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR.

"The 'Pongo Papers,' by Lord Alfred Douglas, contains some of the wittiest verse that has been written in our time. The satire is rapier-like in its thrusts. The solemn methods of modern 'scientific' thinkers come in for some delicious raillery. 'The Duke of Berwick' is full of drollery, and will bear reading more than once. It is difficult to estimate the amount of delicate art and literary culture that have gone to the writing of these astonishingly clever nonsense verses."

London: GREENING & CO., Ltd., 91 St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY 74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON.

MONOCHROME COPIES

BY THE PERMANENT AUTOTYPE CARBON
PROCESS OF PICTURES BY OLD MASTERS.
From the PRINCIPAL COLLECTIONS OF NOTE.

NUMEROUS EXAMPLES OF WORKS BY MODERN ARTISTS

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY'S Processes of Permanent Photographic Reproduction are extensively employed by the Trustees of the British Museum, the Local Government Board, many of the Learned Societies, and leading Publishers.

COPIES OF COINS, SEALS, MEDALS, MSS., DRAWINGS, ENGRAVINGS, ART OBJECTS, MICROSCOPIC WORK, &c.

For limited editions the Autotype processes of Book Illustrations are cheaper than any existing methods of block reproductions, and yield infinitely superior results.

Inquiries are invited from those requiring Book Illustrations of the very highest quality. Specimens and Estimates submitted.

The Autotype Fine Art Gallery, 74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Open Free Daily, 10 to 6.

The Booklovers Library

delivers books in London and to any part of the United Kingdom. Its books are unlabelled, fresh, clean and inviting. It gives you a carriage-paid service or not, just as you wish. It gives you the books you want when you want them.

FOR LONDON AND COUNTRY.

ORDINARY SERVICE.

	Twelve Months	Six Months	Three Months
One Book ...	£1 1 0	£ 12 0	£ 7 0
Two Books ...	1 11 6	1 18 0	10 6
Three Books ...	1 17 0	1 1 0	12 0
Four Books ...	2 2 0	1 4 0	14 0
Six Books ...	2 12 6	1 11 6	16 0
Eight Books ...	3 3 0	1 16 0	18 0

Subscribers to the above service may exchange their books personally or by messenger as often as desired at the Library in Harrod's Stores, and at 17 Hanover Street, W. Country Subscribers to the above service may exchange their books by Rail or Parcels Post, as often as desired, paying carriage both ways. All boxes of books are forwarded to subscribers in advance; the finished volumes being returned to the Library upon receipt of fresh supply. The cost of carriage on four books, by rail, is in almost every case the same as on two or three books.

Booklet giving full terms of Subscription, the latest Monthly Book List, etc., will be sent Post Free upon application.

The Booklovers Library
17 Hanover Street, London, W.
And at Harrod's Limited, Brompton Road, S.W.

The New Album of Modes

"The Recognised Fashion Authority"

Edited by MISS A. MEEHAN

The "New Album" is published on the 20th of each month and is on Sale at all Bookstalls and Newsagents throughout the Kingdom.

PRICE 1/- MONTHLY

The "New Album" is a Ladies' Paper of the very highest class, and is three months in advance of all other Fashion Journals.

Annual Subscription to any part of the World, 15/- post free

Where any difficulty is experienced in obtaining a copy, send 1s. 3d. for a specimen, Post Free, to the Manager, "New Album," 95 Fetter Lane, London, E.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
Life and Letters	307	Three Notes	317
A Dream	309	The Craving for Print	319
Literature :		Barbados : Past and Present	320
Pathological Optimism	309	The Library Table	322
An English Critic of French		Fiction	323
Poetry	311	The Drama :
An Artist's Reminiscences	312	The Revival of "Arms and the
Spain in Stuart Times	313	Man"	324
English Music	314	Correspondence	325
The Christmas Eclogue	315	Books Received	326

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields.

The publishing offices of THE ACADEMY are at 95 Fetter Lane, E.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

WE have received a further letter from Mr. Garnett, in which he explains that the reason he did not object to our version of his lecture at the Playgoers' Club before he heard from Mr. Courtney, is that his attention had not previously been drawn to that version. He also explains that his reference to "running with the hare and hunting with the hounds" was made to the Daily Telegraph, and not personally to the dramatic critic of the Daily Telegraph; and this distinction is apparently in his eyes a very important one. So be it. We can only regret that we should have given unnecessary publicity to the entirely unimportant remarks of Mr. Garnett, and register a fervent vow that we will not be so rash as to attempt to report his utterances in future. We are unable to print Mr. Garnett's letter, because he does not confine himself to the matter at issue, but allows himself to indulge in reflections which are on the borderland of impertinence with regard to the policy of THE ACADEMY as misinterpreted by himself. He refers, among other things, to the "animus" we have displayed against Mr. Courtney. The idea that we have any animus against the distinguished dramatic critic of the Daily Telegraph is too obviously grotesque to call for any denial on our part. If any animus exists, or existed, it lies in the words of Mr. Garnett, of which we endeavoured to give a résumé in our report of the proceedings. According to Mr. Garnett, this endeavour was an unsuccessful one, and there is the end of the matter.

Mr. Hall Caine has joined the noble ranks of Zadkiel, Old Moore, Raphael, and their great Eighteenth Century prototype, Partridge. But, wiser than his rivals, he only prophesies about the past; for on Sunday last he informed the editor of the Daily Mail that he knew that the Druce coffin contained not lead but a human body, the body of the late T. C. Druce. Fancy that! We do not wish to impugn the sagacity of the great Manx writer, but there were others who, though they did not communicate with "Marlowe's mighty line" expressed the same conviction some ten years ago. "I come here on a principle of my own," said Uncle Joseph in the "Wrong Box," when he was discovered at a public house. "The principle is commoner than you suppose," observed Mr. Michael Finsbury, his nephew. As an establisher of precedent, Mr. Hall Caine should become almost as famous as Mr. Robert Caldwell in the higher and harder field of affidavit making. All our distinguished men of letters may now be expected to prophesy, of course, in the columns of the Daily Mail, which is more trustworthy about the future than it ever was about the past.

We may expect communications of this kind: "In August last Mr. George Meredith made a remarkable prognostication, which, out of consideration for Mr. Sidney Lee, we were quite unable to publish—Mr. Meredith wrote: 'I know that during the coming autumn no further light will be thrown on establishing the identity between Bacon and Shakespeare. If you ask how I know, I answer, that as a student of life, I know it, exactly with such kind and certainty of knowledge as is possessed by my eminent contemporary, Mr. Hall Caine.' The veteran novelist was quite opposed to the opening of the grave at Stratford-on-Avon, being convinced after many years' consideration that the body interred there was that of William Shakespeare." Or again: "Mr. Edmund Gosse last February informed us that the House of Lords would not be abolished this year; the delightful author of 'Father and Son' added, significantly, that as long as he remained Librarian it was not likely to be abolished for some years to come. We were very anxious to publish this information, but on consulting our solicitors we decided that the audacious prediction might influence the present Government in its policy. For even more cogent reasons we were obliged to withhold Professor Sidney Colvin's astonishing message to the Daily Mail 'that no government, Liberal or Conservative, would contemplate the sale of the print room at the British Museum to Mr. Pierpont Morgan.' Now that the year is over we have no hesitation in making this public as nothing we can say at this juncture can really damage the proposed purchase, if anything of the kind is contemplated by Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman."

Mr. Hall Caine's protest against the "desecration" at Highgate Cemetery sounds like a sob from Mr. Jerry Cruncher on the introduction of Cremation. Othello's occupation would have been gone but for that same desecration. There are other and easier modes of exhumation than the mere physical inspection of a coffin and its contents. The breath was scarcely out of the late Mr. Rossetti's body before Mr. Hall Caine romped into print with a compilation of trivial anecdotes, told with all the gusto of a retired valet from whom the key of the cupboard containing the family skeleton has been providentially wrested. And, having built his name on this foundation he proceeded to pour forth those grotesque novels which are accepted by the ignorant and uneducated as works of literature containing moral truths and realistic pictures of modern life. In "Who's Who" we learn without surprise that Mr. Hall Caine "had a good deal to do with the breakdown of the three-volume novel." Another Sidonia, he has danced one on the coffin of Mr. Druce. A good title for his new book would be, "The Return of the Druces," without acknowledgments to Mr. Robert Browning.

"The Festive Season" has not been without its effect on our lively contemporary Vanity Fair. A writer in its columns, after some rather muddled and absolutely irrelevant remarks about the Daily Telegraph and "earnest conceit," proceeds to quote from a letter signed "In Nubibus" which appeared in our correspondence columns the week before last. The writer of this letter made some flattering remarks about THE ACADEMY, and the Vanity Fair scribe refers to these remarks as "fatuous self praise." What does the poor gentleman mean? If "A" writes to the Jacksonville Eagle and refers to it as "your valuable paper," does that constitute "fatuous self praise" on the part of the Jacksonville Eagle? Vanity Fair should beware of judging other papers by itself. On THE ACADEMY we don't write the correspondence in our own office, whatever may be the custom on Vanity Fair.

We are glad that the authorities have at last awakened to the necessity of doing something to put an end to the disgraceful license of the atheists and "free-thinkers" who pollute the air with their disgusting blasphemies at Highbury Corner and elsewhere. One of these persons has been arrested on the charge of blasphemy. We are constantly pointing out that the attitude of the police and magistrates towards these people is unnecessarily tender. By doing so we have incurred the wrath of our amiable contemporary, the Freethinker, which was good enough, the other day, to point out to us that even an atheist is a citizen of this country, and as such entitled to the protection of the police. We cordially agree. An atheist is a citizen and so is a man in the most infectious stage of scarlet fever, and so, for the matter of that, is a convicted murderer. All these persons are equally entitled to the protection of the police. The murderer must not be lynched, but must be disposed of by the proper process of the law; the gentleman with scarlet fever must be put into an isolated ward or room to avoid the danger to others of infection; and the atheist should be constrained to do his "freethinking" by himself and not inflict its contagion on the ignorant and the foolish. Nobody wishes him to be persecuted, but he should not be allowed to persecute other people, and those who venture to disagree with him and have the temerity to tell him so in public should not be "run in," and fined, as some unfortunate man was not long ago.

Many people will hear with regret the news of the death of Mr. Leonard Smithers. He will be remembered as the proprietor and publisher of the Savoy Magazine, to which Aubrey Beardsley contributed some of his best drawings. He also published the "Ballad of Reading Gaol," and for a short time kept in Bond Street one of the best booksellers' shops in London. He had an unrivalled knowledge of books, a real love of literature, and a fine taste in all matters of artistic knowledge. In spite of some failings he was a man of genuine kind-heartedness, and his generous treatment of Ernest Dowson will be remembered to his credit. Mr. Smithers died in great poverty and leaves a son of sixteen years, who is unfortunately almost entirely without means of support.

The Bishop of Gloucester has apparently revoked a license to preach in his diocese, which he had granted to a certain ancient retired incumbent, the Rev. W. Lockett, because that old gentleman persists in preaching in Nonconformist chapels. Apparently Mr. Lockett's only reason for doing so is the singularly inconclusive one that the incumbent recently appointed to his parish church, a Mr. Amps, is what he calls a "ritualist." Our Nonconformist contemporary, the Daily News, affects pain at the normal result of Mr. Lockett's continued insubordination. It expresses its opinion in the usual phrase that "the Bishop's action will create as much indignation in the country generally as it has created in the diocese of Gloucester." It may, but how much indignation is that? And does our contemporary mean by the truly nonconforming use of the ambiguous word "diocese," indignation among the only people whom the Bishop's very reasonable action the least affects, the Churchmen whose diocesan he is, or the political Nonconformists who live in that part of the county of Gloucester which comprises the diocese? If it means the Nonconformists, our contemporary may possibly be able to work up some feeling as a political plank. If it means the Churchmen, we imagine that they had sufficient experience, before Dr. Gibson's arrival, of the efforts of senility to be at all inclined to sympathise with a retired clergyman of eighty, who lends himself as a nucleus for working up political capital for the Daily News.

Dr. Gibson might reasonably expect that a clergyman with fifty years' experience was aware when he applied for a license that the license excluded permission to preach in Nonconformist chapels. Since Mr. Lockett persists in ignoring that fact Dr. Gibson has had the unpleasing duty of proving to him that even at eighty he is not too old to learn. We know nothing of Mr. Lockett, except his age, but if he has really assumed the truculent attitude attributed to him by the Daily News, we suspect that, like "the old prophet," he is a confirmed strayer from his beat; if so, he has no one but himself to thank that he has met his lion at last. It would be difficult to find a tamer one than Dr. Gibson in the whole episcopal lair, as his conduct on the Ritual Commission has already shown. Where does the injustice at which the Daily News affects to be pained lie? It lies quite plainly in its own eye. When a political Nonconformist organ, like our contemporary, talks about a diocese, suggests the advantages to be derived by the clergy from Liberation, and asserts that Disestablishment would allow both Mr. Lockett and Mr. Amps to preach where they like, it is merely fingering by anticipation the proceeds of Disendowment with which it is hoping to re-endow its own political sect. Are there, among the clergy who would like to preach in Nonconformist chapels with Mr. Lockett, any sheep so foolish as not to recognise the voice of the old wolf?

A writer in the Musical News is very indignant with THE ACADEMY because it loves not the works of Stainer, Barnby, Gadsby and Garrett, and the remarks on this subject which appeared not long ago in its columns are, we are informed by our contemporary, indicative of the "ignorance and prejudice" of their writer. The Musical News, referring to those remarks, says: "Musicians are quite able to assess at its paper value such an outpouring as this," an observation which we don't quite follow. What is the "paper value" of an "outpouring," and how does a "musician" set about the task of "assessing" it? Against the implied assumption that anyone writing in THE ACADEMY on the subject of music must, of course, not be a musician it would be useless to protest. We merely note it as a curiosity of "musical" journalism. The Musical News goes on to observe that "curiously enough, an article in the Church Times . . . is evidently written from much the same point of view as that in THE ACADEMY." Curiouser and curiouser! We are cheered to find that THE ACADEMY is not the only victim of "ignorance and prejudice" on the subject of music among contemporary journals. It seems somehow to increase the "paper value" of its outpourings.

A DREAM

I.

I walked alone
 In a land of my own—
 Hills of sleep enringed it round;
 Deep and broad
 With never a ford
 The river broke from under the ground.

II.

Trees leant over it,
 Reeds did cover it,
 Down the middle the sunlight went;
 There clouds rested
 Heavily crested—
 White on the water they leaned content.

III.

And here, and there,
 A delicate air
 Laid on the river its faint lace fan;
 The tall reeds bowed
 And the bulrush proud—
 Hither and thither the light wave ran.

IV.

The sun upclomb
 To the high blue dome—
 Set in the heaven, he watched the plain—
 Watched his fill
 Till the stream was still
 And the face of the pastures cracked in pain.

V.

The tall reeds drooped
 And the bulrush stooped;
 The sweet air choked, as the sun did gaze.
 The far plain glimmered
 With heat that shimmered,
 The feet of the mountains were ringed with haze.

VI.

On moved the sun;
 One by one
 Forth from the heavens the eye-clouds stept;
 The wind blew starkly,
 The stream ran darkly—
 Day hid her face in her hands, and wept.

X. Y. Z.

LITERATURE

PATHOLOGICAL OPTIMISM

The Prolongation of Life. By ELIE METCHNIKOFF, Sub-Director of the Pasteur Institute. Translated by P. CHALMERS MITCHELL, D.Sc. OXON., F.R.S., Secretary of the Zoological Society of London. (London: William Heinemann, 12s. 6d. net.)

FOUR years ago Professor Metchnikoff, the famous author of the theory of phagocytosis as an explanation of the phenomena of immunity in disease, wrote a volume which was translated admirably into English by Dr. Chalmers Mitchell under the title "The Nature of Man: Studies in Optimistic Philosophy." This book, to which he has written the sequel we are considering, was intended to assist us to frame a more hopeful conception of life by arousing in us the instinct of death. The words sound like a contribution to a smart dialogue in a modern play, but, nevertheless, they have a meaning. Professor Metchnikoff's two-fold argument was then (and, it may be added, is now) as follows: (1) Human misery and suffering are due to disturbances in our organic equilibrium, which produce discords in our structure and tormenting doubts in our inner consciousness. (2) These disturbances in equilibrium are themselves the result of man's inheritance from remote animal ancestors, which is of such a complex character that many remnants of structure, many instincts in habit, and many impulses in behaviour remain active in us when our environment no longer calls for them, and, indeed, when it may be in active opposition to their presence. In "The Nature of Man" Professor Metchnikoff developed this argument with all the skill of a first-class dialectician and reinforced it by brilliant biological investigations. With transparent sincerity he set himself in opposition to the whole of religion and philosophy—at any rate, he found them equally unsatisfactory, for he declared that where faith in creeds and codes could do nothing to console suffering humanity, science could do all or most. And, as in the previous volume, so in the one before us he regards theological or philosophical systems as owing their origin to an all-permeating dread of death, the teachings of resignation and of wisdom being the outcome of a desire on the part of the leaders of thought to console their followers for impending dissolution. In elaboration of this view he holds that the bitterness of death lies in its unnecessary or premature occurrence, and in our knowledge that we are wound up for a longer period than it takes us to run down; so that if science can put off the evil day for a man until instinct tells him that his normal course is over, much of the miserable anticipation of annihilation will be abolished, and the world will be the happier in proportion. Such is the text of "The Prolongation of Life," the English version of which is also due to Dr. Chalmers Mitchell.

Professor Metchnikoff sets about the expounding of his text in an orderly manner, indeed, one of the attractions of the book is the way in which the speculations are arranged in the sequence which a lawyer would employ in stating a case. First he quotes the comparative frequency of centenarians as proving that unresisting acquiescence in the occurrence of normal death at the age of three-score years and ten is already illogical where the more civilised and better instructed nations of to-day are in question, whatever it might have been in the case of those whom David was addressing when he describes four-score years as the time-limit of man's vital strength. Here the view that the utility of man and woman to the race disappears with the power or possibility of reproduction is challenged, and the reason for the author's attitude is clear, inasmuch as death at the age of seventy, when we recall the average duration of the productive periods of the two sexes, implies a very liberal span of life. Professor Metchnikoff, who later points out the obvious fact that there is good work to be done in the world by men and women who have ceased to propagate their species, suggests that sterility arrives too soon among us, and refuses to endorse any deductions as to the normal span of human life which are drawn from a consideration of the length of the productive period as we understand it. He demonstrates that the power to reproduce is in some instances very persistent, not weakening progressively with age—note, for example, the behaviour of hair and nails—and from this he concludes that other organs and appendages might remain active longer if they were protected. This brings him to the circumstances which are adverse to such activity, and his explanation of their evil influence is dependent on the ingenious pathological theory of phagocytosis, which originally made him famous. Senility he regards as the result of a form of phagocytosis, in which cells of a higher organisation are gradually destroyed by devouring cells termed macrophages, degeneration then occurring as the specific tissue is replaced by the invaders. When depreciation in the working value of a specific tissue—muscle, nerve or what not—has proceeded to the point of inactivity, senility has arrived, and Professor Metchnikoff designs to show that this mournful date can be greatly postponed by careful attention. The macrophages owe their presence and sinister multiplication, he surmises, to our habits as well as to our inheritance of an inadequate physiology or a muddled anatomy, and we have to decide how to annul the evil of these habits, seeing that we can never or seldom correct our physiology or our anatomy.

So far the author has had only man, including woman, in contemplation. At this point he turns aside to examine the conditions prevalent in the animal kingdom, seeking if anything in the lives of those lower beings with whom we are connected directly by the chain of evolution—on this point Professor Metchnikoff allows no doubt whatever—will give a clue to the causes that prolong life in them, or to the causes that may unduly shorten their careers as much as they shorten ours. A rapid review of events in the lives of the animal kingdom, in which review traditions are now and again cited as well as accepted facts, invites us to come to the conclusion that many mammals, like the human race, do not live as long as they should, and indicates that the reason of this may be something in their structure. Size has nothing to do with the duration of life, the fact that the elephant, the largest animal, enjoys also the greatest span of life being a coincidence not capable of any explanation; man is the longest-lived mammal next to the elephant, though his bulk is so inconsiderable when compared with that of the giraffe, the camel, the hippopotamus, the rhinoceros, the buffalo, or the horse. The period of gestation, the period of growth, and the sum of these two have all been supposed to be worth study as forming a basis for prognosing the duration of the whole life of an animal, but scrutiny of the facts, confining ourselves to mammals, shows that no rules exist by which the uterine sojourn or the term of growth can be used as a definite ratio upon which to calculate the whole period of existence. When we turn from the mammals to consider the case of birds, fishes, and reptiles we find evidence to show that many of these are more long-lived than man. Parrots are known to live for 80 or 100 years, and this great age is commoner perhaps among them than among men; if there is anything in popular report pike and carp live for enormous periods; water tortoises live as long as one-hundred-and-fifty years. We are almost constrained to look for some structural difference giving birds and reptiles an advantage over mammals, and in particular is it reasonable to do so if we suspect that many mammals, like men, die before their course is truly run, while birds, fishes, and reptiles escape this fate. Professor Metchnikoff is certain that what we term the lower mammals, even more than men, suffer from premature death, and he brings such good evidence forward in support of his belief that a certain kind of moraliser might well take note of this section of his book. We hear much of the degeneracy of the age, and of the physical deterioration that is surely following on our soft and profligate habits. Experts on recruiting, eloquent Roman preachers, broad-minded Anglican prelates, as well as half-informed popular lecturers and faddists of every brand have recently warned this country that our manhood is effete. They have done good by calling attention to such obvious things as the evils that are engendered in the populace by vile housing, insanitary habits, ignorance, and alcoholism; but they do not all stop there, for some of them ask us to see in the simple appetites and unsophisticated manners of the beasts of the field an example of behaviour, the following of which would lead to a sounder public health. Now, all the figures of statisticians show that man's expectation of survival has increased of recent years, in spite of the vastly enhanced complexity of the social scheme. This complexity has brought with it evils of which we are all aware, but they are more than balanced by the wider spread of knowledge. It is a little rash to suggest the career of the beast of the field as a hygienic or dietetic model to us when man appears to be progressing in health and strength, unless it can be shown that these identical beasts possess an expectation of life comparing favourably with that of man. This cannot be shown. On the contrary, Professor Metchnikoff's view that beasts in a state of nature die prematurely seems incontrovertible. As, then, the giraffe is not worried by his bridge losses, as the nerves of the hippopotamus are not affected by the whirligig of American finance, as the statistics of mortality among lions bear no relation to the consumption of alcohol in deserts, we are bound to believe that the poor resistance of many members of the animal kingdom to early dissolution is due to something which acts potently and inimically, even where the life led is quite primitive.

Professor Metchnikoff believes that the peccant something is the conformation of the intestine in mammals. He puts this question: Mammals being on the one hand shorter-lived than birds and the lower vertebrates, whereas, on the other hand, the large intestine is much longer in them than in any other vertebrates—"Is there here any link of causality binding the two characters, or is it a mere coincidence?" His reply is that the development of the large intestine is the source of danger to mammals, because the gut becomes the store-house of germs, the home of putrefaction, and so the starting-point of auto-intoxication, auto-intoxication being, he holds, the cause of premature death among men, as among many of those denizens of the wood and plain whose simple habits we are enjoined to imitate. Carnivorous animals, even more than men, the author suggests, partake of a diet with which they are unable to deal owing to this inconvenient piece of gut; and they die prematurely of the retention and absorption of germs, from the action of which the light-moving bird and the torpid reptile are exempt through their more simple anatomy. Such is the tangible outcome of Professor Metchnikoff's researches. He finds by discussion of various points that men should live longer than they do; he finds that many mammals, whose freedom from the worries of higher civilisation should cause them to live longer than men, live, as a matter of fact, a shorter time; and he finds in the circumstance that birds and reptiles, which live longer than might be expected considering all things, have a different anatomy from mammals. Thus he arrives at the conclusion that the main drawback to the extension of human life to some such period as 100 years for a normal man and woman, taking full advantage of the benefits accruing from accumulated knowledge of hygiene, is the possession of a pattern of intestine wherein putrefaction can occur readily, and wherefrom deteriorating absorption may take place freely. If this be so, and Professor Metchnikoff's position is a strong one, what is to be done? Manifestly the defaulting intestine cannot be removed as a routine procedure, so that the only practical course is to remedy the putrefaction. Professor Metchnikoff's advice is to have recourse to the ingestion of lactic acid, or, to be more accurate, of cultures of the lactic bacilli, which, on becoming acclimatised in the human digestive tube and finding there the requisites for their subsistence, will thrive and produce disinfecting bodies able to counteract the auto-intoxication. He discusses at length experiments on mice and men to prove his point, adduces in its support the longevity of the races who use some form of soured milk as a staple of their diet, and discusses the relative merits as foods of sauerkraut and marinated vegetables, fish preserved in oil and vinegar, kwass, kephir, protokwacha, koumiss, yahourth, leben or matzoon and varenétz. Of these he considers that the last three must be used boiled, the value of sterilisation of food by heat being fully recognised, while the author must not be regarded as a vegetarian taking the liberty of adding milk and cheese to a vegetarian diet, for it is a direct outcome of his teaching that uncooked vegetables are thoroughly dangerous food. The book must be read to appreciate the many things which he brings forward having a direct bearing on his therapeutical views. The outcome of his teaching is that we must avoid intestinal putrefaction by strict attention to the laws of hygiene, and correct it, if possible, when it has occurred by recourse to cultures of lactic bacilli.

We doubt whether the message will bring the gladness to the heart of mankind which Professor Metchnikoff's sub-title, "Optimistic Studies," promises, for if everything that the author says be accepted, the alternative to the melancholy produced by a sense of an unfairly brief life may be replaced among us by the melancholy due to the anticipation of a century of unpleasing diet. This, however, is not the impression that should be left upon more thoughtful readers, who will understand that the method proposed for dealing with the tricks and manners of our large intestines is but a forecast, and a forecast having only a limited application, of the sort of thing that may become accepted knowledge with far wider bearings. The glad part of Professor Metchnikoff's message lies in the assurance that we are born to live longer and stronger lives than we do, and that much may be expected in the future from enlightened attention to food and a more general comprehension of the scientific principles of feeding.

AN ENGLISH CRITIC OF FRENCH POETRY

The Claims of French Poetry: Nine Studies in the greater French Poets. By JOHN C. BAILEY. (Constable, 7s. 6d. net.)

At a comparatively early age Mr. Bailey has reached, if only temporarily, the honourable and responsible position of Editor of the Quarterly Review. Those who turn to his delightful book on the French poets (supposing that they do not know his introduction to his own edition of Cowper) will be at once reassured as to the sort of treatment that poetry is likely to receive under his reign in that once dreaded and murderous journal. Let those who wish to make up their minds quickly read Mr. Bailey's introductory chapter—so gentle yet so profound, so scholarly yet so human, so broad of view yet so secure as to what poetry is and is not—and thence turn on to his chapter on Heredia, and study his treatment of that most difficult, most entrancing of modern poets.

We have passed through Hugo and Leconte de Lisle to reach him, have seen the "period of expansion" in the Romantic movement, and its period of concentration, which brought us (according to Mr. Bailey following M. Jules Lemaitre) to the "Parnassiens," with Heredia as their greatest name, greater—so we understand him—than Gautier himself. But we need not press the point, any more than we need press the classification, the arrangement of periods, movements which Mr. Bailey, who has an orderly mind, finds it convenient to adopt. Anyone can do that sort of thing; can tell of periods and movements and tendencies, can attempt to make a Darwinian genealogical tree of poetry and poets; and if Mr. Bailey had stopped there his book would have been as negligible as all the books which are written yearly by well-intentioned schoolmaster-critics who have no special susceptibility to or comprehension of poetry. As soon as Mr. Bailey gets to work, his reader finds that he is in the hands of someone who is qualified to speak on poetry, which is a very different thing from periods. After making it perfectly clear that he does not put Heredia on a level with Pindar, he writes of the point of affinity between Pindar, seer and prophet as well as poet, and a simple artist like Heredia. There are no ethics in "Les Trophées." Their subject is the world of facts, not that of our explanations of these facts, or of our attempts to find for ourselves rules for right conduct in dealing with them. But though Heredia does not know how to pass, as Pindar does, from the small events that are visible on the surface of life to the deep things that lie unseen below them, he has more than a little of the gift which Pindar applies alike to the treatment of great things and small, the gift of a style of unequalled felicity.

And then follows this admirable paragraph:

That is his peculiar contribution to the literature of the nineteenth century. He has shown us once more how perfect a thing human speech can be. And those who have any turn for these things know that a great triumph of art like this is not an isolated achievement, appealing only to the æsthetic side of human nature, but that it comes home to the whole of our being, sense, and intellect, and soul. The highest art has rarely a moral intention, but always a moral effect, for it lifts us into an atmosphere in which all the lower side of life seems unworthy and impossible, much as an early Christian felt who was not afraid to say that the weary and heavy-laden could not fail to forget their cares and sorrows while they stood before the great Zeus of Phidias.

Mr. Bailey writes for the intelligent reader of poetry rather than for the expert. His object is "to attempt to discover, and then to illustrate, what may be a reasonable attitude for an English lover of poetry to take up with regard to some of the poets of France"—an object completely attained in the introduction and the following chapters on English taste and French drama, Marot, Ronsard, La Fontaine, Chénier, Hugo, Leconte de Lisle and Heredia. It was outside his province to give anything like a technical study of the methods of Heredia, of the actual arrangement of sounds by which he gains his effects. It was sufficient for him to point out what those effects are, to show how a sensitive and scholarly critic is affected by these exquisite works of art. As to the details of the process by which the effects were obtained, the hungry sheep look up and are not fed by those art critics who talk nothing but studio jargon. And yet, in a case like that of Heredia, where workmanship, the mere arrangement of sounds, is of such capital importance, a very long and very interesting chapter might be written, for instance, on Heredia's use of the last two lines of a sonnet. If you use the Shakespearean form, you are almost compelled either to make the final couplet a summing-up, a concentrated and possibly epigrammatical statement of your point, or to make it a surprise, a sudden denial or modification of all that the three quatrains have stated. In either case you must hit with your final couplet. It must be forcible and sharp. In the Petrarchan sonnet, the last two lines must be neither, if they are to carry out the perfect recoil from the octave. And yet, from the very fact that the human memory is imperfect, the last two lines are those which have the strongest effect; and many a promising sonnet has been spoiled—particularly among those of youthful sonneteers—by the attempt to keep something forcible, often something heavy or grandiose, for the last two lines, and make an effect with them which may tell at the moment, but will be found to ruin the shape and balance of a poetic form which depends upon shape and balance more than any other. This is one of the principal difficulties encountered in this most difficult of poetic forms. And Heredia's conquest of it is one of his most admirable achievements. Mr. Bailey (who has a way of quoting the right things) quotes the wonderful "Le Laboureur":

Le semoir, la charrue, un jong, des socs luisants,
La herse, l'aiguillon et la faux acérée
Qui fauchait en un jour les épis d'une airée,
Et la fourche qui tend la gerbe aux paysans;

Ces outils familiers, aujourd'hui trop pesants,
Le vieux Parmi les voue à l'immortelle Rhée
Par qui le germe éclôt sous la terre sacrée.
Pour lui, sa tâche est faite; il a quatre-vingt ans.

Près d'un siècle, au soleil, sans en être plus riche,
Il a poussé le couteau au travers de la friche;
Ayant vécu sans joie, il vieillit sans remords.

Mais il est las d'avoir tant peiné sur la glèbe
Et songe que peut-être il faudra, chez les morts,
Labourer des champs d'ombre arrosés par l'Érèbe.

In discussing that sonnet Mr. Bailey rightly calls attention to the "grand effect produced, not by sound, or by picture, but by a thought as true as it is finely imagined or employed." Sound, of course, has something to do with it. Labourer des champs d'ombre—the words drag like the dreary eternity of toil the old man sees before him. And in other cases (as in the sonnet to Une Ville Morte) Heredia more definitely employs the onomatopoeic effects which it takes a master to subordinate to the total impression of a poem. But a close study of the final lines of his sonnets only serves to increase our admiration for the restraint, the secure taste, and the perfect craftsmanship which prevent him from throwing things at his reader's head. At first sight it might seem as if this were mere coldness. "Sous les palmiers, au long frémissement des palmes"—"L'Éléphant triomphal foule les primevères"—many an inferior poet has written last lines that hit harder, that are more obviously constructed to express sense by sound and leave the reader thrilled or gasping. With Heredia the sonnet must be taken as a whole before the full beauty can be grasped of this consummate art which, without weakness or poverty, yet without disproportionate force, can put the finishing touch.

The only danger is that in admiring the serenity, the restraint, the classical self-sufficiency of these wonderful sonnets, one should overlook the passion for beauty and sensation which underlies them. It is the one point, perhaps, on which Mr. Bailey has laid insufficient stress, for a reason which the scope and object of his delightful book make it easy to understand. Half Spanish, and born in Cuba, Heredia was no cold or timid dilettante. He loved the sun, and has written of it as only Guillaumet has painted it; a descendant of the Conquistadors, he loved the fire and fury of their conquests, and dreamed passionate dreams of their dead and forgotten cities. He loved romantic adventure—even of the kind he has related in "La Nonne Alvarez," that extraordinary and fascinating book. He loved jewels and fabrics, beautiful women, and beautiful works of art; and his serenity comes, not of coldness, but of perfect faith in his material and in his own power to deal with it.

AN ARTIST'S REMINISCENCES

An Artist's Reminiscences. By WALTER CRANE.
(Methuen, 18s. net.)

MR. WALTER CRANE is the victim of his publishers, as it would seem; for he tells us that he was surprised when it was suggested by them that he should write his reminiscences. We cannot help thinking it a pity that he was not struck dumb with astonishment. For Mr. Crane's work as a draughtsman, designer, and painter holds a high place in our own memories and affections. And Mr. Crane, as a man, is doubtless well beloved by many. His innate amiability speaks from these pages, and, indeed, we have not found a single ill-natured word in the book from beginning to end; so that we greatly doubt whether Whistler's (probably unconscious) experiment in the gentle art of which he was the avowed exponent, had the least success with Mr. Crane. From the way in which the incident is here recounted we should guess that it was a complete failure.

Mr. Crane conceives the duty of one called upon to set down "reminiscences" to be that of recording his personal impressions of "eminent persons he has met, or of scenes and movements of which he has been a witness, or in which he has taken part," and this he does most conscientiously. But he adds to this a great deal of autobiography which has little or no bearing upon his development as an artist, or even as a Socialist (for we believe that Mr. Crane holds opinions of the kind which Roebuck Ramsden would call "advanced"), and whose interest is, indeed, purely domestic—even intimate—as, for example, the traditional account of his journey, at a very early age, from Exeter to Torquay, by coach, when his vocal powers are said to have been exercised to the discomfort of his fellow travellers.

But in one way these memoirs are intensely interesting. They form an invaluable scholion upon the work of Mr. Crane in all its aspects. They explain at once the deadly prettiness of some of his work, the dainty fancy of another of its characteristic aspects, the real and luminous beauty of a third. They disclose the man behind the pencil and the brush in a way which makes much in his work that was heretofore inexplicable as plain as daylight. Try as we may to exclude all thought of the personality of an artist from the criticism of his work, the fact remains, and must always remain, that the art is the mirror of the artist, and that while the value set upon his work by others is extrinsic and often fortuitous, its intrinsic value lies in the amount of self, and the qualities of that self, which the artist has mixed with his colours. More especially is this so when fancy, rather than inspiration, is the guiding spirit. For fancy is of the mind, and proceeds from the man himself, while inspiration is of the soul, and proceeds from God, the artist being no more than the medium through which God is translated into terms of man's understanding. And perhaps we shall not be far wrong if we find the reason for Mr. Crane's lack of inspiration in the fact, recorded here, that at an early stage he "decided for Freethought."

We should not venture to apply such criticism to any man's art under what we may call "gallery" conditions, for under those conditions criticism is of necessity incomplete, dealing only with the fruit, and leaving out of consideration both the seed and the conditions of its cultivation. The recent discussion in these columns concerning Art and morality seems to the present reviewer to have passed by this aspect of the matter of the source of real inspiration, and perhaps rightly, for religion and morality have no necessary interdependence. Mr. Crane's art is highly moral doubtless, but contains nothing of divinity. But in the present case Mr. Crane has offered us the completion of our apparatus criticus, and we cannot but avail ourselves of it.

The result is that every phase of his work appears as an illustration of the man himself. "Baby's Opera" and "Baby's Bouquet" find their marvellous fascination explained in the father and his real child-love. The "Renaissance of Venus" gives us the careful and conscientious student of draughtsmanship, revelling in that peculiar command of luminous colour which is not revealed in Mr. Crane's less ambitious work, but which is none the less his most valuable gift. The Gladstone presentation page, the "Sirens," the "Triumph of Labour," are examples of that outrageous prettiness which sometimes swamps the value of the artist's work and clogs his imagination—the very reflex of his conventional unconventionality. Yet that his fancy can glow into imagination, we have the "Pandora" to show.

Again and again, for all that, we find ourselves wishing that Mr. Crane had let well alone. For the most part the book is written in "journallese," whose more ambitious flights involve the writer in tangled sentences, and land him eventually in the depths of bathos:

... the launch of a big steamer. It was a striking sight to see as the stays were gradually removed, until it almost seemed as if the huge vessel was really only held in check by the tiny silken cord which the lady who performed the christening had to sever with a toy hatchet, after the champagne bottle, dressed in a bunch of ribbons, had been broken against the ship's side. Then she began to glide down the slope, and finally gracefully took the water like a swan. A luncheon and speeches followed.

Nothing could better explain Mr. Crane's utter inability to soar. "A luncheon and speeches followed"!

Nor can we trace in this book any humour save that of the somewhat elephantine kind which is indicated by Mr. Crane's "humorous" sketches and caricatures. It is very domestic, this humour, and verges now and then perilously hard upon the borderland of the pun. On the whole, Mr. Crane's pencil is happier than his pen in this field. A truly delightful sketch is that which prophetically represents the artist and his friend H. E. Wooldridge in old age, discussing a friendly bottle of old port. But the footnote thereto is as heavy as the sketch is light:

The third sketch is an anticipation of our friendship in old age—discussing a bottle of old crusted port. These are only a few out of many—I mean sketches, not bottles of port.

Of strength there is scarcely a trace in Mr. Crane's work—in his book, none. And one cannot help being impressed with the shrillness of the personal note which is sounded by one and all of the Socialist band of the eighties. The powerful personality of Morris, fire-brand though he was, has left no permanent mark; even his marvellous work is failing of a lasting hold upon the progress of design. The total misconception by these worthy people of the true function of Art, which can never become a political weapon and yet remain true to itself, is the cause of the inherent weakness and artificiality which mar the work of this group of gifted men. It is profoundly interesting to read of the incidents of 1886-7 from the point of view of the leading spirits. It is profoundly pitiful to read between the lines the utter inability of those leaders to grasp the fact of their own unimportance. And there is at least one of those leaders who, we should imagine, will scarcely relish the appearance of this book. Mr. John Burns as "the man with the red flag." Mr. John Burns singing "Tit-willow" in Japanese costume, and twirling a Japanese umbrella to delight a Bayswater audience—are not these ghosts which Mr. John Burns in knee-breeches and wearing a steel-hilted sword would rather had not risen to mock him? That "certain caution and desire to be politic" with which Mr. Crane credited him, even in 1885, has grown since then. But it is not conspicuous in the letter which Mr. Burns wrote to the author concerning the design for the L.C.C. common seal:

I informed the Council of my intention to ask you, and we all agreed that you were the best man for it. The design can be adapted to our views, as you generally manage to do these things.

The italics are ours. The shameless dishonesty of the sentiment does not strike Mr. Crane any more than, probably, it struck Mr. Burns. And again, later:

The Cap of Freedom and the labourer is good propaganda—and this on the seal of the Council, branding all future Councils with the propaganda of a temporarily successful party! Truly Lord Rosebery was right when he objected to Mr. Crane's design for a letter stamp, saying that he did not see what Justice and Liberty had to do with the Council.

Yet, after all, in turning the leaves once more we cannot be sorry that Mr. Crane has written his reminiscences; for the weaknesses alike of book and author are amiable weaknesses, and concerning persons, places, and things he has given us a store of interesting pictures, which emerge gradually from his account of them. Little glimpses of the villages, and farms, and orchards that western suburbia has long since swallowed up; the delicate drudgery of the wood-engraving days; the affectionate tribute to this or that friend and companion—these, far more than the letters, speeches, and the like, which form so large a part of the book, are the real and human element, wherein the artist is explained, all unconsciously, by the man, from boyhood on.

SPAIN IN STUART TIMES

The Court of Philip IV. By MARTIN HUME. (Eveleigh Nash, 1907.)

"PHILIP THE GREAT! your most august sovereignties abide gloriously triumphant, graven in the annals of fame: since you are the solid pillar and the upholding Atlas of the faith, the one and only bulwark of the Church, the all-pervading good of your invincible kingdoms." Such is a literal translation of the Spanish encomium which Mr. Hume puts on his title-page. Anything more miserably false as a description of Philip's rule and its effect on his country could not well be devised; and in setting this piece of courtly mendacity in the forefront of his volume, Mr. Hume must have intended to strike the keynote of that dramatic irony which haunts his story of Philip's life and makes it read almost like a Greek tragedy. The story is told very ably, and it is an excellent piece of craft by which, in the midst of all the brilliant glamour of the court, the reader is recalled from time to time to a consciousness of the black fate overhanging the king and his dominion and steadily driving both to the abyss. In his preface, Mr. Hume makes a sort of apologia for abandoning his original plan of a great historical work upon the period of Spanish decadence in favour of the present more limited and avowedly more popular study of court life. It cannot be denied that here is a falling off, a surrender of a higher ideal. It may be granted that the lower aim has been admirably carried out, and the result is a book which the "general reader" may peruse with assurance of reward, whether he is in quest of knowledge or of good entertainment. Nevertheless, the book must prove in a measure disappointing to the more serious student of history; for while the author very rightly claims to have based his work on a great number of original and unpublished records, and while he is excellently qualified for his task by his knowledge of the Spanish language and his previous researches in Spanish history, yet the notes are too few and the references are too loose, the mere title of a work or number of a volume being given in many cases where chapter and verse in the document should have been cited.

However, the ordinary reader, for whom Mr. Hume caters, will probably like the book all the better for its defective critical apparatus, and will find abundant interest in the picture of life and manners, and in the play of character presented by the chief actors on the scene. The story covers the whole period of Philip's life, 1605 to 1665, and it is upon the personality of the King and his dominating Prime Minister, Olivares, that the light is kept focussed. When the King came to the throne, he found the whole social system disorganised, the people crushed by dues and taxes, the nobles enriched by public plunder, trade dying, the coinage debased, the Church full of simony, the navy reduced to seven ships, and war or rebellion threatening on every side. "All this," says the King, with pathetic piety, "was from no fault of my father or his predecessors, but simply because God so ordained it." Such a creed was the worst possible one for a monarch, and when Philip found the same evils growing greater under his own rule, the same curious fatalism blinded him to the real causes at work, though it did not always save him from searchings of heart or pangs of remorse. But the strange thing is that Philip's remorse seems to have touched only the smaller issues of his life—his private and personal relationships—and not to have reacted on those broad questions of national and international policy in which his failure became year by year more conspicuous. He never wavered in his conviction that his one paramount duty was to further at all costs to himself and his people the domination of the Roman Church; and the effort to maintain or spread that domination is the secret of his whole foreign policy. Mr. Hume seems to think that it was mainly Philip's immoralities which tortured his conscience; but this is at least doubtful. The King lived in habitual adultery, no doubt; to this he did not scruple to add sacrilege, as the affair of the nun of San Placido shows. But there is small evidence that sins like these troubled him, while his incestuous marriage with his niece, Mariana, blessed as it was by holy Church, naturally caused him no revolt of conscience. Like many kings, from David and Solomon downwards, Philip found it easy to reconcile the utmost laxity of practice with the strongest profession of devoutness; and the remorse which grew upon him in later life arose, not from any conflict between practice and profession in matters of sexual morality, but from the haunting feeling that he had incurred the Divine wrath by his weakness in matters of religion. The difference is real. It was easy then, as now, to separate the sphere of morality from that of religion; and Philip's conscience, dead in the one, was morbidly active in the other. Hence all the pathos of his letters to Sor Maria, the grave and wise abbess whose friendship at an earlier date in his life might have saved him both from Olivares and from himself. But the sense and sorrow of failure overshadow Philip's life, and the shadow deepens to the end.

Among the episodes of special interest in the book may be mentioned the visit of Charles Prince of Wales, with Buckingham, to Madrid, in quest of the Infanta's hand in marriage. The way in which the prince was kept dangling and was finally baffled by Olivares is well described, and the letters of King James to "Baby" and "Steenie" are piquant for all their fatuousness. Nor should one omit to notice the skill with which Mr. Hume presents the artistic interests of this period, particularly in relation to the two great painters, Rubens and Velasquez. Rubens was at work in Madrid in 1628, and though high in Philip's favour, held a secret commission from Charles I.; and in the following year he was sent as envoy from Madrid to London. It was in 1623 that Diego Velasquez, of Seville, on his second visit to Madrid, sprang into fame, and was commissioned to paint his first equestrian portrait of Philip; nor was the King slow to acknowledge in his own cold and joyless manner the genius of the painter, to whom he granted a pension and a studio in the palace. We learn a good deal about Velasquez, and Mr. Hume adds much to the interest of his story by giving several illustrations from the master's paintings, of which the most striking is the portrait of Philip taken about 1660, and now in the National Gallery. It is a face, if ever there was one, with a ruined life behind it.

Before taking leave of this book, it is fair to say that it is not only full of interesting matter, but charmingly written. The style is forcible and vivacious—a little too rhetorical at times, perhaps, yet full of swing and rhythm. But an author who can write so well should be doubly careful to avoid misprints like "immune" for "immure" (p. 208), "defiance alliance" (p. 266), "seigniorial" (p. 414, n.), "corruscating" (p. 514). Even worse are the lapses of grammar: "whom all knew or guessed were French prisoners" (p. 478); "this document . . . show that" (p. 228, n.); "Don Luis de Haro, anxious as he was . . . , he was unable" (p. 481); "three packets of gunpowder, connected by a train with a slow match, was found" (p. 489). Blemishes like these are unscholarly in the extreme, and not to be pardoned in a book by a Cambridge University lecturer; but fortunately they can be removed in another edition, and need not permanently disfigure an interesting and successful volume.

ENGLISH MUSIC

A History of Music in England. By ERNEST WALKER.
(The Clarendon Press, 7s. 6d.)

ABOUT two years ago we welcomed the appearance of "The Oxford History of Music," the work of five authors in six volumes, which covers in a masterly fashion the whole course of the development of modern European music; and now a book by Dr. Ernest Walker has appeared which, in a single volume, deals with the special subject of music in England. There is no avowed connection between the two, but the new work is none the less a valuable complement to the earlier one. A difficulty which the authors of the "Oxford History" had to meet was the fact that a great deal of the history of English music at some of its most interesting periods had little or no influence upon the development of European music as a whole, so that matter which would have been of interest to their English readers was irrelevant to their main purpose. Dr. Walker therefore fills in what was rejected by the authors of the "Oxford History," and in doing so brings out even more clearly than they the fact that if none of the English composers since John Dunstable had lived, European music to-day would be practically where it is now, in fact, that "we have taken freely from other nations, but have not given back." Yet no one who follows the story which Dr. Walker has to tell will imagine that we have been mere plagiarists. Once own that our music has had little or no influence upon other nations, and we are then free to admire whole-heartedly the work of the great Church composers, Tye, Whyte, and Tallis, the madrigals of Wilbye and his contemporaries, the versatile genius of Purcell, for whom no pinnacle is apparently too high. While Dr. Walker's knowledge of the music of the earlier composers is that of the scholar who has rummaged through libraries, and collated part-books, he is happy in being able to write of it as music which, like that of the present day, must stand or fall by the one test of its beauty and sincerity of expression. He wastes no time in the discussion of what was merely ingenious or experimental, and though some of his judgments on the worth of compositions may seem too personal to be conclusive, he brings before his readers a vivid picture of the relative positions of musicians of each period—at any rate, as they appear to him. For instance, when he says of the three Church composers above named, that they “seem to give out the whole of themselves in every single work in which they give anything at all of their best,” he brings their work into the light of day, and makes the unlearned reader wish to know them better; but when he dismisses Peter Philipps rather summarily with the remark that he was “a very solid and massive, but not at all distinctive composer,” we do not accept his verdict as final. It would be possible to quote a number of sentences, especially in the interesting chapter on the madrigal period or that on Purcell and his contemporaries, which exactly hit upon salient characteristics of composers; for instance, the remark about Purcell, that “Of all great musicians he takes . . . the shortest views.” But to quote sentences is unfair to author and reader alike, for the book is no mere collection of apt aphorisms and epigrams, but an historical review of the course which music has taken in this country, illumined by flashes of the author’s critical acumen.

Two circumstances tend to mar the satisfaction of the general reader, for whom Dr. Walker says he has written this book. One is, that he has permitted himself a curious amount of latitude in the construction of some sentences which, with a little revision, might have been made perfectly clear and simple. The second and more important circumstance cannot be laid to his charge; it is the fact that the subject is one of declining interest. On the premature death of Purcell music in England was left in a state of suspended animation, and when Handel arrived he set his heel upon individuality of expression, and stamped practically all English composition of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries with the impress of his own powerful personality. Dr. Walker’s study of Handel’s music is one of the best things in the book, and his insistence upon the value of Handel’s non-religious work may still be salutary. Afterwards, however, we enter on the dead period, and though Dr. Walker succeeds in showing that even here there was more activity in music than is often supposed, he cannot make “music under the later Georges,” or “early Victorian music” engrossing. When, at last, we emerge into the stronger light of present day effort, the author seems at once too bold and too timid. His summary of the work of the five living composers whom he discusses, Mackenzie, Cowen, Parry, Stanford and Elgar, is rather too glib to be wholly convincing, while his diffidence in mentioning names of younger men, wise though it may be, robs us of a discussion of what bids fair to rank among the most fertile times in our musical history. He does not fail, however, to point out that we are now awake, that although we may not be able to boast great geniuses, who are necessarily rare, “the men in whose hands the future of English music rests are artistically alive; and that is, after all, the main thing.”

A chapter on folk-music is valuable chiefly for the number of tunes which are quoted, and one on “general characteristics” shows how certain crude formulæ survived through hundreds of years in English composition, until Handel crushed them with everything else native that he found here. In the revival of to-day we hear much talk about the foundation of a national school of composition, but when we look back on our history and see how we have been isolated from other nations in the past, both by our geographical position and still more by temperament, it appears certain that our special task of to-day is to learn to be cosmopolitan. This “History” shows, for instance, that the best of our music has been inseparable from words, that we have produced little or no pure instrumental music. The fact that our younger composers are turning seriously to the orchestra, and to the various forms of chamber music, shows that now, late as it is, we are beginning to try to grasp the meaning of the art as a whole, and to treat it as a self-sufficing one. It is our duty to free ourselves from limitations, not to make new ones, and it is certain that if ever a really great school of English music arises its glory must be that it has drunk deep of the experience of others, and so is able to give back in full measure the matured results of that experience.

THE CHRISTMAS ECLOGUE

Cara deum suboles, magnum jovis incrementum.

I HAVE to congratulate a triad of eminent scholars for boldly opposing the stream of contemporary scholia. Their little volume* is particularly welcome now that the Universities are too inclined to seek toleration at the hands of the democracy by playing the part of upper board-schools. These three scholars originally contributed to three different periodicals three essays, which, considering that they were written without any pre-arrangement, complete each other in quite a remarkable way. Mr. Warde Fowler’s appeared the earliest, in 1903, when he propounded three questions, and particularly devoted himself to answering the second of them: “Who or what was the child whose birth the Eclogue celebrates?” Next, Professor Conway’s essay in January, 1907, practically answered Mr. Fowler’s first question, “What was Virgil’s purpose in writing the Eclogue and connecting it with the consulship of Pollio?” Lastly, in April, Professor Mayor’s essay answered the third question: “Whence did Virgil draw the ideas and imagery of the poem?” Now, after consultation and careful revision, the three essays have been published consecutively in one volume under the general editorship of Professor Mayor, not in the order of their first appearance, but much more conveniently in the order of Mr. Fowler’s questions. Each author retains the sole responsibility for his own conclusions. Though Professor Mayor’s subject is the most interesting, and he treats it very ably and sympathetically, I may not have to refer to him again specifically. His editing is all that could be desired. The text of the Eclogue is printed most usefully before the essays, together with a translation by Professor Conway, and there is a model epitome of the contents and a full index. With these aids to distinguishing the authors I need only quote them by name separately, when one seems to be expressing a peculiarly personal opinion.

It does not interest me very much whether Virgil’s primary motif is the beginning of a new cycle of time personified as an infant, or the expected birth of a child to Octavian, Pollio, or another. The main interest to me is how far the poem is instinct with more enduring, universal significance. If, however, it were my undeserved lot to teach this Messianic Eclogue for the schools, unless I were better inspired by some young scholar-poet among my pupils, I should teach them that Virgil took the occasion of an expected heir to a great race to write a natal song; that the child probably was the first-born to Octavian, and that it has been beautifully and quite reasonably suggested by Mr. Fowler that Virgil assumes in his poem the character of a mid-wife assisting at the labour of the mother, and receives the new-born infant into his arms to the accompaniment, as it were, of the last four lines. I should say that since Caius Asinius Pollio was Consul, a highly distinguished man both in politics and literature, and a personal friend, Virgil had addressed the poem to him as a compliment, and also, in order to mark the year 39 B.C.; I should point out what a remarkable date it was, the opening of a new cycle of time, an annus magnus, and also quite evidently of a great and imminent revolution in the condition of the Roman people. I should add, that as Virgil wrote, the expected infant grew for him into the new cycle, a new era; that since he was a hopeful, just, and tender-hearted poet, influenced by the doctrines of the Stoics, he hoped for the Golden Age renewed and regenerate, rather than regretted it as past for ever. I should point out that there is much evidence to show and every reason for believing that Virgil was deeply interested and well versed in the Pythagorean philosophy and in the Sibylline oracles with their Eastern origin and imagery; that he most likely knew something of other poems, Hebrew or Chaldaic, prophetic in form, expressed in language far sublimer than the Sibyls' or his own; and that under such influences his scion of Augustus, his Golden Age renewed, grew and commingled in one who should be both author and essence of the Golden Age himself.

* Virgil’s Messianic Eclogue. Three Studies by JOSEPH B. MAYOR, W. WARDE FOWLER, and R. S. CONWAY. (John Murray, 2s. 6d. net.)

In all this I should be but teaching doctrines and speculations expressed or immediately derived from the three essayists. But if another very clever pupil, likely to be placed by the examiners much higher than the first scholar, one destined for a Fellowship, a Head-mastership, or even Parliament, inquired whether Virgil was therefore inspired, I should tell him that Eusebius said he was; and that St. Augustine said he was not, but the Sibyls were; and that St. Jerome said they were only fools who believed in either. As final authorities I should refer him to Professor Ramsay, and "the distinguished living Oxford scholar," anonymous to me, and gently left unnamed by Professor Conway. I should point out to my clever pupil that the training of the modern "philolog" is not intended to produce "a feeling for a poet's mind," and that he had better not indulge in any if he does not want to damage his prospects. But the poet-scholar I would send to ponder with the three essayists on Isaiah, the Sibyls, St. Augustine, Dante, Milton, on all poet-scholars down to Pope, and on many beyond: while together we would discuss the manifold kinds and sources of the winds, whence they come and whither they go. We would speak together of the Lord God talking in the garden in the cool of the evening; of Aaron's god, Moses; of the spirit kindled from the burning coal; of Isaiah, the docile reed through which the Divine voice sounded; of perverse Balaam, forced beyond all his auguries to utter the sublimest pæans, and cast away like a crushed cymbal when their echoes had scarcely ceased. We would talk of Bezaleel and inspiration into his hands; of nightly trances and breathed spells; of Apollo and his Muses; of the Bacids and the Sibyls; of Dionysus, and of the mighty Pan kindly come to dwell with men below; of Stirps sacra Virginis, author originis ensque sophiae. We would talk of Narcissus inspired by his own face. We would wonder whether Virgil was rapt by the Spirit so far even as the Babe who was to lie in the lap of the Virgin, enamoured of his own verse. We would speculate which way the Spirit of the Lord went from Zedechiah to Virgil, and whether he was constrained to cry unwittingly, δείξω αὐτῷ καὶ οὐχ ἴδὼν. μακαρίζω καὶ οὐκ ἐγγίζει.

Then, after we had studied the essayists to some such purpose as this, we should be inclined for points of philology. We should hold views on the exact meaning of "incrementum," and we should expand them to suit our own purposes. We should recognise with Mr. Fowler that the poetry of the Eclogue is not of the very highest order, and should feel that its importance and charm lie largely in its contribution to what we should call the "incrementa" of Virgil's muse, its divine offspring present throughout Christian art and literature, and, above them all, the Divine Comedy. We should notice, apart from the formation of schools of art, how pregnant with "incrementa" the great masterpieces are, as well as how perfect their actual achievement is. We should recognise that the "incrementa" of Chaucer's poetry is the English language which he created for us, after Anglo-Saxon had been beautified, subtilised, civilised by Norman-French. We should recognise that, though topical influences disfigure and distort the epic of "Paradise Lost" with brutal anthropomorphism, the "incrementa" of Milton's high soul and marvellous poetic gifts are the music of Handel and the lyric beauty of every great English poet since Milton lived.

The three essayists' power to suggest so much, and their possession of that "feeling for a poet's mind without which the best criticism is unattainable" is the first reason why I value their book so highly. The second reason is because they are scholars who show themselves specially qualified to meet on points of mere scholarship opponents, some of whom rely entirely upon it and lose the poet in their researches. Among them is the unnamed "distinguished living Oxford scholar," who protests against "the ridiculous, and if it were not sincere, blasphemous notion that the Eclogue contained an inspired Messianic prophecy." In spite of his scholarship, the "Oxford scholar" has no sequence of ideas or cannot express it in his own language. Blasphemy is none the less blasphemous because it is sincere. If his criticism is matured, he betrays a mind totally incapable of apprehending Dante, much less of comprehending him. To Dante the condescension in the assumptio humanitatis in Deum was absolute, incomparable; Hezekiah, Maher-shalal-hash-baz, the embryo of Pollio Gallus or Julia, Dionysus, all created things, were no more nor less worthy to typify or figure it, than a triangle is more or less worthy than a circle to typify or figure Deity. It is a question of taste and of some appreciation of what expression means, to which scholarship will not help a mind such as this criticism suggests that the "Oxford scholar" possesses. To such a mind as his (if he should have any Christian inclinations) Fra Angelico's bright harnessed angels, wearing their peacock wings, wading knee deep in meadow flowers, dancing their rounds in mid air above Christ's stable will seem gaudy, frivolous, and blasphemously material; tarlatan, eider-down and steam will seem spiritual clothing.

I do not claim any competence to judge questions of pure scholarship, and I approach the debated text of the last four lines of the Eclogue, rather from the position of a jury than from that of an advocate or a judge. The reading which I give here is Quintilian's, the earliest known, accepted by Scaliger, and largely for these reasons defended by Mr. Fowler. The two words printed in italics mark the points of difference to which I refer:

Incipe, parve puer, risu cognoscere matrem:
matri longa decem tulerunt fastidia menses.
Incipe, parve puer: qui non risere parentes, nec deus hunc mensa, dea nec dignata cubili est.

The two last lines may be rendered into obscure English on the analogy of the Latin construction, and following Mr. Fowler's meaning, thus: "Babes who have not smiled-upon their parents—the god has not bestowed on him a table nor the goddess a bed." Even Professor Conway is shy of flying so full in the face of the grammarians as to break three of their elementary rules in two lines. He suggests that Quintilian mis-wrote "q" (qui) for a "c" (cui), which must have stood in his manuscript of the poem. This would be a reasonable supposition if the reading had occurred incidentally, and if, as Mr. Fowler points out, Quintilian had not written "Ex illis enim 'qui non risere,' hic, quem non dignata," and just before, "Est figura et in numero, vel cum singulari pluralis subjuguntur." But Dr. Postgate, who presses à toute outrance the high authority of Quintilian in matters of grammar or phonetics on certain occasions, is as devoted to the grammar-fetich as the "Oxford scholar" to his own sense of propriety. Dr. Postgate apparently "contends that Quintilian's copy of Virgil was a bad one," though it was good enough for Quintilian and Scaliger also. If Quintilian was incapable of discerning writers' errors in his own copy, his authority as a scholar, and with it the conclusions founded on it, are not worth as much as they were. Every language has usages which are a part of its genius, and yet are grammatical anomalies. Considering the small proportion of the literature of any given period which has come down to us, it is surely unscientific to assume that a well-authenticated reading is wrong because it is even very ungrammatical. Grammarians are not the legislators of language, but registrars of the usages of the great writers who make language. They are mere clerks sorting into pigeon-holes great masters' habits of speech. When they omit to register unusual modes of expression, they merely scamp their work, and are fit for nothing more than seats on local committees of education. Like his great master, Quintilian, Dr. Postgate is much more than a mere grammarian, and his pleading is not worthy of him. L. L. A. S.

THREE NOTES—PSYCHOLOGY

MR. DALE, who had quiet rooms in a western part of London, was very busily occupied one day with a pencil and little scraps of paper. He would stop in the middle of his writing, of his monotonous tramp from door to window, jot down a line of hieroglyphics, and turn again to his work. At lunch he kept his instruments on the table beside him, and a little notebook accompanied him on his evening walk about the Green. Sometimes he seemed to experience a certain difficulty in the act of writing, as if the heat of shame or even incredulous surprise held his hand, but one by one the fragments of paper fell into the drawer, and a full feast awaited him at the day's close.

As he lit his pipe at dusk he was standing by the window and looking out into the street. In the distance cablights flashed to and fro, up and down the hill, on the main road. Across the way he saw the long line of sober, grey houses, cheerfully lit up for the most part, displaying against the night the dining-room and the evening meal. In one house, just opposite, there was brighter illumination, and the open window showed a modest dinner-party in progress, and here and there a drawing-room on the first floor glowed ruddy, as the tall, shaded lamp was lit. Everywhere Dale saw a quiet and comfortable respectability; if there were no gaiety there was no riot, and he thought himself fortunate to have got "rooms" in so sane and meritorious a street.

The pavement was almost deserted. Now and again a servant would dart out from a side door and skurry off in the direction of the shops, returning in a few minutes in equal haste. But foot-passengers were rare, and only at long intervals a stranger would drift from the highway and wander, with slow speculation, down Abingdon Road, as if he had passed its entrance a thousand times and had at last been piqued with curiosity and the desire of exploring the unknown. All the inhabitants of the quarter prided themselves on their quiet seclusion, and many of them did not so much as dream that if one went far enough the road degenerated and became abominable, the home of the hideous, the mouth of a black purlieu. Indeed, stories, ill and malodorous, were told of the streets parallel, to east and west, which perhaps communicated with the terrible sink beyond, but those who lived at the good end of Abingdon Road knew nothing of their neighbours.

Dale leant far out of his window. The pale London sky deepened to violet as the lamps were lit, and in the twilight the little gardens before the houses shone, seemed as if they grew more clear. The golden laburnum but reflected the last bright yellow veil that had fallen over the sky after sunset, the white hawthorn was a gleaming splendour, the red may a flameless fire in the dusk. From the open window Dale could note the increasing cheerfulness of the diners opposite, as the moderate cups were filled and emptied; blinds in the higher storeys brightened up and down the street when the nurses came up with the children. A gentle breeze, that smelt of grass and woods and flowers, fanned away the day's heat from the pavement stones, rustled through the blossoming boughs, and sank again, leaving the road to calm.

All the scene breathed the gentle domestic peace of the stories; there were regular lives, dull duties done, sober and common thoughts on every side. He felt that he needed not to listen at the windows, for he could divine all the talk, and guess the placid and usual channels in which the conversation flowed. Here there were no spasms, nor raptures, nor the red storms of romance, but a safe rest; marriage and birth and begetting were no more here than breakfast and lunch and afternoon tea.

And then he turned away from the placid transparency of the street, and sat down before his lamp and the papers he had so studiously noted. A friend of his, an "impossible" man named Jenyns, had been to see him the night before, and they had talked about the psychology of the novelists, discussing their insight, and the depth of their probe.

"It is all very well as far as it goes," said Jenyns. "Yes, it is perfectly accurate. Guardsmen do like chorus-girls, the doctor's daughter is fond of the curate, the grocer's assistant of the Baptist persuasion has sometimes religious difficulties, 'smart' people no doubt think a great deal about social events and complications, the Tragic Comedians felt and wrote all that stuff, I daresay. But do you think that is all? Do you call a description of the gilt tools on the morocco here an exhaustive essay on Shakespeare?"

"But what more is there?" said Dale. "Don't you think, then, that human nature has been fairly laid open? What more?"

"Songs of the frantic lupanar, delirium of the madhouse. Not extreme wickedness, but the insensate, the unintelligible, the lunatic passion and idea, the desire that must come from some other sphere that we cannot even faintly imagine. Look for yourself: it is easy."

Dale looked now at the ends and scraps of paper. On them he had carefully registered all the secret thoughts of the day, the crazy lusts, the senseless furies, the foul monsters that his heart had borne, the maniac phantasies that he had harboured. In every note he found a rampant madness, the equivalent in thought of mathematical absurdity, of two-sided triangles, of parallel straight lines which met.

"And we talk of absurd dreams," he said to himself. "And these are wilder than the wildest visions. And our sins; but these are the sins of nightmare."

"And every day," he went on, "we lead two lives, and the half of our soul is madness, and half heaven is lit by a black sun. I say I am a man, but who is the other that hides in me?"

NATURE

"And there was a broad level by the river," Julian went on, telling the story of his holiday. "A broad level of misty meadows, divided by low banks, between the hills and the river. They say the Roman world is lost beneath the turf, that a whole city sleeps there, gold and marble and amber all buried for ever."

"You did not see anything?"

"No, I suppose not. I used to get up early and go out, and leave the little modern village behind me, hidden in the hot haze. And then I would stand in the misty meadows and watch the green turf shimmer and lighten, as the grey halo rolled away. Oh! the silence. There was no sound except the lapping of the river, the wash of the water on the reeds.

"The banks are yellow mud," he went on, "but in the early morning as the sun began to shine in the mist they pearly and grew like silver. There was a low mound that hid something, and on it an old thorn tree bent towards the east; it was a little way from the tide's brim. I stood there and saw the woods swell out of the haze in the early morning, and that white sun seemed to encompass the town with gleaming walls. If I had stayed still I think I should have seen the glittering legion and the eagles, I should have heard the sonorous trumpets pealing from the walls."

"I expect you have seen and heard more than that," said his friend. "I always told you that the earth, too, and the hills, and even the old walls are a language, hard to translate."

"And I came upon a place that made me think of that," said Julian. "It was far from the town; I lost my way amongst those rolling hills and strayed by footpaths from field to wood, and all that I saw of man was here and there a blue smoke that crawled up from the earth, from the tree, it might be, or the brook, for I could see no house. I went on, always with the sense that I was following an unknown object, and, suddenly, a shape rose from forgotten dreams. An old farmhouse, built of grey, silvery stones; a long barn wavering and dipping down to a black pool, pine trees overhanging the roof. It was all dim, as if it had been seen reflected in water. I went a little nearer, and I found that I was lifted free of the maze of hills. I fronted the mountain, looking across a deep, broad valley, and all the year the mountain winds must blow upon the porch; they look from their deep windows and see the fleeting of the clouds and the sun on that vast green hillside. Yellow flowers were shaking in the garden, for even on that still day the mountain wind swept across the valley. But those grey glistening walls! A light flowed from them, and they spoke of something beyond thought.

"I visited, too, the river valley, passing out to the north. The town was soon hidden behind trees, behind a curtain of Lombardy poplars, whispering of Italy, of the vine, the olive garden. The curving lane led me beneath orchards, their underboughs dark green, almost black, in the shadow, and the road winding between orchard and river led me into the long valley, where the forest is as a cloud upon the hill. I watched the yellow tide cease and the water flow clear, and the breath of the wind was unearthly. It was there that I saw the burning pools."

"You stayed for the sunset?"

"Yes, I stayed all day within the valley. The sky was grey, but not cloudy, rather it was a glowing of silver light that made the earth seem dim and yet shining. Indeed, I say that, though the sun was hidden, you would have dreamed that white moons were floating through the air, for now and again I saw the misty hillside pale and lighten, and a tree would appear suddenly in mid-forest, and glitter as if it blossomed. Yes, and in the calm meadows by the riverside there were little points of brightness, as if tongues of white fire sparkled in the grey grass."

"And the river itself?"

"It was all the day a hieroglyphic, winding in essences beneath those haunting banks, colourless and yet alight like all the world around. At last, in the evening, I sat down beneath a wych-elm on the slope, where I breathed the scent and knew the heavy stillness of the wood. Then a strong wind blew, high up in heaven, and the grey veil vanished. The sky was clear, pale blue, in the west there was exhibited an opal burning green, and beneath a purple wall. Then, in the middle of the purple a rent opened; there was a red glint and red momentary rays, as if rose-hot metal were beaten and dented on the anvil, and the sparks fled abroad. So the sun sank.

"I thought I would wait and see all the valley, the river, and the level, and the woods sink into twilight, become sombre, formless. The light went out from the river, the water paled as it flowed between the sad reeds and grasses. I heard a harsh, melancholy cry, and above, in the dusky air, a flight of great birds passed seaward in changing, hieroglyphic order. The keen line of the hills by sunset home seemed to melt away, to become vague.

"Then I saw the sky was blossoming in the north. Rose-gardens appeared there, with golden hedges and bronze gates, and the great purple wall caught fire as it grew leaden. The earth was lit again, but with unnatural jewelled colours; the palest light was sardonix, the darkness was amethyst, and then the valley was aflame. Fire in the wood, the fire of a sacrifice beneath the oaks. Fire in the level fields, a great burning in the north, and vehement flame to the south, above the town. And in the still river the very splendour of fire, yes, as if all precious things were cast into its furnace pools, as if gold and roses and jewels became flame."

"And then?"

"Then the shining of the evening star."

"And you," said his friend, "perhaps without knowing, have told me the story of a wonderful and incredible passion."

Julian stared at him in amazement.

"You are quite right," he said at length.

THE HOLY THINGS

The sky was blue above Holborn, and only one little cloud, half white, half golden, floated on the wind's way from west to east. The long aisle of the street was splendid in the full light of the summer, and away in the west, where the houses seemed to meet and join, it was as a rich tabernacle, mysterious, the carved house of holy things.

A man came into the great highway from a quiet court. He had been sitting under plane-tree shade for an hour or more, his mind racked with perplexities and doubts, with the sense that all was without meaning or purpose, a tangle of senseless joys and empty sorrows. He had stirred in it and fought and striven, and now disappointment and success were alike tasteless. To struggle was weariness, to attain was weariness, to do nothing was weariness. He had felt a little while before that from the highest to the lowest things of life there was no choice, there was not one thing that was better than another, the savour of the cinders was no sweeter than the savour of the ashes. He had done work which some men liked and others disliked, and liking and disliking were equally tiresome to him. His poetry or his pictures or whatever it was that he worked at had utterly ceased to interest him, and he had tried to be idle, and found idleness as impossible as work. He had lost the faculty for making and he had lost the power of resting; he dozed in the daytime and started up and cried at night. Even that morning he had doubted and hesitated, wondering whether to stay indoors or to go out, sure that in either plan there was an infinite disgust.

When he at last went abroad he let the crowd push him into the quiet court, and at the same time cursed them in a low voice for doing so; he tried to persuade himself that he had meant to go somewhere else. When he sat down he desperately endeavoured to rouse himself, and as he knew that all the strong interests are egotistic, he made an effort to grow warm over the work he had done, to find a glow of satisfaction in the thought that he had accomplished something. It was nonsense; he had found out a clever trick and had made the most of it, and it was over. Besides, how would it interest him if afterwards he was praised when he was dead? And what was the use of trying to invent some new tricks? It was folly; and he ground his teeth as a new idea came into his mind and was rejected. To get drunk always made him so horribly ill, and other things were more foolish and tiresome than poesy or painting, whichever it was.

He could not even rest on the uncomfortable bench beneath the dank, stinking plane-tree. A young man and a girl came up and sat next to him, and the girl said: "Oh, isn't it beautiful to-day?" and then they began to jabber to one another—the blasted fools! He flung himself from the seat and went out into Holborn.

As far as one could see there were two processions of omnibuses, cabs, and vans that went east and west and west and east. Now the long line would move on briskly, now it stopped. The horses' feet rattled and pattered on the asphalt, the wheels ground and jarred, a bicyclist wavered in and out between the serried ranks, jangling his bell. The foot-passengers went to and fro on the pavement, with an endless change of unknown faces; there was an incessant hum and murmur of voices. In the safety of a blind passage an Italian whirled round the handle of his piano-organ; the sound of it swelled and sank as the traffic surged and paused, and now and then one heard the shrill voices of the children who danced and shrieked in time to the music. Close to the pavement a coster pushed his barrow, and proclaimed flowers in an odd intonation, reminding one of the Gregorian chant. The cyclist went by again with his jangling insistent bell, and a man who stood by the lamp-post set fire to his pastille ribbon, and let the faint blue smoke rise into the sun. Away in the west, where the houses seemed to meet, the play of sunlight on the haze made as it were golden mighty shapes that paused and advanced and paused again.

He had viewed the scene hundreds of times, and for a long while had found it a nuisance and a weariness. But now, as he walked stupidly, slowly along the northern side of Holborn, a change fell. He did not in the least know what it was, but there seemed to be a strange air, and a new charm that soothed his mind.

When the traffic was stopped, to his soul there was a solemn hush that summoned remnants of a far-off memory. The voices of the passengers sank away, the street was endued with a grave and reverent expectation. A shop that he passed had a row of electric lamps burning above the door, and the golden glow of them in the sunlight was, he felt, significant. The grind and jar of the wheels as the procession moved on again gave out a chord of music, the opening of some high service that was to be done, and now, in an ecstasy, he was sure that he heard the roll and swell and triumph of the organ, and shrill sweet choristers began to sing. So the music sank and swelled and echoed in the vast aisle—in Holborn.

What could these lamps mean, burning in the bright sunlight? The music was hushed in a grave close, and in the rattle of traffic he heard the last deep, sonorous notes shake against the choir walls—he had passed beyond the range of the Italian's instrument. But then a rich voice began alone, rising and falling in monotonous but awful modulations, singing a longing, triumphant song, bidding the faithful lift up their hearts, be joined in heart with the Angels and Archangels, with the Thrones and Dominations. He could see no longer, he could not see the man who passed close beside him, pushing his barrow and calling flowers.

Ah! He could not be mistaken, he was sure now. The air was blue with incense, he smelt the adorable fragrance. The time had almost come. And then the silvery, reiterated, instant summons of a bell; and again, and again.

The tears fell from his eyes, in his weeping the tears poured a rain upon his cheeks. But he saw in the distance, in the far distance, the carved tabernacle, golden mighty figures moving slowly, imploring arms stretched forth.

There was a noise of a great shout; the choir sang in the tongue of his boyhood that he had forgotten:

SANCT, SANCT, SANCT.

Then the silvery bell tingled anew; and again, and again. He looked and saw the Holy, White and Shining Mysteries exhibited—in Holborn.

ARTHUR MACHEN.

THE CRAVING FOR PRINT

I FANCY that that curious tic, the craving for print, first began to afflict the human race in the last years of the Press-ridden, education-harried nineteenth century. I did not myself chance upon a sufferer till the year 1900; but then I observed the craving in so developed a form that it must have been of some years' growth. The afflicted person was an acquaintance of several months' standing, a plethoric man of a placid temperament, who had once, so his intimates declared, been of an unimpeachable serenity. Now whenever he paid a visit to my rooms in the Temple he would at first talk in an uncomfortable, absent-minded way and fidget about the room. He did not seem to be quite under his own control, and I wondered whether he were in some trouble of money or the heart. I had observed this fidgetiness and wondered what ailed him several times before I discovered its cause. Then one day I was watching him more closely, and I observed that when he picked up a book and opened it, his fidgetiness at once left him, and he was again a calm, unruffled man. After a glance at the print his ideas seemed to flow more freely, and he talked more easily. Now and again he seemed to refresh himself by a glance at the printed page. I thought I was on the track of something new; and I watched him on two other occasions, knowing what to look for. On both occasions the same thing happened. Then I began to experiment upon him. I cleared my room of stray books, and when I next heard his knock I locked up the bookshelves and threw the newspapers lying about into the next room. His uneasiness was extreme; he fidgeted about the room, and his talk was halting indeed. I watched him with great interest. At last the uneasiness suddenly left him; he sidled into an arm-chair by the fire, picked up from the hearth a piece of an advertisement of a mottled soap, torn from a newspaper, and read a few lines of it. It cleared his mind, and he talked easily.

It seemed a rather absurd craving to assail a human being; and I supposed that my friend was exceptional, or that it might be pure fancy on my part. I thought little more of it for a while. Then one day I was taking tea with a lady; two or three other callers were there, among them a leading literary Englishwoman. The only piece of printed matter in sight was a paper devoted to women's sports and dress and the portraits of the fashionable—the last kind of paper a literary woman cares about. Four times during the hour I was there the literary woman, apparently unconsciously, under an impulsion, broke off her talk, rose, walked across the room, read a few lines of the paper, went back to her seat, and began talking again. There was no doubt in my mind that she had to, that the paper drew her to it.

After that I began to look about me in earnest for signs of this craving for print. I found them everywhere. Not only were literary folk affected by it, but to all seeming most intelligent people, and the bulk of the florid product of the board-schools. I observed that the people in trains, or omnibuses, or tram-cars, making their short journeys home to the suburbs after the day's work, if they looked at all intelligent, seemed bound to strain their eyes in the bad light, poring over some ill-printed newspaper or some snappy snippets. More often than not the papers are morning papers, crumpled from having already been read. The readers all seem to suffer from the uneasiness which marks the craving; two friends meeting in a train seem no longer able to talk together with any ease without unfolding their papers and taking snatches of cheering print as they babble. Only the young men and maidens and middle-aged men seem so afflicted; the old people sit quiet with their thoughts, or they talk, or watch their fellow-travellers.

The worst of it was that I found that I suffered from the craving myself. It was hard for me to sit quiet in an easy chair and smoke and muse. Always I wanted to be reading something, to be reading any trivial stuff rather than nothing at all. Then at last, having satisfied myself that there was really such a craving, I discussed the matter with my friends. Most of them had to admit that they did suffer from it, that they could not sit quiet and think, that this craving came upon them and they had to read. It did not matter much what they read, practically anything in the way of printed matter, circulars even, would stay the craving.

Reading is without doubt an excellent thing; but it would seem that the modern excessive indulgence in it leads to a print habit which is quite as strong and, if anything, more deplorable than a drug habit. We seem to be spoiling our nerves and weakening our brain by excessive print-imbibing. I certainly find it very hard to break myself of the continual craving for print, to acquire the power of being able to sit quiet and just think; so do my friends. Yet the power of self-communion is a most valuable power. After all, though you get knowledge from books, you do not want to be always at them. The digestion of that knowledge and the wisdom which comes from it are only attained by letting it simmer in the under-self quietly, undisturbed by continuous additions. The race is losing that power; excess in reading is destroying it, and so preventing the attainment of wisdom.

EDGAR JEPSON.

BARBADOS: PAST AND PRESENT

It is strange that in this age when the keenest interest is taken in reviving the spirit of the past, so delightful and lively a book as Ligon's "True and Exact History of the Island of Barbados" has not yet been selected as one of those old-world volumes, which are felt to be worthy of a re-edition.* The rarity of the work,

* The full title-page of this delightful volume is as follows:—

A TRUE & EXACT
HISTORY
of the Island of BARBADOS.

ILLUSTRATED WITH A MAP OF THE ISLAND, AS ALSO THE PRINCIPAL TREES AND PLANTS THERE, SET FORTH IN THEIR DUE PROPORTIONS & SHAPES, DRAWNE OUT BY THEIR SEVERALL & RESPECTIVE SCALES. TOGETHER WITH THE INGENIO THAT MAKES THE SUGAR, WITH THE PLOTS OF THE SEVERALL HOUSES, ROOMES & OTHER PLACES, THAT ARE USED IN THE WHOLE PROCESSE OF SUGAR-MAKING; VIZ., THE GRINDING-ROOM, THE BOYLING-ROOM, THE FILLING-ROOM, THE CURING-HOUSE, STILL-HOUSE & FURNACES;

All Cut in Copper.

By Richard Ligon, Gent.
LONDON.

Printed for Humphrey Moseley, at the Princes Arms, in St. Paul's Churchyard, 1657.

no doubt, precludes the general reader from perusing its quaint pages, but those to whom this happy privilege has fallen cannot but have been struck with the freshness of style, the power of vivid description, and the interesting glimpse into the seventeenth century, which the writer displays and affords.

Ligon's book appears to have been written for the most part in Upper Bench Prison, to which he was committed on his return to England from the West Indies. We are not aware of the nature of the offence for which Ligon was thus treated, nor would it be pertinent here to seek it. If we vouchsafe the matter a word at all it must be one of self-congratulation at the misfortune which caused the imprisonment, for it is more than likely that it is to this enforced period of leisure that we are indebted for the existence of the book itself.

Those were troublous times in the middle of the seventeenth century. Society was broken up by the factious tendencies of the hour, and law and order were frequently set at defiance by open rioting and pillage. It was in one of these outbreaks that Ligon lost all the worldly goods that he had "gotten by the painfull travells and cares" of his youth, and he resolved, old man though he was, to set out for foreign parts. His friends endeavoured to dissuade him from his purpose, but he confronted them with the proverb: "Need makes the old wife trot." Accordingly we find him taking advantage of the offer of a friend to accompany him to the Caribbees and setting sail from the Downs "in the good ship called the Achilles, a vessel of 350 tunnes," upon the 16th June, 1647, two years before the establishment of the Commonwealth. The account given of the voyage, being the result of close observation, is full of interest, though some of the conclusions he arrives at to explain certain phenomena are, to our more enlightened selves, not a little grotesque and ridiculous. In describing the phosphorescence which would delight him of a night-time as it played on the water about the ship, he thus accounts for it:

In the Ayer, Rough hard bodies meeting with one another, by violent stroakes, Rarifie the Ayer so as to make fire. So here, the ship being of a hard substance and in a violent motion, meeting with the strong resistance of the waves (who though they be not hard, yet they are rough by reason of their saltnes), doe cause a light, though no fire; and I may guess that that light would be fire were it not quencht by the sea in the instant it is made: which in his own Element hath the greater power and predominancie.

In Ligon's time a large increase in the population of Barbados was due to the civil war which raged in Great Britain. Many individuals, to save themselves from total ruin, migrated thither as refugees with as much hard cash as they could hurriedly realise, until affairs at home should become more tranquil. But the largest additions to the white population at that period were contributed by the Christian slaves. No less a number than 7,000 persons, who were taken prisoners at the battle of Worcester in 1651, "were sent to London, and sold as slaves to the plantations of the American Isles."

The voyage to Barbados occupied two and a half months, including a short stay at one of the Cape de Verde Islands. Upon his arrival Ligon found so fierce a scourge was raging in the place—probably an epidemic of yellow fever—that the living were sometimes unable to bury their dead. It is a matter of wonder that any were alive, for not only were dead bodies thrown into the mangrove swamp near to which the small town was situated, but it seems that the people were accustomed to drink of the water which there accumulated:

A town ill situate (says Ligon) . . . for the ground being somewhat lower within the land than the sea-banks are, the spring Tides flow over, and there remains, making a great part of that flat a kind of bog or Morasse, which vents out so loathsome a savour as cannot but breed ill blood.

This, then, was the original site of Bridgetown, the present capital of Barbados, then known as "the Bridge—for that a long bridge was made at first over a little nook of the sea, which was rather a bog than sea." Here were the taverns, kept by Mr. Jobson and Jane Fuller, to which the planters were wont to resort occasionally for a fish dinner, or maybe to seal a bargain, upon a purchase of slaves or cattle, in "kill-devil," since known as rum.* Here also foregathered the rough, hardy, daring sailors, men whose own fathers had sailed under Drake and Raleigh—who, as Froude says, "went out across the unknown seas, fighting, discovering, colonising, and graved out the channels, paving them at last with their bones, through which the commerce and enterprise of England has flowed out all over the world." Here were landed barrels of sated meat and fish, tools for clearing and cultivating the thickly-wooded island, servants, and slaves; and moving amongst the busy throng might have been seen the camels and asses employed to carry their pack-loads to the plantations inland. "Neither the voluptuous man who thinks the day not long enough for him to take his pleasures, nor the sleepie man who thinks the longest night too short for him to dreame out his delights, are fit to repose and solace themselves upon this Iland."

It was the intention of Ligon's friend to have settled in Antigua, but owing to various causes he changed his mind, and decided that it would be better to buy a made plantation in Barbados than by trying his fortunes in a less developed country, "to indure all hardships and a tedious expedition of what profit or pleasure may arise in many years' patience." Ligon nowhere definitely tells us who amongst his fellow passengers was the friend whom he accompanied, but we suspect him to have been a Colonel Modiford, who now comes upon the scene.† This gentleman met at the house of Mr. Philip Bell, then Governor, a certain Major William Hilliard, "an eminent planter of the Iland and a Councillor who had long been there, and now was desirous to sucke in some of the sweet ayre of England." Here was an opportunity of making the desired investment. In a month's time a bargain was concluded whereby Modiford, for the sum of £7,000, was to manage the estate and receive half the profits. The plantation had in it 500 acres of land:

with a faire dwelling-house, an Ingenio‡ plac'd in a room of 400 foot square: a boyling house, filling room, Cistern, and still-house: with a Garding house of 100 foot long and 40 foot broad: with stables, Smith's forge, and rooms to lay provisions of Corne and Bonavist; houses for Negroes and Indian slaves, with 96 Negroes and three Indian women, with their children: 98 Christians, 45 Cattle for worke; 8 milch Cowes, a dozen Horses and Mares, 16 Assinigoes§ . . . In this plantation of 500 acres of land there was employed for sugar somewhat more than 200 acres; above 80 acres for pasture, 120 for wood, 20 for Tobacco, 5 for Ginger, as many for Cotton-wool, and 70 acres for provisions; viz., Corne, Potatoes, Plantines, Cassavie, and Bonavist; some few acres of which for fruit; viz., Pines, Plantines, Milions, Bonanoes, Guavers, Water Milions, Oranges, Limons, Limes, &c., most of them onely for the table.

In the description of the plantation the first feature which strikes our notice is the mention of 120 acres of wood. It is difficult for one who knows the Barbados of to-day to conceive that its first settlers found it a densely-wooded island—not mere scrub and brushwood, but tropical forest, full of magnificent trees with lavish profusion of creepers, orchids, and ferns. "The woods were so thick, and most of the trees so large and massie as they were not to be falne with few hands." Along the leeward side of this wood we may hazard the conjecture that the "faire dwelling-house" was built; close by, the estate buildings; a little farther off, upon the other side of these, the "houses for Negroes and Indian slaves." Nearer to the dwelling-house may have been the habitations, "made of sticks, withs and plantine leaves," of the twenty-eight Christians. A word must be said of these unfortunates, and their status and sufferings are best described in Ligon's own words:

The slaves and their posterity, being subject to their masters for ever, are kept and preserv'd with greater care than the (Christian) servants, who are theirs but for five years according to the laws of the Iland. So that for the time the servants have the worse lives, for they are put to very hard labour, ill lodging, and their dyet very slight.

They were of all classes, from the English Royalist officer to the wild kilted Kelts of the north of Ireland. Clergymen even were to be found amongst them. There were Scots, too, who had fallen into the hands of the Roundheads at the battle of Worcester, and, later on, the failure of Monmouth's Rebellion was the cause of a further contribution to their number. Carlyle tells us that such numbers were thus sold into bondage by Cromwell that the practice gave rise to the coining of an active verb—"to barbadoes you." It seems that the custom was to send them down in batches, men and women together, to the ports of London, Plymouth, and Bristol, there to await the next ship bound for the "American Isles." During the passage, which lasted from six to eight weeks, they were kept locked up beneath deck amongst horses and cattle. If unfortunate enough to survive the voyage, a worse fate awaited them upon arrival. Ligon thus describes the scene:

Upon the arrival of any ship that brings servants to the Iland, the Planters go aboard, and having bought such of them as they like, send them with a guid to his Plantation. and being come, commands them instantly to make their cabins, which they not knowing how to do, are to be advised by other of their servants that are their seniors, but if they be churlish and will not show them, or if materials be wanting to make them cabins, then they are to lie on the ground that night.

On the following day these poor wretches were called out at six o'clock in the morning to work till six in the evening, with two hours interval at midday. The overseers by whom they were commanded treated them with the greatest severity. "Truly," says Ligon, "I have seen such cruelty there done to servants, as I did not think one Christian could have done to another"—a strong statement, all things considered. It is not surprising, under these conditions, to find that these white bond-servants occasionally became desperate and formed conspiracies to revenge themselves upon their masters. Such an uprising was devised in 1649*:

A day was appointed to fall upon their masters and cut all their throats, and by that means to make themselves not only freemen, but Masters of the Iland. And so closely was this plot carried, as no discovery was made till the day before they were to put it in act. And then one of them, either by the failing of his courage, or some new obligation from the love of his Master, revealed this long plotted conspiracy, and so by this timely advertisement the Masters were saved: Justice Hothersall (whose servant this was) sending letters to all his friends and they to theirs, and so one to another, till they were all secured.

Eighteen of the leaders were summarily executed, the reason for making so many examples being that they found them "so haughty in their resolutions." What a splendid picture of pride and desperation!

* Schomburgk calls this insurrection a rising of the African slaves, but it can scarcely be doubted that Ligon, who was on the spot at the time, is correct in stating it to have been a conspiracy of the white servants. The mistake is the less excusable as Schomburgk refers to Ligon as his authority. (Hist. of Barbados, p. 267.)

* About the year 1650 the planters re-named "kill-devil," calling it "Rumbullion," from which we get the present word "Rum." "Rumbullion" is an old Devonshire word meaning uproar or rumpus. Many of the foremost planters at that time came from Devonshire. An old writer says:—"The chiefe fudling they make in the Island is Rumbullion, alias kill-devil, and this is made of suggar canes distilled, a hott, hellish, and terrible liquor."

† It may be of interest to note in this place that Colonel Modiford soon proved himself to the Barbadians to be a man of parts. In 1650 we find him raising a regiment for the protection of the Governor, who was suspected of belonging to the Independents. Two years later his house had become the headquarters of the Parliamentary faction, and in 1660 he was appointed Governor of the Island. Under these circumstances it is strange that in the following year he should have been selected amongst six other gentlemen who, for having remained faithful to His Majesty during the Revolution, were raised by Charles II. to the baronetage; yet Schomburgk, that careful historian, tells us that this was so. Modiford finally became Governor of Jamaica in 1663.

‡ Ingenio was the term used to denote a sugar factory; it was borrowed from the Spaniards along with the art of making sugar.

§ Assinigo, or Asinigo is from the Spanish asnico, a little ass.

A considerable number of the descendants of the white slaves still exists in Barbados, although they are rapidly dying out. Their chief occupations now are fishing and shopkeeping. In Barbados they are opprobriously known as "Red-legs." This word has a curious origin. It appears to have been originally applied as a nickname by the settlers in Ulster to the kilted natives of the country, and the term accompanied such of those individuals as were transported by Cromwell. At the present day, however, it is indiscriminately used to denote anyone belonging to the class of poor whites.

Amongst other produce of the fruit garden Ligon mentions the pine. It is noteworthy that this fruit was apparently grown to perfection at that time, and without difficulty. In later years its cultivation in Barbados has been almost entirely given up, a few private efforts only being made to raise it for the table. Ligon was an epicure of no mean order, and the pine was, of all the tropical fruits that came under his acute notice, the one which most took his fancy. He devotes no less than two pages and a quarter to the description of its appearance and flavour. As a gastronomist he takes rank with Charles Lamb, whose delineation of the same fruit may not inaptly be placed here, side by side with that of our author, so similar are they. Lamb's rhapsody on the pine is introduced into his Essay, "A Dissertation on Roast Pig," its characteristics presenting certain distinctions from those of the succulent porker:

Pine-apple is great. She is indeed almost too transcendent—a delight, if not sinful, yet so like to sinning, that really a tender-conscienced person would do well to pause—too ravishing for mortal taste, she woundeth and excoriateth the lips that approach her—like lovers' kisses, she biteth—she is a pleasure bordering on pain from the fierceness and insanity of her relish—but she stoppeth at the palate—she meddeth not with the appetite—and the coarsest hunger might barter her consistently for a mutton-chop.

Says Ligon:

As you taste it, you finde it in a high degree delicious, but so milde, as you can distinguish no taste at all; but when you bite a piece of the fruit, it is so violently sharp, as you would think it would fetch all the skin off your mouth; but before your tongue have made a second triall upon your palat, you shall perceive such a sweetness to follow as perfectly to cure that vigorous sharpness; and between these two extremes, of sharp and sweet, lies the relish and flavour of all fruits that are excellent, and those tastes will change and flow so fast upon your palat, as your fancy can hardly keep way with them, to distinguish the one from the other; and this at least to a tenth examination, for so long the Echo will last.

Ligon was one of those versatile men for whom nothing—not even the most trivial daily incident—was without importance. The world has known many such; men whose great breadth of sympathy has been their chief obstacle to success; men who, if they could have concentrated their minds upon narrower fields, might have made permanent reputations. Our author is equally at home in describing the cultivation of the sugar-cane and its manufacture into sugar, as he is in giving a minute account of the flora and fauna of the island. He is a combination of architect, sportsman, financier, epicure, poet, draughtsman and physician. Take him as architect, he notices all the defects in the houses he visits, and for remedy gives a detailed description of a perfect dwelling-house for the tropics. As Apicius, he gave the inhabitants a specimen-taste of his proficiency; "and they were all much taken with it, and in a week everyone was practising the art of cookery." He also instructed both Mr. Jobson and Jane Fuller, the keepers of the Bridge Taverns, in the art of dressing fish. We are even taken to the back-kitchen, and shown how a turtle should be butchered—a paragraph which we cannot refrain from quoting at length, so whimsical and gruesome is it:

When you are to kill one of these fishes, the manner is, to lay him on his back on a table, and when he sees you come with a knife in your hand to kill him, he vapours out the grievousest sighs that ever you heard any creature make, and sheds as large tears as a stag, that has a far greater body and larger eyes. He has a joynt or crevis, about an inch within the utmost edge of his shell, which goes round about his body, from his head to his tail, on his belly side, into which joynt or crevis you put your knife, beginning at the head, and so rip up that side, and then do as much to the other; then lifting up his belly which we call his Caligee, we lay open his bowells, and taking them out, come next to his heart, which has three distinct points, but all meet above where the fat is, and if you take it out, and lay it on a dish it will stir and pant ten hours after the fish is dead. Sure, there is no creature on Earth nor in the Seas, that enjoys life with so much sweetnesse and delight as this poor fish the Turtle; nor none more delicate in taste and more nourishing than he.

After three years' residence Ligon fell sick, and for some months fluctuated between life and death. When sufficiently recovered he took horse down to the Bridge, and engaged a passage on a ship bound for England:

and so, being ready to set sayle, myselfe and divers other Gentlemen embarkt, upon the fifteenth of April, 1650, at twelve o'clock at night; which time our Master made choice of, that he might the better passe undescri'd by a well known Pirate, that had for many dayes layne hovering about the Iland, to take any ships that traded for London, by vertue of a Commission as he pretended from the Marquesse of Ormond.

By this manœuvre they managed to elude the vigilance of the marine highwayman; but the voyage was yet to be fraught with perils that had indirectly well-nigh deprived us of this book. A Portuguese sailor at the wheel, who was "not well verst in the English tongue," misunderstood an order, and "so steered the ship so neer the winde that she came upon her staves, which caused such a fluttering of the sayles against the masts (the wind being extream violent) as they tore all in pieces"; for the sails were rotten, the ship having been fifteen months away from England trading on the West Coast of Africa. Provisions ran short, and to such a plight were they reduced that the idea of sacrificing one of their number was seriously entertained; but at last—and there is not a prettier passage in the whole book:

A little Virgin, who was a passenger in the ship, stood up upon the quarter deck, like a she-Worth, and said, That if They would be rul'd by her, she would not onely be the Contriver, but the acter of our deliverance. At whose speech, we all gave a strict attention, as ready to contribute our help to all she commanded; which was, That the Ship Carpenter should make a Distaffe and Spindle, and the Saylers combe out some of the Occome; with which instruments and materials she doubted not but to make such a quantity of thread as to repair our then useless sailes; which she accordingly did, and by her vertue (under God) we held our lives.

We wish we could further trace the fortunes of this brave little Virgin.

But, alas, for the vicissitudes of human life! Ligon only escaped the perils of the sea to be cast, upon his return to his native land, into prison. Let us hope that his friend, the Bishop, had sufficient influence to eventually procure his liberation, and that he was left to spend the remainder of his years in peace.

F. R. B.

THE LIBRARY TABLE

Eugène Delacroix. By DOROTHY BUSSY. (Duckworth, 5s. net.)

FLANKED on either side by a Corot and a Rousseau, the one example of Delacroix's work that is accessible to the London public—the execution of Marino Faliero, in the Wallace Collection—is but little noticed, and probably less talked about. When people of crushing superiority bore you by asking have you seen one thing, or what do you think about the other, it is a useful picture, this one of Delacroix's, to retort upon them. For Mrs. Bussy is quite right in saying that Eugène Delacroix is little more than a name in England; and English people when they are at the Louvre generally skip the later French pictures—there are so many others to see.

Frankly, we do not think there is ever, or, at all events, in the near future, likely to be a vogue for Delacroix in England. He is too serious; and the English are so serious themselves, or take themselves so seriously, that they do not look for seriousness beyond the Channel. To France they go for champagne—but not for stout and bitter. To France they go for week ends or for inspiration; but for the solid framework of their artistic constitution they are true to their Academy and the Trustees. There is something flimsy in the very sound of a name like Delacroix, as compared with those of Tadema or Herkomer, Solomon or Goetze.

In a little book of 120 pages, however, Mrs. Bussy has presented an appreciation of Delacroix and his work which need frighten nobody, and will certainly please anyone who takes the slightest interest in the subject of painting. "We do not propose," she says in her preface, "to do more here than put before the reader some gleanings from the abundant material that already exists." But the larger the field for gleaning, the more difficult the task, not of filling a given number of pages in one of the volumes of a series, but of selecting what is most fit for inclusion within a small compass; it is certainly very well and very charmingly done, and the seventeen illustrations are as useful as illustrations ought to be, but so often are not.

The High Tops of Black Mount. By the MARCHIONESS OF BREADALBANE. (Blackwood.)

THIS book is written in a manner most pleasantly appreciative of the numerous fascinations of the finest of all British sports. Lady Breadalbane is herself a keen stalker, and introduces us in the first place to her initial efforts, when "stag fever" so completely overcame her that on one occasion a fine "beast" was allowed to walk placidly by without a shot being fired, owing to the lady's utter inability to bring the sights to bear upon him. It was a phase, familiar to many a beginner, which quickly passed, and it is evident that before long the lady was more deadly with the '303 than most stalkers of a sterner sex can ever boast that they become. We are not sure, however, that, in discussion of the comparative merits of the old Express rifles and the smaller modern bores, the author gives sufficient credit to the flatter trajectory of the latter weapons. The stories of the killing of a great stag of over twenty stone and of a splendid eighteen-pointer—the latter not a very heavy beast for his head—are told with a zest which gives the reader a real thrill. Other sides of the sport are touched with equal appreciation—the beauty and grandeur of the scenery of the forest, which Lady Breadalbane loved, and evidently knew, so well; the humours of the famous McLeish, and the pathos of the lonely life of the stalkers in the great glens. One specimen of the dour responses of McLeish is well worth quoting. He had been indulging in a long argument in the Gaelic (and who that has stalked does not know how exasperating it is, when deer are in prospect and one is eager to hear the opinion of the professional as to the chance of a shot at a "suitable," or a "shootable," beast, to have to listen to the unending and unintelligible Gaelic in which the head stalker discusses each aspect of the case with the gillies?) at which Lady Breadalbane, at length wearied out of all patience, exclaimed: "Pray do talk English, McLeish; I cannot understand a word you say in Gaelic." "It is a pity you had not learnt such a useful thing before taking to the hill," was McLeish's dry rejoinder. Now and then Lady Breadalbane, in her appreciation of the great scenery of that splendid country, comes out with some fine thoughts, as: "I think David, the Psalmist, must have loved the high tops and solitary places, and understood the wonderful things of the deep seas, for he tells us how God 'bringeth forth the clouds from the ends of the world . . . bringing the winds out of His treasures.'" One really does seem to view the divine alchemy of cloud and mist as one stands on the high tops to which the stalking takes one.

The illustrations, from photographs chiefly, deserve a word of praise, showing—as well as a photograph can hope to show it—the character and beauty of the scenery.

Pope Adrian IV. The Lothian Essay, 1907. By J. DUNCAN MACKIE. (Oxford: B. H. Blackwell.)

AN essay written for a University prize seems to be on a somewhat different plane from ordinary literary work. It may or may not be brilliant and interesting, or excellent in style, showing promise for the future. But we imagine that it must show evidence of good hard work—a condition which this book certainly fulfils, especially in the comparison of many different authorities, in points more or less controversial. The story of Nicholas Breakspear's parentage and birth-place near St. Albans; the Pope's struggle with Frederick Barbarossa; the fate of Arnold of Brescia; the vexed question of the Bull "Landabiler," by which Adrian is alleged to have granted Ireland to the King of England—these and other like matters are well worked out and judiciously treated. Mr. Mackie has made a very careful study of the Pontificate of the only Englishman who has filled the Papal See. As an historical monograph, his essay is full of information; as a biographical sketch, it is, we fear, a little dull, and lacking in interest.

FICTION

The Shadow of the Unseen. By BARRY PAIN and JAMES BLYTH. (Chapman and Hall, 6s.)

IF we had been diverting ourselves by arranging improbable collaborations we could hardly have devised a more piquant union than this between the talented authors of "Eliza" and "Juicy Joe." It is the more to be regretted, therefore, that the resulting volume is hardly a success, for we find in it neither the broad humour of Mr. Barry Pain nor the forcefulness of Mr. James Blyth. We feel that the authors want to make our flesh creep, but a quantity of uncompromising dialect and a witch of Drury Lane solidity have failed to achieve this desirable effect. As a matter of fact, the authors appear to have a dread of encouraging our belief in the supernatural, and they make haste to explain away their very mild horrors in a very annoying manner. When we are looking for thrills we do not wish to be chilled with such dull scientific facts as the laws of heredity and personal magnetism, and we cannot find that in any way this work merits its very proper title.

Vanity. By PAUL and VICTOR MARGUERITTE. Translated into English by K. S. WEST. (Chatto and Windus, 6s.)

THIS is the latest work of the brothers MM. Margueritte, whose distinction it is to make the novel a vehicle of moral exposition. "Vanity" is an exposition by fiction of the modern dominance of the lust for money and power, and the degradation which follows in their train. Taking the Brevier family, as representative of the wealthy bourgeois class, the thesis is elaborately worked out in the career and character of each of its various members. In its deadly seriousness, in its pitiless analysis, and its sudden statement of some realistic little detail the book is characteristically French. It is not a pleasant group of characters whose lives are laid bare before us, and the skill with which their emotions, thoughts, and actions are revealed is somewhat discounted by the too apparent didacticism of it all. The translation from the French has been excellently done.

Through Life unto Death: The Story of a Tragedy.
By GEORGE LOUIS. (Routledge, Ltd., 6s.)

THE event round which this story circles is the eruption of Mont Pelée and the devastation of Martinique, which Mr. Louis visited shortly after the disaster. The book has a Greek god-like hero, whose rowing and generalship had won the Boat-race for his University. The heroine is a beautiful girl with shell-like ears, tendril curls, and deep red-gold hair of the hue which the old Venetian masters loved to paint. Beyond these facts the present reviewer refuses to say anything, as quite frankly and humbly he confesses that he has not yet succeeded in finishing the book, which he calculates contains 235,000 words in its 470 pages.

The Human Element. By ROBERT HERRIOT. (Sisley's, 6s.)

IN chapter eight of this novel the heroine rises in her anger and indulges in an eight-page oration of roughly two thousand words on the attitude of the Church of England towards divorce. The clergyman to whom it is addressed is naturally a little dazed by the time that the dinner-bell cuts it short, and we are afraid that the ordinary reader of novels will be reduced to a rather similar condition by "The Human Element," which is rather a condemnation of the effect of the English divorce laws on the wives of unfaithful husbands than a novel. It is to the credit of the author that he (or she) succeeds in holding the reader's attention with decidedly unpromising materials, and he shows a gift for characterisation that might be profitably displayed in the development of a lighter theme. But as it stands the book is crude.

The Love Story of Giraldus: A Romance of the Twelfth Century. By ALICE CUNNINGHAME. (Francis Griffiths, 6s.)

WE do not know whether Miss Cunninghame bases her story on any particular legend; she gives us no clue, but calls her work "a romance," which suggests that it is original. Her unfortunate adoption of the narrative form, always dangerous, but especially so when the narrator is supposed to be a monk of the twelfth century using the language of his day, makes the book very heavy reading. Long pages of monkish soliloquy, in which such words as "methinks," "perchance," "oft-times" play a large part, are damping to the spirits of the most painstaking reader. Poor Giraldus, with all his misfortunes, is neither more nor less than a bore, and the book is but one more instance of the fact that a very pretty legend often makes a dreary novel.

The Genteel A.B. By A. J. DAWSON. (E. Grant Richards, 6s.)

IN this book are narrated the mighty deeds on land and sea of Bill Chasemore, a sailor in the merchant service, and, as the night-watchman who recounts the stories of his hero loves to tell you, a thorough gentleman; one who uses Florida water two thousand miles from land and talks like a duke in a penny novelette, with an added snap of his own. The watchman has sailed with Bill often enough to know, and we had not listened to his salt and rugged speech very long before we accepted Bill Chasemore, with his gentility and his amazing adventures, as a magnificent institution, and were desirous of extending our gratitude to Mr. Dawson for permitting us to make his acquaintance. Through these pages Bill, beloved of all women, splendidly attired, ready of speech, and of unfaltering courage, marches with the assured success of the hero of a fairy story, and we can only gaze and follow him breathlessly. The watchman himself is a very human figure, and there is something gracious in his proud admiration for his hero, while about all his yarns there lurks a sense of the white beauty of sailing ships and the power of the sea. We are glad to note that the closing pages of the book suggest the possibility of our hearing more of the adventures of Bill Chasemore on some future occasion. Meanwhile, we must be content with reading Mr. Dawson's admirable collection of sketches again.

The Explorer. By WILLIAM SOMERSET MAUGHAM. (Heinemann, 6s.)

THIS is essentially a serious book. There is none of the charming flippancy of "Lady Frederick" to be traced in "The Explorer," but there is the deep understanding of human nature, and the power of making that understanding "tell" that assured Mr. Maugham's success as a dramatic author. He has talent, and he also has the gift for using that talent to the best advantage. "The Explorer" may be described as a "solid" work in the sense that it is carefully constructed and conscientiously written, but it is not a book to be hurried over and skipped. It is not for those readers whose name is legion and who flit through a novel, resting just long enough on every fifth page or so to extract just enough of the plot to enable them to keep pace with the births, deaths, and marriages of the various characters. It must be read as it is written, seriously and carefully.

DRAMA

THE REVIVAL OF "ARMS AND THE MAN"

MR. BERNARD SHAW'S "anti-romantic" comedy Arms and the Man was revived on Monday last at the Savoy and proved a striking success. The story of the play is too familiar to need retelling. One was struck, when seeing it acted, with the impression that its success was chiefly romantic. In vain Mr. Bernard Shaw strives to fight against the universal laws of human nature. His chocolate-cream soldier is one of the most romantic figures conceivable, his entry on to the scene is dramatic, his attitude throughout the first scene is a purely romantic attitude, veiled under a slight mask of cynicism, and the conclusion of the play is utterly and hopelessly romantic. The part of Sergius Saranoff appeared to the writer of this note much less convincing on the stage than in print. Mr. Granville Barker was not at his best in the part which does not seem suited by his voice or his method. Mr. Robert Loraine, as Bluntschli, on the other hand, has never had a part which suits him better and his performance was admirable, and Miss Lilah McCarthy looked and acted the ultra-romantic part of Raina superbly. Miss Auriol Lee did well as Louka, though it is a detestable and tiresome part intended to illustrate one of Mr. Shaw's astonishingly wrong-headed theories that a servant must either be a bad servant or a person of despicable character, and the same criticism may be applied to Mr. James Hearn's performance of the equally detestable Nicola. The dialogue is, of course, full of good things, and the play went on to the accompaniment of a ripple of not too boisterous laughter. It is the sort of play one would recommend to a beginner in Mr. Shaw's works. He is not trying to preach more than a very little, the dialogue is witty and amusing, and there is a strong romantic interest, while the end of the play is the traditional fairy story end, as far as the hero and heroine are concerned. The comedy should achieve a real popular success, in addition to the success it already enjoys among those clever people (including Mr. Shaw) who have been deceived into thinking of it as an anti-romantic comedy.

A. D.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE ALBIGENSES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Surely Mr. Machen's article, "‘Consolatus’ and ‘Church Member,’" is calculated to give a very erroneous idea of the instinct out of which grew the wonderful civilisation of Provence in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries.

It is true that the Puritan attitude would seem to call for some assumption such as the Albigenses boldly made when they declared the visible universe to be the work of the Devil. But Mr. Machen is unfair when he implies that the Albigensian heresy produced in Provence a hypocrisy of belief and conduct akin to that which (I am told) exists in Nonconformist England. The hypocrisy was only apparent; although it is probable that the Albigenses went even farther than the Puritans in their negations of good, in the severity of their moral code, and certain that the Courts where they were honoured lived in flagrant contradiction to this kind of belief. There is a sufficient explanation: The knights and ladies of Provence used the Albigenses as "educators." They reversed the Nihilism of the sect by an ingenious process and discovered thereby a justification of their gay affirmative civilisation. So Nietzsche used Schopenhauer. All values became relative. Blake, too, held visible Nature to be the work of the Devil, and yet was able to declare, "All that lives is holy," and to proclaim the marriage of Heaven and Hell. Such theories are dangerous, and Provence found them so; but she lived out her life, bravely and openly, to the end. The Puritans flourish.

J. M. H.

December 23.

[Mr. Machen writes: "I quite agree with your correspondent J. M. H., and I trust that I did not give anyone the impression that Provence during the twelfth century was as unpleasant as Salem in the seventeenth century. Yet Protestantism and Albigensianism are growths from one stock; and perhaps the differences between the two heresies are differences of race and climate. Add to the parent heresy that "dourness" is latent in the Anglo-Saxon; add also east wind and a savage land: the rest is Salem as described by Hawthorne."]

SPOKEN LATIN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have just read your note on the matter of spoken Latin, which refers to what I said on this subject at the Headmasters' Conference. It gives me satisfaction to find that you deplore the disuse of spoken Latin; but you have somewhat misapprehended our practice in this school. We speak both Latin and Greek regularly, at first on certain common and familiar subjects, later, on any subjects: thus in the sixth form an author may be read, explained, and discussed without the aid of English at all. This is not always done, nor exclusively; but we find that in proportion as the English is properly studied in English hours, it is possible to dispense with English in the hours given to foreign languages. We did not wait for the birth of a favourable "Zeitgeist" before organising this; if we had we should still be waiting. I quite agree with you that spoken Latin has a value of its own apart from the study of literature; but we use it as a means, all the same. It would take too long to explain either method or reasons in your columns; but I may refer to Mr. W. H. S. Jones's "Teaching of Latin" (Blackie).

W. H. D. ROUSE.

December 29.

EXIT ALGERNON

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Some few weeks ago I had the honour of receiving, from Lord Curzon of Kedleston, an unsolicited communication, in which he spoke of me "as the recognised custodian of the monuments of famous men." In a subsequent letter the great ex-Viceroy of India expressed himself as follows:

Will you allow me to say that the work which you voluntarily undertake in calling the attention of a heedless age to the memorials of the past, and in pleading for accuracy of thought, reference, and recollection, seems to me a very valuable one, and I hope you will not give it up.

Deeply gratifying as these words are to me, coming as they do from so illustrious a man as Lord Curzon, I nevertheless do "give it up." I might not have done so, had I received better and worthier treatment from the hands of the Press. As it is, I herewith take my final and irrevocable leave as a correspondent to the newspapers. The remaining years of my life will be solely and entirely devoted to my profession as a musician and composer, in which capacity I will now endeavour to become a great Englishman.

ALGERNON ASHTON.

December 31.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is doubtless a disappointment to many cultured men, bearing the name of librarian, who are readers of THE ACADEMY, to notice the uninformed remarks which appear upon the first page of this week's issue. Unfortunately, the average librarian—perhaps justly—considers it infra dignitatem to reply to such mischievous tirades, and, in consequence, the unreflecting part of humanity is left believing that you know what you are talking about. But emphatically you do not, and as a large number of people have the same muddle-headed idea of public libraries—a fact which may console you—I think it well to point out the error of your ways. First, then, there are no such things as "free" libraries, although there are "public" libraries. A rate-supported, civic library is not "free" any more than are the public highways, parks, or other institutions administered by municipalities. The Libraries Acts of 1892 contain no mention of "free" libraries; and these institutions are not charities, but are intended for all grades of people. The scheme, which you say is new to you, by which the reader who at present demands only bad fiction shall be compelled to take a book of another class, is ingenious and impossible. It is merely a distortion of the idea of the special non-fiction or student's ticket, issued by all modern public libraries, on which readers so desiring may borrow a work other than fiction in addition to the work borrowed on the ordinary ticket. Your remarks about assistant librarians are quite unwarrantable. I believe that, as a class, these young men are intelligent, enthusiastic, and well educated. Do you expect them to wear depending from their necks placards with the legend "Please ask me to compile a scheme of reading for you"? You doubt their ability to give advice on any general scheme of reading, and you compare their intellectual capacity with that of a railway booking clerk. Allow me to remark that your hurried purchase of a third-class railway ticket through a pigeon-hole from a man whose sole conversation with you is "Thank you," does not give you sufficient data for estimating the intellectual calibre of a railway clerk. The modern "efficient ticket clerk," as you call him, is a man, generally speaking, who has been trained in librarianship at the London School of Economics, London University, and is certificated by the Library Association. I suppose you have heard of the Library Association? The assistant librarian is a professional man, often with a wide knowledge of literature, not merely pure, but technical and scientific as well, and quite capable of giving direction as to the best approach to many subjects through books. But he does not inflict his services unasked upon every comer; good breeding would resent such a proceeding. If, however, a reader is too shy to ask for what the librarian is so ready to give, does the blame rest with the latter? If you can give chapter and verse for your statement that a reader once withdrew a whole set of Dumas from a library on one ticket, I shall be inclined to doubt my own conviction that it is a mere fabrication; otherwise, not. Equally absurd is the statement that another reader withdrew books on tickets for every one of his family, including children in arms, in order to supply himself with fiction for a week-end. Most public libraries have an age limit of fourteen years or thereabouts, and such borrowing is manifestly impossible. If it were not so, no harm would be done; a man may as well read ten novels as one, and the tirades against novels are, as you know perfectly well, mere hypocritical nonsense. Your zeal for the improvement of the newsroom is touching. This part of the library is a fungus growth, never intended by the founders of the public library movement. Many librarians deplore its existence; they know perfectly well that it is responsible for half the odium cast upon public libraries. The legitimate sphere of the library is that of literature, and by no manner of reasoning can the average newspaper be included in it. Librarians are merely doing their best with a room that libraries would be vastly better without. I trust, sir, that I have reduced you to a state of due humility, and that your square-bracketed remarks will not be confined to questions of my politeness, but rather to matters of fact.

W. C. BERWICK SAYERS.

December 30, 1907.

[Mr. Sayers appeals to us not to rebuke his manners, but to deal with his facts. The only definite statement he makes in his letter is that there are no such things as free libraries. He subsequently explains away his quibble by showing that he confuses the meaning of the words "free" and "charitable"; but, in any case, Mr. Sayers must have heard of the Cripple-gate and West City Free Libraries, which are content to describe themselves in this manner on a catalogue that lies before us. Mr. Sayers finds our scheme (which was given with reservations) impossible, but he gives no reasons. Our comment on the intellectual equipment of assistant librarians was supported by personal experience, and we have also tested the intelligence of railway clerks. Dumas and his subordinates are said to have produced twelve hundred volumes, so we also do not think it likely that any reader withdrew a "whole set" of his works from a public library. But the students' tickets which Mr. Sayers mentions, and a rule that exists in the library in question, which permits a reader to withdraw the whole of a book in volumes on one ticket, combined with the use of a judicious number of tickets issued to other readers, renders the feat we mentioned (which we know to have been performed) easily surpassable. We are glad to hear that most public libraries have an age limit, but there is nothing to prevent the transferring of tickets, and Mr. Sayers makes but a lame defence of the present condition of "news-rooms," to adopt his elegant terminology. With the more intemperate sections of Mr. Sayers' letter, his final plea for mercy prevents us from dealing, but it occurs to us that the Library Association should take courtesy into consideration when granting their certificates.—Ed.]

ANOTHER POINT OF VIEW

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have no doubt that Mr. Machen would use his sharpest weapons if it came within his range or humour to deal with the class to which I belong; but I, nevertheless, delight exceedingly in his uncompromising writing on the subject of religion. I would, indeed, that he would let the Stiggins host have a little of the neglect and indifference that are so wholesome for them; and he gravely wrongs an innumerable company of decent Stigginsites, who are little affected by the antics of their pastors and masters. I rubbed my eyes when I read Mr. Clutton-Brock's "Other Point of View," and learnt that "Liberalism" is to save the world, and that the "good Liberal's" dreams are of this world transfigured by political effort, somewhere within its "flaming ramparts"—whatever they may be. It is a happiness that "conservatism" may be used as a term free from political meaning, since the party that bore it have adopted other names. It is perhaps a pity that the like good fortune has not yet fallen to "Liberalism." I remember that, in the ardour of youth, I once defined a Liberal policy as being that which was worthy of a freeman; but, alas! I have lived to see active Liberalism covering so motley a host, and employing policies and practices so mean, that the word is almost odious to me. Its associations seem to me to bar it out from the regions to which Mr. Clutton-Brock applies it.

May I suggest that neither in the high sacramental views so powerfully upheld by Mr. Machen, nor in the sweet reasonableness of Mr. Clutton-Brock's political new earth, is the future happiness of the world to be looked for. Neither is universal enough. I have found no need for any doctrine of original sin—I can make enough at home—nor has a personal Devil had any known influence on me. I will certainly not yield my spiritual guidance to any priest, whether with apostolical succession or without; nor do I hanker after the "Liberalism" which, I gather, would seek to establish as its ultimate aim the making the best of both worlds. This has already been highly detrimental to one great religious body, whose prophet predicted that his Methodism would teach his followers how to accumulate wealth.

But have we not heard that it is possible to be in the world and not of it (in the sheer worldly sense), and that the Kingdom of Heaven is within us. Along the lines of personal relation to, and union with, God, and of altruism with regard to our neighbour lies the march of the generations who will yet make a new heaven and a new earth.

The Sacramentalist and the good Liberal are undeniably in this progression; but they are but minorities of minorities at the best, and they will merge themselves in nobler and ampler faiths—their very names may be forgotten—before the goal is reached.

This Kingdom of Heaven is universal as the vital air, and is indeed a spiritual atmosphere. I see no reason why the man of any faith may not belong to it. It is the essence of the teaching of Him who spoke as one having authority, and it may embrace, consciously or unconsciously, the right-hearted of every faith.

How much we owe you, sir, for letting these things be written of in THE ACADEMY. I feel a great indebtedness to Mr. Machen, and I owe something withal to Mr. Clutton-Brock.

S. H.

BOOKS RECEIVED

BIOGRAPHY

- Mackintosh, the Rev. W. L. Life of William Laud. Masters, 3s. 6d.
Vickers, K. H. Humphrey Duke of Gloucester. Constable, 15s. net.
Monteiro, Mariana. The Life of Saint Jerome. Sands, n.p.

BOOKS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

- Macdonald, A. The Quest of the Black Opals. Blackie, 5s.
Baines, Mrs. Philip. Bingle's Widow. S.P.C.K., 1s.
Cowper, Frank. The Forgotten Door. S.P.C.K.; 1s. 6d.
Bramston, M. Barbara's Behaviour. S.P.C.K., 2s.
Wevill, Lilian F. Betty's First Term. Blackie, 3s. 6d.
Marchant, Bessie. Darling of Sandy Point. S.P.C.K., 2s.
Quiller-Couch, Lilian. The Romance of Every Day. Frowde & Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.
Tucker, A. B. The Romance of the King's Army. Frowde & Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.
Fowell, Olivia. Patricia's Promotion. Gall & Inglis, 2s. 6d.
Moore, Dorothea. Pamela's Hero. Blackie, 2s. 6d.
Read, Mrs. R. H. Silver Mill. Blackie, 2s.
Fraser, Edward. The Romance of the King's Navy. Frowde & Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.

MISCELLANEOUS

- Dunlop, O. J. Leaves from a Cambridge Note-Book. Cambridge: Heffer, 2s. 6d. net.
By their Fruits. Selected and arranged by Elizabeth Snushall. Masters, 2s. 6d.
Devotional Gleanings from the Writings of the Rev. Thomas Thellusson Carter. Masters, 2s.
Gibb, Spencer J. Built upon the Faith. Mowbray, n.p.
The Jewish Literary Annual, 1907. Routledge, 1s. net.
Praise of a Simple Life. Edited by Ernest A. Baker. Routledge, 2s. 6d. net.
Spender, J. A. The Comments of Bagshot. Constable, 3s. 6d.
Crockett, W. S. Footsteps of Scott. Foulis, 3s. 6d. net.
Bland, Hubert. The Happy Moralist. Werner Laurie, 3s. 6d. net.
Grant, Mrs. Colquhoun. Quaker and Courtier: The Life and Work of William Penn. Murray, 10s. 6d. net.
Jerrold, Walter. Highways and Byways in Kent. Illustrated by Hugh Thomson. Macmillan, 6s.
Banister, Joseph. England under the Jews. Banister, 1s.
Waterfield, Margaret. Flower Grouping in English, Scotch, and Irish Gardens. Dent, 21s. net.
Symons, Arthur. Cities of Italy. Dent, 4s. 6d. net.
Layard, G. S. Suppressed Plates. Black, 10s. 6d. net.
The Royal Navy. Painted by Norman Wilkinson. Described by H. L. Swinburne. Black, 20s. net.
Vernon, W. W. Readings on the Purgatorio of Dante. In 2 vols. Methuen, 15s. net.
Gambier-Parry, Major. Annals of an Eton House. Murray, 15s. net.
Manucci, Niccolao. Storia Do Mogor. Translated by William Irvine. Murray, 12s. net.
Melville, Lewis. Bath under Beau Nash. Nash, 15s. net.
Walker, Ernest. A History of Music in England. Oxford: the Clarendon Press, 7s. 6d. net.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
& AFTER DINNER.

& BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

The Best Tonic

For the restoration of energy and vitality; the relief of mental and nervous exhaustion, impaired digestion or appetite, there is no remedy so beneficial as

Horsford's Acid Phosphate
(Non-Alcoholic.)

It is a scientific and carefully prepared preparation of the phosphates that provides the tonic and nerve food needed to improve general health.

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 132 Old Street, London, E. C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA

THE SPHERE.
6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

the Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Full Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

The JANUARY "BOOK MONTHLY"
SIXPENCE NET, IS NOW READY.

IT COMPLETES THE RECORD OF THE YEAR'S NEW BOOKS, HAS INTERESTING GOSSIP AND ARTICLES, AND IS BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED WITH CHRISTMAS-BOOK PICTURES, AMONG OTHERS.

THE FEATURE OF THE NUMBER IS A SEASONABLE SYMPOSIUM ON JUVENILE LITERATURE BY FOURTEEN OF THE BEST-KNOWN WRITERS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

London :

Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, E.C.

P.S.—Begin the year by subscribing to the "Book Monthly."

What Men are Saying
What Men are Doing
What Men are Thinking

SEE

PUBLIC OPINION

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY.
EVERY FRIDAY. TWOPENCE.

EDITED BY PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of PUBLIC OPINION is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

What SIR GILBERT PARKER, M.P. says of PUBLIC OPINION :

Dear Mr. Parker,
I cannot but congratulate you on that excellent paper, PUBLIC OPINION, which I read regularly. You have a journal of great influence and usefulness.

Yours truly,
GILBERT PARKER.

PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Book-stall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d., and to any place Abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to PUBLIC OPINION, 30 and 31 Temple House, Tallis Street, London, E.C. Specimens free on application.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART.

PRICE THREEPENCE.

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION :

Inland, 15s. post free, Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free.

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, 95 FETTER LANE, E.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____ months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

STEVENSONIANA

AN ANECDOTAL LIFE & STUDY
OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON

Edited by J. A. HAMERTON, and finely illustrated with 40 Portraits, beautifully printed on antique paper and handsomely bound.

Originally published at 12/6 net, for 6/-.

Postage 5d.

MOLIÈRE: The Complete Plays

The best and most complete English and French Texts on parallel pages and finely illustrated with 31 Etchings after Leloir, 8 vols., crown 8vo.

Published at £2 8s. net, for 25/-.

Postage 1/2

Books for Private & Public Libraries

FOR PRESENTATION,

Including STANDARD WORKS ON ARCHITECTURE,
THE FINE ARTS, SCIENCE, TRAVEL, and SPORT.

New Catalogue will be sent free on application, and all
Books can be ordered direct or through your local bookseller.

All are New as published, in the Publishers' original bindings, and at very low prices.

JOHN GRANT, Wholesale & Retail Bookseller

31 GEORGE IV. BRIDGE, EDINBURGH.

Mr. FRANCIS GRIFFITHS' LIST

MODERN ARGENTINA: the El Dorado of To-day.
With Notes on Uruguay and Chile. By W. H. KOEBEL. With 123 Illustrations. Just ready. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net; by post, 12s. 11d.

THE DICKENS CONCORDANCE. Being a Compendium of Names and Characters and principal places mentioned in all the Works of Charles Dickens. Containing first a List of the Works, secondly a Summary of Chapters in each book or pamphlet, and thirdly a complete Alphabetical Index of names, with the title of book and number of chapter quoted. By MARY WILLIAMS. Just ready. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d. net; by post, 3s. 10d.

THE CONSTRUCTION AND RECONSTRUCTION
OF THE HUMAN BODY. A Manual of the Therapeutics of Exercise. By EUGEN SANDOW. With a Foreword by Sir ARTHUR CONAN DOYLE. Demy 4to, cloth, profusely illustrated, price 12s. 6d.
net. With a Manikin.

JOHN BULL'S ARMY FROM WITHIN: Facts, Figures and a Human Document from one who has been "through the mill." By Ex-Sergeant-Major ROBERT EDMONDSON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

LOVE LETTERS OF HENRY VIII. TO ANNE
BOLEYN. With an Introduction by LADBROKE BLACK. Fcap. 8vo, paper, 6d. net; cloth, 1s. net.

NEW FICTION at 6s.

THE ANCHORAGE. The Story of a New Zealand Sheep Farm.
By W. H. KOEBEL.

THE FORBIDDEN WAY. A Romance of the Cotswolds.

By F. J. COX.

THE CHRONICLES OF BERTHOLD DARNLEY.

Edited by WILKINSON SHERREN.

The Athenæum says: "He has a Hoffmannesque imagination . . . worthy of a place in every literary museum. Vital, poignant, with flashes of extraordinary observation."

PASSING DOWN THE AVENUES.

By L. RUTHERFOORD SKEY.

LOVE IN LONDON.

By A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

THE LOVE STORY OF GIRALDUS.

By ALICE CUNNINGHAME.

London: FRANCIS GRIFFITHS, 34 Maiden Lane, Strand, W.C.

EAGLE INSURANCE CO.

1807-1907

CENTENARY

YEAR

LIVES

ANNUITIES

Head Office:
79 PALL MALL,
LONDON, S.W.

CITY—41 THREADNEEDLE ST., E.C.
Branches—Eagle Insurance Buildings, in BIRMINGHAM, BRISTOL, LEEDS, MANCHESTER

The Surplus disclosed at the Valuation (1902) produced an average Cash Bonus of 30 per cent. of the Premiums paid during the Quinquennium; being a return of one and a-half Premiums.

The Company's Debenture Policies, with Guaranteed Benefits, afford an attractive form of Insurance in the Non-Participating Class, at very moderate rates.

APPLY FOR XXth CENTURY PROSPECTUS, SHOWING SIMPLE AND LIBERAL CONDITIONS.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1862

JANUARY 11, 1908

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN,
ALBEMARLE STREET, PICCADILLY, W.

On Tuesday, January 14, at Three o'clock, ALBERT A. GRAY, M.D., F.R.S.E., First of Two Lectures on "THE INTERNAL EAR OF DIFFERENT ANIMALS." Half-a-Guinea the Course.

Thursday, January 16, at Three o'clock, Professor W. W. WATTS, F.R.S., First of Two Lectures on (1) "THE BUILDING OF BRITAIN," (2) "RECENT LIGHT ON ANCIENT PHYSIOGRAPHIES." Half-a-Guinea.

Saturday, January 18, at Three o'clock, Professor GIBBERT KAPP, Dr. Eng., First of Two Lectures on "THE ELECTRIFICATION OF RAILWAYS." Half-a-Guinea.

KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON
(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON).

DEPARTMENT FOR TRAINING
TEACHERS FOR SECONDARY SCHOOLS.

Theory, Practice, and History of Education.—J. W. ADAMSON, B.A., Professor (Head of the Department).

Ethics.—Reverend A. CALDECOTT, D.Litt., D.D., Professor.

Psychology.—C. S. MYERS, M.A., M.D., Professor. W. BROWN, B.A., Lecturer.

The Department is recognised by the Board of Education as a Training College for Secondary Teachers under the Teachers' Registration Regulations.

The Course, which includes Practical Work in Secondary Schools, extends over one academical year, beginning in October or January. It is suitable for those who are preparing to take the Teachers' Diploma, University of London, and for the Certificate of the Teachers' Training Syndicate, University of Cambridge.

The Fee is £20 for the year, if paid in advance, or 8 guineas per term (three terms in the year). Application should be made to

PROF. ADAMSON,
King's College, Strand, W.C.

THE MOSHER BOOKS

THE NEW CATALOGUE FOR 1908 is now ready, and will be sent free on request to booklovers anywhere that can be reached by mail. This Catalogue, like those that preceded it, is not made up of old and hackneyed quotations concerning books. You are not wearied by "a jollie good book" jingle and that sort of thing, but you are treated to some very genuine prose and verse not seen in every cut and decidedly dried anthology.

THOMAS B. MOSHER, PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

QUEEN SQUARE CLUB.

A social club for men and women interested in politics, literature or art. Lectures, entertainments, chess and bridge. An exquisite Queen Anne club-house, close to the British Museum, and Russell Square Station. Inexpensive lunch and dinner. Subscription two guineas.—Apply Secretary, 9 Queen Square, Bloomsbury.

NOTICE.

All communications to the Editor should be addressed
to 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields,
W.C.

All business communications must be sent to The Manager of "The Academy,"
95 Fetter Lane, E.C.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds of Typewriting carefully done at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

MS. TYPED with care, 8d. per 1000 words. Circulars duplicated from 2s. 6d. per 100 (testimonials). Shorthand.—Mrs. JACKSON, 37 Constantine Road, Hampstead, N.W. (late of Rosebery Square Buildings).

THE TYPEWRITING OFFICE for High-class work of every description. Authors' MSS. 10d. per 1,000 words. Prompt. Accurate.—ERNEST C. PEARCE, 30 College Road, Reading.

Books for Sale

ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA, a set in half-morocco, 35 vols., issued by the Times, for nine guineas net; good condition.—Apply W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

COSTUME.—"TWO CENTURIES OF COSTUME IN AMERICA, 1620-1820," by A. M. EARLE. Two vols., 8vo, profusely illustrated. Macmillan, 1903. Published 21/- net, for 10/6 as new.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

BOOKS AT ONE-THIRD COST—Thousands of the Best Books at from 25 to 60 per cent. below the original prices. Largest and best Stock of Secondhand and New Remainder Books in the World. Write for our January Catalogue.—W. H. SMITH & SON, Library Department, 186 Strand, London, W.C.

Art

EXHIBITION OF FURNITURE, Metal Work and Modelled Ceilings, by ERNEST W. GIMSON.—DEBENHAM & FREEBODY'S ART GALLERIES, WIGMORE STREET, W.

Books, etc., Wanted

THE CAMBRIDGE LITERARY AGENCY, which is placing Novels, Short Stories, Articles, and Poems with over 100 (one hundred) Publishers and Periodicals, sold, on December 31, 12 Short Stories and a Serial by UNKNOWN WRITERS. Hundreds of unique testimonials. All MSS. submitted by GEORGE G. MAGNUS, 115 Strand, London.

WILL PURCHASE AT ANY TIME. ILLUMINATED MANUSCRIPTS, from the earliest times till the beginning of the XVIth Century; Incunabula and other Early Printed Books; Illustrated Books, Prints, from the XVth and the beginning of the XVIth Century. Rare Old Books and Prints.—JACQUES ROSENTHAL, Munich, Bavaria. 10, Karlstr. 10.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical Advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley, Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A Furnished House in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

JUST PUBLISHED. 8vo, boards, 1s. net.

THE SLING.

Remarks in connection with Lectures delivered in the Royal Institution, May, 1905, to June, 1907.

By WM. LEIGHTON JORDAN.

London: Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co., Ltd

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

STEVENSONIANA

AN ANECDOTAL LIFE & STUDY
OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON

Edited by J. A. HAMERTON, and finely illustrated with 40 Portraits, beautifully printed on antique paper and handsomely bound.

Originally published at 12/6 net, for 6/-.
Postage 5d.

MOLIÈRE: The Complete Plays

The best and most complete English and French Texts on parallel pages and finely illustrated with 31 Etchings after Leloir, 8 vols., crown 8vo.

Published at £2 8s. net, for 25/-.
Postage 1/2

Books for Private & Public Libraries

FOR PRESENTATION,

Including STANDARD WORKS ON ARCHITECTURE,
THE FINE ARTS, SCIENCE, TRAVEL, and SPORT.

New Catalogue will be sent free on application, and all
Books can be ordered direct or through your local bookseller.

All are New as published, in the Publishers' original bindings, and at very low prices.

JOHN GRANT, Wholesale & Retail Bookseller
31 GEORGE IV. BRIDGE, EDINBURGH.

The Booklovers Library

delivers books in London and to any part of the United Kingdom. Its books are unlabelled, fresh, clean and inviting. It gives you a carriage-paid service or not, just as you wish. It gives you the books you want when you want them.

FOR LONDON AND COUNTRY.

ORDINARY SERVICE.

	Twelve Months	Six Months	Three Months
One Book ...	£1 1 0	£ 12 0	£ 7 0
Two Books ...	1 11 6	18 0	10 6
Three Books ...	1 17 0	1 1 0	12 0
Four Books ...	2 2 0	1 4 0	14 0
Six Books ...	2 12 6	1 11 6	16 0
Eight Books ...	3 3 0	1 16 0	18 0

Subscribers to the above service may exchange their books personally or by messenger as often as desired at the Library in Harrod's Stores, and at 17 Hanover Street, W. Country Subscribers to the above service may exchange their books by Rail or Parcel Post, as often as desired, paying carriage both ways. All boxes of books are forwarded to subscribers in advance; the finished volumes being returned to the Library upon receipt of fresh supply. The cost of carriage on four books, by rail, is in almost every case the same as on two or three books.

Booklet giving full terms of Subscription, the latest Monthly Book List, etc., will be sent Post Free upon application.

The Booklovers Library
17 Hanover Street, London, W.
And at Harrod's Limited, Brompton Road, S.W.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY

74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON.

MONOCHROME COPIES

BY THE PERMANENT AUTOTYPE CARBON
PROCESS OF PICTURES BY OLD MASTERS.
From the PRINCIPAL COLLECTIONS OF NOTE.

NUMEROUS EXAMPLES OF WORKS BY MODERN ARTISTS

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY'S Processes of Permanent Photographic Reproduction are extensively employed by the Trustees of the British Museum, the Local Government Board, many of the Learned Societies, and leading Publishers.

COPIES OF COINS, SEALS, MEDALS, MSS., DRAWINGS, ENGRAVINGS, ART OBJECTS, MICROSCOPIC WORK, &c.

For limited editions the Autotype processes of Book Illustrations are cheaper than any existing methods of block reproductions, and yield infinitely superior results.

*Inquiries are invited from those requiring
Book Illustrations of the very highest quality. Specimens and Estimates submitted.*

The Autotype Fine Art Gallery,

74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Open Free Daily, 10 to 6.

The New Album of Modes

"The Recognised Fashion Authority"

Edited by MISS A. MEEHAN

The "New Album" is published on the 20th of each month and is on Sale at all Bookstalls and Newsagents throughout the Kingdom.

PRICE 1/- MONTHLY

The "New Album" is a Ladies' Paper of the very highest class, and is three months in advance of all other Fashion Journals.

Annual Subscription to any part of the World, 15/- post free

Where any difficulty is experienced in obtaining a copy, send 1s. 3d. for a specimen, Post Free, to the Manager, "New Album," 95 Fetter Lane, London, E.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
Life and Letters . . .	331	The Hootawa Vandyck: An Old
Bethlehem: the House of Bread . . .	333	Master's Tragedy . . .	339
Literature:		A Forecast . . .	341
A Medieval Romance . . .	333	Concerts and Programmes . . .	342
More Poems: Grave and Gay . . .	334	The Peril of the Fairies . . .	343
La Madonna di Vico . . .	335	The Library Table . . .	344
Our Noble Selves . . .	336	Fiction . . .	345
The Swan of Lichfield . . .	337	The Drama:
Recent Archaeology . . .	337	"Edwin Drood" at His Majesty's
Elizabeth Gunning . . .	338	Theatre . . .	346
		Correspondence . . .	347
		Books Received . . .	350

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields.

The publishing offices of THE ACADEMY are at 95 Fetter Lane, E.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

THE news of the passing of the Times into other hands would, a few years ago, have evoked as much excitement and consternation as the announcement of an impending invasion of these islands by a foreign enemy. As things are at present, it produces merely a mild interest. We are naturally glad to think that there is every prospect that the paper will pass entirely away from the control of Mr. Moberly Bell; but to pretend to rejoice in the acquisition of the paper by Mr. Pearson would be a very different matter. Mr. Pearson represents nothing which can command the admiration of THE ACADEMY. While we are able to concede with pleasure that he has avoided the gross outrages on good taste and common decency which have rendered the Harmsworth journals so disagreeably notorious, he has never established a claim to be anything more than a mere man of business. It is a bad thing for a country when its greatest newspapers become mere money-making machines, and when a given line of policy is only pursued because it has been found to pay. It is absolutely and inevitably true that Honesty is the best Policy in the true sense of the words, but what is "best" from a moral point of view is not by any means necessarily best from the point of view of business. We must, however, keep up our hopes, and look to that reaction which must surely not be very far off. When every important paper in this country belongs either to Mr. Pearson or to Lord Northcliffe, perhaps the mass of the people will begin to understand what is now only apprehended by the few. After all, nobody is obliged to buy a paper unless he likes.

The hypnotic value of a name is a wonderful thing, but it has its limitations. If the Times of the future is to regain its old position and influence it will have to recover its old dignity, honesty, and impartiality, and, failing that, all the business instincts of all the "keenest business men" in the world will not save it from ultimate disaster. A Times which sells inferior encyclopedias at about three times their value, a Times which runs a book club, one of whose avowed objects is to boycott all books, whatever their merits, whose publishers do not consent to fall in with its own schemes for getting money out of the public, a Times which allows its manager to write in its columns unsigned letters purporting to come from outside sources, while denying the plain right of reply to those whom it has attacked with vulgarity and bare-faced mendacity, is not the Times at all, and its assumption of the name is a vile abuse of a noble tradition. Does anyone in his senses suppose that if THE ACADEMY had been bought by Lord Northcliffe (as it very nearly was) it would still be THE ACADEMY?

We call attention to the Brymbo Church School scandal. Brymbo is an independent ecclesiastical parish which was formed out of the parish of Wrexham. The population is exclusively composed of working men. It contains two schools—a County Council sectarian school and a Church school. The Church school was built and is kept in repair by an endowment under which the children are taken to church on Sundays, unless their parents notify their objection, and the Vicar of Brymbo is superintendent ex officio. Before Christmas it was attended by 573 children. The Welsh Committee of the Board of Education, in conspiracy with the Local Education Authority, first required improvements to be made and then prevented the trustees from using funds at their disposal for carrying them out. The Vicar then undertook the responsibility of carrying them out. Baffled in their attempts to secure the building and endowments for sectarian purposes, the conspirators closed the school on December the 31st. The parents of 422 children signed a protest to the Local Education Authority against their action. Nine out of fourteen teachers refused offers of other appointments with equivalent salaries, made by the Local Authority, and held by the school.

The working men of the parish raise £550 a year by voluntary contributions for the support of the Church and school. In defiance of the Local Authority and the Welsh Committee of the Board of Education, the school was reopened on Monday, the 6th, with 339 children. A number of working men gave up half a day's work in order to protect the children from molestation on their way to school. Since the Local Authority "closed" the school it has opened others for the surplus children, consisting of two chapel rooms and an institute, one is upstairs and another below the soil on two sides. The health of the children is of no concern to the Local Authority and the Welsh Committee, provided they can secure sectarian dominance. We quote these details from a letter to the press signed by the Bishop of St. Asaph. We would particularly warn the nine teachers remaining in the Church school to carefully preserve evidence of the offers of other appointments made to them by the Local Authority. As long as Mr. McKenna presides at the Board of Education they will have to guard against persecution by the Welsh Committee of the Board, which will probably pretend that the school was closed because the teaching was incompetent.

In our issue of December the 21st we made a passing allusion to Mr. Macnamara as "an interested witness" concerning the proportions of State Aid to Voluntary Contributions to Denominational Training Colleges. Our imputation may have seemed unfair, but we did not make it at random. A correspondence which appeared in the pages of our contemporary the Morning Post has quickly justified it. We refer our readers to our contemporary for the correspondence is too long to quote. The writers and dates of the letters were as follows: The Rev. J. D. Thomas, Principal of the Home and Colonial Training College, December 24th; Sir C. T. Dyke Acland, December 26th, incidentally referring to the subject; Mr. Macnamara, December 28th, first reply to Mr. Thomas; Mr. Thomas, January 2nd, rejoinder; Mr. Macnamara, January 3rd, second reply. The cause of controversy was that Mr. Macnamara had pointed an argument in a speech delivered in Shoreditch Town Hall on December the 19th with the statement that the total cost of building the Home and Colonial College was £7,600, and that the State found £6,000 of it.

Now, these were some of Mr. Macnamara's strange errors prior to his forcible conversion by Mr. Thomas: (1) He misquoted the figures of the sum he referred to unfortunately deducting £100 from his opponents' balance of credit. This was passed over by both sides in the controversy, as comparatively immaterial. (2) He quoted the sum as the total cost of building operations, which had actually cost £13,071 up to 1857 only. (3) He did not know that the College had existed for twenty years before that date. He subsequently recanted as regards (2) and (3). (4) He ignored heavy expenses, very pertinent to the argument, which were met by the Home and Colonial Society since 1857. He does not explain why he was so reticent of his knowledge to his audience at Shoreditch. (5) Though an Under-Secretary of State, he does not know how to use Blue Books. Sir C. T. Dyke Acland has had to explain that though "We may be certain that the statements of the Board [of Education] will be accurate as to the amounts paid by the State, it is not unfair to assume that the denominational contributions may not have been included even in the most recent official statements." Mr. Macnamara jumped at the bait offered by the Education Blue Book for 1867-68, and was caught by the gills on Mr. Thomas's nasty-audited balance-sheets.

One more pitfall yet remained for Mr. Macnamara after he had recanted, and he fell into it headlong. (6) He quoted (December 28th) as complete, statistics specially stated three times over to be incomplete, in Command Paper 233, a return to an order of the House of Commons made by his own request. Really, if the political Nonconformist party cannot marshal its facts, when it has to face debate in the House of Commons, better than Mr. Macnamara has with all "his acumen and intimate knowledge of scholastic affairs," it is not surprising if it hurries to "make hay" of the Denominational Colleges while Mr. McKenna's Regulations still shine upon it. The suppressio veri is a method of argument which may be very convincing in political Nonconformist circles; it is one sign of the habit of mind which has caused the use of the frequently opprobrious term "Nonconformist conscience," to the great injustice of many Nonconformists. Slow but candid minds do not readily realise how widely that habit of mind exists in England; when they do, they suffer a reaction and regard it with more loathing than it perhaps deserves, for it is curiously blended with certain excellent qualities. We dwell on this subject, for we do not wish, and we do not think that England wishes, to lie again under the heel of "the Saints." It is, therefore, instructive to observe the receipts by which political Nonconformity cooks its material.

Pessimism is indefensible, we were told by the Daily Mail, ushering in the New Year with an inspiring call to Englishmen to be up and doing business. Pessimism may or may not be indefensible; but it is amusing to read the reasons given by the Carmelite organ for its cheery frame of mind. Here they are:

The slightest study of the history of social progress will show in what a wonderful manner the life of humanity has improved. The comforts which a century ago were confined to the upper or the upper middle classes are now accessible to even the humble. At the beginning of last century such things as carpets were rare in even comparatively well-to-do homes. To-day they are found in the tenement. Horseless vehicles, propelled by petrol or steam or electricity, have become familiar features in the street . . . only two days ago an inventor flew a circular kilometre.

Pax hominibus bonæ voluntatis, the angels sang long ago; peace to men with carpets who can fly a circular kilometre is the new greeting. And one must not forget that "instruction is of a higher standard and more widely diffused." A swamp, in the same way, is water more widely diffused than in a river; one hopes that the ague-stricken inhabitants realise their blessings. And, by the way, there is an amusing comment on the "instruction" question in the very issue of the Daily Mail which contains the amazing article from which we have quoted. M. Clémenceau, it seems, has just been visiting the criminals at a "children's court"; and "our own correspondent" describes his demeanour as "horrified." So much for the wide diffusion of high-class instruction. But, in all seriousness, how does stuff such as this Daily Mail "leader" get itself written? How is it possible to find a man who is willing to profess his solemn conviction that machinery is the desideratus gentium? People have been ordered to be happy for all sorts of odd reasons; but this exhortation to bliss because "the turbine has replaced the reciprocating engine and the motor 'buses run about the streets'" seems unique.

That pageantry is highly infectious has been amply demonstrated during the past year or two; but an epidemic so sudden as is chronicled in the London papers this week is really alarming—if there is, indeed, anything in it. Six months is surely far too short a time to prepare for anything like a proper presentment of the history of the greatest city in the world, even if the most influential support had been given it, which, to judge from the names mentioned, is very far from being the case. If a London pageant is seriously contemplated, there ought to be no doubt about its being thoroughly well supported, and most carefully thought out.

The Chelsea Pageant, which was set on foot by the Archdeacon of Middlesex so long ago as last spring, with Earl Cadogan as its President, should amply suffice for this year in London. Chelsea is quite the most interesting of the Metropolitan Boroughs, from the literary and historical point of view, and a series of episodes has been planned for representation in Ranelagh Gardens in July that will do much more than merely please the eye. The President of Magdalen may know to a penny how much a pageant means at Oxford, but his sudden appearance in London with Mr. Lascelles is more surprising than convincing, until we hear of some, at all events, of the Metropolitan authorities giving their countenance, if not their support to so hasty a scheme.

The publication by Messrs. Chatto and Windus of a new edition of Mr. Swinburne's first volume, "The Queen Mother" and "Rosamond," recalls the frenzied denunciations of anger with which the poet's earlier works were received. These two dramas were originally published in 1861. They were followed in quick succession by "Atalanta in Calydon," and the first series of "Poems and Ballads." The growing conviction that a poet had appeared in Britain occasioned a considerable fluttering in the dovecotes of Philistia, and the strident bray of the jackass was heard in the land. Fortunately Mr. Swinburne proved absolutely contemptuous of this chorus of disapproval, and was content to concentrate his energies on the production of poems which, it is not too much to say, posterity will acclaim as among its noblest heritages. To-day Mr. Swinburne occupies by universal consent the sovereignty of English song. The fact that he is not poet laureate is but another illustration of that official stupidity which is, perhaps, the most characteristic note of successive English Governments. The lover of poetry, however, will not feel seriously perturbed because the singer of "Dolores" and "The Hymn to Man" was deemed unworthy of a place in that apostolical succession of immortal bards which connects Mr. Alfred Austin with Nahum Tate.

We have received from the Daily News the details of a scheme which it proposes to put into practice for the purpose of encouraging the public to cultivate what it is pleased to call the "art of reading papers." As the scheme in question simply amounts to a device for increasing the circulation of the Daily News by means of offering money prizes, and as it is exactly on a par with limerick competitions or any other of the modern "brainy," "up-to-date" newspaper methods of alluring readers, we do not feel inclined to give it that publicity in our columns which is requested of us. Our humble opinion is that there is no such thing as the art of reading papers, and if there were we should prefer people to practise on THE ACADEMY rather than on the Daily News. It would be better for them and better for us. Meanwhile, there is the art of writing papers, and we should recommend our astute Nonconformist contemporary to turn its attention to the more legitimate field of enterprise which is afforded by that much neglected art.

BETHLEHEM: THE HOUSE OF BREAD

Draw nigh, O man, in fear,
Bend knee and head;
Its lintel is full low,
Our House of Bread.

Though fair the housel cloth,
Its web is mean;
Yet she who span and spread,
Is Heaven's Queen.

See, as high Altar meet,
For Love's array,
She takes the kine's rough straw,
A lock of hay.

And till the royal Mage
His censer bring,
The beasts, with harmless breath,
Salute their King.

The Tabernacle stands
With wide-flung door,
And, as a lamp, His Star
Flames white before.

Ruddy as Sharon's Rose,
As lily white,
Lo, here exposed the Host
To mortal sight.

Ye humble men of heart,
Souls gone before,
Green Earth, yea, all His works,
Behold, adore!

E. D. FARRAR.

LITERATURE

A MEDIEVAL ROMANCE

The Book of the Duke of True Lovers. Now first translated from the Middle French of CHRISTINE DE PISAN, with introduction by ALICE KEMPE-WELCH. The ballads rendered into the original metres by LAURENCE BINYON and ERIC R. D. MACLAGAN; with seven illustrations. Title page, repeated on cover, designed by Miss B. C. HUNTER. New Medieval Library, Vol. I. (Chatto and Windus, 5s. net, and 7s. 6d. net.)

THOUGH Christine de Pisan was a matron during more than three-quarters of her life, and the whole of her fame, she has always been known by the name of her father, an Italian, called in France, Thomas de Pisan. He was astrologer to Charles le Cinquième, that generous and discriminating amateur of the arts, whose sensitive and rather sensuous features have become familiar all over modern France, through an antiquarian's blunder, as substitutes for those of the great, royal ascetic, St. Louis. Christine was born at Venice in 1363, and at the age of five was carried by her mother to Paris to join her father. At fifteen she was married to a Picard, Etienne de Castel, the King's notary and secretary. He died about ten years later, leaving her with three children badly provided for. The necessity of supporting them forced her to practise the art of letters, for which she was naturally so well adapted. She spent her life closely attached to Courts then among the most distinguished in Europe for their patronage of the fine arts, and her work was highly appreciated and liberally rewarded. Presumably, after she had established her family by these means, she took the usual course of residing at a convent, and died at one at Poissy in 1430. She wrote much amatory lyric poetry, poetry on sacred and scientific subjects, and moral, political and romantic prose. Her works show that she possessed very considerable literary talent, and was a woman of sound common-sense. Among other evidences of it, she defended "Le Roman de la Rose" against the charges of cynicism and immorality which were made against it. She seems, indeed, to have played in the literature of her period the part of M^{me}. de Sévigné or M^{me}. de Staël in more critical, if no more elegant scenes, or that of Mrs. Hannah More or Mrs. Chapone on the baser and coarser boards, which have rendered those good ladies' virtue rather repellant.

Many MSS. of Christine's other works are still extant, but only two copies of "The Duke of True Lovers," those now in the Bibliothèque Nationale and the British Museum, are known to have ever existed. The histories of both MSS. are well authenticated, and give further likelihood to the otherwise sound theory that the romance relates the actual love story of two of the author's princely patrons. The original owner of the first MS. was the famous Jean Duc de Berry, for whom "Les très riches Heures" and innumerable other exquisite illuminations were executed. From him it passed to his daughter Marie, who in 1400 married, en troisièmes noces, Jean Duc de Bourbon. From them it descended to the well-known Constable de Bourbon, from whom it passed by forfeiture to Francis I., who preserved it carefully at Fontainebleau. Charles IX. removed it to Paris to the Bibliothèque du Roi, now called the Bibliothèque Nationale, where it still remains. The second MS. was executed by Christine for Isabeau, wife of Charles VI. The royal baggage—we do not mean that lively Queen, but her goods—was captured in 1425 by John, Duke of Bedford, then de facto Regent of France. Signatures upon the outer envelope of the MS. suggest that it was brought for a time to England. Late in the fifteenth century it was bought by Jean de Bruges, sire de la Gruthuyse, a celebrated bibliophile. In the seventeenth century it was in the possession of Henry Duke of Newcastle. His grand-daughter married Edward Harley, Earl of Oxford, and carried the MS. with her into the Harleian Collection, of which her husband was the founder. Finally it passed into the British Museum when that collection was bought for the nation in 1745. It may be noted that of the original owners, one was the father of the Duchesse Marie de Bourbon, and the other, Charles VI., then under the tutelage of his wife as insane, was first cousin to both the Duke and Duchess; so that "The Duke of True Lovers" seems to have been a peculiar family possession. It is, in fact, the love of the Duke and Duchess, during the short period of the Duchess's second marriage, which the romance is supposed to celebrate. We have pleasure in acknowledging that Mrs. Kempe-Welch's learned introduction has afforded a large and handy nucleus for much of the erudition displayed above.

The story of "The Duke of True Lovers" is extremely simple; it is merely the narrative, told in the first person, of a very youthful noble, still under the authority of his parents, deeply enamoured of a young kinswoman already married. He visits her from curiosity, falls in love with her, persuades his parents to let him give jousts in her honour, raises her husband's suspicions, visits her by stealth in her husband's castle by the aid of an elder confidant, and, finally, deciding with her that they must separate at least temporarily, retires sadly to wars in Spain. His awakening from careless boyhood, his love-sickness, his devotions and despair are simply and prettily told, interspersed with love lyrics. There is no tragedy of any kind, and very little incident. It is the autobiography of a clever boy, written in the taste of the period, edited by an experienced hand. Remembering side-lights cast on the personal habits of the Middle Ages, we shudder when we read that one of the entertainments offered by the lover to the lady was a warm hip-bath in a tent. We wonder whether the entertainment was not rather a rare luxury than a marked attention, though we are amused that the young host should just manage to slip in for a moment during the ablutions to admire his guest's white skin, and merely receive a slight, formal correction for the compliment. On the whole, the elderly husband, a Constable of France, seems to have been justified in sending a chaperon to take care of the lady, and we cannot blame him much for receiving the youth at his own castle with polite reserve. However, no harm seems to have come of the bath, nor yet of a clandestine night passed in converse upon love, in the discreet presence of a faithful confidante. At any rate, nothing in the least improper escaped the revision of Mrs. Chapone. Unhappily, if the Duc and Duchesse de Bourbon were indeed the lovers of the story, the sequel, though happy to begin with, was short and unfortunate, for their married life, which only began in 1400, ended at Agincourt in 1415. The Duke was taken prisoner, and died in captivity in England, and never saw his beloved Duchess again.

The various lyrics are skilfully rendered by Mr. Laurence Binyon and Mr. Eric Maclagan. It will amuse their friends and admirers to speculate which is responsible for which. We will hazard a guess that Mr. Binyon is the author of the ballade: "Verily, Love, I have no language, none," and Mr. Maclagan of "Most noble ladies, cherish your fair fame." We cannot, at present, endorse the statement that the frontispiece represents the only authentic portrait of Christine, since there are at least three other so-called portraits which were exhibited at the Bibliothèque Nationale during the summer of 1904.

MORE POEMS: GRAVE AND GAY

Avilion and Other Poems. By ZACHARY EDWARDS. (Chapman and Hall.)

The Wayfarers. By A. K. SABIN. (Samurai Press.)

The Laboratory. By W. A. OSBORNE LOTHIAN. (Melbourne, 2s. 6d.)

Hydromel and Rue. By F. KAPPEY. (Griffiths, 5s.)

By Many Streams. By ELIZABETH GIBSON. (Samurai Press.)

A Garden of Shadows. By ETHEL ATKINSON. (Macmillan, 3s. 6d.)

The Proposal. (In Stanzaic Ichons). By I. HADFIELD. (Walter Scott, 1s.)

Swords and Ploughshares. By E. S. EVANS. (Stockwell, 1s. 6d.)

Humours of the Fray. By C. L. GRAVES. (Smith, Elder, 3s. 6d.)

Who shall blame the public for its neglect of modern verse and its devotion to the modern novel? A bad novel may be amusing; bad verse is not. Or even if we may allow that verse is sometimes amusing when the writer is unable to scan or be grammatical, yet it surpasses in dullness even the American humorist when it becomes accomplished, correct, and fluent. Mr. Zachary Edwards, without a quail, writes an allegorical poem seven thousand lines in length. We read a few hundred lines. There was no thought, no line, no expression of the slightest poignancy or distinction to be found. But this is not an end of the beautifully-printed, sumptuously-bound volume, entitled "Avilion." Aspiring to surpass Tennyson, he versifies, in the same style, and in three thousand lines (numbered), the story of Sir Palomides. He gives us twenty pages of notes in merciful prose, readable, with a historical enquiry into the legend of the San Graal, and then, to end with—O Casmenae!—a Latin Alcaic Ode, six hundred lines long, for a jubilee banquet at Lyme Regis. Mr. Edwards reveals to us that he is, or was, mayor of the said city. Better than any mere English lines, the first Alcaic quatrain of this heroic song will give readers of THE ACADEMY a standard by which to measure Mr. Z. Edwards:

Gaudete cives oppiduli mei!
Nunc est bibendum, nunc epulis dies
Advenit, et creta notandus
Sic modus assiduus laborum.

We heartily echo the feelings of the last line and envy the leisure and patience of Mr. Edwards, who wrote, and of his friends, who will read all "Avilion."

We next began Mr. Sabin's book with enthusiasm, inspired by the noble name of the Samurai Press, and by the eloquence of a gentleman on the Daily Chronicle, who says of a book of Mr. Sabin's that "in places his style is so good that we must admit that he has achieved the perfect style, as Keats very often did," while a more local journal hints that Milton has here been equalled, if not surpassed. We condole with Mr. Sabin on the terrible decline of power manifested by "The Wayfarers," which, unlike the former works of his pen, resembles neither Keats nor Milton, but Mr. Zachary Edwards.

Mr. Lothian's "Laboratory," which, after some hesitation, we considered to be rather grave than gay, is more interesting, more vigorous, and more vulgar. "The Laboratory" is a chemical poem:

A myriad little factories,
Massed on an ordered plan,
Make up that strange community,
The body of a man.

The book also contains a pleasing poem in German. It shows signs of rough, uncouth Colonial intelligence. It is at least concrete. It is strange that minor poets are almost always abstract and vague, owing to their purbblind romanticism: and if they touch the concrete, they show up at once all their hidden vulgarity.

In this wilderness of dreary and barren trees it is pleasant to discover the thorns and roses of despairing passion. The prettily named "Hydromel and Rue" contains translations from the German of "Marie Madeleine." Mr. Kappey, by his former book, has won the praise of Mr. John Davidson for its "sweetness and grace." He is certainly an admirable translator. This garland of verse is perhaps of fleurs malades. But lovers of verse, however healthy-minded, will agree in praise of lines such as these:

Because mine eyes are fashioned so,
Shalt thou forsake thy house and hearth
And like a beggar thou shalt go,
Despised of men, and nothing worth.
Fair fame and fortune—all shall be
As trodden dust beneath your feet.
Because of me!

We should like to read "Auf Kypros" in the German original: and also to see Mr. Kappey's other volume.

Mrs. Gibson shows signs of imitation of Yeats and A. E. Housman. But her poems are fatally vague, and we sought in vain for a quotable verse. The same is true of "A Garden of Shadows," admirably illustrated by Mr. Byam Shaw. Nor is there much else to be said for the "Proposal," a work in "stanzaic ichons," though we thank the author for telling us that it is "published with the seriousness of purposes and is put forth as the precursor of a further and larger work."

With "Swords and Ploughshares" we turn to the gay poems. We cannot perhaps recommend to readers of THE ACADEMY a versifier who pauses amid his fairly amusing satires on the Conservative Party to write a serious poem in memory of John Kensit. The book is on the whole quite bad, and very clumsy indeed in comparison to Mr. Graves' "Humours of the Fray." It is indeed a joy to read these amusing verses after an hour or more in the company of sighing lovers. Mr. Graves has his prejudices and predilections: and lets us know all about them. He hates Strauss and loves golf. His humorous verse is very far behind Mr. Belloc's: it depends for its effects on double-rhymes and on neat phrasing too exclusively to give permanent satisfaction. But his lines "Thoughts on Drink in the Drought" are splendid. We quote two verses:

Myself did as a boy affect a jar
That held a drink named Raspberry Vinegar;
But adults when they try this liquid find
The more they drink the thirstier they are.
Edward Fitzgerald had a friend named Posh,
With whom he went a-yachting near the Wash,
And Posh (as Mr. Shorter lately proved)
Once lived for three whole days on Lemon Squash.

LA MADONNA DI VICO

The Santuario of the Madonna di Vico. By L. MELANO ROSSI. (Macmillan, 21s. net.)

HIDDEN away in a mountain valley in Piedmont stands the sanctuary of the Madonna di Vico. The church was designed in 1596 by Ascanio Vitozzi, and the great dome was built by the architect, Francesco Gallo, towards the end of his life, between the years 1730-1748, in honour of Charles Emanuel I. of Savoy. There is only one other dome of its shape and size in the world.

The history of its building is of peculiar interest. The origin of many another beautiful church must be similar, though the cause has not passed away, as has the cause and fame of this sanctuary. The French King, Francis I., invaded Piedmont, and during his invasion the Castle of Vico was much damaged. In consequence, when its restoration began to be undertaken in 1539, the brickmakers of the Ermena Valley were called upon to supply a very large number of bricks. Now, in the early part of the year 1539 an unusual amount of rain had fallen, and the brickmakers were hard put to, as their store was rapidly decreasing, and the wetness of the season prevented the manufacture of new bricks. The weather showed no sign of improvement. The position became desperate. At this crisis the only daughter of one of the most respected brickmakers—a girl of seventeen—had a vision. A heavenly visitant came to her and led her, half dreaming, half conscious, to a certain place. There she was told to erect a small shrine to the Virgin, and this she did. Immediately the sky cleared, the sun shone with bright heat, and prosperity came to the brickmakers of the Ermano Valley. The shrine became famous.

Such was the first stage of its history. But the years passed by, and the shrine fell into disuse, until a deacon, by name Cæsar Trombetta, rediscovered it. He cleared the rank growth of weeds that almost hid the pilone from view, and zeal for its sacredness and anger at its neglect took possession of him. He preached on every occasion against the wickedness of not giving honour to the shrine's great sanctity. In the market-place, in the homes of the farmers, in the very streets, he denounced the sloth of the people. The people listened to his reproaches, smiled at his ardour, and went on their way unheeding. Trombetta was in no way deterred by the failure of his sermons. He changed his tactics for the mastery of that event. He applied to the Bishop of Mondovì for leave to build a chapel round the shrine. His petition was so devoutly in earnest that the bishop was moved, not only to grant the necessary leave, but to help the actual building of the chapel itself by a gift of money. Forthwith, the work began. It had proceeded for very few months when its fame began to spread, and thousands flocked to it from every part of Piedmont with offerings. The bishop heard of its fame, and conceived an ingenious, characteristic plan of furthering its success. He ordered the work to cease, and summoned the deacon, Cæsar Trombetta, to answer the charge of an abuse of public faith. Many sittings were held to enquire into the case. At last the most celebrated doctors of divinity were called into a council to arbitrate. Their verdict was one of absolute approval. They declared "the cures genuine and the worship of the shrine a highly commendable act of devotion." The scheme thus obtained, as the bishop intended it to obtain, official recognition; and the bishop, much pleased at the outcome of his manipulation, determined that the sanctity of the place demanded the erection, not of a chapel merely, but of a great church. He himself laid the foundation stone in 1595, before a concourse of twenty-five thousand people, and decreed that a festival should be celebrated on that day the following year and for ever afterwards. As the edifice rose its fame spread, not only over the countryside, but over Europe. The Queen of France sent a special envoy with a magnificent present of jewels and gold. The Constable of Castile, the Duke of Nemours, the Archduke Albert of Austria, Simone Contarini of Venice, all visited the sacred place in person. And the deacon, Cæsar Trombetta, was almost forgotten.

Naturally, Charles Emanuel I., Duke of Savoy, was interested in the renown of this shrine within his dukedom. He was, in fact, specially interested for this reason. He had long been intending to found a great temple of peace, both as a symbol of the unity of his country, to forward which had been his life's work, and as a resting place for his body after death. He determined to use the fame and sanctity of the place for his great purpose, and, in spite of much opposition from the bishop and the people, his purpose was achieved. Captain Ascanio Vitozzi, his military engineer and a notable architect, drew plans, which were approved; the walls of the church which the bishop had begun were demolished, and the rebuilding on an immense scale was inaugurated. But Vitozzi was a man already advanced in years; when he started his masterpiece he was nearly sixty. The local authorities, both civic and papal, caused wearisome delays on every point to which it was possible in any way to raise objection, and Vitozzi died before his work was finished, before the great dome, which would have been the pride of his life, was built. His plans, moreover, fell into the hands of the Cistercians, and were destroyed. The work of building practically ceased. Charles Emanuel I., Duke of Savoy, died, and was buried elsewhere. For a hundred years nothing was done, until the people of Mondovi determined to finish the building themselves. An architect of genius was found among their fellow citizens, one Francesco Gallo, and he, still a young man, employed by the King of Sardinia as engineer, undertook the tremendous task of completing the great structure. The drum was finished in 1730, the dome in 1731, and the lantern in 1733.

As Signor Rossi points out, it is strange that, considering the size and beauty of the dome, the sanctuary should be as little known and visited as it is. His book, dealing with every detail of its history and architecture, is written with enthusiasm and knowledge. The plans are clear, and the illustrations, chiefly reproductions of his own photographs, are of extraordinary beauty. The curving western façade is of quite recent addition; no eastern façade yet exists, and Signor Rossi remarks that a unique opportunity is offered to an art-loving millionaire to make this addition and to replace the tawdry decoration of the arcade and drum with mosaic. May this opportunity be taken!

OUR NOBLE SELVES

An Itinerary. Written by FYNES MORYSON, Gent. In 4 vols. (Glasgow: MacLehose, each 12s. 6d. net.)

Minor Poems of Michael Drayton. Chosen and edited by CYRIL BRETT. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 5s. net.)

Specimens of English Dramatic Poets. With notes by CHARLES LAMB. (Routledge, The London Library, 2s. 6d. net.)

The London Merchant and Fatal Curiosity. By GEORGE LILLO. Edited by ADOLPHUS WILLIAM WARD. All Fools and The Gentleman Usher. By GEORGE CHAPMAN. Edited by THOMAS MARE PARROTT. The Fair Penitent and Jane Shore. By NICHOLAS ROWE. Edited by SOPHIE CHANTAL HART. The Owl and the Nightingale. Edited by JOHN EDWIN WELLS. (Heath, the Belles Lettres series, each 2s. 6d. net.)

THE above list is a small portion of the reprints which have reached us in the last few weeks, and the effect of studying them is to rouse in the student an almost indecent desire to shake himself by the hand, to crow like Peter Pan, and proclaim the cleverness, the wonderfulness of his age. Was there ever an age in which scholarship was so good and cheap? For half-a-crown you may buy Dr. Ward's edition of Lillo's two best plays. Lillo! What was Lillo that he was worth the attention of Dr. Ward? Well, read Dr. Ward on the subject, get an inkling of all that his vast knowledge, his extraordinary memory, and his certain scholarship have to tell you about Lillo, and you will feel, not only that Lillo was much more important and interesting than you supposed, but that an age which contains a Dr. Ward, and a Dr. Ward who will tell you all this for half-a-crown, is really an extraordinary age. And then take up Charles Lamb's fascinating book (only half-a-crown again) and contrast the age which could only swallow Chapman in little fragments with an age which wants him whole—tragedies (Professor Boas is editing them in this same Belles Lettres series) and comedies alike, with learned introductions, notes, varia lectiones, bibliographical details, and what not, as if Chapman were the only dramatist who ever wrote, or as if life were a thousand years long, and there were nothing else to do in it but read. Nicholas Rowe, again: the world knows its Congreve and Wycherley, its Dryden and Otway, so well that it must go on to Rowe, or it will have nothing else left to read. And here, again, is "The Owl and the Nightingale"—seventy pages of introduction, nearly 150 of text (in two versions), thirty-six of notes, and seventy of glossary—as if, when we had romped through all English literature, there were time left to sit down to an exhaustive study of the masterpieces of Middle English. Still, we are not satisfied. We must have the minor poems of Elizabethan minor poets, and here is the Clarendon Press ready with a delightful, antique-looking reprint of Drayton's "Nymphalls" and other things. A step further and we shall have the whole "Poly-olbion"—and a demand could more reasonably be expected for that than for the travels of the Elizabethan traveller, Fynes Moryson, "in Germany, Bohmerland, Sweitzerland, Netherland, Denmarke, Poland, Italy, Turkey, France, England, Scotland and Ireland," which Messrs. MacLehose are adding to their various handsome editions of old travels.

Lovers of "midnight darlings," small men who stagger under their weight, or huge men, like the late Mr. Joseph Knight, in whose hands anything less like a folio seemed petty, may be inclined to sneer at these reprints in small volumes, at the people who like their selections made for them, and their scholarship all ready dressed for them in introductions and notes. But we may justly claim for the present age, not only a very wide diffusion of scholarship of a kind sufficient to make a public for the introductions and notes, but a remarkable fertility in scholars fit to do the work. We must not be taken to class either Miss Hart or Mr. Parrott with Dr. Ward when we say that all these editions are the work of genuine scholars. Mr. Brett, again, clearly knows his Drayton thoroughly; he has chosen the poems well and printed them carefully. And all this labour-saving apparatus—for that is what it comes to—testifies to a genuine desire on the part of the public to know the truth, and all the truth—to have a sound text to read, notes which will explain the meaning when it is obscure, and introductions that may point out the plan and general portée of the work. The ideal thing, of course, is to make one's own introductions, to ferret out one's own notes. Life is not long enough, especially when we are so anxious to read everything, major or minor, that has survived from the past.

It remains true that never has literature been so ardently, so widely, nor so intelligently studied as at the present day—and that in spite of the extravagant or dismal, silly or stupid, finicking or vulgar nonsense which the Press pours forth daily in its so-called "literary" columns. Setting all that aside, and setting aside the thousands of feeble, and nasty, and illiterate books that flood the bookstalls, we may claim fairly to be the most scholarly age in English history. There is no limit to our curiosity about our first-rate and second-rate writers of the past; no limit to our demand for accuracy and thoroughness, and no limit, as it appears, to the supply of scholars capable of satisfying our requirements.

Yes; but what of ourselves? What are we doing all this time to express our own life and hand on our lamp to posterity? Our scholarship of itself is one thing we are doing—seeing that posterity no less than ourselves shall have good texts and good criticism, and that cheap. There are hundreds of living people who, when their time comes, will deserve a "Grammarian's Funeral" for that alone. It is the common reproach against us that we are doing nothing original, that we have no great writers whom the scholars of two centuries hence will annotate and squabble over and establish. We turn from Fynes Moryson and pick up Mr. Knight's "Where three Empires meet" (and we mention it because to name "Arabia Deserta," or a book by Professor Browne would be unfair to Moryson); from Drayton, and pick up—what? It is really impossible to choose from among the scores of modern poets on our shelves—well, let us shut our eyes and draw. What is this? "The City of the Soul." And we have not even mentioned Mr. Meredith, or Mr. Bridges, or Francis Thompson, or Mr. Swinburne. We turn from Rowe and take up Attila, from Lillo and here is Waste, from Chapman's comedies to The Importance of Being Earnest. It is all nonsense! Let us drink to Our Noble Selves!

THE SWAN OF LICHFIELD

A Swan and Her Friends. By E. V. LUCAS. (Methuen and Co., 12s. 6d., net.)

To write the biography of Anna Seward is to disinter a corpse, and it is impossible to acquit Mr. Lucas of a certain freakish perversity in the selection of such a subject for a book of over three hundred pages. In her own day the "Swan of Lichfield" was no inconsiderable figure in the world of letters. She was adored by Hayley (whose poetry was certainly no worse than her own), she was on speaking terms with Johnson, she was a friend of Scott. Her remains—which may still be read by the curious—afford an amazing commentary on the value of contemporary criticism. The study of inanity is, however, as Mr. Lucas is careful to remind us, not without its interest, and the present volume is quite as entertaining as anything that its author has yet given us.

Anna Seward was a typical product of her period, and that period must be reckoned as among the worst in the history of English literature. Her style was affected, pompous, jejune, and dull. She never by any chance called a spade a spade. A lake to her was always a glittering expanse of water. Her literary tastes were deplorable. She considered Erasmus Darwin a poet, and she thought Southey "beyond comparison the superior" to Wordsworth. Yet she could praise genius too, and it remains to her credit that she was among the first to discern the essential greatness of the author of "Tristram Shandy." Scott she admired not wisely but too well—too well, indeed, since, dying, she made him her literary executor. Scott performed the task like the great gentleman he was, but with what agony of soul may be dimly guessed. Perhaps, however, even the iron resolution of the Wizard of the North was hardly proof against such flattery as this:

Your epic ballad, "Cadzow Castle," is all over excellence, harmonic, picturesque, characteristic. It satisfies to luxury the whole soul of my imagination. The gay festivity of modern life, with which it opens, and the quiet graces of a cultivated landscape, in the blessedness of national peace, which forms the close, have the finest possible effect, as preceding and succeeding the spirited and sublime story of Regent Murray's assassination. The lifted pall of oblivion discloses that scene in all the interesting customs and manners of the feudal times. Then the interspersed landscapes! You Salvator! you Claude!—what a night scene!—what an animated description of the morning chase! Your bull!—what a sublime creature!—and O! the soft, sweet picture of Margaret; pale, yet beauteous convalescent from her maternal throes!—it rivals the Alcmena of Pindar in his first Nemean ode.

It is the supreme merit of this biography that its subject is not allowed to dominate the stage to the exclusion of other and perhaps worthier figures. Lichfield life in the closing years of the eighteenth century is sketched with a vivid pen. We catch an occasional glimpse of the ponderous gallantries of Richard Lovell Edgeworth, and the luckless amours of Thomas Day, of "Sandford and Merton" fame. Dr. Erasmus Darwin—whose second wife Miss Seward unavailingly desired to be—bears us frequent company, and Mr.

Lucas has thought it worth while to reproduce in these pages "The Loves of the Triangles," that once famous parody of "The Botanic Garden"—a poem, too, almost as tedious as its prototype. To the Ladies of Llangollen, a couple of eccentric recluses who dedicated themselves to solitude in early life, Mr. Lucas has devoted an entire chapter, by no means the least interesting in the volume. For these ladies—and particularly for the elder one, Lady Eleanor Butler—Miss Seward, who revelled in rank, appears to have entertained a very sincere affection. Finally, there is the great Dr. Johnson, whom it is easy to see the Swan very cordially disliked. In 1784 she conveyed the news of his death to Hayley—then a very frequent correspondent:

At last, my dear bard, extinct is that mighty spirit, in which so much good and evil, so much large expansion and illiberal narrowness of mind, were blended—that enlightened the whole literary world with the splendours of his imagination, and, at times, with the steadiest fires of judgment; and, yet more frequently, darkened it with spleen and envy; potent, through the resistless powers of his understanding, to shroud the fairest claims of rival excellence. Indiscriminate praise is pouring in full tides, around his tomb, and characteristic reality is overwhelmed in the torrent.

After all, there is nothing in the popularity of Anna Seward that need surprise us. Since her day we have witnessed the rise and fall of a Martin Farquhar Tupper and of a Philip James Bailey. And it may be worth while recalling that of a contemporary of the Swan—a Charlotte Smith, of Bignor (in Sussex)—the Gentleman's Magazine found it possible to write:—"It is trifling praise for Mrs. Smith's sonnets to pronounce them superior to Shakespeare's and Milton's." Sic transit gloria mundi.

RECENT ARCHÆOLOGY

The Annual of the British School at Athens. Vol. XII. (Macmillan, 25s. net.)

Egypt and Western Asia in the Light of Recent Discoveries. L. W. KING and H. R. HALL. (S.P.C.K., 10s. net.)

THE work of the British School of Archæology in Athens has placed the school in the front rank of archæological research, and the appearance of the "Annual" is one of the landmarks of the archæological year. The close association of the school with the epoch-making discoveries in Crete adds to the importance of a publication in which we may always look with confidence for mature consideration of the vast mass of new evidence concerning prehistoric Greece, which has accumulated with almost disconcerting rapidity of late years. And the twelfth volume has been awaited with added eagerness, in that it was to contain the completion of Mr. Mackenzie's article upon the Cretan palaces. That completion is now before us, and we are bound to admit that it carries his argument to a conclusion more forcible and final than we had been disposed to anticipate. From the demolition of Dörpfeld's "Achæan" theory he has proceeded to the erection of a theory of Cretan origins remarkable, not only for its intrinsic soundness, but also for the coincidence of its conclusions with those reached by other archæologists from totally different data and upon different lines of thought. Architecture, racial type, customs, mythology and religion, all seem, in the light of most recent research, to point to a North African origin for the "Mediterranean" race, and that origin shared with the pre-dynastic race of Egypt. In the light of this theory much that was strange and dark in the Ægean prehistoric world, and, indeed, in the artistic development of classical Greece, becomes plain as daylight. We owe a great debt to Mr. Mackenzie for the lucid manner in which he has set forth the evidence from the data with which he is here immediately concerned.

Particularly instructive, when read in close conjunction with Mr. Mackenzie's article, is "Egypt and Western Asia in the Light of Recent Discoveries," by Messrs. Hall and King. Both these gentlemen have achieved a distinction which makes their names a sufficient recommendation for the book. The S.P.C.K., indeed, does well in pursuing its publication of works like those of Maspero, and this volume, which forms an indispensable continuation of the work of the great Egyptologist. Though the responsibility of authorship is not here specifically divided, we can hardly be wrong in ascribing the Babylonian and Assyrian chapters to Mr. King—whose valuable publication of "Chronicles Concerning Early Babylonian Kings" we noticed recently—and to Mr. Hall those chapters which deal with pre-dynastic Egypt and its relation to the Ægean. Of very special interest is the opening chapter, in which Mr. Hall combats, we think reasonably, Professor Flinders Petrie's theory of a palæolithic Egypt thickly afforested, and swept by torrential streams. In the Babylonian chapters we have revelled in the detailed account of the vicissitudes of Shirpurla and Gishku, and of the building of Gudea's temple. Throughout the book the dramatic force and simplicity of language render it not merely intelligible, but even fascinating; and the learning which underlies it is never obtrusive; yet—and herein lies the skill of the writers in handling their material—the necessity for smooth writing has never betrayed them into bald dogmatism on disputed points.

The book is brought thoroughly up to date, even the excavations at Boghaz Keui and at Der-el-Bahari being included, and a good account is given of the remarkable results of the Susa excavations.

In the Egyptian chapters we make no doubt that the authors are right in their view that "Aha" and "Narmer" are the originals of the legendary Mena. But the pre-dynastic time of Egypt is perhaps better set forth here than any other part of the story; and we make no doubt that of the various theories summarised by the authors, that which would make the neolithic Egyptians "Mediterranean" in type and race is the correct one. Of the Semitic element in dynastic times there is more uncertainty, and we are inclined to think that in the Sumero-Semitic blend of race which (perhaps) inaugurated the dynastic history in Egypt there was more of the Ugro-Altaic than of the Semitic element.

In the Asiatic chapters the principal matter is that already treated by Mr. King in the book to which we have already referred; namely, the skilful rearrangement of the Babylonian dynasties, and the separation from them of the line of kings of the "Country of the Sea." The point is here re-stated, and the consequent modifications of chronology clearly set forth.

As a whole the book is no less than indispensable to anyone who seeks to keep abreast with the advance of modern research in the history of the world's dawn.

ELIZABETH GUNNING

The Story of a Beautiful Duchess, being an Account of the Life and Times of Elizabeth Gunning, Duchess of Hamilton and Argyll. By HORACE BLEACKLEY, M.A. (London: Constable, 21s. net.)

It is perhaps a pity that Mr. Bleackley, writing about Elizabeth Gunning, and necessarily telling us something of other members of the family, did not write more of Maria Gunning, Countess of Coventry, and so make his book a complete history of the remarkable sisters. He would have had room between the pretty covers of this volume, for he is at times a little more diffuse and detailed about Elizabeth than was strictly needful. "The Sisters Gunning," to anyone conversant with the period, would have been a more attractive title. Certainly, however, the title is appropriate enough; beautiful Elizabeth was beyond question, and she married two dukes, of whom one was a duke twice over, so that Dr. Johnson called her "the duchess with three tails." It is a wonderful history, that of the Gunnings. There have been women a few who have begun lower down—the Gunnings, of course, were gentlefolk—and finished higher up; but for two sisters, with nothing but good looks to help them, to march so irresistibly to great positions was really curious. Nothing but good looks is almost literally true. Maria was a flighty, vain, and distinctly silly creature, and it says much for the management of her mother that she married so handsomely, and did not, in the euphemistic phrase of the day, "accept an establishment." Elizabeth had more character, no doubt—the late Duke of Argyll, not a facile judge, had a great respect for his grandmother—but there is nothing in Mr. Bleackley's careful and very laudatory record to show that she was not quite an ordinary woman, apart from her beauty. Neither sister had any education to speak of, and reading carefully in the records of the time, one observes that neither had much in the way of manners either. But education, manners—who cared for that in the presence of two such faces? It is really something to the credit of a corrupt and "cynical" age that mere beauty could go so far in it.

Mr. Bleackley's book, being complete and knowledgeable, could not be otherwise than interesting, and, to a reader previously ignorant of the subject, must be full of surprising events. He is not a master of vivid character drawing like Carlyle, but that faculty is rare. As a matter of fact, outside the Gunnings themselves he had not much interesting material in the way of character. Neither of Elizabeth's husbands—Hamilton, the reckless profligate, or Argyll, the excellent soldier and worthy landlord—arrests one's attention very forcibly. Some minor characters (in the story), like the mad Duke of Douglas and his energetic wife, Peggy, or the Lady Jane Douglas of the famous "Douglas cause," are more curious to observe. That famous cause, indeed, takes up a considerable part of the book. The Duchess of Hamilton's connection with it was that, if Lady Jane's children were not her own, the young Duke of Hamilton would have succeeded to a large part of the Duke of Douglas's estates, so that she was, of course, intimately concerned; but it speaks a little unfavourably of her interest as an individual woman that so much space could have been spared for the arguments and evidence. Most astonishing evidence it was, no doubt. Mr. Bleackley is on the Hamilton side, but he insists that he writes without prejudice. In one small matter, however, one imagines that prejudice did get the better of him: James Boswell was on the other side, and Mr. Bleackley is so angry with him that he gives a fierce account of Boswell's appearance and manners, which is manifestly unfair. The occasion was the visit of Boswell with Johnson to Inverary, and the sage talking with his beautiful hostess must have been a curious and charming sight. One or two other famous people come slightly into her life. Charles Fox, at Eton, fell in love with her in a modest and boyish way, and late in her life, at Naples, she met and was kind to a beautiful woman, whose start was far humbler than her own, and whose beauty was to be even more famous—Emma Hamilton, to wit. She was Emma Hart then, and not yet married, so that the Duchess of Hamilton did a bold as well as a kind thing in befriending her. It is pleasant to know that she had a kind heart, this beautiful Gunning, with all her worldly successes.

G. S. S.

THE HOOTAWA VANDYCK: AN OLD MASTER'S TRAGEDY

"My own experience," said an expert to a group of mostly middle-aged men, who had spent their whole life in investigating spiritual phenomena, "is a peculiar one."

"It was in the early autumn of 1900. I was at Rome, whence I had gone to investigate the relative artistic affinity between Pietro Cavallini and Giotto (whose position, I think, will have to be adjusted). There were as yet only a few visitors at the Hotel Russie, chiefly maiden ladies and casual tourists, besides a certain Scotch family and myself. Colonel Brodie, formerly of the 69th Highlanders, was a retired officer of that rather peppery type which always seems to belong to the stage rather than real life, though you meet so many examples on the Continent. He possessed an extraordinary topographical knowledge of modern Rome, the tramway system, and the hours at which churches and galleries were open. He would waylay you in the entrance hall and enquire severely if you had been to the Catacombs. In the case of an affirmative answer he would describe a tomb or ruin you had missed, far better worth seeing; and if a negative he would smile, and tell you the shortest and cheapest route, and the amount which should be tendered to the Trappist Father. Later on in the evening over coffee, if he was pleased with you, he would mention in a very impressive manner, 'I am, as you probably know, Colonel Brodie of Hootawa.' His wife, beside whom I sat at table d'hôte, retained traces of former beauty; she was thin, and still tight-laced; was somewhat acid in manner, censorious concerning the other visitors, singularly devoted to her tedious husband, and fretfully attached to the beautiful daughter for whose pleasure and education they were visiting Rome. I gathered that they were fairly well to do."

"It was Mrs. Brodie who first broke the ice by asking if I was interested in pictures. Miss Brodie, who sat between her parents, turned very red, and said: 'Oh, mamma, you are talking to one of the greatest experts in Europe.' I was surprised and somewhat gratified by her knowledge (indeed, it chilled me some days later when she confessed to having learnt the information only that day by overhearing an argument between myself and a friend at the Colonna Gallery on Stefano de Zevio, and the indebtedness of Northern Italian art to Teutonic influences).

"Mrs. Brodie took the intelligence quite calmly, and merely inspected me through her lorgnettes as if I were an object in a museum."

"Ah, you must talk to Flora about pictures. I have no doubt that she will tell you a good deal even you do not know. We have some very interesting pictures up in Scotland. My husband is Colonel Brodie of Hootawa (no relation to the Brodie of Brodie). His grandfather was a great collector, and originally we possessed seven Raphaels.' 'Indeed,' I replied, eagerly; 'might I ask the names of the pictures? I would know them at once.'

"I have never seen them," said Mrs. Brodie; 'they were not left to my husband, who quarrelled with his father. Fortunately, none of us care for Raphaels, but the most valuable of all the pictures, including a Vandyck, were entailed. Flora is particularly attached to Vandyck. He is always so romantic, I think.'

"Flora, embarrassed by her mother's eulogy of family heirlooms, leaned across as if to address me, and said: 'Oh, mamma, I don't think they really were Raphaels; they were probably only by pupils—Giulio Romano, Perino del Vaga, or Luca Penni.'

"As you never saw them, my dear," said Mrs. Brodie severely, 'I don't think you can possibly tell. Your grandfather' (she glared at me) 'was considered the greatest expert in Europe, and described them in his will as Raphaels. It would be impious to suggest that they are by any one else; there were two Holy Families. One of them was given to your grandfather by the King of Holland in recognition of his services, and a third was purchased direct from the Queen of Naples. But your father is getting impatient for his cigar.' They rose and bowed sweetly. I joined them in the glass winter garden a few minutes later."

"Have you been to the Pincio? But I forgot, of course you know Rome. I do love the Pincio," sighed Mrs. Brodie over some needlework, and then, as an afterthought: 'Do you know the two things that have impressed me most since I came here?' 'I could not dare to guess any more than I dare tell you what has impressed me most,' I replied, gazing softly at Flora. 'The two things which have really and truly impressed me,' continued Mrs. Brodie, 'more than anything else, more than the Pantheon or the Palatine, or the Forum, are—St. Peter's and the Colosseum.' She almost looked young again."

"The next day we visited the Borghese, and I was able to explain to Flora why the circular 'Madonna and Angels' was not by Botticelli. And, indeed, there was hardly a picture in Rome I was unable to re-attribute to its rightful owner. In the apt Flora I found a receptive pupil; she even grew suspicious about the great Velasquez at the Doria, in which she fancied, with all the enthusiasm of youth that she detected the handling of Mazo. I soon found it was better for her training to discourage her from looking at pictures at all—we confined ourselves to photographs. In a photograph you are not disturbed by colour, or by impasto, and you are able to study the morphic values in a picture, by which means you arrive at the attribution without any disturbing æsthetic considerations."

"One afternoon, returning from some church ceremony, Flora said to me:

"Oh, Aleister' (we were already engaged secretly), 'papa is going to ask you next winter to stay at Hootawa; before I forget I want to warn you never to criticise his pictures. They are mostly of the Dutch and English school, and I daresay you will find a great many of the names wrong, but you know papa is irritable, and it would offend him if you said that the Teborch was really by Pietro de Hooghe. You can easily avoid saying anything, and then you will really admire the Vandyck.'

"Darling Flora, of course I promise. By the way, you never speak of your family ghost, although Mrs. Brodie always refers to it as if I knew all about it; and the Colonel has often told me of Sir Rupert's military achievements."

"Oh, Aleister, I don't know whether you believe in ghosts: it is very extraordinary. Whenever any disaster or any good fortune happens to our family, Sir Rupert Brodie's figure, just as he appears in the Vandyck, is seen walking in the Long Gallery; and every night he appears at twelve o'clock in the green spare bedroom; but only guests and servants ever see him there. We have a saying at Hootawa that servants will not stay unless they are able to see Sir Rupert the first month after their arrival. Only members of the family are able to see him in the Long Gallery, and, of course, we never know whether he betokens good or ill luck. The last time he appeared there, papa was so nervous that he sold out of Consols, which went down an eighth the day after. We were all very much relieved. But he invested the money in some concern called "The Imperial Federation Stylograph Pen Company," and lost most of it; so it was not of much use."

"Tell me, darling, of your father's other investments," I asked anxiously.

"Oh, you must ask papa about them, I don't understand business; but I want to tell you about Sir Rupert. The Society for Psychical Research sent down a committee to enquire into the credibility of the ghost, and recorded four authentic appearances in the spare bedroom; and on family evidence accepted three of the appearances in the Long Gallery. It was just after the report was issued that papa was invited to lease the house to some Americans for the summer, and he always gets a good price for it now, simply on account of the ghost. I always think that rather horrid. I don't believe poor Sir Rupert would like it."

"Perhaps he doesn't know," I suggested.

"Of course, you don't believe in him," she said in rather an offended way.

"My darling, of course I do; I have always believed in ghosts. Most of the pictures in the world, as I am always saying, were painted by ghosts."

"Oh, no, Aleister, you're laughing at me; but when you see Sir Rupert, as you will, in the spare bedroom, you will believe too."

"At the end of January I became Flora's accepted fiancé."

"In February I moved with the Brodies to Florence, where I was able to introduce them to all my kind and hospitable friends—the Berensons, the Loesers, and the Hornes. Flora was in every way a great success, and commenced a little book on Nero di Bici for Bell's Great Painters Series. It was quite a primavera. Our marriage was arranged for the following February. The Brodies were to return to Hootawa after it was vacated by the American summer tenants. I was to join them for Christmas on my return from America, where I was compelled to go in order to settle my affairs. My father, Lorenzo Q. Sweat, of Chicago, evinced great pleasure at my approaching union with an old Scotch family; he promised me a handsome allowance considering his recent losses in the meat packing swindle—I mean trade. I was able to dissuade him from coming to Europe for the ceremony. After delivering two successful lectures on Pietro Cavallini in the early Fall at mother's soirées I sailed for Liverpool."

"There was deep snow on the ground when I arrived at Hootawa in the early afternoon of a cold December day. The Colonel met me at the station in the uniform of the 69th, attended by two gillies holding torches."

"There will just be enough light to glance at the pictures before tea," he said gaily, and in three-quarters of an hour I was embracing Flora and saluting her mother, who were in the hall to greet me. For the most part Hootawa was a typical old Scotch castle, with extinguisher turrets; an incongruous Jacobian addition rather enhanced its picturesque ensemble."

"You'll see better pictures here than anything in Rome," remarked the Colonel; but Flora giggled rather nervously."

"In the smoking-room and library I inspected, with assumed interest, works by the little masters of Holland and some more admirable examples of the English eighteenth-century school. Faithful to my promise, I pronounced everyone of them to be little gems, unsurpassed by anything in the private collections of America or Europe. We passed into the drawing-room and parlour with the same success. In the latter apartment the Colonel, grasping my arm, said impressively: 'Now you will see our great treasure, the Brodie Vandyck, of which Flora has so often told you. I have never lent it for exhibition, for, as you know, we are rather superstitious about it. Sir Joshua Reynolds, in 1780, offered to paint the portraits of the whole family in exchange for the picture. Dr. Waagen describes it in his well-known work, and Dr. Bode came from Berlin on purpose to see it some years ago, when he left a certificate (which was scarcely necessary) of its undoubted authenticity; but I was so touched by his genuine admiration that I presented him with a small Dutch picture he admired in the smoking-room, and thought not unworthy of placing in the Berlin Gallery. I expect you know Dr. Bode."

"Not personally," I said, as we stepped into the Long Gallery."

"It was a delightful panelled room, with oak-beamed ceiling; between the mullioned windows were old Venetian mirrors and seventeenth-century chairs. At the end, concealed by a rich crimson brocade, hung the Vandyck, the only picture on the walls."

"It was the Colonel himself who drew aside the curtain which veiled discreetly the famous portrait of Sir Rupert Brodie, at the age of thirty-two, in the beautiful costume of the period. The face was unusually pallid; it was just the sort of picture you would expect to walk out of its frame."

"You have never seen a finer Vandyck, I am sure," said Mrs. Brodie anxiously. I examined the work with great care, employing a powerful pocket glass. There was an awkward pause of about five minutes."

"Well, sir," said the Colonel, 'have you nothing to say?'

"It is a very interesting and excellent work, though not by Vandyck; it is by Jamieson, his Scotch pupil; the morphic forms . . .—but I got no further; there was a loud clap of thunder, and Flora fainted away. I was hastening to her side when her father's powerful arm seized my collar. He ran me down the gallery and out by an egress which led into the entrance hall, where some menial opened the massive door. I felt one stinging blow on my face, then, bleeding and helpless, I was kicked down the steps into the snow, from which I was picked up half stunned by one of the gillies."

"Eh, mon, hae ye seen the bogles at Hootawa?" he observed."

"It will be very civil of you if you will conduct me to the depot or the nearest caravanserai," I replied."

"I never saw Flora again."

"But what has happened about the ghost, Mr. Sweat? You never told us anything about it. Did you ever see it?" asked one of the listeners in a disappointed tone."

"Oh, I forgot; no, that was rather tragic. Sir Rupert Brodie never appeared again, not even in the spare bedroom; he seemed offended. Eventually his portrait was sent up to London, where Mr. Lionel Cust pointed out that it could not have been painted until after Vandyck's death, at which time Sir Rupert was only ten years old. Indeed, there was some uncertainty whether the picture represented Sir Rupert at all. Colonel Brodie never recovered from the shock, and resides chiefly at Harrogate. Gradually the servants all gave notice, and Hootawa ceased to attract Americans. Poor Flora, I ought to have remembered my promise; but the habit was too strong in me. Sir Oliver Lodge, I believe, has an explanation for the non-appearance of the phantom after the events I have described. He regards it as a good instance of bi-psychic duality—the fortuitous phenomenon by which spirits are often uncertain as to whom they really represent. But I am only an art critic, not a physicist."

ROBERT ROSS.

A FORECAST

THERE was once a silly schoolmaster whose one idea in life was to make the boys in his house constantly and consistently uncomfortable. To carry out this great aim he invented a new variety of football, compared with which the most rugged Rugger is positively sybaritic; it was such an efficient, manly, thorough-going sport that it gave the boys heart-disease in the prime of their youth, and the school doctor said it wouldn't quite do. But the master had other ways of fulfilling his main purpose: he scowled on armchairs as horribly luxurious, and when he heard that one of the boys had had two hot baths in a week he said: "Boy, boy! you are like the later Romans, boy!"

Of course, this was nonsense—a fair sample of the singularly silly nonsense to which schoolmasters as a race are addicted—but it illustrates a curious propensity common to us all of trying to institute comparisons between the present and the past, of endeavouring by this means to divine the future. One fears that this is a form of divination as futile as the old recognised contrivances—or perhaps the ancient sciences might prove their claim to a higher trust—but we are always wondering whether we are really like the later Romans, and whether our end will be as theirs. It is a futile attempt, I say; because the conditions are so utterly dissimilar. It is true that the Romans were rich, luxurious, the lords of a great empire: but with that one has to stop. They were Latins: we are a mixture of Saxon and Scandinavian, with a dash of Celtic: theirs was a slave state, ours is not: they had put away their modified democracy long before they became "later"; we have thrown ourselves, heart and soul, into a very popular form of "popular government." And then all the world-conditions are widely and utterly different: there are no Huns, nor Goths, nor Vandals to overwhelm us; or if there were we should destroy them with quick-firing guns. Perhaps if this were the seventh century and not the twentieth the Mahdi would be in occupation of the Court of St. James; but Lord Kitchener and applied science have made this mode of purgation impossible. No; it is useless to attempt this method of divination from the past; one had better stand in the old ways if one would pry into the future. Some weeks ago I read in THE ACADEMY of a Cambridge Don—a very violent man, I am afraid—who thinks that Geomancy means "divination by earthquakes." Well, that would be an ugly and dangerous method enough; still, it might give as good results as the way of historical comparison.

And yet one cannot help wondering and speculating as to the next chapter in human affairs; one cannot help asking oneself, for example, as to what will be the end of the United States of America. Here again, of course, there are points of resemblance between the modern state and those famous "later Romans." There are the savage contrasts of enormous wealth and hideous poverty; there is the population composed of all the nations of the earth; there is, perhaps, no very great distinction between a Servile War and a "Labour Movement." But one knows that it will not do: these likenesses are but on the surface. California is not to Washington as Egypt was to Rome; and the Roman plutocrat, though he may have been a very bad fellow, was unable to exercise the horribly corrupting and all-pervading influence of a Standard Oil magnate. Trimalchio's dinner-party, perhaps, was not in the very best taste, the opimianum Falernum annos centum was possibly over-accented, though one cannot help applauding the hors d'œuvres which pictured the Signs of the Zodiac. In any case, there is something magnificent in the Roman millionaire's question: What is a poor man? and one is ready to pardon a good deal for the sake of his allusion to his wife as "this Megæra." Trimalchio, doubtless, was a bad citizen, and a bad subject, an omen of dissolution, if you please; but he was not an active enemy of the human race.

And so one returns, quite unfortified, to the question of what will eventually happen to the United States of America. It is really very difficult; one might have hoped something of Japan, but, as fate ordains, the Japanese have taken to the study of Herbert Spencer—or, at least, they say so. Of course, one hopes great things of the Japanese; one trusts that their Western assumptions are mere profitable play-acting; that when they have crushed the blatant Occident under their feet by means of Occidental science, they will calmly return to true civilisation, and dispute once more concerning the orthodox doctrine of arranging flowers in a jar, and the true recipe for the composition of incense. We desire to be optimistic, and if Japan is indeed true to herself the future of America may yet be secure.

But if this is not so to be, what remains for this extraordinary mass of barbarism, combining as it does all the horrible savagery of the past with the industrial atheism of the present? One does not wish to press the case too strongly. I have no desire to repeat seriatim the long list of abominations which I have already catalogued in THE ACADEMY; one needs not to emphasise the fact that the "graft" trials in San Francisco are accompanied by a kind of infernal chorus of bullies and bravoës armed with revolvers. But what is to happen?

Of course, there is one assumption constantly made by citizens of the United States which must be firmly negated. Americans are always speaking of themselves as a "young" nation. This is clearly nonsense. The original settlers of the United States were emigrants from a very old civilisation; those famous men of the Mayflower carried with them (or should have carried with them) the lessons of a thousand years of nationality. Since then the off-scourings and wretched outcasts of Europe have been poured into the States: Slavs, Italians, Englishmen, Germans, Irish have been tumbled headlong into the melting-pot. All the products of the ages are mingled there; there is certainly no element of youth in the cauldron, and one must repel, firmly but kindly, the excuses that are made because "we" are a "young people." And what is to happen?

Well, personally, I believe that the United States are going mad; that the symptoms which we have harshly condemned as evidences of national wickedness are really evidences of national mania. I do not deny that wickedness has been exalted and cultivated in "these States" to a very great degree. I am aware that the War of Independence was a squalid imposture, that the after history of the United States is a history of fraud and swindling unexampled in the story of the world; I know that American politics, national and municipal, have long been the most shameful of all stories, that justice is more rare in America than bdellium. But I do not think this is the point. I doubt whether the Americans are destined to be the final and supreme examples of national villainy; or rather, in default of purging hordes of barbarians, I question whether the curtain will be rung down on a tableau of mere wickedness. It seems to me likely that as animal decay produces a new race—maggots have no resemblance to a dead sheep—so sheer madness will be the result of the "intellectual" and "political" activities of the United States. The world, perhaps, is to behold the strange spectacle of a whole nation in delirium. In a sense it will be something new; and yet, perhaps, historic examples might be found. Athens was politically mad in the days of Cleon, the Sausage King; England was not far from mania when the wholly unimportant siege of Mafeking was relieved; France has had the Grand Monarque and Napoleon I. on the brain—consult for the latter malady the opening pages of the “Débacle.” But the dementia of America promises to be graver than any of these.

Of course, the subject is far too vast for treatment in an article. One can only deal in head-lines, and in but a few of these. But—to take one point only—is it not a serious symptom when a potato merchant imagines himself Emperor of China? Consider, then, America, which loudly, even blatantly, proclaims itself as humanity in revolt against all the violences, villainies, iniquities of mediævalism, and yet stands before the nations clearly and indubitably as one mass of violence and villainy and political corruption, as the mere creature of fraudulent commercial anarchs, of “Trusts,” which can make and unmake president and legislature, judge and jury. But what is this if it is not madness? In the individual case, such a state of mind might be harshly termed hypocrisy; but the average hypocrite does not claim superiority over all the saints and the noble army of martyrs. If he did, we should say he was not so much bad as mad, and the conclusion as to the state which virtually does make this claim seems to me unavoidable, especially as the claim, one gathers, is really believed, cherished in all seriousness. One may “make believe” now and again, one may bluster on occasion, and yet remain sane; but one goes home and is ashamed of one’s self. But if the make-believe and the bluster accompany us to our pillows, if they really become part of our nature and interior belief, then we are mad.

Of course, mania in its technical and scientific sense has long been alarmingly prevalent in America. Wendell Holmes comments on this fact after a fashion that shows that he was himself “touched”—sane by nature as he undoubtedly was. For after stating the fact that the lunacy percentages of the East Coast were the highest in the world, he draws the astounding conclusion that the inhabitants of Massachusetts are, therefore, the most intelligent race in existence. The Massachusetts madmen, according to Holmes, were as the dead and wounded on the field of battle, signs that a bitter fight had been waged. The analogy is, in itself, the quintessence of craziness; one hopes that the Autocrat did not really believe in it. And since his time, one understands, madness has been increasing by leaps and bounds, so that a physician has calculated that in a hundred years half the inhabitants of Chicago will be technically insane.

One has, perhaps, a foretaste of the end in news that is quite recent, in the staring announcements, repeated day after day, of the suicide of a millionaire. One of the silliest and wickedest theories of “the man in the street” is that madness is the result of excess of imagination, that all artists are, by nature, half-crazy, and are always on the edge of complete delirium. As a matter of cold, hard fact, mania develops in the classes which are wholly unimaginative, in book-keepers, shop-keepers, and agricultural labourers—in persons who from one reason or another are purged from all consideration of art or imagination. Thus, it is without surprise that one finds the millionaire, the representative American, prone to self-destruction, and the whole race on the verge of lunacy. From the earliest beginnings, from the days of the Mayflower, this people has denied the things that make for peace, it renewed its abnegation of the truth at the Revolution, it has confirmed its apostasy again and again in modern times—and now, perhaps, the end is not far off.

One can deduce the like conclusion from many diverse arguments. From the utter wickedness of politics and affairs, from judicial corruption, from the defiance of law as exhibited in the horrible lynchings, from the statistics of divorce—a million and a quarter divorces have been granted in the last twenty years—from social follies of the most frantic sort, from the manner in which mad “religious” sects rise and flourish in the fetid mental soil—these are all signposts which point to one goal, and that is Bedlam. The other day, one hears, some board at Boston altered the words “Christmas Day on which Christ was born” to “Christmas Day on which we go to visit our grandmothers.” One cannot call it impious; it is merely imbecile. And a gentleman named Standley Gautereau, of Stanford University, California, has just published his prose poem, “Women! I Love You,” in what he calls the “Full Obscurity Edition (Unfinished)” —a work which would certainly ensure his confinement in a lunatic asylum in any other country, if it did not rather expose him to criminal proceedings. Here is a mild example of Mr. Gautereau:

The surgeon quits when the heart ceases. He lays the scalpel down, dust settles in his microscope, his vials dry. He buries his head in nervous hands, and defeated, groans “Unexplained.”

Thy simplest act exceeds his greatest power. In the by-law of your love, you outwit Death’s constitution. Your love turns the face of Dissolution.

The politician lays down the gavel to await your living vote.

The speculator invests on population, ignorant of the fields of love on which he stakes his corner lots. His boom is to-day; thine is for ever. His city is earth, thy city is life.

Men rise—out of where?—thy love—and rule the world of what?—thine offspring. They acquire millions in a single deal. They shall leave it to an heir of thine.

There are other things—many of them quite unspeakable—and of such things is the future of America. And the end of these things is the frantic lupanar—and death.

ARTHUR MACHEN.

CONCERTS AND PROGRAMMES

IN remarking that a recent programme of Ysaye’s was utterly unworthy of the greatest living violinist, THE ACADEMY spoke the simple truth. There is already far too much bad music in London; and that Ysaye’s golden tone and miraculous breadth of phrasing should be pressed into the service of third-rate obscurities suggests the spectacle of a tame eagle catching flies. The box-office, which has more to do with the making of programmes than most people suppose, may, in such a case, partly explain (though it cannot excuse) the descent; but as often as not the bias of friendship with a composer is a determining factor in the unhappy choice.

The influence of the box-office is, after all, a limited evil, and for wanton outrages in programme construction it can seldom be held responsible. I have been glancing casually through a bundle of programmes covering a period of three months, and enjoying a malicious pleasure from the étalage of taste that, collectively, it affords. One ostensibly serious concert, to which four performers contribute, comprises thirty items, some of which are tolerably lengthy. A vocal recital, given by a singer who is not quite a Landi, consists of twenty-two songs (ten of them quite new) following each other without any obvious attempt at grouping save that of a couple of printer’s rules thrown across the page. At a pianoforte recital, Bach’s Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue is followed immediately by a Scarlatti sonata and the insufferable “Alceste” Fantasia of Saint-Saëns—a sequence that the pianist will need much heroism to “live down.” Equally delightful is the juxtaposition, in another programme, of Beethoven's "Adelaide" and a harp solo, suggestively named "Echoes of a Waterfall," by a Mr. John Thomas. (Let it be freely conceded that Beethoven seldom supplies his own comic relief). Unhappily, so long as commercialism in music foists upon us performers rather more Philistine than the friendly audiences to which they delight to minister, so long shall we be compelled to protest against the ravages of this kind of selection, and to assure the stranger within our gates that we are no parties to these ugly noises.

It has been necessary to make this reference to the majority of programmes for the sake of putting them definitely on one side. Unless we happen to be critics, we are not obliged to suffer them, or any part of them, very often. Let us ask rather what is the music that we, who are not strangers to music, need to hear, and what are the conditions that we demand for hearing it well. Since St. James's Hall was pulled down to give place for some "improvement" or other, we have been without a concert-room of similar size and equally good acoustics. Queen's Hall, admirable enough for occasional and fugitive effects, takes the edge off any kind of performance as a whole; and the delightful concert-room of the Royal College of Music is, of course, private property. Assuming, then, that we have the building for which we are waiting, of what sort is to be the programme that shall satisfy us, before we take our seats, by its consistent interrelation? The analogy of a dinner, ridiculous if applied as a whole, may yet help us in one particular: it cannot be too strongly urged that a concert should begin with hors d'œuvres. To tell us that the true artist can plunge at once into the depths of the Sonata Appassionata or (in the case of a conductor) the fourth Symphony of Brahms, is nihil ad rem: he is not playing to an empty hall, but to auditors in innumerable degrees of receptivity. I should like to see the principle carried a stage further: every concert of any importance might well begin with ten minutes of complete silence, after which late-comers could be admitted without the present distracting effect on those already seated. Then a small work might be advanced, in preparation for the more strenuous portion of the programme. In a note prefixed to the score of the Eroica Symphony, Beethoven asks that it may be played near the beginning of a concert and surrounded only by specified pieces of smaller scope, so that it may not fail to produce il suo proprio effetto. It is only by continual care in details of this nature that music gains a chance of making its full appeal. It is obvious enough that our concerts commonly begin too early—half-past three and nine o'clock are quite early enough; that the intervals are far too short; and that there are too many separate impressions or groups of impressions. In many cases, indeed, the brain of the wearied auditor becomes, in the end, a kind of palimpsest, retaining with clearness nothing but the latest of a dozen diverse hands.

There remains the question of the one-artist programme. The smaller men can play the smaller things quite perfectly—and, in particular, things written by composers who have nothing to say, and say it beautifully. The most intimate reading of the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto that I know—and the Concerto is, on the whole, the finest product of Mendelssohn's prodigious talent—is that of an artist whose playing of Bach leaves much to be desired. Great artists usually fail to recognise that they are not equally satisfying in all kinds of musical idiom, and, in consequence, do things occasionally that make us gnash our teeth in impotent rage. But they might, at least, have the grace to eschew the mottled programmes that too often make us wonder whether they have any taste at all. It would be quite easy for them to play the seventy-fifth Caprice of Tomkins and kindred effusions in an appendix for which no one would be obliged to remain on penalty of losing some ripe growth of beauty placed at the end of the concert. Tomkins and his like may, and in some instances do, attain complete expression of all that is in them once or twice in their long and probably well-paid careers; but that is no reason why they should jostle their way to the front, elbowing aside masters in whose eyes shines the wisdom of the ages.

HOWARD BAYLES.

THE PERIL OF THE FAIRIES

It is something to have heard once in a lifetime the ecstatic thrill that glorifies Essex Hall, while that intellectual pirate Mr. Bernard Shaw sails out and scuttles a number of little merchant-ships of thought that have never hurt anybody. The applause and admiring laughter that punctuate his periods really suggest that Fabianism makes people happy, while the continued prosperity of the group gives the lie to the cynic who reminded me how popular ping-pong was while the craze lasted, and how utterly forgotten it is to-day. But I had to rub my eyes while I stood in the overcrowded room, listening to Puck in Jaeger, more witty perhaps than the old Puck, but no less boyishly malicious, and ask myself whether, after all, this was only the old magic in a new form. True, civilisation had perforce made him larger in order that human beings might appreciate his eloquence, and I saw no traces of wings or magic flowers. But beyond that, I recognised the same pitying contempt for mortals, the same arrogant confession of his own faults, the same naïve cunning. And then (perhaps a turn of the voice did it, or some slight slurring of the words) the enchantment passed, the ears of his audience resumed their ordinary dimensions, and I offered mentally two teaspoonfuls of honey to the real Puck, for I saw that he had tricked me into recognising his qualities in the most serious man the twentieth century knows.

Yet, though I had found Mr. Shaw to be only a prophet, and his fellow Fabians honest enthusiasts instead of bewitched weavers, I cannot say that the discovery left my mind at ease for the welfare of the fairy kingdom that is so important to everyone who has not forgotten it. What if this terrible seriousness were to spread? What if everyone were to turn prophet? What if a night should come when never a child in all the Duke of York's Theatre would clap its hands to keep Tinker Bell alive? At first I wished to reject this frightful end of all our play and laughter and wonder as impossible. Yet sinister stories of children who preferred sewing-machines and working models to dolls and tin soldiers rose in my mind, and it is hardly more than a step from that degree of progress to the case of the child who may find the science of sanitation more interesting than tales of fairies. The possibility should make even the extremists shudder, but it must be remembered that many honest people believe in technical education, and that for that matter practically the whole of the teaching in our schools takes the form of an attack on the stronghold of the imaginative child. It is our barbarous custom to supplant a child's really beautiful theories with the ugly crudities which we call facts, and it is impossible to realise how much humanity loses in the process. As for the fairies, frail little folk at best, how shall they prevail against the criticism of our sulphur, and the cunning of our permanganate of potash? Shall we always be able to distinguish them from microbes?

It may be well to pause here and see whither the wise, serious men of to-day are taking us. I suppose they will abolish Will-o'-the-Wisp by draining all the marshes, and their extreme industry will render Puck's kindly, household labours ludicrously unnecessary. They will turn their swords against all the bad barons, unjust kings, and spiteful magicians, whose punishment has been hitherto the fairies' special task; and this they will do in blackleg fashion, neither demanding nor receiving their just wages of beauty and immortality. They will scornfully set aside the law, so dear to the younger inhabitants of nurseries, by which it is always the youngest son or the youngest daughter whom the gods delight to honour. They will fill with porridge and deck with flannel underclothing the little flower-girls and crossing-sweepers, whose triumphs set faith in the eyes of babes. With their hard, cruel facts they will completely wreck the fairy civilisation which has taken centuries of dreaming and wandering children to construct. They will brush our fancies away like cobwebs.

A while ago, when I was a little boy, some enemy seeing me admire the stars, thought it necessary to tell me exactly what they were; later, my natural interest in the extraordinary behaviour of the sea led another enemy to place a globe in my hands, and prick the bubble of the universe with ridiculous explanations. So it is that when I regard the heavens I see enormous balls of rotting chemicals, rendered contemptibly small by distance, floating in a thin fluid called space; so it is that when I look at the sea my mind is occupied with stupid problems about the route of floating bamboos, when I ought to be exalted as one who peers out through the darkness towards the Unknown. Where there were two then, there are to-day twenty kindly persons about every child, eager to prove the things it would like to believe in superstitious, and eager to explain away its miracles in terms of dustcarts and vegetable soup. Our babies are taught to hang out their stockings and to batter in their empty egg-shells, but are reminded at the same moment that these charming rituals are but follies, and that the capital of Scotland is Edinburgh. Youngsters babble Imperialism and Socialism when they ought to be standing on their heads to look at the Antipodes, and their parents commend their common sense. Already, I fear, the wings of many of the fairies are beginning to fade, and Puck capers but mournfully in his lonely haunts.

But fairies, goblins, elves, call them what you will, they are worth having, and that is why I would entreat the wise men who are arranging to-morrow for us, to spare them, even though they have forgotten themselves all that the presence of fairies in the world is worth. By all means feed the children and give them Union Jacks, but let their faith in the beautiful be looked to as well. And, finally, to the serious person who says with raised eyebrows: "You can't honestly say you believe in fairies," I would answer this: In a world which at present is fiercely antagonistic to the belief in any emotion less material than hunger, it is impossible to avoid occasional doubt concerning the existence of anything which it is not possible to eat. But when I am in the company of those who really do believe, I do not fail to hear the echoes of fairy laughter in their speech, and see the flicker of fairy wings reflected in their eyes, and with this knowledge I am content.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

THE LIBRARY TABLE

Nature's Moods and Tenses. By HORACE G. HUTCHINSON. (Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d.)

It is not often that the reviewer can congratulate the journalist who attempts to turn his journalism into literature by re-presenting his work to the world in the form of a book, but Mr. Hutchinson's graceful prose entitles him to something more than mere approval.

"Nature's Moods and Tenses" is a collection of essays contributed to various weekly papers, and, cleverly divided into sections, the book is a charming fireside companion. Nature-lovers will find every phase of country life touched upon, perhaps not too scientifically for some, but for the general reader nothing could be more entertaining. "A Winter's Tale" is one of Mr. Hutchinson's best pieces of descriptive writing, the battle of the gulls with the gale being done with a zest that makes the whole essay one to be remembered. It is, of course, impossible even to mention the numerous issues with which the author deals. Birds of all kinds, dogs, deer, trees, and the rest of the ingredients that go to make up what is termed Nature are fit subjects for his pen. Even such uninspiring topics as snow and ponds become interesting under Mr. Hutchinson's direction. A special part devoted to an account of the Shetlands and the ways of the fisherfolk on these unenchanted islands is by far the best modern picture of the drab lives led by the northern fishermen. Even here, however, the author extracts considerable fascinating detail from amongst a mass of uninspiring surroundings. The last section of the book, entitled "Country Gossips," is attractive, and that is saying a great deal. The mannerisms of farmers and peasants are never very exciting, and it requires a skilled pen to make them worth reading. Mr. Hutchinson has succeeded, but the reader when he has finished will not have forgotten the impression created on his mind by the essays dealing with animal and Nature life. The author knows the country intimately; he can write with a keen insight and an appreciation of effects in few words, and the result is easy to imagine. On the other hand country-folk are superficial creatures at their best—that is, the simple person whose outlook on life is naively selfish—and while we sympathise with the birds, beasts and fishes, we merely laugh at the man whose erudition is crudity personified. But we all know "Country Gossips," and Mr. Hutchinson's introduction to old friends is done with a geniality that disarms prejudice. This is the reason for his success. "Nature's Moods and Tenses" is clearly not intended to be a class-book, for the writer is never didactic, but without losing any of its reality and authenticity it remains an alluring introduction to the study of country life. There are more learned works, but there are not many more fascinating.

Vignettes of the Regency. By WILLIAM TOYNBEE. (The Ambrose Company, Ltd., 6s. net.)

It will be a long time yet before George IV. regains his prestige with the English people as "the First Gentleman in Europe," but signs are not wanting of a revulsion in feeling on many points that were "crinolined"—if we may coin such an expression—under the iron respectability of the Victorian era, and when Thackeray's loud "Fie!" has died down as we pass along the ages, George will doubtless come into his own again. Mr. Max Beerbohm once gave him a thin, but shining, coat of whitewash, and now Mr. Toynbee comes to his aid, and scrapes off some of the mud that has so caked his reputation.

The first three chapters, those on the Prince Regent and the Royal Family, the Government, and the Opposition, occupy the greater part of this little book; after which are five shorter sketches that may more aptly be called vignettes, being very pleasant little sketches of such interesting and not too well-known people as Lady Holland, Lord Melbourne, Lord Brougham, Sir John Moore, and William Pitt as a private individual. The first chapter is naturally the most amusing, and Mr. Toynbee makes very good use of the materials at his disposal in composing a lively picture, in which Princess Caroline is sympathetically given a more prominent place than was possible in our school history books. On Lord Brougham he is unnecessarily rather than unduly severe, as well as on John Hookham Frere. But his vignettes, besides being good likenesses, are cleverly drawn, and miss nothing by being what they are, and not portraits d'apparat.

Society Recollections in Paris and Vienna, 1879-1904.
By AN ENGLISH OFFICER. (John Long, 12s. net.)

THE officer and gentleman who gossips of two worlds in two capitals evidently knows what he is writing about, and he certainly gives a picture of a quarter of a century's frivolity and froth of politics with a naïveté and frankness which occasionally becomes almost embarrassing in its ingenuousness. He chats of the opera and its stars, Gambetta, Prince Hohenlohe, Princess Metternich, Lord Lyons, Dr. Evans, Johann and Edward Strauss, Cora Pearl, and a hundred other celebrities, and gives another absolutely authentic account of the death of the Crown Prince Rudolf of Austria. The book makes no pretension to be in any sense literature, but will doubtless be highly appreciated by many.

London Parks and Gardens. By the HON. MRS. EVELYN CECIL, with illustrations by LADY VICTORIA MANNERS. (London: Constable, 21s. net.)

THIS is one of those books which, of necessity, are reviewed at less length than many others of far less interest and importance. The reviewer might, indeed, write an essay of his own on the subject, but that is not reviewing. He might give a list of London parks and gardens, but that is not reviewing, either. All that there really is to say is that the book is a complete whole, and that it is extremely well done. Effectually to criticise, a reviewer would have to possess Mrs. Evelyn Cecil's trenchant knowledge and to have performed her exhaustive achievements of observation and research: the present reviewer has no such pretensions, and can only remark that where his personal knowledge was any guide he found no mistake and much interesting information. The London parks are not its least glory among cities, and here is an adequate and most pleasantly-written account of them all. Mrs. Cecil takes in the whole County of London. The individual distinction of her book is that it alone deals with the subject as a whole, and that even other books which have dealt with parts of it have not dealt with them, as this does, from the horticultural as well as the historical point of view. It should make a grateful present to anyone who loves trees and gardens, especially as Lady Victoria Manners's pictures are worthy of the text.

Studia Sinaitica No. XII. (Cambridge University Press, 1907. Price 10s. 6d. net.)

THIS is a volume of twenty-two pages of introductory matter and eighty of text, containing forty-one facsimiles of dated Christian Arabic MSS., with text and English translation by Agnes Smith Lewis and Margaret Dunlop Gibson, both bearing the honorary degrees of D.D. Heidelberg, and LL.D. St. Andrews. The very learned introduction is by the Rev. David Margoliouth, Professor of Arabic, Oxford, and also deals with Arabic caligraphy. The MSS. deal with ritual, martyrology, the lives of the saints and martyrs, sermons, and the lectionary of the Gospels. There are also extracts from the Apology of Evaristus (xiv.), St. Saba (xxvi.), the Commentary of Ephraem on Genesis (xxx.), Sermons and Legends (xxxvi.), Dialogue between an Emir and a Monk (xxxvii.), Chrysostom's Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews (xxxviii.), Prologue of Matthæus Raderius to the "Scala Paradisi" of John Klimax, Abbot of Sinai (xl.), and Prayers (xli.).

FICTION

The Fruit of The Tree. By EDITH WHARTON. (Macmillan, 6s.)

MRS. WHARTON'S work has deservedly acquired the reputation of careful technique and earnest thought. The present book will certainly not lessen that reputation. It is a good, interesting story; not too original in plot, perhaps, although the central dramatic point of a deliberate overdose of morphia, given to put an end to hopeless pain is far from being commonplace. The main interest of the story lies in the development of the characters of Amherst and Bessy; and here there is just a point of criticism to be made. Bessy and Amherst fall hopelessly in love with each other, so hopelessly on her side that she is willing, temporarily, at any rate, to sacrifice her own interests to the object of his life, the improvement of the conditions of labour at her mills. Her nature is not strong enough to endure the self-denial, although her love for him remains as strong as ever. On his side, on the contrary, his love for her weakens as he sees her interest in his work fade, unless he appeals to her love for him. This he refuses eventually to do. "'I'll do anything . . .'" she sobbed; and in the darkness he held her to him, and hated his victory." This attitude would have been natural had Amherst simply married Bessy in order to achieve his social and economic ideals. But Mrs. Wharton does not, we think, mean this; in fact, she clearly hints that their marriage was due to love, mainly, if not alone. Amherst's attitude towards his wife is therefore slightly inconsistent, and his character is weakened accordingly. In Justine we are also a little disappointed. At first she is intensely interesting—a strong and compelling picture of the modern working woman; but her weakness—only temporary, admittedly—is inconsistent with her strength, both earlier and later in the story. The other characters in the story are neat and effective thumb-nail sketches of American society, drawn with the sure knowledge that comes from intimate acquaintance with the originals.

It must not, however, be thought from this criticism that we wish to underrate in any way the worth of Mrs. Wharton's story. On the contrary, we are of opinion that it is in many respects a good novel—far above the average of modern fiction. But Mrs. Wharton's work is good enough to stand detailed criticism, and faults, which in a less worthy book might be passed over as negligible in view of the low standard of the whole, stand out all the more clearly in her case, because the level of her work is undoubtedly high.

The Eddy. By RICCARDO STEPHENS. (Wm. Blackwood and Sons, 6s.)

ONLY in putting down this book, after reading it through with growing interest, does one realise how admirably the story is told. More than any recent book which we have seen it fulfils the famous definition of art as "life seen through a temperament."

That temperament is not the author's own, but far more subtly and impressively, while ostensibly relating the holiday life of a pleasing group of people in the Scottish Highlands and the simple love-story of charming Diana La Quesne and the young aristocrat who has taken up literature for a livelihood, Mr. Stephens reflects the struggles and character of the village doctor as he occasionally and incidentally came into contact with the occupants of the Manor. There are some admirable descriptions of Scottish scenery, fishing and shooting, and humorous interludes, notably those of the drunken Provost of Glen Aire in his officious moods. At first one is tempted to dismiss the leading characters of the story as no more than mildly interesting; their lives are as placid and well-ordered as a yacht sailing before a gentle breeze. Then one realises that from the yacht of their lives they are watching the stern and frantic efforts of a lonely man to keep himself morally afloat, and from being drawn into the whirlpool of his weakness. Those on board the yacht are too socially remote to give him effective help. He is only an English doctor settled in a little Scottish town, which they visit at rare intervals for shooting, fishing, and holidays. No more is seen or told of him in the book than one would actually see or know of the local doctor if one were a member of an annual country-house party in the Highlands. Yet his occasional appearances in attendance at a peasant's cottage, his invitation to dinner or a day's fishing, as a matter of charity rather than courtesy, rouse a real interest in the doctor and make him the pivotal, though apparently only a subsidiary, character in the story. It is he that brings about the final crisis—an incident the more dramatic for being one of the higher risks of daily human life, and for the restraint with which it is narrated. Altogether "The Eddy" is an admirable book; the story is so well, so quietly told, without recourse to adventitious aids or spicery.

Admiral Eddy. By OLIVER ONIONS. (John Murray, 6s.)

NOT since Mr. Kenneth Grahame's "Golden Age; or, Dream Days" (and, by-the-bye, when are we to have another book from Mr. Grahame's pen?) have we found any stories of childhood at once so charming and so natural as the five that compose this book. Mr. Onions has the rare gift of appreciating and understanding the child-mind, and without unduly serious psychological analysis succeeds, by neat and unforced touches, in revealing the character and thoughts of his hero.

Admiral Eddy is altogether a delightful character. Whether as admiral, or embryonic psychical research student, or General commanding the Forces during the Campaign of the Great Hall, he stands out before us, a charming little figure, brave, eager, single-minded, honourable, and chivalrous. Of course, he is fortunate in the friendship and guidance of George, The Other John, and Phyllis; the healthy barbarism of John the Younger is also an excellent tonic for his seven-years-old weakness; but even at seven years he can act alone, as shown in The Dryad, guarded by his instinctive honour and manliness.

In a book of short stories, where all are good, it is difficult to decide which is the best. For ourselves, we, perhaps, should be inclined to give our vote for "The Damoiseau" or "The Dryad." They are more subtle in their delineation, less obvious in their motif, than either "Admiral Eddy" or "The Campaign." These last, however, will possibly appeal more strongly to many readers, and certainly to readers of Admiral Eddy's own age. Fortunate, indeed, will such readers be if they have a George of their own to design and build a sister ship to the Anna Pink, and to act as First Lord in another thrilling sea fight round Port Anna; or, when the weather forbids outdoor fighting, to conduct another campaign between the Sierras in the Long Drawing Room—where Phyllis made the weather—and the Swamp by the Morning Room.

The Woman in the Way. By WILLIAM LE QUEUX. (Eveleigh Nash, 6s.)

EVERY chapter in Mr. William le Queux's new novel adds a new element of mystery, gives a fresh direction to the puzzled and probing mind, or holds it up altogether. But Mr. William le Queux has none of the higher qualities of mystification. He has his initial and intricate plot of crime, and then he expands it into a six-shilling novel, assuring you again and again that never were such cunning scoundrels. But he never produces the sense of an increase of mystery. After a certain time you weary of the eternal parallel complications, none of which seems to thicken the atmosphere or co-operate with one another, like a horror with many faces. The book is exciting by sections, but, in spite of the criminal plot, it is tame as a whole. But it is obvious that there may be sections of excitement in a novel in which murdered men are "made up" to look like living men, antiquarians at work on Venetian MSS. infuse the bacilli of diphtheria into an invalid's beef-tea, a Lady Kathleen is seized at her trysting-place, hurried away in a motor-car, and pitched over a bridge into a river by night—and so on, ad infinitum, or rather, till the modern time-limit of the novel is reached, and Mr. William le Queux has to draw in his imagination, ready to take a flying leap into the space between the covers of his next book.

DRAMA

"EDWIN DROOD" AT HIS MAJESTY'S THEATRE

PERHAPS there is no kind of play that is less likely will prove an artistic success than an adaptation of a well-known novel; and of them all, the novels of Dickens—with the possible exception of A Tale of Two Cities—are quite the most likely to turn into failures. Still, Mr. Comyns Carr is to be congratulated on this occasion, for at any rate, Edwin Drood is a great improvement on Oliver Twist, which was one of the worst plays I ever had the unhappiness to see. Two things were quite obvious last Saturday night; one of them was that Mr. Carr had provided a really first-rate part for Mr. Tree, and the other was that he had invented a highly ingenious and, on the whole, satisfactory solution of the Edwin Drood mystery. With regard to this solution, it is not necessary to say much, and certainly it would be tedious at the present time, considering the large amount of literature that has grown up round Dickens's unfinished novel, to contrast it with the other solutions that have from time to time been put forward. This one has, at least, the merit, which will appeal to all real lovers of Dickens, that it ends happily.

Jasper, who had acquired the opium habit and had made every preparation for the murder of Edwin Drood, is prevented at the critical moment from carrying out his purpose by the very power of this habit. So strong is the frenzy that the drug engenders, that he disturbs and warns his victim; and in the morning, when he finds the latter gone, he is firmly convinced that he has carried out the whole murder and burial in the manner that he had so carefully planned. Drood keeps out of the way until the last moment when Jasper is dying in prison, where he had been placed on his own confession, but is just in time to join hands with the too fascinating Rosa Bud and forgive Jasper for the wrong he has tried to do them.

The earlier part of the play is too well known to need telling here, Dickens's main story having been more or less carefully followed. We are left, then, with a fairly satisfactory melodrama, which was made interesting by the powerful acting of Mr. Tree, and spoilt to a large degree by the fact that in no other character was it possible to take the smallest interest, so carefully had each of them been pared down to help in producing the most typically characteristic actor-manager's play I have ever seen. But, as an actor, Mr. Tree made up for many of the defects, and it is a long time since he has produced a new play which gave him so many opportunities of displaying his great gifts as an actor of melodrama. His passion for Rosa, his mania under the influence of the opium, his craftiness in designing the crime, and, more than all, his sudden fear in the scene with Mr. Grewgious, when he finds there is a flaw in his carefully prepared scheme, were all wonderfully portrayed, and as an actor he thoroughly deserved the applause and enthusiasm his playing evoked. As a manager he has made the mistake of producing a play which has no part sufficiently important to act as a foil for his own acting, or to keep the interest alive while he is off the stage.

The least unimportant of the other parts was that of Mr. Grewgious, whom Mr. Carr, most unnecessarily, converts into a kind of comic Sherlock Holmes; it was very well played by Mr. William Haviland. Mr. G. W. Anson gave an excellent performance of Durdles, who, as everyone knows, always refers to himself as Durdles and in the third person, a trait which Mr. Carr has exaggerated to a most irritating extent. Mr. Frank Stanmore was very good as The Deputy. The parts of Edwin Drood and Neville Landless were almost reduced to those of walking gentlemen, but were picturesquely filled by Mr. Basil Gill and Mr. Charles Quartermaine respectively. Miss Adrienne Augarde was a delightful Rosa Bud and was the most Dickensy-looking character in the whole play. Mrs. Frederick Wright, sen., too, gave an admirable performance as Princess Puffer. As to Miss Constance Collier, she has a tiny part, out of which there was nothing to be got, and, worst of all, in one act she had to wear a most unbecoming dress.

The play has no literary merit whatever.

A. C.

We are asked to state that Mr. Wilfrid Blunt's pamphlet, "Mr. Blunt and the Times," can be obtained from the Chiswick Press, 20 Took's Court, Chancery Lane, E.C.

CORRESPONDENCE

PATHOLOGICAL OPTIMISM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The admirable article in your issue of the 4th instant, on the subject of M. Metchnikoff's latest work, leaves little to be desired so far as it summarises the book. And it is the more admirable, perhaps, in that it inevitably must put to many readers questions of some moment. For myself, I think the great pathologist's opinions arouse more interest than his discoveries, which latter we all regard as among the most brilliant and important of the past half-century. But when a miner discovers a diamond, it does not follow that he is an authority upon geology; nor if he be a great geologist do we necessarily accept his ideas upon metaphysics. Similarly, because a man devotes his life to the microscope, and is accounted therefore a great physiologist, we need not hold as authoritative his views upon life and death, nor even upon the laws of evolution. Nevertheless, so powerful is the effect of great names upon the public—more especially, it seems, upon that section which is professionally concerned in supporting the dogmas of science—that it is hard to refuse the homage expected of us when the popes thunder forth their decrees.

In one word, sir, though M. Metchnikoff's book is full of wonderful facts his researches have elucidated, full of evidences of extensive reading, full of belief in the possibilities of science, it is yet not a good book scientifically, philosophically, or logically. As you tell us, the first half of his two-fold argument is the assertion that human suffering is due to disturbances in our organic equilibrium which produce discords in our structure and tormenting doubts in our inner consciousness; and the second is that these disturbances are inheritances from remote animal ancestors, many of our organs being hindrances rather than advantages. And the book purposes to give us hope, by showing how some discords may be circumvented.

Now, in the first place, there is no physiological justification whatever for the assumption that we are so tormented. We have inherited from humble ancestors just so much and only so much of their organs and functions as have proved by their mutual adaptation beneficial. Every organ that has survived the wear and tear of the mills of evolution has done so solely because of its utility. I admit that this claim is large, and a favourite one for dispute among biologists; yet I cannot believe that any authority among them will dare assert that the large bowel in all mammals is a hindrance, or that it can be considered merely as a relic of former ages, and on the whole disastrous in its services. For the argument must stand good for all mammals as well as man, seeing that, according to Metchnikoff, it is the cause of their having shorter lives than birds and reptiles and fishes, as well as of our own fear of death. It would be quite as philosophical to argue that man's altruistic, if not his religious, instincts must be set down to his possessing this impolite organ, seeing that in the mammal generally parental affection is strongly developed, while in the reptiles and fishes it is almost absent, though birds, where the large intestine is more definitely distinguished, are certainly good parents!

Human misery, like all other misery, is doubtless the result of disharmony between the ideal and the actual; nevertheless, this discord is the very source of our evolution. It is the impetus to that adaptation to, or overcoming of, the environment which the Neo-Lamarckians proclaim as essential in the origination of varieties and species. And it is no less with the older Darwinians this discord which, accounting for the rejection of the less fit and the survival of the more fit in the perpetual struggle, has been responsible for the upbuilding of man and other kinds. But M. Metchnikoff, of course, understanding all this, now steps in with his science and will, forsooth, arrest these disharmonies! He will proclaim peace between bowel and the religious aspirations of man, and thus prolong a life that, without its efforts to overcome the disharmonies between reason and ideals, stomach and food, greed and good health, would soon sink into a state where happiness would be measured solely by the absence of grief, and man would cease to fear death because he had attained the harmonious elysium of the parasites. Science is hereafter to supersede the laws of evolution just as she has circumvented the old faiths and creeds. And cui bono?

M. Metchnikoff is also a bad logician. He argues from the particular to the general. Because he himself has no sense of religion, he believes that no man of intellect now dare boast any. Because some simple folks live longer than ourselves and drink sour milk, he suspects that all should drink it. Because some have surmounted the disaster of losing an organ by surgery or disease, he argues against the utility of such an organ. Similarly, a recent author has argued that because certain simple-living peoples do not eat meat and do not suffer so commonly as ourselves from malignant disease, that therefore meat is the cause of cancer, and so on.

But the worst part of M. Metchnikoff's argument lies in the use of his own particular facts. The cells he has discovered and calls macrophages, in the event of any injury to the tissues, swarm about it and multiply extraordinarily. They devour the blood poured out into a closed wound as well as the damaged structures, thus paving the way for complete restoration where the damage is not too great. They exist in almost all structures and, though always alive, show no tendency to exert their beneficent powers until opportunity occurs. Now, M. Metchnikoff asserts that these macrophages bring about senile decay, and he gives us wonderful accounts and illustrations of the manner in which they absorb and destroy the vital cells of different organs. All of which facts, coming with his authority, we dare not dispute. Yet we are perfectly at liberty to doubt whether he be not putting the cart before the horse. Seeing that the phagocytic function of these macrophages is during active life entirely beneficent, we are at liberty to suppose that they do not act differently in old age. They do not, in fact, destroy the living but the dying tissues: their work is still beneficent. The point may not seem to be of much importance, yet upon Metchnikoff's view, death is disease and cruel; upon this other view it is normal and beneficent. By procrastinating death, by what means soever, its nature is not changed; and unless, because of the sweet parasitic life which he offers in exchange for that of strenuous contest with difficulties, he is going to destroy our sense of reality along with our sense of horror, he will not make us wonder less, or desire less an immortality.

Sir, this putting of the cart before the horse lies at the root of all this day's failure to understand the meaning of life. John Hunter, a biologist as great as Darwin, and greater than some of to-day who ridicule those sublimer inheritances of man that cannot be demonstrated in museums and test-tubes, insisted that life was the cause and not the consequence of organisation: a dictum that Huxley declared to be fraught with the profoundest significance, and one that should never be lost sight of by the physiologist. Metchnikoff argues as if man, who, he declares, is "a sort of miscarriage of an ape," were a conglomeration of organs accidentally inherited along with a resultant misfortune of life; and as if this misfortune would be modified if we could but make all the organs settle down together in peace. His proposition is but a physiological Hague Conference. He fails to see that life is the cause and not the consequence of structure. He fails to see that the activity of his macrophags is not the cause but the consequence of death. Man may be a slave to his large intestine because he is not master of his physiology; but he will not lengthen his days and glorify his life until he learn that he is somewhat supreme to his organisation:

For of the Soul the Body Form doth take,
For Soul is Form and doth the Body make.

January 8.

GREVILLE MACDONALD, M.D.

THE PROLONGATION OF LIFE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your review, in last week's issue, of Elie Metchnikoff's book on this subject reminded me that I have in my possession a work entitled "The Art of Prolonging Life," by Dr. C. W. Hufeland, Professor of Medicine at the University of Jena, an English translation of which appeared in 1797. Ward, Lock & Tyler re-published this some years ago. The date does not appear, but I must have had it nearly thirty years. I have also an impression that Dr. Erasmus Wilson edited a previous edition of the same book. The work that I have is written in a popular style and is not intended as a scientific treatise, as I have no doubt Elie Metchnikoff's work is. I have not seen his book; but the one I possess has always struck me as one of the most informing popular works on the subject of health that has appeared in an English dress. Some of the subjects mentioned in your review are dealt with in Hufeland's work.

JAS. GAULT.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—After reading, as I always do, your notes under "Life and Letters," together with Mr. Sayers's reply, I find you both wrong on certain points.

As you rightly show—in square brackets—there are "free" libraries which are public, but, at the same time, are not rate-supported, notably the very successful free libraries in the City of London. Many librarians, however, object to the term "free" libraries as savouring too much of charity! I do not, for, from my own experience, the public care not two brass buttons how a library is supported, so long as it is well managed and they are well served. In fact, the name is of no importance at all—at least, to the users of a library.

The "two tickets" system, on the other hand, is no novelty, but is in use in most free libraries. Ordinarily, of course, a reader can only obtain a single book (in one or more volumes) on his or her ticket. Some fifteen years ago the bright idea struck a prominent member of the Library Association—Mr. J. Y. W. MacAlister—that it would be a good thing for libraries to grant readers a second ticket, available for any work except fiction. Thus, it is possible for a reader to have a light work for perusal in train, bus, or train, besides the recondite book of philosophy, history, or travel, needing more careful study. Although I cannot guarantee that all my readers do carefully wade through the heavy literature, I see no adequate reason for surmising, as you do, that they should trouble to load themselves up with tomes to leave lying about in their homes.

Evidently, too, you have scant sympathy with the oft-times hard-worked junior counter-assistant at many public libraries. Readers can hardly expect extra attention at a counter where perhaps twenty other borrowers are impatiently waiting their turn. At most libraries great help is always obtainable by referring to the librarian or sub-librarian, and probably before long English libraries may even adopt the American system of the "information desk."

Just a word about the news-room. I, personally, should be sorry to see such a useful department done away with, although it has been much abused in the past. Wherever space permits, magazines, reviews, and such-like literature are kept in a room apart, frequently in the reference department, and, certainly, such is the case in all the large and better-class libraries.

January 3.

F. T. W. LANGE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I cannot but think that your judgment of library assistants is based upon a very, very limited experience of them, and differs very much from the opinion of the majority of readers. There are, of course, instances of assistants whose intellectual equipment is not of the best, and whose knowledge of literature is also not extensive. But every profession in life contains such members—they may even be found amongst editors. Is this any reason why a whole profession should be branded with the same mark? I do not quite see how the statements in your issue of the 28th ult. can be altogether reconciled. If, as is stated, all assistants are greatly underpaid, then the opinion of the writer of the article must surely be that their attainments are worth a great deal more than they receive for them. Of course, libraries are open to abuses. So are churches! But you would not do away with either because of the fact. The borrower who was able to take away twenty-four volumes of Dumas at one time probably thought what a privilege it was, and most certainly would not think he was abusing the library. His opinion, as one entitled to use the institution, and possibly an indirect supporter of the same, is worth quite as much as that of—with all respect—any other person. Nearly every public library, in its rules, prohibits eating and smoking, and only the enforcement of the rules is necessary to check these things, although in my twenty years' experience of library work I have seen little, and heard less, of such happenings. One naturally regrets the prevalence of loafers in our public institutions, but it is a difficult matter to prohibit altogether a class of people for whom, as much as for any other class, such places were meant. Even the man who gazed at the outside cover of THE ACADEMY for an hour and a half may have only been meditating on some striking passage he had previously read therein. Probably some library assistants have done the same thing over the article I have been quoting. I myself had to look at the title more than once before I could convince myself that it was really THE ACADEMY I was reading. While not agreeing with Mr. Sayers that the scheme outlined in your paper is an impossible one, yet I cannot believe that it is altogether desirable. It is a fact that numbers of readers, if they were refused fiction only, would do as they probably did before the advent of the public library—spend their spare halfpennies on cheap, trashy "horribles," rather than be compelled to take matter they did not appreciate. First of all attract your public to the library with popular but good-class fiction (to number the only alternative to the public-house), and surround him with more solid literature, so that his mind may gradually be weaned to the sterner stuff in the book world. I agree with you that an assistant, when asked for a particular work and not having same, should be ready with a suggestion of something similar, although I have a vivid recollection of suggesting a work to a reader requiring information from a particular work which we had not got, and being told to mind my own business. The public are as much to blame as the staff. I happen to know that a large number of library assistants are in every way capable and worthy of the profession they serve, but we all agree that to ensure the highest type of official it will be necessary to largely increase the remuneration now given. This is just as true as it is erroneous to assume that all assistants have intellects and literary judgment no higher than those of a booking-office clerk. As regards the "courtesy" question, I can only take it that the Library Association has found that commodity so self-evident in the majority of assistants that its inclusion in an examination syllabus would only be superfluous. For the sake of my profession I truly hope so. Apologising for the length of my letter.

B. M. HEADICAR.

[We are glad to see that our correspondents do not emulate the perfervid eloquence of Mr. Sayers. Our point was, of course, that by paying library assistants more, public or free libraries would attract a more cultured class of man to their service. We should be sorry if in our zeal for their welfare we had done an injustice to the present body of library assistants. Perhaps our experiences have been unfortunate.—ED.]

A PROTEST

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Is English speech losing the sound of "r" before a consonant? A poet, in your issue of January 4th, rhymes broad and ford, presumably pronouncing them brawd and fawd. The same tendency is noticeable everywhere, in prose as well as verse; "r" seems to be taken merely as the sign of a broad vowel. Thus khaki is sometimes written kharki, and a daily paper even stated lately that August is "phonetically spelled Orgust!"

This is a serious matter for those who would preserve the purity of our language and the dignity of our verse. Colloquial pronunciations are quite enjoyable in comic pieces. When Lear of "The Nonsense Book" rhymes Majorca and Walker, when Browning rhymes nimbly and chimbly (= chimney), or when a writer in Punch rhymes Eliza(r) and advertiser, the mispronunciations are part of the fun; but no one of these is tolerable in serious poetry. It is like rhyming Mrs. and kisses; in serious verse we must say mistress.

It may be answered that broad and ford is a case of imperfect rhyme, just like over and cover in the stanza which follows. But the cases are wholly different. No one imagines that over and cover are pronounced with the same vowel-sound. Theirs is a genuine case of imperfect rhyme, such as may be found in all our great poets. Only pedantry condemns these; they are sanctioned by the practice of our master-singers, and are easily defensible on grounds of theory. But broad and ford are so near in sound that they are sure to be taken for perfect tallies. This, if I mistake not, was why Tennyson condemned such "Cockney rhymes." Like other youthful bards—like Keats and Mr. Swinburne, for example—he began by rhyming dawn and morn, but ceased to do so when he came to years of discretion. And the reason he gave was that people would take them for identically sounding words, which to his nice ear was abomination.

The term "Cockney" suggests a further point. Even granting that in Southern English the "r" is wholly dropped—which I by no means admit—do our poets write for one small part of the Empire? Throughout nine-tenths of the English-speaking world the "r" is certainly not dropped, and rhymes like broad and ford are held signs of an affected and namby-pamby pronunciation. At any moment fashion may restore the missing sound, as it has lately restored the aspirate to herb and humble and humour, and perhaps to which as distinguished from witch. Should that happen, users of these rhymes will stand pilloried as the Laura-Matilda singers of an effeminate time, when one of the least virile of English dialects tried to usurp dominion over all others.

If further argument be needed, it may be found in the chaotic uncertainty which follows relaxation of phonetic truth. Here are a few of the rhymes which I have seen used in serious poetry: drawn and gone, dawn and torn, court and thought, hearth and path, law and before, wroth and North, ear and Cytherea (Keats, also Nora Hopper), taut and port, creatures and preachers. In comic verse: nurture and researcher, sooner and lacuna, Iena and explainer, Chicago and embargo, motor and iota, Milwaukee and door-key, show to what lengths the thing can be carried. Is it well to admit even the thin edge of the wedge? Without being pedantic, may we not fairly say that colloquial slovenliness of speech accords ill with the higher strains of poetry?

January 5.

T. S. O.

[The rhyming of broad and ford is an undoubted instance of a "Cockney rhyme," and is quite indefensible. At the same time in our judgment the poem had sufficient merit to allow of its appearance, even with this ugly blemish.—ED.]

EUGENE DELACROIX

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your reveiwer of Mrs. Bussy's book, mentions "The Execution of Marino Faliero" as "the one example of Delacroix's work that is accessible to the London public." May I remind him of the two works by this master in the Constantine Ionides Collection—viz., "The Good Samaritan" and a sketch for the painting in the Louvre, "The Shipwreck of Don Juan"?

January 4.

STANLEY COX.

PARENTAL RIGHTS AND SCHOOL TRUST DEEDS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—There is no necessary antagonism between the "inalienable right of the parent to choose the religious education of his child," and the defence of Church School Trust Deeds. We, who insist that the latter shall be jealously respected, are entirely warranted in taking a stand on parents' rights. That ground is impregnable. But there are several ways of making parents' rights effectual, and some of the plans before us are perilously near the worst way.

Parents have every right to prescribe the religion in which they wish to see their children brought up. They have no right to over-ride a trust deed, but at most a right to claim some relaxation of it for themselves. For instance, Nonconformists or Romanists living in a one-school area, served by a Church School, have no right to say this shall not be a Church School for Church children. They have a right to demand that the educational machinery of the district shall leave them free religious opportunity, but this right might be satisfied:

- (1) By building a new school (on the lines of sec. 8 of Mr. Balfour's Act);
- (2) By a conscience clause and facilities in the Church School; or
- (3) By a conscience clause and facilities outside the school building—e.g., by attendance at chapel.

The point to work on is that the parental right is a right over teaching, not over buildings settled on trust. The right is one to demand opportunity, not a right to tear up a trust deed.

The best safeguard of parental rights is a strong system of voluntary schools of different kinds. If we transfer our schools, who have we to trust to? An Act of Parliament: in other words, a bit of paper that the next general election might throw away! If our opponents were honestly prepared to accept parental rights as the principle of a final settlement, there would be something to be said for elaborating such plans as those which are being put forward at the present time. But our opponents are not prepared to accept the principle of parental rights. The principle they are trying to run is a hare-brained theory of the State and its rights which we could never accept. In such circumstances to elaborate these plans is to gratuitously disturb men's minds and to weaken (by dividing) the defence. It will be quite time enough to formulate a plan where we see signs of agreement on first principles.

The very worst way of giving effect to parents' rights would be to introduce the parental vote into school management. Most parents would not vote, and in many places a parent's ban would afford a delightfully easy opportunity for a handful of fanatics to carry all before them.

Moreover, our first principles do not pledge us to this. We are pledged to a system that shall safeguard parental rights and give full opportunity, but it does not follow that such a system can be best built on parental votes. It is one thing to base a system (in principle) on parents' rights, and quite another to subordinate its machinery to parental votes.

T. E. CLWORTH,
Hon. Sec., Church Schools'
Emergency League.

January 3.

UNIVERSITY INTELLIGENCE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—A lecture will be delivered at King's College, Strand, by Dr. B. P. Grenfell, Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, on Tuesday, January 28th, at 5 p.m., on "Recent Discoveries of Papyri at Oxyrhynchus."

The lecture will be illustrated by lantern slides, and will be free to the public.

WALTER SMITH,
Secretary.

January 2.

THE CRAVING FOR PRINT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The affliction so successfully diagnosed by Mr. Edgar Jepson is the result of the insensate hatred of "idleness," falsely so called, which distinguished the training of the young in the latter part of last century. "Don't sit doing nothing: get a book!" and similar admonitions, destroyed meditation. In the endeavour to be severely practical the day-dream was treated as a moral monster; and lo! in its place we find the "snappy snippet." Imagination was crushed, and maimed souls have lost the power of interior vision.

Neither prophet nor poet can be nourished on advertisements of mottled soap, and the knowledge of the exact number of lenses in the left eye of a blue-bottle in no way compensates for spiritual blindness. Then "Ho! for the Sangraal, vanished vase of Heaven," let us vow for a year and a day to follow Mr. Machen's guidance on the High Quest. Rich diet, such as this, is indicated for emaciated souls.

January 7.

FRED. G. ACKERLEY.

BOOKS RECEIVED

BOOKS OF REFERENCE

- Who's Who*, 1908. Black, 10s. net.
Who's Who Year Book, 1908. Black, 1s. net.
Debrett's Peerage, Baronetage, Knightage, and Companionage, 1908. Dean, 31s. 6d. net.
The Literary Year Book, 1908. Routledge.
 Woodhouse, S. C. A Dictionary of Classical Mythology. Routledge, 1s.
 Baylee, John Tyrrell. A Gazetteer of the World. Routledge, 1s.

BOOKS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

- Stories from the Old Testament*. Retold by S. Platt. Harrap, 2s. 6d. net.
Stories from Chaucer. Retold from the Canterbury Tales by J. Walker McSpadden. Harrap, 2s. 6d. net.
 Mundell, Frank. Captain Cook. Melrose, 1s. net.
 Williams, Constance. Frances Willard. Melrose, 1s. net.
 Everett-Green, Evelyn. Clanrickard Court. Melrose, 3s. 6d.
 Murray, Mary E. Dick the Gipsy. The Sunday School Union, 1s.
 Cule, W. E. Tom and Company, Limited. The Sunday School Union, 1s. 6d.
The Royal Annual, 1907. The Sunday School Union, 2s.

DRAMA

- The Dramatic Writings of John Bale*. Edited by John S. Farmer. Early English Drama Society, n.p.

EDUCATIONAL

- Knox, E. M. Bible Lessons for Schools—Exodus. Macmillan, 1s. 6d.
Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. Edited by Alfred W. Pollard. Macmillan, 1s. 6d.
 Lee, Elizabeth. Seventeenth Century Prose. Macmillan, 1s.
Les Fiancés du Spitzberg. By Xavier Maimier. Edited by A. A. Hentsch. The Clarendon Press, 3s. 6d.
Journal d'un Voyage aux mers Polaires. By Lieut. René Bellot. Edited by H. J. Chaytor. The Clarendon Press, 2s. 6d.

FICTION

- Fletcher, J. S. The Ivory God. Murray, 6s.
 Cooke, W. Bourne. For King and Love, and other Stories. Ouseley, 6s.
Lady Lilian's Luck. By Anna Comtesse de Brémont. Greening, 6s.
 Cunninghame, Alice. The Love Story of Giraldu. Griffiths, 6s.
 Maugham, W. S. The Explorer. Heinemann, 6s.
 Newte, Horace W. C. The Master Beast. Rebman, 3s. 6d. net.
 Biss, Gerald. The White Rose Mystery. Greening, 6s.
 Lefroy, Ella Napier. Held to Honour. Ouseley, 3s. 6d.
 Douglas, James. The Unpardonable Sin. Grant Richards, 6s.

POETRY

- Spring in London*. By E. A. Smith, Elder, 2s. net.
 Shatwell, Wellesley. Collection of Verses. Gay & Bird, 1s. net.
 Young, Filion. The Lover's Hours. Grant Richards, 2s. 6d. net.
The Poetical Works of the Rev. H. F. Lyte. Edited by the Rev. John Appleyard. Elliot Stock, 6s. net.
 Legge, Arthur E. J. The Pilgrim Jester. Lane, 4s. 6d. net.
 Frazer, Eppie. The Clodhopper. London: Bale, Sons & Danielsson, n.p.
 Atkinson, Ethel Tindal. A Garden of Shadows. Macmillan, 3s. 6d. net.
 Hazellhurst, John. Flashes from the Orient. Digby Long, 2s. 6d. net.
The Poetical Works of John Keats. Edited by William T. Arnold. Macmillan, 3s. 6d.
 Gibson, Elizabeth. By Many Streams. Samurai Press, 5s. net.
 Sabin, Arthur K. The Wayfarers. Samurai Press, 2s. net.
The Oxford Book of French Verse. Chosen by St. John Lucas. The Clarendon Press, 6s. net.; India paper, 7s. 6d. net.

Cresswell, Thirza. Stray Thoughts in Verse. Allenson, 3s. 6d.
Poems and Ballads of Goethe. Translated by W. Edmonds-toune Aytoun and Sir Theodore Martin. Blackwood, 6s. net.

Hutton, Mary. The Táin. Maunsel, 10s. 6d. net.
 Mason, Veronica. I Heard a Child Singing. Elkin Mathews, 1s. net.
 Graves, Charles L. Humours of the Fray. Smith, Elder, 3s. 6d. net.
 Vine Hall, Edgar. Songs and Lyrical Poems. Jacobs, 2s. net.
 Macleod, Fiona. From the Hills of Dream. Heinemann, 5s. net.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS

- Johnstone, Charles. Chrysal, or the Adventures of a Guinea. Routledge, 6s.
 Dodge, Walter Phelps. The Real Sir Richard Burton. Unwin, 6s.
The Works of Shakespeare—The Comedy of Errors. Edited by Henry Cuninghame. Methuen, 2s. 6d. net.
The English Spy. Drawn from the life by Bernard Black-mantle. In 2 vols. Methuen, 7s. net.
Palgrave's Golden Treasury. Dent, n.p.
 Ruskin, John. Ariadne Florentina. Val D'Arno. Allen, 2s. 6d. net.
Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales. Constable, 3s. 6d. net.
 Eliot, George. Silas Marner. Macmillan, 6s.
 Austen, Jane. Northanger Abbey. Dent, 5s. net.
Macaulay's History of England. In 5 vols. Routledge, 1s. net each.
 Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth. Dante's Paradise, Dante's Purgatorio, and Dante's Inferno. Routledge, 1s. net each.
 Ramsay, E. B. Reminiscences of Scottish Life and Character. Routledge, 1s. net.
 Ainsworth, William Harrison. Windsor Castle. Routledge, 1s. net.
 Thackeray, William Makepeace. Some Roundabout Papers. Foulis, 1s. 6d. net.
 Dickens, Charles. Doctor Marigold. Foulis, 1s. 6d. net.
 Carroll, Lewis. Alice's Adventures in Wonderland. Lane, 1s. 6d. net.
 Carroll, Lewis. Alice's Adventures in Wonderland. Heinemann, 6s.
 Gissing, George. The Odd Women. Nelson, 7d. net.
Alice in Wonderland. By Lewis Carroll. Illustrated by Charles Robinson. Cassell, 6s.
 Wilde, Oscar. The Soul of Man. Humphreys, 3s. 6d. net.
 Savile, Sir George. The Young Lady's Chesterfield. Humphreys, 3s. 6d. net.
 Bell, Lady. Topics for Conversation. Humphreys, 3s. 6d. net.
 Pollard, Alfred W. Books in the House. Humphreys, 3s. 6d. net.
 Austen, Jane. Pride and Prejudice. Nelson.
Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, Twelfth Night, Antony and Cleopatra, Cymbeline. Blackie, 1s. 6d. net each.
Imagination and Fancy, by Leigh Hunt. Eothen, by A. W. Kinglake. Poems by Thomas Hood. Blackie, 2s. 6d. net each.
 Gaskell, Mrs. Cranford. Macmillan, 5s. net.
 Tuckwell, the Rev. W. Reminiscences of Oxford. Smith, Elder, 6s.
Envelope Books: Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám, Isabella or the Pot of Basil, Rhyme of the Duchess May. Foulis, n.p.
 Swift, Dean. The Battle of the Books, Miscellanea. Greening, 2s. net each.
 Gaboriau, Emile. The Blackmailers. Greening, 1s. 6d. net.
The Adventures of Baron Munchausen. With an introduction by Henry Blanchamp. Greening, 1s. 6d. net.
Gil Blas, translated by T. Smollett, in 2 vols. Agnes Grey, by Anne Brontë. Poems of Samuel Taylor Coleridge. The Three Clerks, by Anthony Trollope. The Life of John Sterling, by Thomas Carlyle. Frowde, 1s. net each.
 Caine, Hall. Cobwebs of Criticism. Routledge, 1s. net.
The De la More Booklets: The Sensitive Plant, by P. B. Shelley. Saul, by Robert Browning. Il Peneoso, L'Allegro, and Arcades, by John Milton. The De la More Press, 1s. 6d. net each.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED WHITE & BLUE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
& AFTER DINNER.In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

Nervous Disorders

A deficiency of the phosphates causes a lowering of nervous tone, indicated by exhaustion, restlessness, headache or insomnia.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate

(Non-Alcoholic)

supplies the nerve cells with health-giving life force, restores strength and induces restful sleep without the use of dangerous drugs.

An Ideal Tonic in Nervous Diseases

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 159 Old Street, London, E. C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fullest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

The JANUARY "BOOK MONTHLY" SIXPENOE NET, IS NOW READY.

IT COMPLETES THE RECORD OF THE YEAR'S NEW BOOKS, HAS INTERESTING GOSSIP AND ARTICLES, AND IS BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED WITH CHRISTMAS-BOOK PICTURES, AMONG OTHERS.

THE FEATURE OF THE NUMBER IS A SEASONABLE SYMPOSIUM ON JUVENILE LITERATURE BY FOURTEEN OF THE BEST-KNOWN WRITERS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

London:

Simkin, Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, E.C.

P.S.—Begin the year by subscribing to the "Book Monthly."

PUBLIC OPINION

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF
CURRENT THOUGHT & ACTIVITY.
TWO PENCE EACH FRIDAY.

ESTABLISHED 1860.

An Interesting Review of World Events.

To get a broad, comprehensive and clear view of the great movements afoot on the globe, to catch the inmost spirit of the activities of the world—to grasp their full meaning—read PUBLIC OPINION.

This paper compels reading by the tremendous interest of its subjects and their cosmic sweep. It is a journal of timeliness that appeals to intelligent men and women who wish to know the best that is said and done in all fields of human activity.

Its pages are brimful of information and discussion on Politics, Science, Religion, Literature, Art, Music, and the Drama, and of the people who keep the world turning around. It gives the best from all periodicals and keeps one abreast of the culture of the age in all lines of thought and achievement. To the busy man and woman it is indispensable. It is the paper that keeps you educated.

PUBLIC OPINION is the ideal paper for every home, of interest to every member of the family, a luxurious necessity and a necessary luxury. Its circulation increases each week, and it is read by people in all parts of the world.

Specimen Post Free on application.

Offices: 30 & 31 Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART.

PRICE THREEPENCE.

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION:

Inland, 15s. post free, Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free.

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, 95 FETTER LANE, E.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____ months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

A LITERARY FOUR-IN-HAND

MR. JOHN LANE begs to inform his patrons that he will open the Publishing Season by starting from the Bodley Head four new Authors, viz :—

- | | | |
|--------------------|-----------------------|-------------------------|
| 1. A NEW HUMOURIST | F. J. Randall | LOVE AND THE IRONMONGER |
| 2. A NEW CLASSIC | W. Compton Leith | APOLOGIA DIFFIDENTIS |
| 3. A NEW CRITIC | R. A. Scott-James | MODERNISM AND ROMANCE |
| 4. A NEW POET | Lascelles Abercrombie | INTERLUDES AND POEMS |

Mr. Lane believes that these books will run through the Season. The following are the fixtures :—

JANUARY 15th.

APOLOGIA DIFFIDENTIS. By W. Compton Leith. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE publisher is conscious that it is unusual to hail a new writer as "a classic," but Sir Thomas Browne, Pater, R. L. S. and Kenneth Grahame were once new writers, and he claims for Mr. Compton Leith that he has written a book worthy to be placed along with the writings of such authors. By some APOLOGIA DIFFIDENTIS may be voted precious—it is certainly intimate—but those who have the delicate perception to appreciate a new style will read and re-read the book. It stands apart from the highway of modern introspective literature; it is too true to be precious, too classical to be treated as ephemeral. By its overwhelming sincerity it will command respect, and not a few will sympathise with a soul battling against the heartlessness of circumstance.

JANUARY 22nd.

LOVE AND THE IRONMONGER. By F. J. Randall. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE robustious essence of Twentieth-Century Humour. The story of how a moribund jester landed a number of very respectable people in topsy-turvydom, and how they were extricated therefrom by a further twist of the deceased man's testament, will appeal to all who possess what has been called the fourth of the great Cardinal Virtues—Humour.

JANUARY 22nd.

MODERNISM AND ROMANCE. By R. A. Scott-James. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE literature of every period is at one and the same time a mirror and a guide. Mr. Scott-James's study of MODERNISM AND ROMANCE aims at indicating the scope of these functions in the literature of our own day. He takes a few conspicuous tendencies of the age—the scientific spirit, self-consciousness, democracy, realism, pessimism, and the new romantic movement—and shows how almost every new book may be regarded as a symptom of health or disease in the social organism. The book is not a series of essays, but a continuous treatment of the dominant characteristics of contemporary life as revealed in contemporary literature.

JANUARY 29th.

INTERLUDES AND POEMS. By Lascelles Abercrombie. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

SOME weeks ago the well-known editor of a distinguished weekly declared he had discovered a new poet—a real genius. On his being asked if the poet's name was Abercrombie, his astonished reply was "Yes." "I thought so," was the retort; "I have just accepted a volume from him entitled INTERLUDES AND POEMS, and one of the most distinguished living writers wrote me a spontaneous letter drawing attention to Mr. Abercrombie as 'not only a poet, but a poet of very great and original powers. . . I mean, this is really that rara avis, a man of genius.'" Poetry, if it is to possess vitality, must deal with vital questions. Consequently the subject-matter of the poetry of different generations appears to vary. In reality it is not variation but development, and with development of subject comes development of form. Mr. Abercrombie perhaps has more marked development of form than any of his predecessors since Whitman. It is because he is treating of ideas forced upon him by his generation. But behind the new standpoint, the new teaching, there is recognisable the old music flowing in new channels.

N.B.—The publisher feels impelled to explain, or at least to apologise for, the unconventional form in which he announces his four new authors, but in order to display their respective points the typographical substitute for limelight seems the one resource to any one desirous of directing critical attention to his Pegasus team. The publisher's modesty is perhaps the result of a recent reading of "Apologia Diffidentis"; or possibly of an inward conviction that "Good wine needs no bush" has lost its application in the Twentieth Century.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON AND NEW YORK.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1863 JANUARY 18, 1908 PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON
(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON).

DEPARTMENT FOR TRAINING
TEACHERS FOR SECONDARY SCHOOLS.

Theory, Practice, and History of Education.—
J. W. ADAMSON, B.A., Professor (Head of the Department).

Ethics.—Reverend A. CALDECOTT, D.Litt.,
D.D., Professor.

Psychology.—C. S. MYERS, M.A., M.D., Professor. W. BROWN, B.A., Lecturer.

The Department is recognised by the Board of Education as a Training College for Secondary Teachers under the Teachers' Registration Regulations.

The Course, which includes Practical Work in Secondary Schools, extends over one academical year, beginning in October or January. It is suitable for those who are preparing to take the Teachers' Diploma, University of London, and for the Certificate of the Teachers' Training
Syndicate, University of Cambridge.

The Fee is £20 for the year, if paid in advance,
or 8 guineas per term (three terms in the year).

Application should be made to

PROF. ADAMSON,
King's College, Strand, W.C.

THE MOSHER BOOKS

THE NEW CATALOGUE FOR 1908 is now ready, and will be sent free on request to booklovers anywhere that can be reached by mail. This Catalogue, like those that preceded it, is not made up of old and hackneyed quotations concerning books. You are not wearied by "a jollie good book" jingle and that sort of thing,
but you are treated to some very genuine prose and verse not seen in every cut and decidedly dried anthology.

THOMAS B. MOSHER, PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

QUEEN SQUARE CLUB.

A social club for men and women interested in politics, literature or art. Lectures, entertainments, chess and bridge. An exquisite Queen
Anne club-house, close to the British Museum,
and Russell Square Station. Inexpensive lunch and dinner. Subscription two guineas.—Apply
Secretary, 9 Queen Square, Bloomsbury.

Art

EXHIBITION OF FURNITURE, Metal
Work and Modelled Ceilings, by ERNEST
W. GIMSON.—DEBENHAM & FREEBODY'S
ART GALLERIES, WIGMORE STREET, W.

NOTICE.

All communications to the Editor should be addressed
to 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields,
W.C.

All business communications must be sent to The
Manager of "The Academy,"
95 Fetter Lane, E.C.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens
and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds of Typewriting carefully done at home (Remington). Good paper.
Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from
3s. 6d. per 100.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road,
Clapham, S.W.

MS. TYPED with care, 8d. per 1000 words.
MS. Circulars duplicated from 2s. 6d. per 100 (testimonials). Shorthand.—Mrs. JACKSON,
37 Constantine Road, Hampstead, N.W. (late of Rosebery Square Buildings).

THE TYPEWRITING OFFICE for High-
class work of every description. Authors'
MSS. 10d. per 1,000 words. Prompt. Accurate.—
ERNEST C. PEARCE, 30 College Road, Reading.

Books for Sale

ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA, a set in half-morocco, 35 vols., issued by the Times,
for nine guineas net; good condition.—Apply
W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

COSTUME.—"TWO CENTURIES OF COSTUME IN AMERICA, 1620-1820," by A. M. EARLE. Two vols., 8vo, profusely illustrated. Macmillan, 1903. Published 21/- net, for 10/6 as new.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

BOOKS AT ONE-THIRD COST.—
Thousands of the Best Books at from 25 to 80 per cent. below the original prices. Largest and best Stock of Secondhand and New Remainder
Books in the World. Write for our January
Catalogue.—W. H. SMITH & SON, Library
Department, 186 Strand, London, W.C.

Books, etc., Wanted

THE CAMBRIDGE LITERARY AGENCY,
which is placing Novels, Short Stories,
Articles, and Poems with over 100 (one hundred)
Publishers and Periodicals, sold, on December 31,
12 Short Stories and a Serial by UNKNOWN
WRITERS. Hundreds of unique testimonials.
All MSS. submitted by GEORGE G. MAGNUS,
115 Strand, London.

WILL PURCHASE AT ANY TIME.
ILLUMINATED MANUSCRIPTS, from
the earliest times till the beginning of the XVIth
Century; Incunabula and other Early Printed
Books; Illustrated Books, Prints, from the XVth
and the beginning of the XVIth Century. Rare
Old Books and Prints.—JACQUES ROSENTHAL,
Munich, Bavaria. 10, Karlstr. 10.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by Installments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity
as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical Advice by eminent Physicians
and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley, Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A Furnished House in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense
when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary,
Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

Price 6d.; by Post 8d.

"UNCLE REMUS'S MAGAZINE."

Edited by JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS.
(Author of the "Brer Rabbit" Stories).
The latest American Magazine. Full of good things.
JANUARY NUMBER NOW READY.
Of all Booksellers and Newsdealers: or The International
News Company, 5 Bream's Buildings, Chancery Lane,
London, E.C.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including
Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth;
Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz,
Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application.
Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New
Oxford Street, London, W.C.

The QUARTERLY REVIEW

No. 414. JANUARY 1908. 6s.

1. NINETEENTH CENTURY SPAIN.
2. WILLIAM BLAKE. By T. STURGE MOORE.
3. THE ENGLISH BOROUGH. By H. W. C. DAVIS.
4. JOHNSON'S LIVES. By Professor J. CHURTON COLLINS.
5. THE RELIGION OF JAPAN. By Sir CHARLES ELIOT, K.C.M.G.
6. ARIOSTO. By R. WARWICK BOND.
7. THE EIGHT HOURS' DAY IN COAL MINES.
8. THE POETRY OF MR. ALFRED AUSTIN.
9. THE RIGHT TO WORK.
10. THE HAGUE CONFERENCE. By Professor WESTLAKE.
11. GREEK TEMPLES AND EARLY RELIGION. By Professor R. CARR BOSANQUET.
12. THE JUBILEE OF THE ALPINE CLUB. By Sir MARTIN CONWAY.
13. MR. BIRRELL'S RECORD IN IRELAND.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.

No. 423. January, 1908. 8vo, price 6s.

- I. THE GOVERNMENT OF SUBJECT RACES.
- II. LADY MARY WORTLEY MONTAGU.
- III. THE ORIGIN AND PROSPECTS OF GOTHIC ARCHITECTURE.
- IV. BISHOP GORE AND THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.
- V. THE FALLACIES OF SOCIALISM.
- VI. VERSAILLES.
- VII. HEINRICH HEINE: ÉMOTION AND IRONY.
- VIII. RELIGION IN LITERATURE.
- IX. THE AGRICULTURAL POSITION OF THE UNITED KINGDOM.
- X. THE SECOND HAGUE CONFERENCE.
- XI. QUEEN VICTORIA'S LETTERS.

LONGMANS, GREEN & Co., 39 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY

74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON.

MONOCHROME COPIES

BY THE PERMANENT AUTOTYPE CARBON
PROCESS OF PICTURES BY OLD MASTERS.
From the PRINCIPAL COLLECTIONS OF NOTE.

NUMEROUS EXAMPLES OF WORKS BY MODERN ARTISTS

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY'S Processes of Permanent Photographic Reproduction are extensively employed by the Trustees of the British Museum, the Local Government Board, many of the Learned Societies, and leading Publishers.

COPIES OF COINS, SEALS, MEDALS, MSS., DRAWINGS, ENGRAVINGS, ART OBJECTS, MICROSCOPIC WORK, &c.

Inquiries are invited from those requiring Book Illustrations of the very highest quality. SPECIMENS AND ESTIMATES SUBMITTED.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART CATALOGUE.

ENLARGED EDITION, with Hundreds of Miniature Photographs and Tint blocks of Notable Autotypes.

For convenience of reference the Publications are arranged Alphabetically under Artists' Names.

Post Free ONE SHILLING.

A Visit of Inspection is invited to

The Autotype Fine Art Gallery,
74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

No. 2.

NOW READY.

1s. net.

The • International

The January number contains important articles by leading Foreign Statesmen on the Crisis in Portugal, the Future of Austria, and the Labour Party in Belgium.

Special features of the number are articles on New Developments in Art and Literature by Walter Crane, Professor Regnault (Paris), Lily Braun (Berlin), and Dr. Schoenhof (Vienna), while the Editor contributes an article on the Awakening of Art in Oriental Countries, and the sensational new developments of realistic painting in Japan, illustrated with several fine reproductions of the principal pictures.

The • International

The Magazine which records all important Reform Movements throughout the world. Over 250 Foreign Correspondents. Price 1s. net; obtainable through any Bookseller.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1 Adelphi Terrace, London.

WILD HONEY FROM VARIOUS THYME.

By MICHAEL FIELD. Crown 8vo, cloth. 5s. net. The ACADEMY says:—"Michael Field is perhaps the greatest of our living lyric poets who are actually writing at this time."

THE CONGO AND THE COASTS OF AFRICA.

By RICHARD HARDING DAVIS. Illustrated, 6s. net. This book sheds much new and surprising light on the manner in which King Leopold has conducted and is conducting the government of the Congo.

CHEAPER EDITION.

THE AGE OF THE EARTH,

and other Geological Studies. By W. J. SOLLAS, LL.D. Illustrated, 6s. net.

THE CAUSES OF PRESENT DISCONTENTS IN INDIA.

By C. J. O'DONNELL, M.P. 2s. 6d. net. A criticism of the policy of the present Government, and a plea for the adoption of conciliatory methods.

NEW NOVELS.

THE BLUE LAGOON.

By H. DE VERESTACPOOLE, Author of "The Crimson Azaleas." 6s. A strikingly original romance.

EVE'S APPLE.

By ALPHONSE COURLANDER, Author of "The Sacrifice," &c. 6s. A society romance with a strong ethical interest.

The Crown and "Initiative"

All interested in the discussion roused by Mr. Haldane should read Mr. Sidney Low's illuminating chapters on the present position of the Monarchy in

The Governance of England

Second and Cheaper Edition. 3s. 6d. net.

Published by T. FISHER UNWIN, London.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
Life and Letters	355	The Comedy of Errors	362
The Bride's Welcome	357	The Genesis of Hellenic Culture	363
Night and Day	357	Mirabeau	364
Literature :		Richard Verstegan	365
An Elegant Aphorist	357	Veneremur	367
Almost a Great Man	358	The Native Fiction of China	368
The Bible as Literature	359	The Library Table	369
Sir Henry Wotton	360	Fiction	371
"The Final Atom-Dance"	361	Correspondence	373
		Books Received	373

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields.

The publishing offices of THE ACADEMY are at 95 Fetter Lane, E.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

EARNEST students of the drama will find buried in the shy columns of the New York Herald an "interview," in which Mr. James Welch throws a flood of light on how the successful plays of to-day—or some of them—are written. The information is so illuminating, the light so blinding, that for the benefit of those who do not habitually read the New York Herald we transcribe some of the choicest passages. "The prompt book of When Knights were Bold, Mr. Welch told his interviewer, "is a literary curiosity. There is not a page of the original manuscript left intact. At every performance a shorthand writer is stationed in the wings and takes down every new word or bit of business that is introduced, and also records at just what the audience laughs each night. Then the next day, at rehearsal, the play is changed to suit the latest liking of the audience." It is certainly an ingenious method of play-writing, and no doubt Mr. Welch is right in dubbing the prompt book that results from it a "curiosity," though we should have hesitated to describe it as "literary." However, Mr. Welch seems to have had no such qualms, if the "interviewer" is to be credited. "In this way," he continues, "the comedy has been written and re-written time after time." ("Comedy" is good!) "Whenever a young author comes around to sell me a play I just show him this manuscript, and let him see what is in store for him. If he is not frightened he has probably the right stuff in him, and is worth paying attention to." Happy young author, who, after "coming around" to Mr. Welch, can survive his test, and so be deemed worthy to construct a "comedy" for the audiences who throng his theatre nightly! How proud he must feel, say on the two hundredth night of his piece—that is, after the industrious shorthand writer has for the one hundred and ninety-ninth time re-written it in the wings—to have been the creator of such a work of art! Unluckily, there will be one crumple in his rose-leaf, one flaw in his perfect self-content. He will not be able to recognise his work any more. But no matter. He need not repine. He "has the right stuff in him."

According to a writer in a contemporary musical journal (the Musical News), musical criticism, to be of any value, must be the signed work of a man well stricken in years. "The public," if we are to believe this gentleman (a Mr. S. M. Eagleton, "simply smile" at critics who remain anonymous. Mr. Eagleton also refers with scorn to "the young gentleman who does THE ACADEMY music notices." We have never heard of Mr. Eagleton, and do not profess to have any facilities for ascertaining the ages of anonymous writers in contemporary papers; but we are able to predict that however old or however young Mr. Eagleton may be, he will grow older, and perhaps wiser in time. He may even, if he cultivates humility and gives himself up to the study of the great composers, arrive at a state of mind which now appears incredible to him, the state of mind in which a hearty dislike for the works of Stainer may not appear wholly outrageous and preposterous. With advancing years, too, his style and his manners are likely to change, and any change in these would probably be for the better.

Why is it, by the way, that the epithet "young" is so often used as a term of reproach when it is applied to those who write reviews or criticise plays, and music and what not? "The young gentleman who does the poetry," "The young gentleman who attends to the fiction," and so on? The person who writes the particular paragraph or notice which draws forth these bitter protests may not be young at all; he may be very old, or simply middle-aged, and he may not even be a gentleman. The most admirable musical and dramatic criticism has frequently been written by elderly people, who had no earthly pretensions to be considered gentlemen; ladies for instance, or mere men who are not gently born. If Mr. Eagleton had referred to "the elderly and low-born reprobate who does THE ACADEMY music notices," he would at least have shown a little originality. As it is he merely demonstrates to all whom it may concern that he is one of that large class of persons in this country who not only prefer bad music to good, but also invariably lose their tempers when anyone ventures to disagree with them.

In a speech at the National Liberal Club on the 13th, Mr. Macnamara is reported to have said that the second ballot was wanted if the will of the people was to prevail. Now, since the year 1645, or thereabouts, whenever any party in the State has attained its ends, it has confidently affirmed that either the designs of Providence or the will of the people has prevailed. We certainly heard a great deal about the prevalence of the will of the people after the last general election, and we understood from Mr. Macnamara and others that it was still continuing as late as last June, when Mr. McKenna issued his regulations. Mr. Macnamara now joins Mr. S. T. Evans in pointing out the fact, which has not been doubted for a long time by anyone outside the circle of party politics, that the will of even a bare majority of the people has never yet been represented in the House of Commons at all. We congratulate Mr. Macnamara and Mr. Evans that the exigencies of their party have allowed them to show their commonsense and breadth of view. Mr. Macnamara cites the seven constituencies which have returned members to Parliament since the last general election, after "three-cornered" contests. The returns show that in every instance the present members represents a small minority of the votes polled.

We quote the data in the following order:—(A) Number of votes for defeated candidates; (B) name of constituency; (C) party of candidate elected; (D) number of votes in his favour.

A	B	C	D
12,684	West Bradford	Labour	4,957
19,611	Croydon	Conservative	8,248
14,226	Jarrow	Labour	4,698
13,792	North-West Lanark	Conservative	5,588
10,370	Colne Valley	Socialist	13,648
16,228	Huddersfield	Liberal	5,762
15,517	West Hull	Liberal	5,623
102,428			38,524

Consequently, since the total number of voters in the seven constituencies was 140,952, rather more than one quarter only are now represented in Parliament, as they desired. Further, it is fair to assume that a proportion of those who did not vote abstained from doing so on principle, because neither of the three candidates before them represented their views.

Last week we commented strongly on the untrustworthiness of Mr. Macnamara's statistics. We are glad to point out that his quotations in this case are quite impartial. In fact, the two elected candidates, who will presumably always vote against the Government, show up to rather better advantage as regards the proportion of votes cast for them than the members of the other three parties. We do not enter into Mr. Evans's comparison between the seats in Parliament and the votes given at the three general elections which he cites, because it involves another question—namely the numerical size of constituencies, which the matter of the seven "three-cornered" constituencies does not. But he, too, points out quite candidly that Welsh Conservatives, whose number he estimates at between eight and ten thousand, are now entirely unrepresented in the House of Commons. We do not suggest that the present Government is more likely than any other party Government which has preceded it to promote electoral reforms, unless they are likely to prove profitable to its party. Nevertheless, Mr. Evans's suggestion deserves to be considered on its merits. He points out that the objection to a second ballot is that voters will not be got to the ballot boxes twice. He suggests instead that they should be allowed to record substitutive votes, by numbering the candidates "1," "2," "3," etc., in the order of their preference, omitting one candidate. If no absolute majority appeared on a first count of the voting papers, the candidate obtaining the fewest votes (who would, of course, be the one oftenest omitted) would be eliminated from the contest, and the votes recorded for him be transferred to the next candidate in order on his supporters' lists. The process would be repeated until an absolute majority appeared.

But Mr. Evans's party sting is situated in a proposal to join his scheme, which he calls "alternative votes," in a Bill with "the closing of public-houses on polling days," and "single votes." He hopes by doing so to steal a march on the House of Lords. He hopes that they may refuse to abolish the plural vote, and by doing so incur odium by rejecting a scheme of electoral reform which has the appearance of justice and impartiality. He carries out the present Government's policy of "filling up the cup." A Government greatly influenced by conscientious persons, which plays the agent provocateur, and deliberately fosters evils which it loudly denounces, in order that good may come of them, presents a disgusting spectacle of hypocrisy. If the Government really believes that the House of Lords, as it stands, is the evil which it pretends, it should appeal to the country on the question of its reformation or abolition. Happily, there is a will of the people slow to move, and difficult to entice to the ballot-boxes, which considers the House of Lords, without false representative pretensions, more entitled to respect, more useful and more impartial than a House of Commons which does not represent it, but the will of party caucuses.

The correspondence columns of a newspaper are like a net let down into the great deep—strange monsters are borne up into the light of day, and the fishermen, now and again, find their nightmares realised. A queer fish, indeed, has just been landed by the Daily Chronicle, in the person of a gentleman who calls himself "Non-Musical," and writes from the City. Thus he argues:

Knowledge has made considerable strides since Shakespeare with his "Music of the Spheres." These spheres are shown not to exist. Physiology has shown that the "emotions" caused by music are of the nature of physical "commotions"; that is, they are merely sensuous and unworthy to form a medium for a communion of intelligences as are the pictorial and literary arts. Indeed, in so far as literature borrows from music for the elaboration of its effects it loses much of its finer character. Music has a value as promoting fighting and love-making. It is a stimulus of our baser instincts, but in the realm of pure reason it has no place.

One cannot help feeling that this interesting correspondent has allowed his strong artistic bias to overcome his rational faculties. For, agreeing with him that Bach's Fugues constitute a sensuous, unworthy, and immoral appeal to man's basest and most degraded instincts, that they are, in short, "a commotion," why should we be less the servants of "pure reason," when we consider the other arts? "Non-Musical" certainly does make a distinction between the fine and the lower literature; it is, of course, manifest that the "City Article" belongs to the former class, and the work of Keats to the latter. Indeed, all poetry, borrowing as it does from music, must be condemned as unworthy. But how about painting? What shall we say of architecture, of sculpture? Possibly we may let a few statues pass as useful illustrations of anatomy; but are the emotions excited by the sight of Chartres Cathedral anything but "physical commotions," belonging no more to the region of pure reason than stomach-ache or mumps?

And then we must recollect that knowledge has made considerable strides since Chartres Cathedral was built. We may feel quite sure that neither the architects nor the master masons could have passed the most elementary examination in physiology, so their work is clearly debasing and sensuous, too. Besides, gargoyles are shown not to exist. And as to painting—well, here "Non-Musical" allows his æsthetic prejudices to land him in mere decadence. He must know quite well that Turner's work does not make a purely rational appeal, that Botticelli's paintings contain representations of beings whose existence Hæckel could not allow for a moment. It is, of course, possible, that "Non-Musical" means by the "pictorial" art the beautiful drawings of engines which may be seen in certain technical papers. We hope it is so, for it would be a pity to view so powerful an intelligence degraded by sensuous and unworthy physical commotions.

"How pleasant to know Mr. Lear!" We used to think so, but we are not now at all sure that we wish to know more of him than his inimitable nonsense rhymes and his "limericks." Apparently he had a habit of indulging in a crude and, to us, unappreciable kind of fun, without regard to time or circumstance. The specimens which we have seen quoted by our contemporaries have on our nerves the same sort of effect as an inquiry made in our presence by one friend of another for his wife, when we know that he has just divorced her for eloping with the groom. It is most disappointing to find that so charming a writer made such a terrible and tiresome fool of himself in private. We can only pretend that his letters are spurious. Of course, his original "limericks," those included under the rubric, "There was an old Derry-down-derry," were almost all of the two-rhyme sort. We remember very few which had the third rhyme, which was a later improvement of his.

THE BRIDE'S WELCOME

(County Donegal.)

What, did you say, was my sister sayin' ?
 "No luck comes where the eyes are green."

Take that folly an' turn it strayin',
 Green is the luckiest colour seen.

Isn't grass green for the eyes to rest in?
 Arn't the trees of the same sweet hue?
 Mind you this, when she starts her jestin',
I'd love you less if your eyes were blue.

What was my little brother shoutin' ?
 "Hair that 'ud match our red cow's tail."
 I'll be with him an' stop his floutin'
 With a kind little word from the tip of a flail.
 You, with your hair where the sunshine ranges,
 Like the autumn light on the beechen track.
 Is it me would be wantin' changes?
I'd love you less if your hair was black.

What was my poor old mother croakin' ?
 "Never a cow and hens but few."
 Widows, Cushla, is sore provokin',
 Tis often all that they've left to do.
 She, with her lame back, there at her knittin',
 Angry with pain, and sad to be old—
 Mind you this, when she starts her twittin':
I'd love you less were you hung with gold.

ALICE FLEMING.

NIGHT AND DAY

When the grey night comes drifting o'er the sea,
 The melancholy sea that will not sleep,
 And the moist wind is sad with ghosts of flowers,
 Dear, do you think of me?

Alas! . . . But when the birds wake, and anew
 Dawn weaves her coronal of rosy hours,
 Pale from the vigil that remorse must keep,
 I think and think of you.

I am the image of night, expressionless;
 Haunted by mocking ghosts and hateful dreams;
 Heavy with anguish of distracted thought;

But you —O you are like the dawn that gleams
 On men who wander in a wilderness;
 Guiding their wounded feet to holy streams,
 And gilding the fair city that they sought.

ST. JOHN LUCAS.

LITERATURE

AN ELEGANT APHORIST

The Comments of Bagshot. Edited by J. A. SPENDER.
 (Constable, 3s. 6d.)

LONG ago Mr. Balfour raised the question of witchcraft. He did so quite incidentally, as an illustration, if one remembers rightly, of an argument; he was discussing, perhaps, the valid reasons of belief and disbelief, and pointing out, as an obiter dictum, that we had no earthly grounds for disbelieving in the existence of sorcery and sorcerers. One forgets whether he noted the usual (and quite illogical) suppressed reason for disbelief in such things—"I have lived in Park Lane—or Whitechapel—for the last twenty years, and I have never seen an undoubted case of sorcery." Such an argument as this, it is clear, will never do; it proves nothing, it establishes not even a probable reason for disbelief: and the question is whether there are not a great many propositions of universal acceptance among "rational" people which have no better grounds of justification.

For example, here is the admirable Bagshot as edited by Mr. J. A. Spender, recording the following aphorism in his notebook:

The weaknesses commonly attributed to democracy by the pessimists are mostly weaknesses inherent in collective action of any kind—oligarchic, aristocratic, or democratic. They could be avoided only by absolutism, which is impossible in modern States.

Why impossible? Because the Daily Mail and the Daily Telegraph and the Times would never stand it? But then, under an absolutism, these admirable journals, as they now are, would no longer exist. And then, on the next page, one reads this "motto for Cabinets"—Twenty wise men may easily add up into one fool. The old arguments against democracy were never more tersely put; though the sentence recalls a passage in an antique writer, a passage which marvels over the fact that while the mob is a raging and devouring beast, each of its component parts is a rational human being, a creature made in the image of God. And, again, in this most entertaining and excellent book one comes across dicta as to modern politicians—dicta which assume, more or less, the fact that politicians are humbugs. Bagshot, it is true, tells them that they could get on very well without being humbugs: still one may almost gather from these various places the probable conclusion that "collective action"—i.e., politics—is a corrupt and insincere tomfoolery, and that the only safe way is absolutism—which, for some unassigned reason, is declared to be impossible.

Let us not be misunderstood. It may well be that there never were witches, that absolutism is impossible, that (to cite another passage) the speculations of the schoolmen and alchemists were "fantastic": but the excellent and philosophic Bagshot should have given us reasons. Alchemy, for example: how is it "fantastic"? Diamonds have been made by art: why not gold? Bagshot, in this instance, is certainly positing the standpoint of Bacon, but one gathers that he takes the statement as his own. But surely alchemy is by no means fantastic when one thinks of the latest hypotheses in science, regarding all matter as diverse manifestations of one force—one may note with advantage the curious approximation to the "fluid" universe of Law. And our Bagshot should not have been ignorant of the Symbolic Theory of Alchemy, according to which the physical transmutation is a mere image of the interior and spiritual transmutation possible to men—or to a few men. As for St. Thomas Aquinas and the schoolmen—well, if Bacon really thought of alchemy in the abstract and of the scholastic philosophy as mad whimsies, is there much ground for doubting that Bacon, on these points, was an ass?

But the fact is that Bagshot must have reconsidered these matters. If Mr. Spender will look more closely, we are convinced that he will find these questions summed up in a final and satisfying form. For Bagshot is, in most things, a most admirable guide. Take this:

The worst spectacle in politics is that of everybody doing what everybody disapproves in the hope of pleasing somebody else who doesn't exist. This fictitious being is commonly called "the man in the street."

And again:

Second-rate minds are apt to be confirmed in their inferiority by education. This is why a liberal education so often results in illiberal opinions.

And more excellently still:

A large number of scholars are men of science gone astray, and many editions of classical authors are but chemical analyses of their component parts, from which the element of literature is excluded. It is for this reason, amongst others, that a classical education so often fails to impart a literary sense.

It would be difficult to put more admirably the case against "education" as a pill remedy for all the ills of the world. The "green tree," Bagshot seems to point out, of a truly liberal education has often produced pedants, bores, and churls: what are we to expect from the poor "substitutes" which the Board School has to offer? If the Odyssey will not make a man a gentleman, how vain to expect much from the Seventh Standard Reader.

One wishes the clergy would make themselves familiar with the wisdom of Bagshot:

What curious instinct is it (he asks) which has led the Christian world to describe the "ages of faith" as the "Dark Ages"? Last Sunday I heard a preacher exhort his congregation to return to the Christianity of the "first six centuries," and within five minutes he was speaking of a large part of this period as the "Dark Ages."

Mr. Spender, the editor of these papers, says that Bagshot was a kindhearted and charitable man. So much is evident from the passage quoted; he is good enough to speak of flatulent hypocrisy as a "curious instinct." We, who have not the good temper and the sweet charity of Bagshot, know all about that preacher—who is certainly no creature of the imagination. The "first six centuries" is a catchword of a few years ago, a catchword invented by a person who was utterly ignorant of its implications, who was void of information concerning the celebration of the Divine Liturgy in Jerusalem c. 400. But the phrase had a popular sound and so it "caught on": the standard of the first six centuries became a test of safe, moderate churchmanship. The "Dark Ages"? Well; there were no motor-cars in the sixth century; and it is by such tests that the ordinary cleric judges the light and dark of the soul.

We are convinced that Mr. Spender has not exhausted his material. There is, we are certain, an interior cabinet which he has not yet explored. Bagshot has said so many excellent things that there must be things more excellent still hidden and occult:

Thoughts are chords, and words are single notes—for which reason music so often expresses thought more profoundly than speech. Perhaps in another world there will be a kind of orchestrated literature combining the two—a speech of many parts all blending into one immensely enriched meaning.

He who knows these things is initiated in the mysteries; he knows the true sense of the words κόγξ ὄνραξ.

ALMOST A GREAT MAN

Sir George Grey, Pioneer of Empire in Southern Lands. By GEO. C. HENDERSON, M.A., Professor of History at Adelaide University. (London: Dent. New York: Dutton and Co., 12s. 6d. net.)

THE strenuous Colonial statesman buried in St. Paul's some ten years ago was one of those men who just missed greatness by reason of certain personal defects. His ideas were large and by no means ill-conceived, he had the strength and courage of a lion, and he was animated by a deep sense of duty to his country and to humanity. But he had the temper of an autocrat and a sensitiveness to criticism which went far towards paralysing his usefulness as a public man. His present biographer goes so far as to assert that he was "totally unfitted both by nature and training for playing an important part in constitutional government"; and we do not think this at all an exaggerated affirmation. Yet Australia probably owes more to Grey than to any single individual except, possibly, Parkes; South Africa to-day acclaims him as the prophet of the coming Federation; whilst in New Zealand, the scene of his worst mistakes, the dominant policy goes back past the late popular idol, Dick Seddon, and finds in Grey its true source and origin.

Mr. Henderson's biography is an able piece of work, clear, discriminating, judicial. An Oxford scholar holding a chair in an Australian university, his outlook is Imperial rather than Colonial, and he delivers himself of no shibboleths. He has had access to, and has made good use of, Grey's private papers and correspondence, and has treated, in due proportion, his services in Australia, South Africa, and New Zealand, setting forth his merits with generous appreciation, but expressing candidly and without reservation his view that he erred gravely on not a few occasions.

The only part of the book, indeed, to which we feel inclined to take any exception is the introduction, some of which seems to us superfluous, or at any rate misplaced. That the cry "Government by the people for the people" goes back to the days of Edward I. seems a somewhat hazardous statement; and that the advent of the Labour Party in England (which may or may not be a benefit) is "a striking example of the influence of Colonial politics" is at least open to question. There is, too, an absurd pomposity about such a phrase as "raised to the rank of lieutenant." Further on in the book Mr. Henderson's English editor should not have allowed "Earl Carnarvon," "the Parliament" and a few similar inaccuracies to appear.

A signal example of the unnecessary comma appears in the sentence (p. 98): "Edward Gibbon Wakefield is reported to have said that the company was founded by men with great souls and little pockets, and fell into the hands of men with great pockets and little souls"; the sentence, as it stands, seems to refer to an awful accident having befallen the author of the famous system of colonisation.

Sir George Grey belonged to the family of Lord Stamford (the Greys of Groby) and was therefore of aristocratic extraction. Like his father, who fell at Badajoz, he had also been a soldier. These two facts go some way towards accounting for the masterful temperament which made Grey's enemies represent his democratic views as insincere. The supposed inconsistency is easily shown by Mr. Henderson to be baseless. Nothing can be more certain than the lifelong devotion of Grey to democratic ideals, except his equal devotion to the cause of the British Empire. He was that somewhat rare creature, a Radical Imperialist. The most consistent of Home Rulers, he extended the principle, not only to the four provinces of Ireland, but also to Scotland, Wales, and separate areas of England. But the spirit of his scheme was Imperialistic, not provincial; there was nothing peddling about this man's politics. His belief in self-government and popular education were, however, unlimited, and carried him to the length of proposing to the Federal Convention of 1891 that the Governor-General of the proposed Australasian Commonwealth should be elected by the people. The ex-Governor of New Zealand proved too Radical for the Radicals of England in 1870, though he was charged (quite unfairly) with having hindered the cause of self-government in the Colony. Whether to-day he would find anyone to agree with his view that fiscal differences need be no bar to Imperial Federation may be a subject for speculation.

Sir George Grey (who must not be confounded with his contemporary, the popular Whig Home Secretary, who was for a few months his namesake's superior at the Colonial Office) is chiefly remembered by the man in the street to-day for his action in diverting to India, on his own responsibility, the troops that were going to China in 1857. This was a good and fortunate action for the Empire; but as regards the High Commissioner's own career it may be looked upon as a doubtful symptom. Hitherto, as Governor of South Australia and New Zealand, as well as in South Africa, Grey had won signal success in organising young colonies and conciliating native races. But his success was the success of a pioneer statesman with practically a free hand. After the Indian Mutiny, he, in the words of his present biographer, "was more and more disposed to act as though he were the head and centre of the Empire; and that led to a conflict between him and his superior officers which left them no alternative but to demonstrate in the clearest manner that in the last resort his will must yield to theirs." And therefore, despite Mr. Froude and others, we are inclined to agree with Mr. Henderson that "it is still possible to believe that Downing Street was amply justified in paying high tribute to his services in 1867, and—finally dispensing with his services."

The biographer accumulates instances of the great Proconsul's insubordination. "The important dispatch which Earl Grey wrote advising the maintenance of the authority of the Maori chiefs was not even acknowledged; the conditions for the settlement of the Anglo-German Legion in South Africa were ignored; repeated orders to effect a reduction in the Kaffrarian expenditure were not complied with; and in order to get settlers for the South-East he entered into a contract with a private firm at Hamburg to send out German families, when he knew that the Imperial authorities had decided against it; the preparation of a scheme for the federation of South Africa was recommended to the Cape Parliament, though the Colonial Secretary had advised him to take no step without first consulting Her Majesty's Government." Grey's method was this: "Instead of carrying out instructions that were distasteful, he would express some anxiety lest he had not fully explained the situation and signified his intention of awaiting the Colonial Secretary's reply to his more elaborate explanation. In the days prior to the introduction of steamboats this gave him a respite of twelve or even eighteen months."

But so great was the appreciation felt, and often expressed, by the Imperial authorities for his services that no sooner had Sir George Grey been recalled from South Africa than he was sent back to serve for a second time as Governor of New Zealand. Here, in the face of immense difficulties, he failed on the whole, and at the expiration of his term of office was not again employed. He practically defied the Colonial Office, and at the same time came to loggerheads with his own Legislature. Mr. Henderson, while coming to an adverse decision, sets forth fully the very difficult part the Governor had to play, and exposes the unfairness of much of the criticism to which he was exposed. While condemning unsparingly his subsequent conduct towards the Imperial authorities, and admitting his failure as a New Zealand parliamentarian, he shows that Grey's ultimate influence in the politics of the Colony was paramount.

But whilst the fascination of contemplating the spectacle of a conflict between circumstance and temperament has led us to dwell upon Grey's difficulties and failures, it must not be supposed that there was not a decided balance in his favour, taking his long life as a whole. It was he who saved the struggling settlement of South Australia from abandonment and made it a model colony; it was he who first laid down a just but firm policy towards the natives, both of New Zealand and South Africa; and it may be maintained with more than a show of reason that, had his policy been accepted, the two Boer wars might never have been necessary. Moreover, he was no slave to materialism, as are so many Colonial statesmen; he had imagination enough to value the treasures of the old world, though he thought so many of its traditions pernicious. His political work covered a wider field than that of Sir Henry Parkes or Cecil Rhodes; and his book on Polynesian Mythology is a legacy of a kind that neither of his fellow-men of action left behind them.

THE BIBLE AS LITERATURE

The Literary Man's Bible. A selection of passages from the Old Testament. Arranged, with introductory essays and annotations, by W. L. COURTNEY, M.A., LL.D. (Chapman and Hall, 10s. 6d. net.)

IN his preface Mr. Courtney shows himself fully alive to certain obvious objections that can be brought against the compilation of a biblical anthology for "the literary man." He shows his wisdom in thus anticipating, and in some measure disarming, his critics, for, in truth, we can imagine nothing more provocative of criticism than the title of the volume. It may be true, as Mr. Courtney seems to suggest, that the religious view of the Bible has so completely overshadowed its literary aspect that many "thoughtful men are not able to appreciate, or have ceased to appreciate, its unparalleled value." By "thoughtful men," we suppose Mr. Courtney to mean those who reject the crudely stated doctrine of actual literal and verbal inspiration. Some, it may well be, who oppose or are indifferent to Christianity never read the Bible, and so are likely to remain ever blind to its beauty as literature. But we are inclined to doubt if they are likely to read it any more because they have the selections from the text presented to them in ordinary print and binding, with notes and comments by Mr. Courtney. If, however, we misinterpret Mr. Courtney's meaning if he intends to imply that to regard the Bible as "the Word of God" is to lessen one's capacity for appreciating its literary aspect, we deprecate and repudiate the suggestion. The religious man is more likely to have his sensibility to its literary beauty quickened, rather than deadened, by his belief. And does Mr. Courtney forget the number of people to whom the Bible is "literature," the numbers to whom it is the only book of literary value they ever read. It is not rare to come across people in every class of life steeped in Bible phraseology. To them "the Good Book" has been the most active instrument in their lives, opening up a new world of thought and sensation. It has served—as great literature does serve—to withdraw their thoughts from the mere machinery of life, and to fix them, with appropriate emotions, on the great and universal things that matter. But it is not for these that Mr. Courtney has compiled his book. And, as for "the literary man" (we dislike the term as much as does the editor)—well, he must read the Bible, and, reading it, presumably would prefer to select for himself the passages of supreme literary value. It is impossible, surely, to conceive that anyone whose care is literature does not read the Bible, and read it constantly. There will be well-thumbed passages in every "literary man's" Bible, pages where the volume opens of itself, so often have they been conned. And to the Bible will he turn as a sort of sanctuary—a place of refuge where he is secure from the hideous and screeching vulgarities of so many of the books of to-day. In its sober, sonorous sentences, in its gorgeous jewelled passages, or in its quiet, tranquil chapters, he will find for himself both solace and inspiration. And in his Bible he requires no introductory essays, or historical section, or index, or division of the book into (1) The Prophets, (2) Poetic Section, (3) Wisdom Literature. From the text alone he prefers to select what appeals most to his literary sense.

It may be that we are wrong. It may be that in this age of anthologies there are thousands of "literary men" who have long been secretly pining to have a Bible specially prepared for them. If a "literary man's Bible" had to be, we would as lief that Mr. Courtney compiled it as any other man. He had taste, discrimination, and knowledge. He has included in his selections nothing that is not "literature."

SIR HENRY WOTTON

The Life and Letters of Sir Henry Wotton. By LOGAN PEARSALL SMITH. In Two Volumes. (Oxford: The Clarendon Press, 25s. net.)

IN these two volumes Mr. Logan Pearsall Smith has made a comprehensive and scholarly contribution to the European history of the early seventeenth century. He appears to have spared himself no pains in the amassing of material—contemporary documents. State papers and modern histories have all been laid impartially under contribution; over five hundred of Wotton's letters have been included; and, finally, in a series of appendices, a considerable amount of information invaluable to the historical student has been collected. The result is a memoir which, for sheer industry and thoroughness of research, can successfully challenge comparison with any similar work in our literature.

To the majority of modern readers Wotton is little more than a name. He is remembered, if at all, as the writer of a few lyrics, one of which has found its way into every anthology of love poems that has been compiled within recent years. In his own day, however, he played many parts, all of them with grace and distinction. He was, as Mr. Pearsall Smith has reminded us, "a noble example of that much maligned class, the 'Italinat' Englishman." He embodied in his person the finest culture of the Renaissance and of the succeeding period. An accomplished Greek scholar, a poet of no mean order, an enthusiastic bibliophile and art-collector, he was the friend and correspondent of Casaubon, of Donne, and, at a later day, of Milton. It was, however, chiefly as a man of affairs that he was known to his contemporaries. His life was one long series of strange and startling vicissitudes. He moved in an atmosphere of plot and counter-plot, of treachery, cunning, dissimulation and intrigue. His experiences did not tend to raise his opinion of human nature, and a thinly-veiled cynicism is the dominant note in many of his letters to the great personages of the English court. He never scrupled, when it suited his purpose, to make use of knaves, whom he found "almost as necessary as honest men." He had, it must be confessed, much to justify him in such a belief, and the wonder rather is that he retained through all his surprising adventures and disillusionments so much faith and simplicity.

We see him in these pages ambassador in Holland and in Vienna; journeying to Scotland, in the disguise of an Italian nobleman, to warn James VI. of a plot to assassinate that monarch's life; serving with Essex in Ireland; angrily remonstrating with the Doge at Venice on the question of anchorage taxes; attempting to establish a form of Protestantism within the confines of the Venetian Republic; negotiating a marriage between Prince Henry of England and the Infanta of Savoy; involved in domestic broils; one moment the pet of a fickle sovereign, the next in disgrace, and summoned back to England.

Perhaps the most interesting section of this biography is that devoted to Wotton's ill-starred attempt to introduce an alien form of religion into Venice. The incident has received but scant attention from most historians, and Mr. Pearsall Smith, who has dealt with it at considerable length, deserves the warmest thanks of his readers. The facts, briefly stated, are as follows: Shortly after Wotton's arrival in Venice he found the Republic in a state of seething agitation at the high-handed action of the Papacy. The moment seemed opportune to strike a blow for Protestantism, and Wotton confidently anticipated the co-operation of James I., who had been thrown into a state of nervous trepidation by the discovery in England of the Gunpowder Plot. In Venice itself he had the unobtrusive aid and advice of Paolo Sarpi, a Servite friar of liberal tendencies. Sarpi, however, was too cautious a statesman to sanction any violent scheme of religious reform. "He seemeth," wrote Wotton to Salisbury, "as in countenance so in spirit, liker to Philip Melancthon than to Luther, and peradventure a fitter instrument to overthrow the falsehood by degrees than on a sudden; which accordeth with a frequent saying of his own, that in these operations non bisogna far salti." But Sarpi's hatred of the Papacy carried him a considerable way with Wotton, and his position as theological counsellor to the Republic invested his action in the matter with an unique degree of importance. The settlement of the dispute between Venice and the Papacy did not serve to diminish Wotton's ardour, and preparations for the formation of a Protestant league went on apace. Works on controversial theology were distributed and eagerly read by the nobility of Venice, and at length Wotton, acting on the advice of Sarpi and Fulgenzio, sent to Geneva for a Protestant pastor. The movement, however, which, as Mr. Pearsall Smith says, "depended on the political condition of Europe for its success," was destined to be abortive. It was, indeed, so far as Venice was concerned, rather anti-Papal than anti-Catholic, nor does it seem at all probable that Wotton's dream of converting the Republic into a Protestant State could ever have been realised, even under the most favourable conditions. It is strange nevertheless, that such an enterprise should have received so little attention from historians of the period. As Mr. Pearsall Smith truly says: "It is of interest on account of the personalities involved, and the political forces and the currents of thought it brought into relief and opposition. As a counter-attack on the Papacy in the midst of the Catholic reaction, conducted by members of the English Church, it deserves a place in the history of Anglicanism."

The closing years of Wotton's life are characterised by a certain sober charm. "Arrived near those years which lie in the suburbs of oblivion," the aged diplomatist was free to cultivate unmolested those interests which were, in truth, never far from his thoughts. For in the midst of his busiest activities he preserved an admirable detachment of mind.

He is the first of that bookish, contemplative class of authors, men like Cowley, Marvell, Gray, Cowper, Charles Lamb and Edward Fitzgerald, whose names lend a rare distinction, and whose writings gave a certain fragrance to English literature.

We like to think of him as wandering among the bookstalls of Venice, engaged in scholastic disputations with his friend, Casaubon, or angling with Izaak Walton by quiet waters. He was always pre-eminently a man of letters, and he shared that devotion to the phrase which is one of the distinguishing qualities of the literary genius. He defined an ambassador as "an honest man sent to lie abroad for the good of his country," and he paid dearly for the pun. On another occasion he wrote: "The itch of disputation will prove the scab of the Church (Disputandi pruritus fit ecclesiarum scabies), and, with pardonable vanity, he had the epigram engraved upon his tombstone. Throughout life he had been a faithful son and servant of the English Church, and he died within her fold, in deacon's orders. He was forgotten by the children of those whom he had served so loyally, and a modest request to Charles I. that he might be given the Mastership of the Savoy met with no response. He was not, it would appear, without his interior consolations:

How happy is he born and taught,
That serveth not another's will;
Whose armour is his honest thought,
And simple truth his utmost skill. . .

Who envies none that chance doth raise,
Nor vice; who never understood
How deepest wounds are given by praise;
Nor rules of state, but rules of good;

Who hath his life from rumours freed;
Whose conscience is his strong retreat;
Whose state can neither flatterers feed,
Nor ruin make oppressors great;

Who God doth late and early pray
More of his grace than gifts to lend;
And entertains the harmless day
With a religious book, or friend!

This man is freed from servile bands
Of hope to rise, or fear to fall;
Lord of himself, though not of lands,
And having nothing, yet hath all.

In these lines one recognises the lineaments of a noble spirit, whom disappointment might sadden, but could not subdue.

Of Mr. Pearsall Smith's labours, as embodied in these volumes, it is impossible to speak except in terms of the highest praise, and we owe him thanks for the publication of so many of Wotton's letters. In an age when the art of letter-writing was held in some esteem, these letters and despatches, by virtue of their fluent and graceful style, occupy an unchallenged supremacy. To the student of history their value is of the utmost importance. They throw an interesting sidelight on the domestic and diplomatic history of Europe in the opening decades of the seventeenth century, and, in Mr. Pearsall Smith's words, "they give an intimate picture of an English ambassador's life in the time of Shakespeare."

"THE FINAL ATOM-DANCE"

Lucretius, Epicurean and Poet. By JOHN MASSON, LL.D. (London: Murray, 1907.)

THE delightful and inspiring side of the genius of Lucretius is what Statius calls his "soaring frenzy," furor arduus Lucreti, the solemn dignity of the imagery and the language which illustrate and express his scabrous speculations. He worships his master Epicurus. "He was a god," he cries, "a very god." It is his delight to watch through quiet nights, expounding the great truths of Epicurus, and to rehearse them in his dreams when sleep overtakes him. One must not, he urges, be dismayed by the novelty of his speculations. How the firmament itself would paralyse us if suddenly presented to us!

Look up at the bright and unsullied hue of heaven and the stars which it holds within it, and the moon and the sun's light of dazzling brilliancy: if all these things were now for the first time presented to mortals, what could be named that could be more marvellous? [Here and elsewhere we avail ourselves of the vigorous prose translation of Munro.]

Enthusiasm, even when it takes the form of despair, is the keynote of the sombre and majestic poem.

But the book before us has comparatively little to say about the form of the six books, "De Rerum Natura." It deals almost wholly with the Epicurean, not the Poet. It is largely an amplification of a former volume by Dr. Masson, "The Atomic Theory of Lucretius" (1884). He truly remarks that the "De Rerum Natura" is the only book dealing primarily with Science which still remains a poem. Tennyson, a profound admirer and intelligent student of the poet, as his "Lucretius" shows, might have achieved a similar feat. He has shown on a small scale in his "Two Voices" a similar faculty for

Shutting reasons up in rhyme
Or Heliconian honey in living words.

To speak of a work on science as a poem might seem paradoxical. But one might venture on a greater paradox, and say that the work of the Roman atheist—for atheist he was, though he did provide a place in his system for extramundane beings whom he calls gods—is a religious poem. Elizabeth Barrett Browning has shown a keen insight into the mind of this high priest of irreligion, who rails against religion yet betrays a profoundly devout spirit:

Lucretius—nobler than his mood:
Who dropp'd his plummet down the broad,
Deep universe, and said "No God,"
Finding no bottom: he denied
Divinely the divine, and died
Chief poet on the Tiber-side,
By Grace of God! His face is stern,
As one compell'd, in spite of scorn,
To teach a truth he could not learn.

For most readers the grand roll of the hexameters, and the solemn music of the poet's digressions on the ironies of life, "the boast of heraldry, the pomp of power," will constitute nine-tenths of the pleasure to be derived from the work. But students of Dr. Masson's volume will see how deeply interesting it is to compare the Epicurean of the Roman Republic with the thinkers of the last three centuries from Gassendi to Clifford and Herbert Spencer. Dr. Masson writes:

Modern speculations regarding Evolution and the origin of Life, and in particular the famous controversy between Tyndall and Martineau regarding the "Potency of Matter," furnish a parallel which enables us to realise more clearly how Lucretius's Atomic Theory led him to a new conception of Nature as a self-working power, and how it developed into a naive theory of evolution.

The theory of the potency of matter, which is closely related to Prof. Clifford's theory of mind-stuff, is a corollary from the Declination (clinamen) of Atoms, which is called by M. Guyau the central and most original doctrine of Epicureanism, as implying a power of spontaneity or modified free-will action residing in all forms of matter, and by its working producing what we call chance. We are certainly often struck by an appearance of malignity in inanimate things, which may not, after all, prove a mere fancy. Dr. Masson is very interesting in the chapters setting forth the debt of science to Lucretius. This includes no less than modern chemistry, which is founded on the Atomic Theory of Democritus, developed by Epicurus, preserved for us by the Latin poet, and revived by Gassendi in the seventeenth century.

According to Lucretius, law exists everywhere in Nature. There is nothing but atoms and void. The atoms are of many different but a finite number of shapes. They are inconceivably minute, yet have parts. In applying to this theory the data of modern speculation Dr. Masson observes:

Sir Wm. Thompson says that if a drop of water could be magnified to the size of our globe, the molecules composing it would appear to be of a size varying from that of shot to that of billiard-balls. According to Clerk-Maxwell about two million molecules of hydrogen placed in a row would occupy $\frac{1}{33}$ of an inch, and a million million million million of them would weigh something more or less than 70 grains troy.

Again, exactly to the same effect as Lucretius I. 628-634, Clerk-Maxwell says:

We do not assert that there is an absolute limit to the divisibility of matter: what we assert is that, after we have divided a body into a certain finite number of constituent parts called molecules, then any further division of these molecules will deprive them of the properties which give rise to the phenomena observed in the substance.

Balfour Stewart, too, almost in the very words of Lucretius, writes:

A simple elementary atom is a truly immortal being, and enjoys the privilege of remaining unaltered and essentially unaffected by the powerful blows that can be dealt against it.

This at once brings to our minds the discovery of radium and the statement one often meets that it involves the downfall of the atomic theory. In answer to a question how far is the atomic theory affected by the discovery of radium, the distinguished chemist, Professor F. R. Japp, holds that, if we could stop at the radio-active elements, the atomic theory would not be maintainable. But we cannot stop there, and he sums up thus:

To chemists and physicists the essence of the atomic theory does not lie in the unchangeableness of the atoms, but in the fact that the phenomena dealt with by chemistry and physics can only be interpreted satisfactorily on the assumption that matter consists of discrete particles—that it is discontinuous. No chemist or physicist of standing that I have heard of suggests that these recent discoveries involve the abandonment of the atomic theory. We have only to go a little further down for our ultimate particles. At present they are the electrons—if there is anything ultimate in science. So far from the atomic theory being abolished, I consider that Crookes's spinthariscopes, which show the individual flashes of light produced when each α -particle (helium atom) is shot off from a small quantity of radium and impinges on a phosphorescent screen, does the same thing for the atomic theory that Foucault's pendulum experiment has done for the rotation of the earth.

But our space will not permit us to go deeper into the science of the book. Our readers will have already seen how thoroughly the author attacks scientific problems. We commend especially to their attention Chapter X. on Atomic Declination and Free Will. The clinamen is really the headstone in the corner of the whole structure. Nothing else can deliver the mind of man from necessity.

As to religion, though Lucretius fiercely assails it, he is far outdone by the reckless and biassed virulence of some modern writers. Dr. Masson quotes the following from the late Prof. Clifford:

If we once admit that physical causes are not continuous, but that there is some break, then we leave the way open for the doctrine of a destiny or a Providence outside of us, overruling human efforts, and guiding history to a foregone conclusion. I think that, if it is right to call any doctrine immoral, it is right so to call this doctrine, when we remember how often it has paralysed the efforts of those who were climbing honestly up the hill-side towards the light and the right, and how often it has nerved the sacrilegious arm of the fanatic or the adventurer who was conspiring against society.

Chapter I. on the times of Lucretius is very readable and instructive, and one can see that the writer is an ardent admirer of the genius of the poet, though he does not say much about it. But we must protest against his very unsound critical method in dealing with the celebrated judgment of Cicero on the poem of Lucretius. No critic should be rash enough to change the logical quality of a proposition as it stands in the MSS., unless that proposition is demonstrably an impossible one, and unless he can show how it came to stand in that form in the MSS. The passage runs thus, as handed down to us by the MSS.:

Lucreti poemata ut scribis ita sunt, multis luminibus ingenii multae tamen artis.

The criticism of his brother with which Cicero expresses his agreement is that Lucretius had not only much of the genius of Ennius and Attius, but also much of the art of the new school of poetry, which might seem incompatible with that genius. Now, whether genuine afflatus and minute perfection of execution are incompatible is a question which may be argued. To us it appears that they are not. Tennyson and Milton (not to bring in Shakespeare) have both. But even now some deny genius to Tennyson because of his perfect art. The criticism, whether true or false, is perfectly possible and intelligible. What is the verdict of Dr. Masson?

In the MSS. a "not" is clearly wanting which must be supplied before either "genius" or "art."

Those who believe in that way of dealing with ancient tradition would undermine the study of classical literature. What should we think of a hardened realist who should "emend" a modern text of Shakespeare and make Prospero say:

We're not such stuff
As dreams are made on?

R. Y. TYRRELL.

THE COMEDY OF ERRORS

The Comedy of Errors. Edited by HENRY CUNNINGHAM. "The Arden Shakespeare." (Methuen and Co., 2s. 6d. net.)

A LARGE octavo, clearly printed, with margins wide enough for making notes in, and light enough to hold without fatigue, is a very pleasant and useful form in which to publish the Shakespearean plays; and if they are all as carefully edited and fully annotated as this one is, they should prove a very popular series. At the same time, it is allowable to suggest that the notes have here and there a tendency to over-fulness. If it be a fault, it is certainly on the right side; and the inclusion of the whole text of Warner's translation of "Menaechmi," as an appendix, is so welcome that it seems hard to make any complaint. But there is too much mere "dictionary" in the footnotes, and such notes, for instance, as those on pp. 26-28 might well be curtailed.

The really interesting question about The Comedy of Errors is, did Shakespeare read "Plautus" in the original Latin? And into this Mr. Cunningham goes boldly in his preface. We say boldly, because no one but the boldest would go flatly against so redoubtable an authority as Professor Churton Collins, who claims, in his "Studies in Shakespeare," to have demonstrated that "in the Latin original he certainly read 'Plautus.'" It is an interesting challenge, for fully as we agree with the bulk of Mr. Collins's conclusions in this essay, there is certainly room to doubt this particular demonstration. "He must have read the original," is what he says, "as no English translations, so far as we know, existed at the time." To this Mr. Cunningham replies by quoting the printer's preface to Warner's translation:

The writer hereof (loving Readers) having divers of this Poet's Comedies Englished, for the use and delight of his private friends, who in Plautus' own words are not able to understand them, I have prevailed so far with him as to let this one go farther abroad for a public recreation.

This was printed in 1595, while the earliest date assigned to The Errors is 1589, the general opinion being that 1591-2 is more probable. In 1594 it was specially performed at Gray's Inn.

So far, the honours would seem to be with Mr. Cunningham, for whether we regard the young Shakespeare as an illiterate genius or a trained classical scholar, nothing is more likely than that Warner's translations should have found their way into his hands, busy as we know he was at the theatre adapting and producing plays. But Mr. Cunningham sadly weakens his case by quoting fifteen "parallels" between Shakespeare and Warner, which, he says, "may be considered with much reason to have been in Shakespeare's mind when engaged on the composition of The Errors." It is hardly too much to say that if any weight is to be attached to these, then Mrs. Pott may be triumphantly acclaimed as having established the Baconian authorship beyond question.

A stronger point in Mr. Cunningham's favour is that Shakespeare turns Plautus's "Epidamnus"—as does Warner—into "Epidamnum." At first sight this seems conclusive. That Warner, translating from Plautus, should make the mistake is curious enough; but that Shakespeare should do so too is inexplicable. But it must be remembered that while Warner's translation was in print as early as 1595, The Errors did not see the light until 1623, and we have no history of the MS.—evidently a very faulty one—from which it was printed; and during the twenty years in which it was knocking about, and sometimes being acted, it is quite possible that Heminge and Condell thought "Epidamnum" was correct, and altered it. Again, there is a very significant clue in the fact that the two Antipholi, in the first two acts, are called Sereptus and Erotes, respectively. The latter is inexplicable, but the former must surely be a reminiscence of Subreptus, or Surreptus, as the first Menaechmus is called by Plautus—but not by Warner.

In the text there is nothing to decide the question; and the fact probably is that, whether Shakespeare was a classical scholar or not, he did not in this case consult either Plautus or Warner, but adapted the older play, A History of Error, much as he did The Taming of a Shrew; that is to say, he made an entirely new play out of an old one, disregarding the text altogether. This is, of course, assuming that the History of Error was an adaptation of Menaechmi; but even if it were not, it is more likely that some old version existed which Shakespeare treated in the way he was accustomed to at that period of his development, than that he went direct to Plautus, either in Latin or English, without leaving more traces than are pointed out by Mr. Cunningham.

A word must be said about Mr. Cunningham's conjectural emendations. One or two of these are certainly happy, and will probably stand; for, sacred as the first Folio may be, there is no doubt that in the case of an early play, such as this, making its first appearance in the Folio, there is room for emendation. But in another case Mr. Cunningham's zeal seems to have strangely blinded him—viz., in Act I., sc. 1, l. 61, where the introduction of the words "but scarce" is not only not "essential to the construction following," but is actually forbidden by the words "any" and "but longer" in the following lines.

THE GENESIS OF HELLENIC CULTURE

The Palaces of Crete and Their Builders. By ANGELO MOSSO. Illustrated. (Fisher Unwin, 21s.)

DR. MOSSO'S contribution to the literature of Cretan discoveries has an outstanding merit which has undoubtedly influenced his method of treatment; "The Palaces of Crete" contains incidentally one of the most sympathetic appeals for the recognition of the human element that we ever remember to have seen advanced in the name of archæology. The theory that intellect alone should be tolerated in prehistoric treasure diggings has so long been responsible for confining archæology within esoteric bounds, and for driving rusty nails in the coffin of culture, that we must extend a warm welcome to the work of a scholarly author who recognises that it is the specialist's business to spread and stimulate culture, not to corner it. "Crete has been fortunate in its excavators," remarked Professor Burrows in his own recently published account of the discoveries in that island, another book on the subject, whose aim was to come within the reach not only of classical scholars, but of the general cultured public; doubtless it is largely owing to the fact that Crete has been fortunate in its excavators that it has also been singularly fortunate in its writers. But "it is not enough to be a writer to describe excavations," says Dr. Mosso; "the soul must rise and vibrate in the highest realms of science and feel the impulse to clear away the darkness which veils the unknown. The heart rather than the intellect must palpitate with the fever of research—the sacred fire which intoxicates until the mind attains to the revelation of an almost superhuman dream, in which the secrets of history are seen beneath the earth. The writer who could reproduce these emotions in the poetic surroundings of the Hellenic landscape would find a new and inexhaustible spring of poetry, for our inner life becomes more intense in the presence of the origins of our civilisation." And where are we to look for the ideal writer? The director of the new International Laboratories at Col d'Olen on Monte Rosa points neither to the laboratory nor to the study; here is his testimony as a liberal-minded guide:

The most intense excitement which I have ever felt is that of excavating. An artist [the italics are ours] who is overcome by this passion should describe the surroundings in which archæological researches are being made, should reproduce from life the anxiety of the first attempts, describe the technique of the pits and trenches and the coming to light of the documents which speak when history is silent. If the artist and the archæologist could transmit to the reader the enthusiasm and excitement which he feels while standing among the labourers when the pick gives a hollow sound and the ground echoes as a presage of new discoveries, if he could show the hands which tremble as they grope in the earth, or timidly pass over the fragments of a work of art to remove the coating of dust which hides it, if he could explain the hidden power of excavation to exalt the mind, and the insistent, almost childish call on fortune to grant new treasures, he would write not a book, but a romance, a drama of the human soul which seeks the unknown.

Dr. Mosso has only written a book, but at least that book proves that he is a sympathetic student of human nature as well as an eminent anthropologist, that he has a keen appreciation of the beautiful transcending an intellectual interest in the history of art, and that he can transmit feeling in addition to imparting knowledge.

Leaving the question of archæology's call to the artist-collaborator we must now readjust the scales, and come without prejudice to a consideration of Dr. Mosso's survey of Cretan discoveries. He has jotted down observations and expressed opinions in such a way that 323 out of his 342 pages constitute a traveller's note-book; the few remaining pages are devoted to a scientific essay, with the avowed object of proving that Mediterranean civilisation was not derived from the Indo-Germanic race. The scholar, as the enthusiastic prey of the diverse interests of a cultured amateur archæologist, is a very different writer from the anthropological specialist with whom we are brought into contact in the last chapter of this book. We are forced to the conclusion that the first and larger section of the work was written with a purpose in a style born of the artistic instinct, but for fear that purpose should have escaped the reader, the second all-purpose section was added. Dr. Mosso prepared us in his preface for this dual method of letting evidence speak for itself and afterwards speaking for it; it is as a tribute to his way of presenting that evidence that we confess the last chapter came upon us as a surprise, in spite of the introductory warning that was responsible for the initial difficulty in making up our minds whether to begin with the first chapter or the last. Reminded of our doubt on this point, we quote the author's advice and add our own:

I hope to convince the reader that primitive Mediterranean civilisation did not originate with the Indo-Germans, and I advise him to begin with the last chapter that he may see at once the conclusions to which I have come. If, however, he has faith and patience it will be better for him to follow the order in which I have arranged the evidence and related my impressions of travel.

Speaking from experience we should say that this is certainly one of the books which "should immediately be read twice," the first time from Chapter I. onwards, whilst the starting point of the second reading should be a reperusal of the final chapter.

A first reading on the lines suggested will make no demands on either the faith or the patience of those who have already followed step by step the discoveries in Crete, but for the many who were waiting till quite lately to become familiar with the work through the medium of a summary, Dr. Mosso's book will, we should think, be a little confusing at the outset, owing to the use of the terms Minoan and Mycenæan. "Minoan" being a comparatively new artistic adjective, and one that has been the subject of heated discussion, would it not have been better to have begun with the note, which now occupies page 130, explaining its use and that of the more familiar term "Mycenæan"? And, again, will not the general public, to whom Dr. Mosso makes a point of addressing himself, feel the need of a map of Crete in such a book? And, yet again, does not Dr. Mosso presume on faith when he speaks of fixing dates with certainty by the aid of Egyptian evidence of the XIIth Dynasty, without pointing out that the actual date of that Dynasty is the subject of yet another heated discussion? But, such details apart, this first reading will certainly be fraught with much enjoyment, for whether he discourses on prehistoric art, religion, society, or domesticity the author treats the Cretan discoveries as a vital part of a living past rather than as relics of a dead civilisation, whilst the numerous excellent illustrations add to the interest and testify to the value of the text.

In the second reading, beginning with the conclusion and going back to check conclusions, we are called upon to decide how far Dr. Mosso has proved his case in connecting up a past and its future with the present, in linking Crete and Greece, in identifying Minoan with Hellenic culture. Briefly stated, that case is a plea for the abolition of the Aryan race theory, and the substitution of a belief that European civilisation was an entirely South to North movement; as its learned counsel justly remarks, "the problem of race is apt to become a burning question," but he might have added with greater justice that the whole problem he aims at solving is the subject of many burning questions, and with still greater justice he might have brought forward more fully other theories that have been advanced on other evidence for a counter North to South movement. On all sides, however, the evidence is more or less incomplete, and even if it be felt that Dr. Mosso has proved his case to-day there still remains the fascination of speculating on what to-morrow's discovery will reveal.

MIRABEAU

MIRABEAU, the Demi-God! This is Mr. Trowbridge's apotheosis of him. Mirabeau, the gasbag; Mirabeau, the heartless humbug, the flamboyant fraud; Mirabeau, the physical and moral degenerate from half a dozen bandit breeds, Florentine and French; Mirabeau, the

Mirabeau, the Demi-God. By W. R. H. TROWBRIDGE. (London: T. Fisher Unwin.)

Marseillais, swindler, spadassin, confidence trickster, mari complaisant, egregious fool, police spy; Mirabeau, the mischievous farceur, who transformed what was at its outset an admirably progressive and humane movement into a sanguinary harlequinade; Mirabeau, the Whole Hog—surely this is the true Mirabeau!

Mr. Trowbridge, who has evidently felt the somewhat meretricious charm of M. Gaston Lenôtre's clever stories of the French Revolution, in which historical sobriety of statement is subordinated to picturesque anecdote, very honestly presents his biography of Mirabeau under the guise of a romance. It is, however, only a modified romance. Even the conversations are ostensibly based upon phrases of genuine correspondence between the persons concerned. And if it were not for Mr. Trowbridge's inclination to present his hero as a true hero, one might congratulate him upon having produced a very telling picture of Mirabeau, and contributed to vulgarise in English one of the most shocking passages of French history. He takes Mirabeau at his birth, describes the loathing which his hateful old father had for him—a prophetic kind of instinctive repulsion which did credit to an otherwise detestable character—he describes his school days, leads us through the miasmic maze of his married life, shows us Mirabeau in exile in Holland, in prison in Vincennes, and is in a measure his apologist throughout all the "smart and dirty" adventures of which his chequered existence was composed, until this aristocratic Robert Macaire and broken-down Lovelace, finally resolving upon the rôle of political Judas which he is to play to the end of the chapter, hammers for admittance to the Tiers Etat, where he had no right, and thus steps upon the most blazingly lit-up of all stages.

It has recently been announced that M. Sardou is about to produce a play dealing with Mirabeau which is specially destined for the English public. It will be curious to see whether this master of melodramatic stagecraft will be able to make his hero comprehensible to the English intelligence. English writers on the French Revolution have hitherto misunderstood and misrepresented Mirabeau because they have not sufficiently studied the Meridional French character. The men of the North have discussed the men of the South without bearing in mind, or being perhaps ignorant of, the essential distinctions which divide the mentality of Northern Europe from that of the Midi of France. This is a mistake which no Frenchman would make. And no serious student of French literature need fall into such an error, for with "Numa Roumestan" before him, to mention one out of many analyses of the Meridional character with which French fiction supplies us, he may be sufficiently edified on the topic. "Honour," shrieked Carlyle, on his topmost note, "to the strong man, in these ages, who has shaken himself loose of shams and is something. For in the way of being worthy, the first condition surely is that one be. Let Cant cease, at all risks and at all costs: till Cant cease nothing else can begin. Of human criminals in these centuries," writes the moralist, "I find but one unforgivable—the Quack." Yet if Carlyle had not been so eminently a man of the North, and a good deal of a Quack himself, he must have perceived that Mirabeau never opened his lips but to cant, and in the matter of quackery could have given points to Cagliostro and beaten him. Mirabeau was, if not the actual inventor, at least one of the most blatant exponents of that dreadful semi-humanitarian, semi-political cant which for more than a century has been the curse of French public life. It has invariably been from the Midi, the Southern and Mediterranean districts of France, that these cyclones of cant have come, spreading devastation and desolation in their path. From Mirabeau to Gambetta is but a step; but it is a giant stride of Death across a vast plain of French history strewn to its glimmering horizon with the whitening bones and crumbling skulls of the innumerable fools who have been sacrificed to the national fetish of Gab. There is, perhaps, no more pathetic monument to the decline of France than that egregious statue of Gambetta in the Place du Carrousel, spouting, with its mouth wide open and its arm waving in the air, amidst the silent stones of the deserted Louvre. From the day that the French Revolution started to the present day France has been in constant danger of talking herself to death. The baneful orators whose irrepressible gab has helped towards her dismemberment, after losing her the hegemony of Europe, are to be counted in scores. One of the first and most mischievous was undoubtedly Mirabeau. In the long tale of sanguinary mystifications of which French history since the end of the eighteenth century has been largely composed no one deserves a higher pedestal than he in the temple of Humbug. But while there have been mischievous "rhéteurs" galore, who were neither insincere nor wilfully dishonest, Mirabeau was frankly dishonest. In every important phase of his private and public life he appears as a traitor. His final act was to sell the cause of the people, to play Judas to the political Messiah of his own creating. His own father, who probably knew him best, would never listen to any of the apologies for his son which friends and relatives might, in their kindly weakness, put forward. He knew Gabriel to be an unmitigated rascal, a complete villain. He would have killed him had he been able. He did his best to accomplish this aim, and it is certainly a pity that he did not succeed. He had made up his mind to destroy him just as one would a mad dog. He knew the Midi too well to be taken in by his son's Meridional gush, and was constantly warning other people against its fatal influence. In one of the most characteristic passages of his correspondence on the subject of his son, he writes to his brother, the Bailli de Mirabeau: "The romance with which he perfumes himself from top to toe appears to have affected your judgment. If you trust him he will mould you to his liking. Let me advise you to beware of the gilded bill of your tame canary." Thus is the simple-minded old country gentleman warned, of whom, by the way, Mr. Trowbridge says: "Very Riqueti of very Riqueti, the Bailli might be described as the revers de medaille of his brother." Even Carlyle's English is preferable to this. But "the romance with which he perfumes himself from top to toe"—what an admirable description of the particular Meridional type to which Mirabeau belonged, showing how thoroughly well the Marquis knew and appreciated his Midi! Perhaps the best character which could be written of Mirabeau would be obtained by piecing together these scattered remarks about him which appear in his father's letters. The old man was himself of the Midi; indeed, as Frenchmen jocularly put it, of Midi et demi, of Marseille (by origin), of the Marseille of the Marseillaise, and there is a grim irony in this old man's fate to have conceived a Socialistic theory embodied in his nonsensical "Friend of Men," and then to have engendered Mirabeau the Monster, and Mirabeau the Tun; by the one to have let loose the wind which was to sweep away the class he was trying to reform, and in the other to have symbolised the wine-barrel in which its survivors might, and very generally did, seek consolation. Old Mirabeau, with his preposterous economical theories, leavened by his gigantic egoism, is a ridiculous figure enough, but he had a native nobility of temperament and motive which contrasts him sharply with his son. "There are dregs in every race," the old man is credited by Mr. Trowbridge with having said to his son, "and you are the dregs of the Riquettis." No doubt the father was right. Historians make a mistake when they decline to accept a positive judgment such as this pronounced by one who was better situated to know than anybody else. "But whoever will, with sympathy, which is the first essential toward insight," says the excellent Carlyle, "look at this questionable Mirabeau may find that there lay verily in him, as the basis of all, a Sincerity, great free Earnestness," . . . and so forth. Why look for sincerity in a born liar, for Earnestness (with a capital E) in this putrid gasbag? Just as there is a type of elephant called the rogue elephant which sane elephants ruthlessly and very properly destroy at sight, so there are rogue men and rogue women. Woe to those who have listened to their blandishments, to their lachrymose appeals to the highest human principles, who have extended the slightest sympathy to their fraudulent whinings and specious lies. Danger and death lie that way. History should brand the rogue man for what he really is, and Mirabeau not as a demi-god, pace Carlyle and with apologies to Mr. Trowbridge, but as the rogue man, the consummate swine. To express the slightest sympathy with such beings is an act of lèse-humanity. In one of his volumes on Socialism, M. Jaurès deplores the pecuniary difficulties which, in his opinion, forced Mirabeau to be a traitor to his principles. Poor demi-god! And who knows but that Judas owed exactly thirty pieces of silver to his blanchisseuse!

Mr. Trowbridge will have it that Mirabeau's life was a romance. Romance or sordid tale of villainy, there was a Balzacian epilogue to it which has only recently been revealed. In "La Comtesse de Mirabeau," by Dauphin and Leloir, just published by Perrin et Cie, we learn from hitherto unpublished documents that this curious woman, "widow of the most illustrious Gabriel Honore de Riqueti," married after Mirabeau's death a Sardinian officer, named De la Rocca, who died from falling out of a cab. Then the ex-Madame de Mirabeau installed herself on the first floor of the Hotel de Mirabeau in the Rue de Seine, which belonged to her sister-in-law, paying 154 francs a month for full board and lodging. Forgetting all the outrageous conduct of her worthless first husband towards her, she surrounded herself with portraits and souvenirs of him. She convinced herself that she had always loved the man to whom she had been cynically unfaithful. She defended his memory at a time when his name was held in universal execration, and finally died at the age of forty-eight in Mirabeau's room and in his bed.

ROWLAND STRONG.

RICHARD VERSTEGAN

THE earliest writer on the subject of English etymology was Richard Verstegan. In the Dictionary of National Biography the name is spelt Verstegen. But I prefer the spelling which I find in the volume which I shall presently discuss; it occurs at the end of the Dedication to James I., at the end of the "Epistle to our English Nation," and again in the Commendatory Verses contributed by friends; twelve times in all, and always spelt with a.

We are told that his grandfather was a Dutchman, named Theodore Roland Verstegen; but his father lived in England, following the trade of a cooper, and adopting the surname of Rowlands. Young Richard Rowlands was sent to Christ Church, Oxford, to study, where he imbibed a love for letters. Only a few years previously Archbishop Parker had been endeavouring, and with some success, to revive in England the study of Anglo-Saxon. Already, between the years 1566 and 1570, two editions had been issued of Ælfric's sermon on the Paschal Lamb; which was followed, in 1568, by William Lambarde's selections from the Anglo-Saxon Laws; by the important edition by John Foxe, the martyrologist, in 1571, of the Anglo-Saxon Gospels; by the publication, in 1574, of Asser's "Life of King Alfred," including the Anglo-Saxon text of the Preface to the King's translation of Pope Gregory's "Pastoral Care"; and by Lambarde's "Perambulation of Kent," printed in 1576, which also contained a few specimens of our oldest Southern English. Rowlands was attracted by some of these publications, and professed a great admiration for the study of Anglo-Saxon. He did not, however, long remain in England, as we find him living at Antwerp in 1588, where he doubtless became more or less acquainted with his grandfather's native tongue. The result was his publication at Antwerp, in 1605, of the once celebrated work by which he is best known, entitled "Restitution of Decayed Intelligence in Antiquities concerning the most Noble and Renowned English Nation. By the Study and Travel of R.V." Later editions appeared in 1628, 1634, 1659, and 1673. I have only access to the last of these, which contains some obvious misprints.

It will be seen that Rowlands (or as he here calls himself, Verstegan) had a quite unique opportunity. Had he been in the least degree careful and accurate, he might have poured a flood of light on the study of English. But it is impossible, after a careful study of his work, to be blind to the inevitable conclusion that he did immensely more harm than good, as he never hesitates to mislead his readers of set purpose, if he can only impress them with a respect for his own learning. The very natural remark, in the "Dictionary of National Biography," that the work "exhibits his knowledge of Anglo-Saxon," turns out to be lamentably far from the fact. One could, of course, pardon in him any number of small inaccuracies; but it is difficult not to resent the confident effrontery with which he thrusts upon us results which he must have known to be wholly unfounded guesses. It is difficult to believe that he had any accurate knowledge; he certainly had not the scholar's instinct.

Take the remark:—

I find the name of our Lord Jesus to be in our ancient English translated Hælende, that is to say, Saviour or Salvator.

If he had read as far as the fourth chapter of St. Matthew, he would have found that the right form was Hælend, occurring seven times, and that Hælende, with e, expresses the dative case. This sets us on our guard at once, though it refers to a nicety which was no doubt then considered as being of little account.

It is much more serious when he delivers himself of a guess as if it were a downright and undisputed fact. I give an example.

Speaking of "our Saxon ancestors," he says:—

They used to engrave upon certain squared sticks about a foot in length, or shorter or longer as they pleased, the courses of the Moone of the whole year, whereby they could certainly tell when the New Moons, Full Moons, and changes should happen, as also their Festival daies; and such a carved stick they called Al mon aght, that is to say, Al-mon-heed, to wit, the regard or observation of all the Moons; and hence is derived the name of Almanack.

It is obvious that this is deliberately and inexcusably false. Of course, they never called it anything of the kind; but it is the author's ingenious way of insinuating an etymology which he had made up for himself. Such a compound is wholly impossible in English; and, in order to compose it, he has used "aght" to express the German and Dutch "acht," care, heed; a substantive which the English did not so employ. What one resents is such a statement as "they called," as if it could quite easily be verified.

This discovery is followed up by an explanation of the Anglo-Saxon names of the months, which, as a matter of fact, he did not know. He actually substitutes for them names which are partly taken from Dutch or Flemish, or else invented for the purpose. The following is a specimen:—

They called February "Sprout-kele," by "kele" meaning the kele-wurt which we now call the cole-wurt, the greatest pot-wurt in time long past that our ancestors used, and the broth made therewith was thereof also called kele [!]. . . . it was the first herb that in this month began to yeeld out wholsom young sprouts, and consequently gave thereunto the name of Sprout-kele.

It is all invention. This precious Sprout-kele is merely a made-up term, to give a supposed origin for the Dutch name for February, which is Sprokkelmaand or "Sprokkel" month. The "kele" to which he refers is (as we find in the Oxford Dictionary) a bad Southern English spelling of "kale" or "kail," for which the true Southern form is "cole"; all unoriginal forms, from the Latin "caulis." No doubt "sprout" is a native word, but Verstegan did not find it in Anglo-Saxon, because it has not yet been found even at the present day. As a fact, the Anglo-Saxon name for February was something quite different—viz., "sol-monath," which is discussed in Toller's Dictionary. And as for "sprokkel," the older spelling was "sporkel," which cannot be explained by cabbage-sprouts.

Towards the end of the book there is a valueless and confused alphabetical list of "Saxon" words, some taken from the Gospels, some from Dutch, and some so grotesquely spelt as to be neither reasonable English nor reasonable Dutch. A few notes occur, some of which are curious enough. Thus, under A, we find:—

And-warp [meaning Antwerp], anciently Hand-warpe, took that name, as is said, of hands being there cut off, and cast into the River of Skeld.

Under C, he gives a form which is not Anglo-Saxon, but modern English dialect:—

Clough, a kind of breach down along the side of a hill.

This relapse into common sense and matter of fact is only momentary. Would that he had mentioned hundreds of such words! But I fear it stands almost alone; though the next page yields "culver, a pigeon."

Under D is an example of Verstegan at his worst:

Dugud [he means A. S. duguth] or Dought, virtue; we yet sometimes call a man of strength and valour a doughty man. [True enough, except that Dought is an invention; but mark the sequel.] It is also written Thugud [it never was]; whereof they use in some parts of England the word thewhes or thewes, to wit, virtues, good qualities, or parts of the mind.

The false spelling "thewhes," which never occurs, is ingenious; in order to let us down gently, from g to w, we are allowed an intermediate but imaginary wh.

There is some hope that the book is practically dead; but it must not be forgotten that it had a most unfortunate influence, and showed such antiquaries as were more anxious to parade their learning than to arrive at truth how easy it was to have their own way by the simple process of manufacturing such forms as might be required.

Before taking leave of Verstegan, let us learn something from him. It is remarkable that he gives in full the story of the Pied Piper of Hamelin. He dates it for us near the end of Chapter III.:

And this great wonder happened on the 22 day of Julv. in the year of our Lord 1376.

WALTER W. SKEAT.

VENEREMUR

THE Socialists assert that they are creating "a new heaven and a new earth." It is a progressive age; and a progressive heaven would, doubtless, be home-like to many of us. Still, to some old-fashioned spirits this Socialist phrase "a new heaven" gives pause. The Socialist new earth is a thing imaginable. A well drained, well ventilated, well washed, thoroughly inspected community, fed from co-operative stores, and "educated" on text-books; a community in which everyone is as good and no better than his neighbour is quite conceivably the new earth of Socialism. But what is the new heaven which is to be attained by an equal distribution of those material goods which a man was anciently supposed to leave behind him when the tenure of his years expired? What does Socialism offer a man when he has done with his "crust of clay," when the co-operative stores and nationalised land of a new earth slip from his sight?

Chance recently took me into a district where some relief from the conditions of our twentieth century earth was certainly needed. And in that district I stumbled on the heaven, the domus aurea, of a percentage of those grey toilers. It was not a new heaven. It was entirely unprogressive. To the maker of new heavens (who happened to be actively engaged in his manufacture that very evening not two streets away) it is an obsolete curiosity of the human museum. It has nothing whatever to do with the individual's equal shares of tea, leisure, and land. But it had, as it appeared to me, an onlooker, everything to do with what is perhaps a matter of even greater importance, the individual's common and indestructible happiness. This is what I saw.

Firstly, grey mud, grey asphalt, grey houses, and a slant grey rain beating across the sodden street. It was a long street of small tightly-curtained windows, the main artery whence diverge hundreds of lesser streets, as the lesser nerves branch from the central stem; and each of these lesser nerves is alive, and each very often aching with one common pain, the pain of poverty. For in that vast network of streets rent day dominates the week; sloopshops and second-hand furniture dealers thrust their poor wares out on to the dirty pavement; and the pawnbrokers' windows are filled with the itinerant household gods of a population never far from disaster.

As you go down that main artery the surrounding miles of struggling humanity take shape as one vast restless organism; a creature with flashes of noisy joy in its cheap excursions; with, to quote the jangle of a poet of many peoples, the Depth and the thickness

Of sorrow and sickness always quite close to its daily round, and with an everlasting greyness for its physical world; greyness of dark, wet asphalt this day of mild south-wester, greyness of foul, hot, dust-covered asphalt under August suns, a shivering greyness of icy pools and gutters when winter is pitiless.

Out of this great grey sea, this fluctuating multitude of toilers, ever shifting, ever the same, I stepped into the porch of a quite outrageously cheerful, red-brick building, attracted thither by gleams of that crimson, for which the eye unconsciously aches in those streets of monotone. The crimson flashed hither and thither behind the glass doors; it was Sunday evening, and, idly curious, I entered. Within opened the nave of a bare, clean, spacious church, the seats of smooth, well-wrought oak, the walls of a light red brick, unstained as yet by the smoke of the great city. The far-off altar alone shone with any attempt at decorative beauty, gleaming with many coloured marbles, and heavily enriched with gold. The flitting crimson flashes resolved into the broad shoulder-scarfs, worn as an officer wears his sword sash, of surpliced choir-boys, preparing it would seem, for some immediate ceremonial. What, I wondered, was to happen that dull wet Sunday evening in that dull grey district? A few working women were already seated, not without premonitory whisperings, in front of me; and every few minutes came the patter of busy little feet, as tiny children, each carrying a large paper parcel, and more or less in charge of an elder, came up the aisle, and vanished through a side door. Slowly the congregation gathered. Old working men and women in Sunday best, if the one family umbrella had lost its handle; solemn-eyed three-year-olds, in frocks too starched to admit of sitting down even edgewise; young men and women in the full spring of life; and, to epitomise the whole, wriggling on the seat in front of me, the very imp of street mischief, an imp who presently pulled out of his velveteen breast pocket the dirtiest possible wisp of a pocket handkerchief, and proceeded to apply it with the conscious flourish of a Beau Brummel. A stir in the church, crowded now to the doors, and the rows of vacant seats in front are filled with a mass of the clearest snow white, as two by two, from the sacristy door, come perhaps a hundred girls, the tiniest not five years old, all alike dressed and veiled in white. The veils thrown over the little heads are mostly clear muslin, but one dark-haired mite is covered by a bit of spotted window blind, surely the effort of some poor home to do its best in honour of "sacred mysteries," venerated through all the squalor of its struggles. The organ sounds, and the people kneel as the choir boys, crimson-sashed for the festival, enter, followed by a tall, spare young priest, a figure knit up with energy, alert in body and in mind. Still kneeling, the people join with the priest in that most human, perhaps, of all music, the music of many voices, caught for once into unison. A five minutes' sermon, instinct with the vitality of the preacher, and the ceremonial of the day begins. Lamps flash out down the long aisles, for the cloudy evening light is fading. A lad, carrying aloft a crucifix, followed by two others with great lighted and flower-wreathed candles, advances slowly, from the foot of the altar steps, down the nave; and behind, two by two, from the tiniest solemn child of four, to girls on the brink of womanhood, all the white figures, with little white gloved hands folded, and some with white flower chaplets beneath their veils, move down the long church, the red-robed choir boys and the gold-vested young priest closing the procession. As they move on they sing hymns known to all, the whole congregation taking up the familiar words. Down the nave, up the aisle, past the High Altar, "illustrious with light," down the further aisle, back again up the nave, go the children, one long river of shining white, flowing among the grey kneeling lines of the working folk. Now they are singing the Stella Maris:

Ave Maria, the night-shades are falling,
Softly our voices rise unto thee.
Lost in the darkness, by stormy winds driven,
Shine on our pathway, fair Star of the Sea.

The voices of the people rise full and deep, and the tiniest of the children sing beneath their white veils, for who is there here who does not know "The Star of the Sea":

Softly thy spirit upon us is stealing,
Sinless and beautiful, Star of the Sea.

An old man, kneeling in front of me, with silvered hair, and rough overcoat, has some trick of the head, some outline of the figure at prayer, that involuntarily sweeps the mind back for one moment to the lovely canvases of the old Italian masters; and yet it is the twentieth century, and the hoot of the motor and the cry of the Sunday coster come in at the open door from the streets of this our London.

The procession is over, the children are in their places, filling their seats with a cloud of innocent white, the priest goes up to the altar, and the people remain kneeling as the organ bids them join in the hymn of the Salutaris Hostia, in preface to the customary Sunday evening Benediction. No cockney twang, no street-bred stridency of voice, mars the beauty of the deep-toned Latin, sung by these working people with a familiarity born of knowledge from far-off childhood, and with a depth of feeling that perhaps is sometimes lacking in the costliest choir music. For this church is the church of the poor, and here it is the many voices of the toilers, kneeling in sombre lines from the altar steps to the western door, that sing the well-known words of these, some surely of the most beautiful, if the briefest, hymns of any liturgy. The ringing of the altar bell precedes the deep silence of the Benediction. The last chant of the Adoremus is sung. And then choir boys and priest file out; one by one the altar lights are extinguished, and the people rise and step out into their square miles of rain-sodden asphalt streets. Their heaven has been as closely present to them, to recur to the words of the Latin hymn scarce off their lips, as are the foes of misery and sickness, despair and sin, which, as they have sung, press round them on every side:

Bella praeiungunt hostilia,
Da robur, fer auxilium.

At the next street corner, in an open space, across which the slant rain drives, the new heaven and new earth are being dispensed. Their outward and visible sign is an unwieldy van, adorned with gigantic letters spelling out "Liberty, Fraternity, Landlordism, Capital." Outside the van an orator shouts himself hoarse as, in angry tones, he addresses his listeners. The van is a Clarion Van, and the preacher and his audience are accounting themselves to be in the forefront of progress. To them a kneeling people is a mediæval anachronism; to them one man is as good as another; their New Earth is an equal apportionment of bread and brains; their New Heaven is, presumably, an equal attainment of social virtues. But to some of us, who doubt whether man can preserve happiness on bread and brains alone, it may seem well that the poor, struggling in the thick of our monstrous cities, enclosed in the grey world of their mean streets, emmeshed in the day's toil for the week's food, should believe themselves to kneel at the open gate of a heaven not of their own making, and having nothing whatever to do with the equal or unequal distribution of the goods of this world. G. M. GODDEN.

THE NATIVE FICTION OF CHINA

RECENT criticism of the supposed evil effects resulting from the translation into Chinese vernacular of sensational European literature naturally directs attention to the quality and characteristics of native fiction, a subject in itself full of interest to the student of national mentalities.

Considering the great length of time over which accessible Chinese literature extends, observers are generally much impressed by the fact that hardly more than 20,000 volumes of this description can be accounted familiar even to the scholarly classes of the Celestial Empire, while not a tenth of that number are known to the ordinary reading public. Of these "novels" the earliest extant were written about the twelfth century. Now, seeing that the great Chinese revival of letters took place under the Han dynasty (B.C. 206—A.D. 25), and bearing in mind that the extreme reverence of the native for any script makes for the preservation of everything actually committed to paper, this absence of early fiction has perplexed the critic. More especially is this the case in that Japan, a far less literary country, affords existing examples of a fictional character dating at least two hundred years earlier, such, for instance, as the famous "Pillow Sketches," a record of contemporary court intrigue, largely scandalous, and no doubt partly imaginary, written by a Japanese lady about the year 1000.

The explanation of the deficiency is perhaps twofold. In the first place, the literati, sole authority on all matters intellectual, whose dicta are and have always been accepted by the rest of the nations as final and irrefutable in things literary, despise fiction as unworthy script, far beneath the criticism of a man of letters, and condemn its authors as "recorders of small talk," an expression of contempt much more scathing than the nearest Western equivalent "penny-a-liner."

Secondly, imagination is not a distinguishing quality of the Chinese mind.

Whether these are the sole causes of the small output of fiction is doubtful; a consideration of the nature of such novels as do circulate will reveal a factor perhaps more determining than either of the above.

Judged by Western standards the native story is on the whole yet more deficient in quality than in quantity. Inordinate length (the most famous Chinese novel, the "San Kwo Chih Yen," is in 24 volumes), the lack of coherence, the superabundance of dreary aphorisms and detailed moralising, and an elaboration of minutiae, incredible if not noted at first hand, combine to make the social or domestic novel intolerably dull, while in stories of a ghostly or fabulous nature—a common form—absence of vraisemblance deprives the mysterious of its normal attractions.

These qualities being in measure characteristic of Chinese mentality the novelist whose work evinced no traces of them would, of necessity, be unrepresentative of his race.

But there is another and entirely external cause for the mediocre success of the native novel—assuming that criticism to be itself just, which is perhaps to assume too much.

The "Book" language does not lend itself to the writing of fiction; a statement perhaps not appreciable by the student familiar only with the adaptable qualities of European languages, but in this instance extremely germane to the just consideration of the subject. Prof. Douglas may be quoted in this connection:

"As a consequence of the very unplastic nature of the language there is wanting . . . that grace of diction and varying force of expression which are found in languages capable of inflection and of syntactical motion. The stiff angularity of the written language, composed as it is of isolated unassimilating characters, robs . . . works of fancy of half their power, but in no way interferes with the relation of facts, nor the statement of a philosophical argument. And hence . . . the poetical and fanciful works of Chinese authors offer fewer attractions than their writings on history, science, and philosophy."

It is to this inherent deficiency in "Book" Chinese, plus the hardly credible handicap to a novelist of being compelled to write in a language in which he never speaks, thinks, expresses, or hears others express emotions or passions, which is therefore in no true sense the vehicle of his personality, that the faults of the native novelist must be largely attributed. "Book" Chinese—the literary tongue is a very different language from that of ordinary speech—can only be acquired with much labour, and remains as unknown as any foreign language to a considerable proportion of the populace. When Kuanhua becomes first the sole colloquial of the Empire, and then the tongue common to both speech and writing, a tremendous development in the quality and convincing power of Chinese fiction may be confidently anticipated. The novelist will then write as he speaks and as he is accustomed to hear his fellows speak in all the varying moods of life, which at present are often inexpressible in "Book" Chinese. In love romances and fabulous or ghostly stories the Chinese writer for these various reasons falls considerably below the Japanese, but in respect both of the historical novel and the detective story the Chinese production stands easily first, at least in all the best-known examples of these two classes of fiction.

The "San Kwo Chih Yen," already mentioned, by Chin Shan or Kuan Chung, of which several translations exist under the title of the "History of the Three Kingdoms," is not only a thrilling narrative, but also affords one of the best sources of information on which scholars rely for knowledge of the stirring times of the later Han, beginning about or before 200 A.D.—a notable period of Chinese history.

The "Shui Hu Chuan" is another fine example of the historical novel, and deals with the doings of real brigands, prototypes of the modern Hunghutsze, who, for the safety of well-nigh impregnable marshes, for years terrorised an enormous area of Mid-China. Among others of this class may be remembered the quaint "Narrative of an Embassy," translated into English nearly a hundred years ago by Sir G. Staunton, a volume which concludes, oddly enough, with an abstract of the early part of the Yu-Kiao-Li (usually spelled Yu-Chiao Li), a love story of the tenth century. The explanation given by the translator for not completing his labour—the novel being comparatively short—is that the interest dies out after the initial volume! In his opinion, however, the worthy knight will not find himself in agreement with modern scholars. The plot has the very elementary but eternally recurring foundation of one man and two women. One of the young ladies is of skittish and most un-Chinese disposition, and ruffles it not infrequently as a man, in which guise, indeed, the hero first meets her. The unconventional charmer turns out to be a loved and lost relative of his first innamorata, and the complications are quite admirably sketched, the fact that the man is actually ardently in love at the same time with the two strongly contrasted types of femininity being treated as an incident as commonplace, as possibly it actually is; did not conventionality of thought no less than conventionality in action induce a truly unconscious self-deceit in such cases among Western communities?

The conclusion of the problem, probably foreseen by Chinese readers, comes as an interesting surprise to the foreigner. The hero marries both ladies, and all settle down to an ideally happy ménage à trois! The "Hung Lou Meng" or "Dream of the Red Chamber," is, by modern critics, placed alone in the front rank of Chinese fiction. As already stated, it extends to 24 volumes, and though the author is uncertain, the date is placed by native scholars in the seventeenth century. Considering its huge length the plot is well constructed and the characterisation skilful. Parts of it afford pleasant reading, and the whole presents aspects of Chinese social and domestic relations, and Chinese points of view on many debatable subjects, as these could never be extracted from any set volume of essays or ethics, or from many conversations with the frankest of natives.

"The Student's Daughter Revenged," in the collection of dramatic stories and plays called the Yuen-Jin-pe-Tchong, is a clever story of how a young woman out-manceuvred the villain, who, after various other ill-doings, succeeded in practically exiling her guardian on some distant mission of State in order that he might work his nefarious will on the unprotected girl refused to him in marriage. Finally there are the criminal romances, which, but for undue length, are often capably conceived and related. The two best examples of this class are the "Liao Chai Chih," written in 1679 ("Strange Tales from a Chinese Studio") and the "Chin-Ku-Chi Kuan" ("Marvellous Tales"), an earlier work, both now translated. From one of these collections comes the "Brass Nail Story," an excellent specimen, told with slight variations by several writers, and recently recounted at length in Sir C. Eliot's Eastern letters.

A magistrate being unable to determine the cause of death in a murder trial which he had to decide found himself, in default, in peril of execution by virtue of local law. In this dilemma his wife advised him to look under the root of the victim's pigtail. In that well-concealed spot the head of a nail revealed at once the fate that had overtaken the deceased. The widow was arrested, confessed her crime, and suffered the extreme penalty. But now the magistrate was torn by new emotions. Secretly he exhumed the body of his wife's first husband, examined the skull, and learned to his horror the excellent reason of the lady's sagacity in the late difficulty.

The rest of the story is given up to a skilful detailing of the conflict which proceeded in the unhappy man's mind between the claims of gratitude and marital affection on the one hand, and of personal fear and public duty on the other. Nor does the whimsical author think it needful to disclose how this mental struggle ended. Chinese readers, however, are confident that in suicide the problem found solution.

J. R. C.

THE LIBRARY TABLE

The Game Animals of India, Etc. By R. LYDDEKER.
(Rowland Ward.)

THIS is a reprint, with additions, in a much cheaper and handier form, of Mr. Lyddeker's splendid volume well known to all hunters of big game, "The Great and Small Game of India, Burmah, and Tibet." The principal item of addition in this reprint is the Malayan Peninsula, and since Burmah and Tibet are still included and fully discussed from the author's standpoint, it becomes apparent that the elastic "Etc." of his present title has a capacious range. What his standpoint is may be said shortly. Mr. Lyddeker is equally equipped as a naturalist and a sportsman. He has a knowledge hardly rivalled of the subjects and the countries which he touches. He writes in a clear, straightforward manner; he treats his large scheme with a perfect thoroughness, both as to discussion of the place in classification, and structural characters of the various animals, and also as to the means of approaching and hunting them. The scientific part is not so emphasised as to make the reading dry for those to whom this side of the subject makes no special appeal, and yet is sufficient for those to whom it does; and his general descriptions of the hunting and the scenes in which it is followed are lively enough to please the general reader. It is seldom, indeed, that a combination is found of so many of the requisite qualities for a work of the kind, and the result is a whole which seems as if it must be almost the final word—in the present state of our knowledge, at all events—on the big game of the wide areas covered by it. Each animal is treated in a chapter by itself. The clouded tiger and the snow leopard, for example, are not grouped together among "Tigers" or "Leopards" respectively, and dismissed with a few sentences merely; and the accounts of the smallest, as of the largest and most dangerous game animals, are fully adequate. In regard to illustrations, heads of all the animals discussed are shown, and shown with beautiful clearness. Besides these there are illustrations from photographs of some of the kinds stuffed and set up, the best-known specimens of each kind being taken when available, and there are many showing the live animals. The last have generally been taken from the creatures in captivity, but are none the less illustrative. It is difficult to criticise such a book, for just criticism has to fall into the strain of unmodified praise. It is hardly conceivable that any lover of big game shooting who does not already possess the more sumptuous edition will hesitate to possess this; and even those who have the larger will find the additions in the smaller, but more comprehensive, book worth their attention.

With Shelley in Italy. By ANNA BENNESON MCMAHAN. (Unwin, 5s. net.)

It would be easy to mock at this book as the patchwork compilation of pictures and extracts, which it might easily have been, and which most emphatically it is not. The spirit which pervades the whole book from cover to cover gives it unity and cohesion; and that spirit is the spirit of reverence. It is no pretentious volume hurried together to take the public eye by one who has much time to waste and a schwärmerei for Shelley. The object of the book is absolutely unpretentious, and to its execution have gone care, understanding, and skill. The object is simply to suggest in detail the Italian atmosphere in which the poems of the last four great years of his life were written. This has been done by means of well-made selections from his letters and note-books (which are far too little known), and of photographs. Never has photography been put to a better use. There are sixty-four photographs, and with a few exceptions all are admirably illustrative. Some of the pictures are quite extraordinary. They show not only the place, but the place under the very aspect which Shelley saw and described. For all lovers of Shelley we know that this book will contain at least an hour's unmitigated pleasure, and for those who are not well acquainted with Italy much delightful information.

Tales of Troy and Greece. ANDREW LANG. (Longmans, Green and Co., 4s. 6d. net.)

THE stories of the childhood of the world have become the storehouse of the childhood of to-day. Not for the first time does Mr. Andrew Lang now turn to the child's account his love and knowledge of Homeric themes. And in this book he has brought the real Homer nearer than ever to the modern child. Catches and turns of phrase that we know for Homer's, in their English guise, carried along in the swing and the swirl by the epic tide, though that tide be diverted into the vaguer channels of the prose; sudden appeals to the comparison of modern days and places, that set the picture for a modern child—or the older modern lover of a well-told story—Fairyland and Wonderland made real. These are the charm and the marvel of this story-book of Greece and Troy.

Not only so, but all the wealth of Mycenæ, Troy and Crete, of Melos and Orchomenos, is pressed into the service, though never for a moment does the archæologist overcome the teller of a tale. But we can imagine no happier schoolboy than he who, having become familiar with this book from cover to cover, for love of the story and its glittering colour, suddenly realises that in his Homer the tale is retold for him: surely the Greek must lose its terrors for that fortunate one.

The pictures, by H. J. Ford, are charming, but they do not help the story overmuch: perhaps they are too fairy-like for stories so real—stories of Ulysses, Sacker of Cities and Wanderer, of Jason, Theseus and Perseus. From whatever source, whether Chian, Alexandrian or Attic, Mr. Lang has drawn, the stream that he has drawn is one of pure delight.

The Book of Fair Women. By FEDERIGO LUIGINO OF UDINE. Translated by ELSIE M. LONG from the Venetian Edition of 1554. (Werner Laurie, 6s. net.)

THOSE were good days in which men, tired after a long day's hawking, drew their stools round the fire, and having quietly determined upon a subject to discuss, discussed it. Messer Federigo Luigino of Udine describes a conversation of such a party at which he dreamed he was present, after the literary fashion of the time, in this book which Miss Long has translated. She has done her work well. The original is gay with a gallant grace, and much of the grace and gaiety has been instilled into the translation.

This is Luigino's dream. He dreamed that Signor Giacomo, M. Pietro Arigone, the excellent Doctor della Fornace, Signor Vinciguerra, Signor Ladislao, and himself were conversing with such animation and mutual interest that Signor Giacomo cried out: "Fair sirs, if it so please you let us defer our argument for the present and I will carry you with me to my house at San Martino. . . ." There he proposed to spend three days in hawking, and to show them a falcon of such unexampled prowess that by its side Federiga degli Alberighi's bird would seem but a barn-door fowl. "The days we will devote to chasing the heron and the wild duck, and the nights thereof to sweet discourse on such matters as may best entertain and divert you. I pray you therefore, gentlemen, to bear me company and to bring with you hearts rightly attuned to gaiety." Who would wish to refuse such an invitation? Certainly not five gallant Venetian gentlemen. They immediately made ready and rode out to San Martino. They arrived before nightfall. They warmed themselves and supped with all imaginable cheerfulness; then, tired with the ride and anxious to get up very early in the morning, "we gaily addressed ourselves to repose, singing, some madrigals, others ballads, and others again sonnets, each of us extolling the lady whom he chiefly delighted to honour." Now it happened, as Luigino with delightful seriousness points out, that each gentleman averred in his song his lady to be the fairest of all women in the world. Not lightly did each man aver it, but with strong conviction, so that strife loomed amongst them, until Signor Pietro Arigone suggested that Luigino should act as arbiter in the contention. They were to fashion a peerless lady in their talk, and whoever of them should add most to the charms of this imaginary beauty, his lady and no other should be accepted by the company as the fairest woman in this world.

So they set themselves to their gallant task with such earnestness that the humour of the enterprise does not escape them, and the perfect lady slowly comes into being. First they decide the grace of her body and the several graces of her mind and character. Then Luigino praises the virtues of each man's lady, gives the award to the small daughter of their host, Signor Giacomo, and awakes suddenly from his dream.

It is a delicately conceived and delicately executed little work, full of charm and freshness. The form in which the book makes its present appearance is good, though it might have been improved by the omission of the design on the cover, and by the use of slightly smaller, more compact, type.

The Brahmans, Theists and Muslims of India. J. CAMPBELL OMAN. (Fisher Unwin, 14s. net.)

THIS is a strange book, and a striking one. It is not a book to dip into, to skip, or to read carelessly. At first, it seems chaotic, too "chatty," too loosely strung together to be thorough. But there emerges from it at length a human and forcible picture of the Indian religious welter, which is a gain to those who seek the real life of the mysterious East. Charlatanism and cheating, side by side with a religious fervour which enters into every act of daily life, a blind and child-like faith coupled with that strange and universal manifestation of human nature which can only be described as religious vanity—these are appreciated in a vast degree by Mr. Oman, whose point of view, though quite sufficiently detached for the purposes of sane criticism, is nevertheless far more sympathetic than that of the average of European writers on such subjects. Nor is there lacking the saving grace of humour, which lends its aid in the description of the National Congress of 1893 at Lahore. The whole series of chapters upon the Indian Social Reformers is admirably arranged, but the prevailing note is not hopeful, especially in reference to the custom of child-marriages. On the whole, there is perhaps a tendency in the author's mind to regard the Hindu with more sympathy than he can accord to the Muslim. The worship of Kali is treated with a noticeable absence of European prejudice, while the Muhammadan faquirs are, for the most part, regarded as rather impudent frauds. Mr. Oman has the gift of anecdote, and the little detached series of stories concerning faquirs and saints is well calculated to produce an impression of the immense gulf which separates Hindu and Muhammadan thought in India, though the author brings out very clearly the contamination of the Muhammadan point of view by the tremendous influence of Kali, who is also to be found installed as a great goddess even in the stronghold of Buddhism, Lhasa. It is not surprising that, among so many rivals, the natural outcome of varied race and climate, Christianity should have made so little headway in India. The book is one of great interest, for it bears the stamp of that first-hand knowledge with which Mr. Oman has already made us familiar in his previous works.

The Junto. By TERESA MERZ. With introduction by W. F. LORD, M.A. (Newcastle: Andrew Reid and Co., 3s. 6d. net.)

THIS little book was inspired by Mr. Frewen Lord, and it won the Gladstone Prize in 1903—we presume in the Durham College of Science, Newcastle. A somewhat epigrammatic introduction is contributed by the "onlie begetter," who is a great admirer of good Queen Anne, and considers St. John (Bolingbroke) "a great man." He also informs his readers that "it is not with law as it is with other pursuits," for "one either knows the law or one does not." We should say usually one does not. But to our task. "The Junto" is a very tolerable specimen of prize-winner. It claims to have neither novelty of fact or treatment; but it is clearly written, accurate, and equipped with references. It may be found useful by young students of the period. There are, however, one or two strictures to be passed before dismissing it with a blessing. The remarks upon the character of the age in which the members of the Junto lived are true, but misplaced. It is true that the time which saw the foundation of the Bank and the National Debt is interesting to study, because it saw "the real beginnings of our own age." But this should have been said at the outset, not casually dropped in the course of the biography of Halifax. That able financier and Lord Somers were the only two of the five who formed the Junto who have any claims to be considered great men. It was scarcely necessary for the author to mention (as she does in two places) the absurd attribution of the "Tale of a Tub" to Somers by a certain Mr. Cooksey, who wrote a life of the great lawyer. Swift's comparison of Steele and Addison to Somers and Halifax, and his remark that the characters of the two latter were well expressed in their mottoes (Prodesse pram conspici and Otium cum dignitate), are appositely cited; but, unfortunately, the last word of the first of the two mottoes twice appears as "loved, or had any good opinion of." The statement (p. 59) that "Somers retired from public life and continued one of the Opposition till Queen Anne's death" embodies a contradiction in terms. There seems nothing very surprising in Wharton's father having been "well-known as a staunch Calvinist, beside being an ardent Covenanter." The Dean of St. Patrick's for once hit off an opponent's career justly when he characterised that of the writer of "Lillibullero" as "wholly occupied by vice and politics"; and we would venture further than the prize-author, who cautiously avers that he was "probably somewhat correct." The sketches of Russell (Orford) and Sunderland call for no comment.

My Rock Garden. By REGINALD FARRER. (Edwin Arnold, 7s. 6d. net.)

ROCK-GARDENS have grown so greatly in popularity of late years, and literature of much account intimately concerning them is so scant that Mr. Farrer's book is certain of a considerable public. Every page will be eagerly read by the enthusiast for alpine plants (a chapter is devoted to making the garden), but "My Rock Garden" is in the main a plant catalogue, and although it is pleasantly written, it is very certain that the uninitiated would only be sadly bored by chapters upon subjects such as the Kabschia Saxifrages, and Papaveraceæ, Cruciferæ, and Dianthus. The extreme pleasure that the enthusiast finds in rock-gardening is somewhat of a mystery even to many people who are energetic flower-gardeners; but rock-gardens of imposing dimensions, constructed at great cost, are multiplying rapidly throughout the country, and, speaking from experience, we can warn the immune that every garden-lover is in some danger of taking up this delightful but expensive craze. Moreover, the inoculated are not always content to stay peacefully at home and cultivate their plants. There is even the danger that a perusal of "My Rock Garden" may eventually send the reader exploring the mountain ranges of the world collecting plants as its author does. Mr. Farrer is a welcome addition to the ranks of writers upon garden subjects; we have all too many garden books, but those which are the outcome of much knowledge commonly possess grave literary defects, while the authors of those which do not sin in this respect too often possess but an extremely superficial knowledge of gardening. The illustrations are reproduced from photographs, and are not particularly good.

FICTION

The Heart's Banishment. By ELLA MACMAHON. (Chapman and Hall, 6s.)

It has often been said that no book has ever been written which gives a true picture of Oxford life. The truth or falsity of this need not be discussed here; but this, at least, may be said, that in "The Heart's Banishment," although no single scene is laid in Oxford, Mrs. Macmahon has succeeded in reproducing to an astonishing degree that subtle, indefinable spirit or note which is the hall-mark of Oxford men. This is perhaps the chief interest in the book, and consequently it will probably not meet with such a success as might otherwise have been possible. For the story itself is scarcely convincing. Frederic Vane—country curate and successful playwright—is so self-contradictory that he becomes difficult of acceptance. As the former he is most ordinary, if a little above the average in conscientiousness; as the latter he is so extraordinary in his brilliance that he becomes quite another person. The best shown and most consistent character in the book is Father Lankester, and the scenes between him and Vane are really admirable. To compare him with another character in fiction, of similar purpose—Father Lamplugh in The Christian—is perhaps the best method to show his worth. Mr. Caine's character is a caricature; Mrs. Macmahon's, if not a portrait, is a conceivable, in fact, a true type.

The Doverfields' Diamonds. By E. M. VAN DEVENTER (LAWRENCE L. LYNCH.) (Ward, Lock, 6s.)

THOSE experienced in the ways of fiction will guess before they have got beyond the title-page, that the Doverfields' diamonds were stolen, or they would hardly have been considered worth writing about. They will, therefore, not be surprised to meet with several old friends, closely associated with the style of literature. The sparkling foreign lady, a dazzlingly beautiful brunette, whose past is a mystery to all but the French police; the young, innocent wife, who is keeping something from her puzzled but trustful husband; the fascinating blackguard; the wretched dupe bent on revenge; the brilliant detective who unravels the mystery; and, last but not least, the piquante lady's maid, are all familiar figures. The diamonds have to be found, and the reader knows they must turn up in the most unlikely place possible; he is therefore not surprised when they are discovered sewn up in the French lady's bustle. The detail of the plot is ingenious enough to be interesting, and the story ends with a satisfactory scrimmage in the dark among the various rogues and detectives.

The Conqueress. By GEORGE OHNET, translated by FRED. ROTHWELL. (Chatto and Windus, 6s.)

"THE CONQUERESS" is but another illustration of the difficulty of producing a satisfactory rendering of the French into the English tongue. That the feat is a possible one has been proved by the work of Lafcadio Hearne and other able translators, but in most cases those who cannot read French in the original have to be content with heavily British versions of Gallic wit, or, what is worse, strange productions in language closely resembling Du-Maurier's "franc-ingle" or "ingle-franc." The translator of Mr. George Ohnet's novel has had a more than usually hard task before him, and he has met it in the heavily British spirit. He has produced a conscientious and painstaking version, and in so doing has lost much, if not all, of the delicacy of touch which characterises the work of the French author. The fact that the book is an exceedingly difficult one to translate does not excuse such a vulgarism as: "She was now living, along with her brother, in the Hotel de Condottier."

The House on the Thames. By G. W. APPLETON. (John Long, 6s.)

It is one thing to write a sensational book, another to produce a quite improbable one. "The House on the Thames" contains the elements of a very exciting tale, but loses all value owing to the fact that the principal incidents of the plot are beyond all bounds of possibility. Young ladies, even in fiction, do not shoot German gentlemen of distinction in foreign hotels and depart, unmolested, a few hours later, as if nothing had happened. There is a police force, even in Germany, and it keeps a very paternal eye on the movements of the ubiquitous British tourist. The other situations in the book are on a level with this one. The story of three girls besieged in a house on the river, but a few miles from a police station, the midnight capture of two of them by the minions of the German Baron; their subsequent adventures on board his yacht, and their ultimate release, does more to rouse the reader's sense of incredulity than to whet his interest.

Mrs. Barrington's Atonement. By VIOLET TWEEDALE. (Long, 6s.)

It could scarcely be expected that Audrey Barrington would appreciate her husband's numerous visits to the house of the widowed Lady Calthorpe, and, as a consequence, what the authoress terms "the crudities of her nature," made trouble for everybody. Vincent, her husband, is a spiritualist, and as Lady Calthorpe appears to be a first-rate medium, the two spend some pleasant moments with spirits of the dead. But Mrs. Barrington grows jealous, and in her grief thinks she can find consolation in Guy Talbot, who is a handsome gentleman of undecided position. She claims his protection eventually, and he, with great discretion, sends her to her room and goes out to bring Lady Calthorpe to look after the runaway. Of course, many complications arise out of Audrey's desertion of her husband, and the curious medley of characters introduced serve to prolong the story beyond the necessary length. Guy is a sort of pagan hero, who loves a dying woman, Lady Calthorpe, who in turn is still in love with her dead husband; Vincent is appeased by his wife's atonement—the birth of their baby—and after considerable trouble peace is restored to the owner of Great Vincent Hall. Of the book it may be said that Violet Tweedale has done better work. There is a great deal of slipshod writing in "Mrs. Barrington's Atonement," and sentences like "was similar to many another house of the same type lying hidden away in the rural villages of England" irritate quite as much as the immature analyses of the thoughts of the principal characters. Nowadays, however, this sort of thing passes in certain circles for cleverness, but "Mrs. Barrington's Atonement" is not a clever production by any means.

The Marble Sphinx. By ST. JOHN LUCAS. (Elkin Mathews, 1s. 6d. net.)

WHEN the Greek slave Alexis was thrown out into the high road, bleeding from the whips of his master's gigantic Nubians, he lay so still that all the wild things of the woodland came and looked at him and went away; he lay like a broken flower until the dryad saw and loved him and healed him with her magic herbs. So they lived together in the forest until the Centaur broke in upon their peace with the message that the dryad must choose between her woodland nature and her human lover. She chose her human lover and they passed together out of the forest towards the strange life of the city. They came to the house on the city's outskirts where Thanatos lived with Erös, and where among the eternal roses of the garden stood the Marble Sphinx. They were welcomed as guests to the great feast which Death was preparing in honour of his triumph over the gods of old. The guests arrived, singly at first, the chief guests, the Kings of Life and of Thought, and others, then in large numbers. Of the dreadful awakening of the Marble Sphinx, of the strange happenings that followed closely upon his awakening, of Death's utter overthrow, it is written with well-chosen words.

It is a delicate piece of work. Mr. St. John Lucas has written a short story of considerable beauty in the form of an allegory—a prose fancy, in which the prose is good and the fancy graceful and vigorous. He penetrates to the depths of modern life in an imaginative atmosphere that is agreeably free from the mists of modern conventions. There is no heavy insistence upon one interpretation, with the result that the allegory is instinct with fine meaning, which is as natural and potent and satisfying as is the smell of sweet-briar in the early morning sunshine.

CORRESPONDENCE

"A FORECAST"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I observe in your issue of the 11th instant an article, entitled "A Forecast," from the pen of Mr. Arthur Machen. Mr. Machen, in general, writes as one with authority, on subjects of which he knows more than a little, and often with a power of invective which is very refreshing. It is with the greater regret that I see him condescending to such pettiness as disfigures the opening of the article in question. It would scarcely be worth noticing, did not the final quotation of the first paragraph make the whole a slur upon one man, for to one man only do the quoted words belong.

The wit or wisdom of these words in themselves matters little: it is a well-worn trick to pick up a phrase widowed of its context—of its antecedents, of the mood, the tone in which it was uttered—and hold it up to ridicule. But the ingenuity which can take such an isolated saying of a man who least among men conformed to any received "pedagogic" type, who in his relations to the boys under him and his attitude to life at large was a whole world away from the kind of "Public School ideal" which makes its victims a sorrow to their friends and a derision to their enemies—the ingenuity which can take this and call it "a fair sample of the singularly silly nonsense to which schoolmasters as a race are addicted," is indeed transcendent. But Mr. Machen's very subtlety plays him false and locks the pillory upon him, for assuredly he must stand self-convicted as ill-informed or superficial in the eyes of any who knew the man and possess the slightest insight into character.

True, we all have our points of view, and a reasoned attack on a man's memory, delivered with obvious sincerity and conviction, would need no excuse, even if it called for refutation. But a casual and sidelong flier such as this needs no refutation, and can have but one excuse—ignorance. Its motives are obscure, and, whatever they may be, no purpose can be served by this particular kind of de mortuis, which to those (perhaps necessarily few) who take its full import, is an impertinence quite in the vein of that "K. H." on whose back your ploughers have recently and deservedly ploughed and left long furrows.

"There was once a silly schoolmaster, whose one idea in life was . . ." The acumen of it!

E. PHILLIPS BARKER.

January 13.

[Mr. Machen writes: I am afraid I do not quite see the point of Mr. Barker's objection. It is true that "the quoted words" were uttered by a well-known schoolmaster, whom we will call Mr. X. It is my opinion that they do constitute "a fair sample of the singularly silly nonsense to which schoolmasters as a race are addicted," and I may add that, in my judgment, the "Memoirs" of Mr. X. furnish many more samples of the same kind. So far as I can gather from Mr. Barker's letter, he waives all argument as to the sense or nonsense of "the quoted words," and simply says that he knew X. and liked him. I am quite content to believe these two propositions, but I am afraid I must pronounce them impertinent—in the logical, not the social, sense.]

A GERMAN POETESS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Whilst perusing your esteemed publication a few days ago, I came across the name of Marie Madeleine, the German poetess, some of whose stanzas, it appears, have just been ably translated. I was delighted to hear of a good translator of modern German verse-writers, who have, in my opinion, been rather neglected.

Marie Madeleine, who was still very young when I saw her, has written several promising pieces; but she is only one among many new German bards who have done really fine work. I am thinking of Felix Dahn, Theodore Fontane, Paul Heyse, the volatile author, Theodor Storm, and Ernst von Wildenbruch, whose "Herenlied" is most dramatic, while all his prose, especially the little "Legende" entitled "Claudia's Garten," bears the imprint of a truly poetical spirit. I am not aware if Heyse's epic, "Der Verrückte Roland," has ever been translated, but I do know that it is a splendid creation, and the outcome of a mind deeply influenced by the Roland legends of Germany and those early Italian masters, Boiardo and Ariosto. Another clever and fascinating poet is Prinz Emil zu Schönau-Carolath, a relative of the well-known Reichstag member, whose verses, "Der Letzte Tag," I once translated inadequately myself. He has composed some haunting lines, and his "Sulamith," "Das Schwarze Haus," etc., will ever linger in my memory. Also the words of several modern German songs would repay translation, for the German vocalist is a sentimentalist too, and many of his madrigals exhale the sweet violet scent of Heinrich Heine.

Yes, modern German poetry cries aloud for translators, and I do not see why it should not be done into English just as well as the best Teuton prose work has been, such as the novels of Hermann Sudermann and Gustav Frenssen.

REGINA MIRIAM BLOCH.

THE QUEEN SQUARE CLUB

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The committee of the Queen Square Club wish it to be known that they will be "At Home" on the evening of Tuesday, January 21st, at the Club House, 9, Queen Square, to any ladies and gentlemen who may be desirous of becoming members of a non-political social club, and who would thus have an opportunity of making the acquaintance of some of the present members and of inspecting the delightful Queen Anne house which forms the club premises.

The Queen Square Club was founded chiefly for men and women interested in artistic and literary matters, whilst facilities for bridge, chess, etc., are also afforded. Debates, concerts and lectures upon topics of the day, by well-known people, are given weekly.

Further particulars may be obtained from

THE SECRETARY,

9 Queen Square.

THE DAILY NEWS READING CONTEST

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In your issue of the 11th of January you have inadvertently misinterpreted the details submitted to you in connection with the Daily News Reading Contest.

No money prizes are offered by the Daily News, this being one of many features which distinguish it from the Limerick Competitions, with which your notice has erroneously identified it.

I feel sure that in your next issue you will contradict this statement, as it is calculated to mislead your readers as to the real objects of the Daily News Reading Contest.

A. G. GARDINER

(The Editor).

January 15.

[The Daily News offers, as the awards in its Reading Contest, prizes of the value of £1,500. The question whether the awards are made in cash or in kind seems to us quite immaterial, but we are glad to make the correction, though it in no way affects our criticism of the scheme.—Ed.]

BOOKS RECEIVED

BIOGRAPHY

Lord Wantage. A Memoir by his Wife. Smith, Elder, 10s. 6d. net.

Ellice Hopkins. A Memoir by Rosa M. Barrett. Wells Gardner, Darton, 3s. 6d.

BOOKS OF REFERENCE

Official Year-Book of the Scientific and Learned Societies of Great Britain and Ireland. Griffin.

The Writers' and Artists' Year-Book. Black, 1s. net.

The Clergy Directory, 1908. Philipps, 4s. 6d.

DRAMA

Sutro, Alfred. John Glayde's Honour. French, 2s. 6d. net.

EDUCATIONAL

The Fowre Hymnes. Edited by Lilian Winstanley. Cambridge University Press, 2s. net.

Victor Hugo. Selected Poems. Edited with introduction and notes by H. W. Eve. Cambridge University Press, 2s.

MISCELLANEOUS

Wylde, C. H. How to Collect Continental China. Bell, 6s. net.

Gordon, Seton. Birds of the Loch and Mountain. Cassell, 7s. 6d. net.

Kennedy, Bart. The German Danger. Collier, n.p.

- The History of Freedom, and other Essays.* By Lord Acton. Macmillan, 10s. net.
- Historical Essays and Studies.* By Lord Acton. Macmillan, 10s. net.
- Barzini, Luigi. Pekin to Paris. Grant Richards, 16s. net.
- Webb, Wilfred Mark. The Heritage of Dress. Grant Richards, 15s. net.
- Wright, J. C. In the Good Old Times. Elliot Stock.
- Gordon, Seton. Birds of the Loch and Mountain. Cassell, 7s. 6d. net.
- The English Housewife.* Edited by Constance Countess de la Warr. The Grosvenor Library, n.p.
- Charity's Guerdon.* Compiled by T. Edwards Jones. Ipswich: Smith's Suitall Press, 1s. 6d. net.
- Griffith, C. J. The Romance of the Sky. Routledge, 1s.
- Larymore, Constance. A President's Wife in Nigeria. Routledge, 7s. 6d. net.
- The "Gloucester" Diary and Directors' Calendar for 1908.* Gloucester: Brooke, n.p.
- Dobbs, Archibald E. Philosophy and Popular Morals in Ancient Greece. Simpkin, Marshall, 5s. net.
- Baughan, Edward Algernon. Ignaz Jan Paderewski. Lane, 2s. 6d. net.
- Wallace, Alfred Russel. Is Mars Habitable? Macmillan, 2s. 6d.
- Hulbert, H. H. Voice-Training in Speech and Song. University Tutorial Press, 1s. 6d.
- Memorials of Old Derbyshire.* Edited by the Rev. J. Charles Cox. Bemrose, 15s. net.
- Aphorisms and Reflections.* From the works of T. H. Huxley. Selected by Henrietta A. Huxley. Macmillan, 2s. 6d. net.
- Marden, Philip S. Greece and the Aegean Islands. Constable, 12s. 6d. net.
- Stopes, Charlotte Carmichael. Shakespeare's Warwickshire Contemporaries. Shakespeare Head Press, n.p.
- Brydges, R. H. Bridge Catechism. Chatto & Windus, 2s. 6d. net.
- Penrose's Pictorial Annual, 1907-8.* Penrose, 5s. net.
- Haselden, W. K. Daily Mirror Reflections. Pictorial Newspaper Co., 1s.
- Bonhote, J. Lewis. Birds of Britain. Black, 20s.
- Leclère, Albert. La Morale Rationnelle. Paris: Félix Alcan, fr.7.50.
- Reed, Helen Leah. Napoleon's Young Neighbour. Little, Brown & Co., n.p.
- Marlowe, Francis. The Secret of the Sandhills. Sampson Low, Marston.
- Herkless, John, and Robert Kerr Hannay. The Archbishops of St. Andrews. Vol. I. Blackwood, 7s. 6d. net.
- Bone, Gertrude. Children's Children. Duckworth, 6s. net.
- Heywood, N. Arthur. Oddities of the Law. Ouseley, 2s. 6d. net.
- Crichton, Douglas. Sanquhar and the Crichtons. Dumfries: The Courier and Herald Press.
- Barrett, Charles. From Range to Sea. Melbourne: Lothian, 1s.
- The Year's Work in Classical Studies, 1907.* Edited by W. H. D. Rouse. Murray, 2s. 6d. net.
- Memorials of Old Dorset.* Edited by Thomas Perkins and Herbert Pentin. Bemrose, 15s. net.
- Epilegomena on Horace.* In the form of a critical letter by E. R. Garnsey. Swan, Sonnenschein, 5s. net.
- Lawson, W. R. John Bull and His Schools. Blackwood, 5s. net.
- Blok, P. J. Geschiedenis van het Nederlandeche Volk. Sijthoff, 10 marks 50 pf.

POETRY

- A Rose of the Old Régime.* By the Bentztown Bard. Doxey Book Shop Company, n.p.
- Frazer, Eppie. The Clodhopper. Book III. Prue, Bale & Danielsson.
- The Poetical Works of Campbell.* Edited by J. Logie Robertson. Oxford University Press, 2s.
- The Poetical Works of Shelley.* Edited by Thomas Hutchinson. Oxford University Press, 2s.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with. Fullest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

PUBLIC OPINION

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT THOUGHT & ACTIVITY.

TWO PENCE EACH FRIDAY.

ESTABLISHED 1860.

An Interesting Review of World Events.

To get a broad, comprehensive and clear view of the great movements afoot on the globe, to catch the inmost spirit of the activities of the world—to grasp their full meaning—read PUBLIC OPINION.

This paper compels reading by the tremendous interest of its subjects and their cosmic sweep. It is a journal of timeliness that appeals to intelligent men and women who wish to know the best that is said and done in all fields of human activity.

Its pages are brimful of information and discussion on Politics, Science, Religion, Literature, Art, Music, and the Drama, and of the people who keep the world turning around. It gives the best from all periodicals and keeps one abreast of the culture of the age in all lines of thought and achievement. To the busy man and woman it is indispensable. It is the paper that keeps you educated.

PUBLIC OPINION is the ideal paper for every home, of interest to every member of the family, a luxurious necessity and a necessary luxury. Its circulation increases each week, and it is read by people in all parts of the world.

Specimen Post Free on application.

Offices: 30 & 31 Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
& AFTER DINNER.

& BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

THE CITY OF THE SOUL

By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS.

This volume was issued anonymously in May, 1899. The first edition of 500 was exhausted within a few months of publication, and a second edition of 500 was issued in December, 1899.

Owing to the failure of the Publisher the book has been unobtainable for several years. 150 copies, all that remain of the second edition, are now offered for sale at the original published price, 5/- net, by MESSRS. BICKERS & SON, LEICESTER SQUARE, LONDON, from whom alone they can be obtained.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The Late Mr. LIONEL JOHNSON in the OUTLOOK in an Article entitled "A Great Unknown."

"The title of these arresting poems is taken from that of an opening set of four sonnets, and it well describes and defines the writer's poetical attitude. Here is not the impeccable dulness of an accomplished imitator, of the soulless craftsman who has caught some master's style; behind or within these poems is a personality. The pieces which will probably win most admirers are three ballads. Youth in its white, fresh grace, its wistfulness and joyousness, wonder and simplicity, sings and sighs in these ballads, of which one is a legend, one historical, and the third a beautiful invention. . . . But possibly finer than these fine fantasies are the more personal, or at least more intimately conceived and meditative poems. . . . Let the reader turn to 'Rejected,' a mystical lyric worthy of Blake and impossible to describe otherwise; if he has any sense of poetry he will feel and confess that we have here an authentic poet. Among crowds of clever versifiers here comes a poet."

THE SATURDAY REVIEW.

"Delicate imagination and sense of words are not the only qualities that entitle 'The City of the Soul' to peculiar distinction. The writer adds to these a technical judgment no less completely at home with the ballad than with the lyrical or sonnet form. As a criticism of verse, this would be exhaustive praise. But these pieces contain just that element of passion which transforms skilful verse into fine poetry. The ballad soliloquy 'Perkin Warbeck' is extraordinarily good. . . . Among the rest of the poems are two translations from 'Les Fleurs du Mal.' In daintiness of expression, often married to exotic sentiment, the translator himself has no slight affinity with Baudelaire. The book is full of things which tempt one to linger."

THE SUNDAY SPECIAL.

"This poignant accomplished singer."

"A PARISIAN" IN THE ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

"These poems, 'The City of the Soul,' by an anonymous author, were known in part to the Parisian public before they were printed in England, for some of the best among them—and the volume, it seems to me, is a treasure-house of gems—first appeared in the 'Revue Blanche,' with the accompaniment of a French translation. That is some three years ago, and the great masters of French poetry, chief among them the late Stéphane Mallarmé, were not slow to applaud."

"The remarkable success which I hear the book has since had in England does credit, I think, to the judgment of our French critics, which is often singularly just in its estimate of English poetry, especially if it belongs to the Elizabethan period of our literature, or be animated by the Elizabethan 'Souffle' . . . and surely it is this 'Souffle,' a pure invigorating wind from heaven which blows and whispers and weeps in this new poet's verses. The two translations from Baudelaire are as perfect in form and in the repetition of the frisson of the original verse as Baudelaire's own translations from Poe and Longfellow. It is a pleasure to find so complete, so temperamental a sympathy between a great French and great English poet."

The Late MR. FRANCIS THOMPSON IN THE ACADEMY.

"He has a rich sense of language, a true gift of mellifluous versification. Few poems are without cunning and iridescent diction; and all have a rich, youthful passion for beauty which is in itself an inspiration. . . . No poem at once complete and brief enough for quotation will exhibit altogether the glow of his diction, the luxuriance of his fancy, and the melodious quality of his verse."

MR. GEORGE STREET IN THE PALL MALL MAGAZINE.

"In my case, I reckon but very few of the contemporary writers of verse known to me, as poets—how few I should hardly like to say. Among them I place without hesitation the anonymous author of the 'City of the Soul.' . . . This inspiration I take to be first of all the beauty of visible things freshly impressive on the senses. It is as though a child said 'Look, how beautiful!' but a child able to see minutely and variously. . . . and the power to see beautiful things and to express them beautifully is so rare, that one is justified (taking my view of it) in thinking the appearance of this little book a most fortunate event."

THE STANDARD.

"The verses have a character of their own, and are at times quite exquisite in point of workmanship . . . this accomplished and skilful hand."

THE SCOTSMAN.

"This is a book of anonymous poetry of a rare distinction. . . . This is a verse of the proud kind that scorns a vulgar appreciation, and looks for the approbation of connoisseurs. . . . In all these the feeling is always wrought to a high pitch of intensity, yet cautiously and solemnly, without weakness of hysterics."

THE TIMES.

"He is by turns æsthetic and introspective, and is at his best in his ballads, especially the ballad of 'St. Vitus,' almost every stanza of which is a Pre-Raphaelite picture."

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"These are the verses of a poet. The volume is small, but it would be most unjust to call it the production of a minor bard. . . . It is a work of a remarkably high order. The author has achieved great distinction in his sonnets. . . . Indeed, all through the book one comes upon lines which are astonishing in their beauty and their distinction. . . . a poet who proves himself capable of the very highest work. There can be no doubt as to the fate of these poems."

THE STAR.

"The fresh, clear voice of a poet sounds unmistakably in 'The City of the Soul.' . . . I have no space for a tenth of the glorious poetry with which this little volume is strewn. . . . a scroll of poems this which before many days will set the world wondering, and the name of the author? Well, the world will know it also before long. He cannot disguise his genius."

"N.O.B." IN THE ECHO.

"A new poet who is of serious account is something of a rarity to-day. Yet such I fancy is a true description of the anonymous author of 'The City of the Soul.' . . . The lovely little ballad of 'St. Vitus' is one of the most arresting things in the volume, for here it is that the formal grace of the anonymous poet makes its first irresistible appeal. . . . But to my mind the new bard's claim to attention might be established on a single poem. Scarce a line is there of 'Wine of Summer' which Keats might not have contentedly signed."

THE SUN.

"His thoughts are poetic and so is his expression of them. He is a master of technique, and he has in his lines a lilt and a rhythm that is musical and fascinating. His 'Perkin Warbeck' is an exquisite specimen of the ballad. . . . The whole book is full of gems."

THE GLASGOW HERALD.

"Nothing could be finer than the treatment of these subjects (the ballad of 'St. Vitus' and 'Perkin Warbeck'), and they clearly show that the author, whoever he is, possesses the ballad-making faculty. . . . Some fine lyrics and sonnets help to illumine the volume."

THE DUNDEE ADVERTISER.

"Work of so fine a cast ought to have borne the author's name. Only rarely amongst books of poems published nowadays does one appear distinguished by such really lovely and lofty fancy. . . . One or two of the poems are introspective without being morbid; some have their music and colour taken direct from nature, and convey much the same impressions as may be derived from exquisite water-colour drawings. Others are like dreams that 'go out like tapers,' caught and preserved in magic lines."

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

"The anonymous author of 'The City of the Soul' has genuine talent. . . . He moves easily and gracefully in various measures; he has imagination and sense of colour and an excellently full vocabulary."

THE WESTERN MAIL.

"From the first page to the last every piece has not only something, but a good deal to lift it above the common-place. . . . Indeed, although we are afraid to say it, we thought we recognised sometimes a timbre of which no other English poet than Swinburne is capable."

THE BRITISH MERCURY.

"We need only read the opening pages of this little book to be amply convinced that it is the work of a true poet. . . . The volume begins with a sequence of four sonnets. They ought to be carefully pondered over by the reader. . . . For ourselves we regard them as the crowning effort of his genius. . . . The writer of this book handles the ballad with consummate skill."

THE IRISH INDEPENDENT.

"This is a volume of poetry to which the author does not append his name. We admire his modesty. . . . They appear to us to be suffused with the colour and the atmosphere we find in Keats. . . . We shall eagerly look forward for another volume by the same writer."

THE BIRMINGHAM GAZETTE.

"The anonymous author of 'The City of the Soul' has indubitable power, rich imagery, and a deep vein of thought. There is an intensity about his utterances which grips the reader, and the plangent tone reaches the heart. . . . As a proof of a different power take the subtle 'Impression de Nuit,' the picture of London which this author can trace in fire and blackness, in marvel and misery."

ABERDEEN FREE PRESS.

"In this almost luxuriously simple little volume we have some of the sweetest song that we have chanced upon for a long time. The name 'Poetry' is no misnomer for the work of this tuneful singer."

MONSIEUR LAURENCE JERROLD IN LA REVUE BLANCHE.

"Parmi les innombrables volumes de vers qui s'accumulent et dont il est vraiment préférable de ne rien dire, en voici un, anonyme, du plus haut intérêt. Il y a une émotion intense et une belle musique des mots dans cette Cité de l'âme, et l'âme est celle d'un vrai poète. . . . Le volume se termine par une sorte de péan magnifiquement simple, une 'ode à mon âme' orgueilleuse et triomphale, où s'affirme une outre-cuidante fierté dans un chant rapide, d'un style parfaitement pur et d'un souffle large. Cependant il y a de meilleures choses peut-être encore dans le volume. . . . Le volume—qui contient en outre plusieurs sonnets d'un beau style—est l'œuvre d'un vrai poète."

MESSRS. BICKERS & SON, LEICESTER SQUARE, LONDON.

MESSRS. BELL'S PUBLICATIONS.

Detailed information concerning these Books will be sent to any address on application.

READY JANUARY 22nd.

Crown Folio.

225 Copies only for Sale.

SANDRO BOTTICELLI.

By HERBERT P. HORNE.

Crown folio. Printed at the Chiswick Press, on Arnold's hand-made paper, with an Appendix of Original Documents, many of which are printed for the first time, and 43 Photogravure Plates of Pictures specially Photographed, many for the first time. Price £10 10s. net.

* * A Supplementary Volume, containing a detailed study of the School of Botticelli, a "Catalogue Raisonné" of all the known works of the master and his school, a Bibliography, and an Index to both volumes, is in the press, and will be issued as soon as possible. The price of this volume will not exceed £5 5s. net.

Orders will be taken only for the Two Volumes.

PROSPECTUS AND SPECIMEN PLATE ON APPLICATION.

Small 4to, Illustrated, 10s. 6d. net.

QUEEN MARY'S BOOK.

A Collection of Poems and Essays by Mary Queen of Scots. Edited by Mrs. P. STEWART-MACKENZIE ARBUTHNOT.

"Whatever may be his point of view with regard to Mary, the reader interested in her personality and career should be glad of this beautiful collection of her poems and essays, and should be grateful to Mrs. Arbuthnot for her zeal in making the collection and in supplying renderings of those pieces not already translated."—Daily Telegraph.

Post 8vo, with Portrait, 10s. 6d. net.

THE ROMAN JOURNALS OF FERDINAND GREGOROVIVS (1852-1874).

Edited by FRIEDRICH ALTHAUS. Translated by Mrs. GUSTAVUS W. HAMILTON.

"Few people, one might imagine, could have written a dull diary of events in Rome between 1852 to 1874: yet few could have combined so vivid an account of the steps in the struggle between old and new with so accurate a judgment of the forces at work, and so haunting a spirit of affectionate reverence for the old. He loved Rome, and he understood, if he could not love, the Latin character. To read the journal is to see Papal Rome through keen but reverent eyes."—Times.

Demy 8vo, with 7 Portraits, 15s. net.

THE ELIZABETHAN RELIGIOUS SETTLEMENT.

A Study of Contemporary Documents. By HENRY NORBERT BIRT, O.S.B., Priest of Downside Abbey.

"These six hundred pages.....contain such a wealth of concisely stated and well-arranged material of a reliable character—and much of the volume has undergone a severe testing—that no future student of the first half of the Elizabethan age can possibly afford to do without them."—Church Times.

WORKS BY ABBOT GASQUET, D.D., O.S.B.

READY IMMEDIATELY.—Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE BLACK DEATH IN 1348 AND 1349. New and Revised Edition.

READY SHORTLY.—Crown 8vo.

THE LAST ABBOT OF GLASTONBURY, and other Essays. Illustrated.

PREVIOUSLY ISSUED.

Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

HENRY III. AND THE CHURCH. A Study of his Ecclesiastical Policy, and of the Relations between England and Rome.

"It is written with no desire to defend the Papacy from the charges which were made even by the faithful at the time, and it may fairly claim to represent an unbiased survey of the evidence. His book will be indispensable to the student of the reign of Henry III."—Times.

Demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

HENRY VIII. AND THE ENGLISH MONASTERIES.

"As to the solid value of this great book there is absolutely no difference of opinion among competent critics, and the scrupulous moderation which always characterises the learned Abbot's statement of a case, and the total absence of controversial bitterness, render all his work in the field of history acceptable even to those who differ the most widely from his conclusions."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE EVE OF THE REFORMATION. Studies in the Religious Life and Thought of the English People in the Period preceding the Rejection of the Roman Jurisdiction. Fourth Edition.

LES CLASSIQUES FRANÇAIS ILLUSTRÉS.

Publiés sous la direction de DANIEL O'CONNOR.

Small crown 8vo, with 8 Full-page Illustrations in Colour and 29 in Black and White, 5s. net.

NOW READY.

GEORGE SAND: LES MAÎTRES SONNEURS.

Préface d'ÉMILE FAGUET, de l'Académie Française. Illustrations de M. V. WHEELHOUSE.

READY IMMEDIATELY.

GEORGE SAND: LA MARE AU DIABLE.

Notice Analytique de C. A. SAINTE-BEUVE. Illustrations de GERTRUDE LEESE.

Post 8vo, 6s. net.

HOW TO COLLECT CONTINENTAL CHINA.

By C. H. WYLDE. With 40 Plates, and upwards of 600 Facsimiles of Marks.

"Presents in a handy and compact form all that is essential for the average collector to know regarding the history of any old European factory whose productions he is likely to meet with."—Evening Standard.

HANDBOOKS OF THE GREAT MASTERS IN PAINTING AND SCULPTURE.

Edited by G. C. WILLIAMSON, Litt.D.

CHEAPER REISSUE.

Post 8vo, with 40 Illustrations and Photogravure Frontispiece, 3s. 6d. net each.

JUST PUBLISHED.

VELASQUEZ. By R. A. M. STEVENSON.

PERUGINO. By G. C. WILLIAMSON, Litt.D.

PIERO DELLA FRANCESCA. By W. G. WATERS, M.A.

PINTORICCHIO. By EVELYN MARCH PHILLIPS.

Cloth, 5s.

THE STORY OF AN ALPINE WINTER.

A Novel. By Mrs. AUBREY LE BLOND, Author of "True Tales of Mountain Adventure," "Cities and Sights of Spain."

"Will recall many pleasant memories to those who have already gauged the delights of skiing or being rocked in a bob-sleigh. As to the tyro—it will help him to look less like a tyro. Assuredly read the volume if you want a few tips."—Daily Chronicle.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, York House, Portugal Street, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1864

JANUARY 25, 1908

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON
(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON).

DEPARTMENT FOR TRAINING
TEACHERS FOR SECONDARY SCHOOLS.

Theory, Practice, and History of Education.—
J. W. ADAMSON, B.A., Professor (Head of the Department).

Ethics.—Reverend A. CALDECOTT, D.Litt.,
D.D., Professor.

Psychology.—C. S. MYERS, M.A., M.D., Professor. W. BROWN, B.A., Lecturer.

The Department is recognised by the Board of Education as a Training College for Secondary Teachers under the Teachers' Registration Regulations.

The Course, which includes Practical Work in Secondary Schools, extends over one academical year, beginning in October or January. It is suitable for those who are preparing to take the Teachers' Diploma, University of London, and for the Certificate of the Teachers' Training
Syndicate, University of Cambridge.

The Fee is £20 for the year, if paid in advance,
or 8 guineas per term (three terms in the year).

Application should be made to

PROF. ADAMSON,
King's College, Strand, W.C.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN,

ALBEMARLE STREET, PICCADILLY, W.

Tuesday next, January 28, at Three o'clock,
Professor F. J. HAVERFIELD, M.A., LL.D., First
of Two Lectures on "ROMAN BRITAIN: a, Its Frontiers and Garrison; b, Its Interior Civilisation." Half-a-Guinea the Course.

Thursday, January 30, at Three o'clock, Major
MARTIN HUME, First of Three Lectures on "THE STORY OF THE SPANISH ARMADA." Half-a-
Guinea.

Saturday, February 1, at Three o'clock,
LIONEL CUST, Esq., M.V.O., M.A., First of
Two Lectures on "ANTHONY VAN DYCK." Half-a-Guinea.

Subscription to all the courses in the season
Two Guineas. Tickets may be obtained at the Office of the Institution.

THE MOSHER BOOKS

THE NEW CATALOGUE FOR 1908 is now ready, and will be sent free on request
to booklovers anywhere that can be reached by mail. This Catalogue, like those that preceded it, is not made up of old and hackneyed quotations
concerning books. You are not wearied by "a jollie good book" jingle and that sort of thing,
but you are treated to some very genuine prose
and verse not seen in every cut and decidedly
dried anthology.

THOMAS B. MOSHER, PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

QUEEN SQUARE CLUB.

A social club for men and women interested in politics, literature or art. Lectures, entertainments, chess and bridge. An exquisite Queen
Anne club-house, close to the British Museum,
and Russell Square Station. Inexpensive lunch
and dinner. Subscription two guineas.—Apply
Secretary, 9 Queen Square, Bloomsbury.

NOTICE.

All communications to the Editor should be addressed
to 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields,
W.C.

All business communications must be sent to The
Manager of "The Academy,"
95 Fetter Lane, E.C.

Art

EXHIBITION OF FURNITURE, Metal
Work and Modelled Ceilings, by ERNEST
W. GIMSON.—DEBENHAM & FREEBODY'S
ART GALLERIES, WIGMORE STREET, W.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately
done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens
and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The
Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds of Typewriting carefully done at home (Remington). Good paper.
Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from
3s. 6d. per 100.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road,
Clapham, S.W.

MS. TYPED with care, 8d. per 1000 words.
Circulars duplicated from 2s. 6d. per
100 (testimonials). Shorthand.—Mrs. JACKSON,
37 Constantine Road, Hampstead, N.W. (late of Rosebery Square Buildings).

THE TYPEWRITING OFFICE for High-
class work of every description. Authors'
MSS. 10d. per 1,000 words. Prompt. Accurate.—
ERNEST C. PEARCE, 30 College Road, Reading.

Books for Sale

ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA, a set in half-morocco, 35 vols., issued by the Times,
for nine guineas net; good condition.—Apply
W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

FIELDING'S WORKS. EDITION DE LUXE. Edited by LESLIE STEPHEN. 10 vols. Royal 8vo. Buckram, labels, as issued.
Only 1,000 printed, this being No. 745. Smith
Elder, 1882. £3 5s.

WALKER, 37 BRIGGATE, LEEDS.

BOOKS AT ONE-THIRD COST.—
Thousands of the Best Books at from 25 to 80 per cent. below the original prices. Largest and best Stock of Secondhand and New Remainder
Books in the World. Write for our January
Catalogue.—W. H. SMITH & SON, Library
Department, 186 Strand, London, W.C.

Books, etc., Wanted

THE CAMBRIDGE LITERARY AGENCY,
which is placing Novels, Short Stories,
Articles, and Poems with over 100 (one hundred)
Publishers and Periodicals, sold, on December 31,
12 Short Stories and a Serial by UNKNOWN
WRITERS. Hundreds of unique testimonials.
All MSS. submitted by GEORGE G. MAGNUS,
115 Strand, London.

WILL PURCHASE AT ANY TIME.
ILLUMINATED MANUSCRIPTS, from
the earliest times till the beginning of the XVIth
Century; Incunabula and other Early Printed
Books; Illustrated Books, Prints, from the XVth
and the beginning of the XVIth Century. Rare
Old Books and Prints.—JACQUES ROSENTHAL,
Munich, Bavaria. 10, Karlstr. 10.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest
the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by Installments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity
as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical Advice by eminent Physicians
and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley, Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A Furnished House in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense
when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary,
Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

JUST PUBLISHED. 8vo, boards, 1s. net.

THE SLING.

*Remarks in connection with Lectures delivered in the Royal Institution,
May, 1905, to June, 1907.*

By WM. LEIGHTON JORDAN.

London: Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co., Ltd

Price 6d.; by Post 8d.

"UNCLE REMUS'S MAGAZINE."

Edited by JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS.

(Author of the "Brer Rabbit" Stories).

The latest American Magazine. Full of good things.

JANUARY NUMBER NOW READY.

Of all Booksellers and Newsdealers: or The International
News Company, 5 Bream's Buildings, Chancery Lane,
London, E.C.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including
Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth;
Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz,
Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest
Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application.
Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New
Oxford Street, London, W.C.

Educational and Scientific Books

NEW AND SECOND-HAND

THE LARGEST STOCK IN LONDON OF
Second-Hand School, Classical, Elementary, and Advanced Scientific Books MATHEMATICAL, THEOLOGICAL, & FOREIGN BOOKS

BOOKS FOR ALL EXAMINATIONS

ALL ENQUIRIES AS TO PRICES OF BOOKS ANSWERED.
KEYS AND TRANSLATIONS. BOOKS BOUGHT.

J. POOLE & CO.

(Established 1854).

104 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON, W.C.

(and 2 MANETTE STREET, SOHO, W.C.)

BOOKS BY POST

Orders from any part of the Country for the despatch of Books by Post or any inquiries regarding Books receive the most prompt attention at

W·H·SMITH & SON'S
BOOKSHOP

KINGSWAY · LONDON · W·C

Full Discount allowed for Cash

The Booklovers Library

delivers books in London and to any part of the United Kingdom. Its books are unlabelled, fresh, clean and inviting. It gives you a carriage-paid service or not, just as you wish. It gives you the books you want when you want them.

FOR LONDON AND COUNTRY.

ORDINARY SERVICE.

	Twelve Months	Six Months	Three Months
One Book ...	£1 1 0	£ 12 0	£ 7 0
Two Books ...	1 11 6	18 0	10 6
Three Books ...	1 17 0	1 1 0	12 0
Four Books ...	2 2 0	1 4 0	14 0
Six Books ...	2 12 6	1 11 6	16 0
Eight Books ...	3 3 0	1 16 0	18 0

Subscribers to the above service may exchange their books personally or by messenger as often as desired at the Library in Harrod's Stores, and at 17 Hanover Street, W. Country Subscribers to the above service may exchange their books by Rail or Parcels Post, as often as desired, paying carriage both ways. All boxes of books are forwarded to subscribers in advance; the finished volumes being returned to the Library upon receipt of fresh supply. The cost of carriage on four books, by rail, is in almost every case the same as on two or three books.

Booklet giving full terms of Subscription, the latest Monthly Book List, etc., will be sent Post Free upon application.

The Booklovers Library

17 Hanover Street, London, W.

And at Harrods Limited, Brompton Road, S.W.

CONTENTS

Page	Page
Life and Letters 379	The World's Religions 386
La Mechancete de la Nature . . . 381	The Schoolmaster's Dream . . . 387
Imitation from Maurice Maeterlinck 381	School Books 390
Literature :	Education : A Glance at Practice . . . 391
The Entente in Poetry 381	Hogmanay 394
Roma Vale 382	The Administration of Municipal Galleries 394
The Queen of the Adriatic . . . 383	The Library Table 396
Genius Loci 384	Fiction 397
Misadventures among Masterpieces 385	Correspondence 399
	Books Received 402

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields.

The publishing offices of THE ACADEMY are at 95 Fetter Lane, E.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

WE have long sought a favourable opportunity of noting the discrepancy between the reports given by our daily contemporaries of legal proceedings and the dictates of Law, Reason and Commonsense. We express no opinion whether the fault lies with our contemporaries' reporters or with the remarks of the legal officers, mainly magistrates, which they report. Whichever be the case, the reports are not likely to promote public respect for the law, and we suggest that an official report should be supplied, on which reporters can make what comments they please. We remember a report which caught our eye a long time ago now, which represented a city magistrate—we fancy it was the late Sir John Voce Moore—as having actually sentenced a boy to some small penalty for having obstructed the traffic by shaking his master's mats early one morning, in St. Paul's Churchyard. But upon the master rising in the court and violently denouncing the magistrate, and warning him that if he did not look out, he should hear a great deal more of the matter, the decision was reversed on the spot, and the boy discharged. All this occurred, according to the reporter, in this truly admirable but Oriental fashion.

The other day, in the York cruelty to children case, the chairman of the bench of magistrates is reported first, to have strongly reprobated the behaviour of the public, because an "important" witness for the defence had been frightened away by its violence, and was consequently not forthcoming. At first sight, the case ought obviously to have been adjourned until the "important" witness could be recaptured. On second thought, we conclude that the able counsel for the defence considered that his absence was, on the whole, more favourable to his clients than his presence. If so, the chairman's observation, as reported, was pointless. Secondly, in giving the reasons of the bench for not sentencing the male accused to prison, the chairman is reported to have said: that the fact of the accused's holding an honourable public office could have no bearing on the question whatever, except that it proved his good previous record, because he would not have held that office if anything had been known against him; and that, consequently, the bench had decided to sentence him to a fine, instead of the imprisonment which it considered his conduct deserved. The consequences of this inconsequent rigmarole, according to the report, is, that in the estimation of the York bench, the local Education Authority's ignorance entitles their solicitor, who was convicted by the bench of gross neglect of children, to remain at large, when he would now be in prison, if the Education Authority (whose ægis, unfortunately, facilitated his neglect) had never employed him; although the fact that they did employ him had no bearing on the question, except as evidence that he was incapable of such misconduct as that for which the bench convicted him.

The whole distressing case suggests two other questions more important than the first: (1) Where was the school attendance officer, and why did he not report that the children did not attend any school? (2) Cannot the system of confinement "during the King's pleasure," or some other which would produce the same practical effect, be extended to such cases as that of the female prisoner? By some such means such persons who are not positively insane might be subjected to the humane and remedial treatment of expert doctors, in cases of moral degeneration arising from physical causes, as they are at that admirably conducted institution—Broadmoor.

The sudden and lamented death of Sir John Lawson Walton recalls one of his first successes, the enormous damages which he obtained for the plaintiff in the notorious "Kitson Case." It will be remembered that the verdict struck a salutary terror to the hearts of the few garrulous medical practitioners who disgrace a profession distinguished by honour and discretion. A correspondent to the Morning Post, signing himself "An Old Customer" of a very well-known banking company, indignantly protests, as well he may, that the company's representative has recently confessed, with some naïveté, that his company only divulges its customers' secrets when asked to do so by companies for the collection of debts—but never—"no never," to individual inquirers. If "An Old Customer's" protest is well founded, it is about time that an action was brought against the banking company in question, which, in common with all banking companies, attracts custom by loud asseverations of inviolable secrecy, and on its own confession violates it in favour of other commercial companies. We trust, if such gross breaches of confidence are proved, it will be taught probity and discretion by damages that will break Sir John Lawson Walton's record.

How is it that "occultism"—a wide term covering many things foolish and some things not so foolish—has proved such bad material for imaginative literature? There are exceptions, of course; Lytton's "Strange Story," still more his "Haunters and the Haunted," have genuine thrills, and the latter certainly stands very high in the literature of terror. Each of these books represents an occult theory of things; the experts would no doubt inform us as to how far they are directly due to the teaching of Eliphas Lévi. It is certain that Lytton was a disciple of the Restorer of Magic; it is asserted that Lévi performed an Evocation of Spirits before Lytton at night, on the roof of the Pantheon in Oxford Street. At all events there are many traces in both the books mentioned of a tradition that is both ancient and occult; and the result, from a literary point of view, is excellent.

But how about Spiritualism? It has burdened the earth now for some sixty years, and so far as one knows it has not been responsible for half a dozen lines of decent literature. It has given us "Inspirational Discourses," it is true, and about these "Discourses" let the veil be drawn. Popular journalism, no doubt, has been, and is, responsible for some sorry stuff, but its crime in this sort is light, its offence small when one compares its output with the communications that are said to have come from "the other side." Then there was "Theosophy"; the mid-eighties of the past age gave us "Karma" and "United," which were—well, not great books. One remembers, later, fiction that appeared in an extinct journal called Lucifer. It was strange, but bad; and one fails to find much merit in a story that is running through some Theosophical magazine at the present day. It is called, we believe, "Little Mary in Heaven," and irreverent people wonder as to the name of the restaurant.

One fears that the teaching of Mary Baker G. Eddy is not to prove more inspiring than that of H. P. Blavatsky. "The Seamless Robe" (Laurie), by A. Channel, is an earnest attempt to impress the novelist's art into the cause of "Christian Science." Polemically considered it may be excellent; one notices that the Bishop of Exminster (usually alluded to as Bishop Saul) is brought to his knees in a highly satisfactory manner before the teaching of the Boston Prophetess; but from the mere literary standpoint there is little to be said for the tale. The authoress may have gained many spiritual treasures from Mary Baker G. Eddy; but she has also learned the use of the horrid word "antagonise," presumably from the same quarter. It must be said, however, that one meets the very best society in these florid pages; and perhaps something might be done with the tale if it were recast in dramatic, not to say melodramatic form, and called "The Worst Bishop in England."

We regret that owing to our date of publication, we could not effectively call attention to the Special Consultative Meeting and the Mass Meeting arranged for January the 24th, by the Church Schools' Emergency League, which brought them to our notice. However, we have pleasure in calling attention to the League's copious supply of emergency leaflets, which have now completed their sixth series, and especially to the useful alphabetical index to the series, compiled by the Hon. Secretary, Rev. W. E. Cleworth, giving references to all the subjects mentioned in the leaflets, as well as to their actual titles. We may give an idea of the usefulness of the leaflets by mentioning that No. 73, "The Training Colleges," not only contains large extracts from the controversy on that subject down to the end of December, but also an account of the manner in which the Japanese Government succeeded in "jerrymandering" the American Congregational body out of a college which it established at Tokyo, founded with the Japanese Government's permission, through the efforts of a native Congregationalist. The story is an example of the use made of professions of Liberalism by Governments—and particularly by the Japanese Government, if these facts have been correctly reported—to commit commercial trickery. The case offers a striking parallel to the attempts which are being made in England by the present Nonconformist Government to cheat private corporations out of the full enjoyment of institutions on which they expended large sums of money, on the faith of the direct encouragement given to them by preceding Liberal and Conservative Governments when in need of private capital, in order to carry out their policy. We doubt whether this method of indirect repudiation is likely to increase confidence in Government guarantees of any kind.

Our attention has been drawn to a peculiarly unpleasant pamphlet issued by the Daily Dispatch, with a view of securing advertisers for its columns. It is adorned on the cover with a picture of Mr. Lloyd-George, and with small reproductions of this picture on every page. It is elegantly called: "What are you going to do about it?" After quoting some figures from a recent speech of Mr. Lloyd-George's as to the great prosperity of Lancashire, it proceeds in the sort of strain indicated by the selections we append:

Is not the fact of the weekly income (from £8 to £10) of the average artisan's home in Lancashire sufficient to tell you that here is a splendid opportunity to create additional trade for yourself? Eight pounds are seldom earned by a working-class family outside Lancashire. But here Cotton reigns supreme, and King Cotton, in 1907, stands unchallenged.

Every mill is working to its fullest capacity, working from six a.m. to, perhaps, eight o'clock at night. Competent operatives are scarce. Every man who can do the work is snapped up; women, girls, boys, all are pressed into the service of King Cotton, their wages going to swell the family pay-roll. Thus we in Lancashire do not think it an extraordinary state of affairs when we see father, mother, and children at work in the same mill.

But do you, Mr. Advertiser, know all this?

Cosmetics and patent medicines are, and more could be, profitably advertised. The strenuous life of the mill soon tells its tale. Beauty fades and health often fails, with the result that chemists in working-class districts do a roaring trade.

We call the attention of the President of the Board of Trade to the use which is being made of his words and his effigy. If he will read the pamphlet through we cannot help thinking that it will give him, as a "Liberal Progressive" statesman, food for thought. We have seldom read anything more nauseating than this pamphlet.

Opinions may differ as to the advisability of retaining the Censor of Plays, but there can be no two questions of the useful purpose that would be served in the interest of certain "dramatic authors" by founding the office of, shall we say, "Official Supervisor of Plays." One of the duties of the office might be to correct inaccuracies before the production of the venture which would be specially beneficial in cases where the authors write about phases of life altogether outside the sphere of their acquaintance. The capacity of the supervisor would not be too severely tested in pointing out to those responsible for the play, A White Man, now being played by Mr. Lewis Waller, that the hero cannot be the "Hon." James Winnegate, and at the same time the cousin and heir to the Earl of Kerhill. If the American author had no knowledge of the class of life about which he wrote, surely either the manager or one of the actors, or the prompter, or even the call-boy (a possible son of the butler) ought to have observed the absurd mistake. The blunder recalls the grotesque large advertisement posters which were launched forth some few years ago by a well-known theatre before the production of a serious play of Roman life. There was a large poster of a Roman coin of the Republican epoch bearing the head of Julius Cæsar, with the date B.C. 44 on the coin.

LA MÉCHANCETE DE LA NATURE

"We are certainly often struck by an appearance of malignity in inanimate things which may not, after all, prove a mere fancy."—R. Y. Tyrrell, THE ACADEMY, January 18th, 1908.

Le chemin est perfide et la forêt traîtresse,
Et la nuit, vénéneuse, avec les rameaux tresse
Le filet effrayant où nous tombons un soir
Et le marais trompeur a caché son miroir.
Le brouillard épaissit l'horreur de son suaire;
Et dans l'obscurité visqueuse et séculaire,
Tordant ses bras cruels, le chêne, triomphant
Sur l'arbre rabougri chaque jour étouffant,
Se dresse, envahissant le ciel, et se balance.
Et le long peuplier s'aiguise en fer de lance.
Pour vivre, les ormeaux sont devenus bourreaux,
Et l'on sent s'augmenter le farouche chaos
D'atômes ennemis, hideux, sans cesse en guerre
Contre nous, nés comme eux de la féconde terre.
Le roc sous l'ocre rouge a l'air d'un assassin,
Car la pierre est féroce et le pic inhumain.
Lorsque l'étang fétide et fauve tremble et fume,
De grands yeux flamboyants épouvantent la brume.
Et dans la menaçante épaisseur des taillis
Les faibles par les forts sont toujours assaillis;
Et le vent porte au loin leur plainte formidable,
Mais la loi les écrase, armée, inexorable.
Ils tombent, se changeant en l'horrible limon
D'où s'échappe à son tour la peste et son poison.
Et l'on entend la Mort peupler l'ombre vivante. . .
Alors l'on te maudit, O Nature méchante!

ANDRÉ TURQUET.

IMITATION FROM MAURICE
MAETERLINCK

They slew three maidens white of sin,
To seek the thing their hearts within.
The first maiden was Happy-days;
Where her blood fell on trodden ways,
Lithe adders lisp and leap always.
The second maiden was Gladdening-eye;
Where her blood fell the streams a-nigh,
Meek lambkins bleat to the mild sky.
The third maiden was Ah-Alas!
Where her blood fell in the green grass,
Archangels watch till three years pass.

M. A.

LITERATURE

THE ENTENTE IN POETRY

Revue Germanique. Sept., 1906. LES CONTES DE CANTERBURY. Prologue.—CONTE DU CHEVALIER.—CONTE DU MEUNIER.—CONTE DU CUISINIER.

Revue Germanique. Sept., 1907. LES CONTES DE CANTERBURY (Suite). CONTE DE L'HOMME DE LOI.—CONTE DU MARINIER.—CONTE DE LA PRIEURE.—CONTES DE CHAUCER SUR SIRE TOPAZE et sur MELLIBEE.—CONTE DU MOINE.—CONTE DU PRETRE DE NONNAINS.—CONTE DU MEDECIN.—CONTE DU PARDONNEUR. (Paris: Félix Alcar.)

Dans les sentiers de la Renaissance anglaise, par EMILE LEGOUIS. (Paris: H. Didier.)

Les Sonnets de Shakespeare. Essai d'une interprétation en vers français.—I.—CAHIERS DE LA QUINZAINE. (Paris: 8 Rue de la Sorbonne.)

ENGLISH poetry, like English paintings, has been until recent years sadly neglected in France. Shakespeare, Milton, Ossian (!), Byron, with possibly Pope, were the only poets known. The late Professor Beljame, by his lectures and translations, did a good deal to popularise the poets of the nineteenth century, notably Shelley and Tennyson. He left behind him in the Universities a steadily increasing band of workers, Hovelake, Angellier, Legouis, Derocquigny, Morel, to mention only a few, who have published studies on English literature that no scholar can afford to ignore. Quite recently M. Legouis, who is already well-known for his masterly translations of Wordsworth, has formed a joint-stock company of translators, who have undertaken the formidable task of turning Chaucer into French. Two issues of the Revue Germanique have been monopolised by the translators, and there is still more to come. Thanks to the liberality of the French Academy a certain portion of the Prix Langlois has been assigned to the work, and it is earnestly hoped that in a month or two the whole of the Canterbury Tales will have appeared in a French dress. Considering Chaucer's immense debt to French literature it seems remarkable that this act of poetic justice has so long been delayed. It is true there exists a translation by the Chevalier de Chatelain, but this pedestrian version of the Pilgrim's ride is the merest Boileau and water, with everything typically Chaucerian carefully "steam-rolled" out of it. M. Legouis has apparently accorded his assistants a wide discretion in the interpretation of their task. It is, of course, difficult to hit the happy mean between a modern and mediæval style. We understand one realist among the translators, who would have probably pleased the late Samuel Butler, proposed to render our host as "Notre Amphitryon"! Too great an affectation of archaism would likewise be a mistake. The majority of translators appear to have aimed at a sort of Butcher and Lang style, slightly archaic, but always intelligible. None of the translators have attempted a version in rhyme, but in many cases an effort has been made to reproduce the sense of rhythm by translating into verses of ten or twelve feet, and by observing the cæsura. It seems rather invidious to pick and choose among so many excellent interpreters, but the Prologue by M. Cazamian and the Conte du Meunier by M. Delcourt seem to us especially successful, while the Conte de l'Intendant by M. Derocquigny reads like an original work. This is no doubt due in part to his unrivalled knowledge of Norman-English, which has so often been placed at the service of the Oxford Dictionary. M. Derocquigny's renderings remind us at every moment of the vividness, the energy, the sly and broad humour, with its whiffs of mediæval middens of the author of Maître Patelin and of Rabelais, with the ease and flow of the Contes, of La Fontaine, whose reticences at times he happily copies.

Not content with introducing Chaucer to his countrymen, M. Legouis has recently published a series of studies in translation entitled, Dans les Sentiers de la Renaissance anglaise. Avoiding for the most part the highways of Elizabethan poetry, he takes his readers by a series of cross-roads and by-ways for a delightful ramble from Sidney to Herrick and Herbert, not the least charming part of the stroll being the indications he gives when passing from one poet to another. There has always been a very widespread half-truth current concerning French that it is a language into which re-translation in verse is practically impossible. Englishmen are, however, always ready to capitulate before a fact. Let them read M. Legouis's renderings and then decide. Our mind, we must confess, is already made up. Here is a scholar who has gone behind his Boileau and his Racine straight to the sources of the Pléiade. He writes in a style that recalls the unaffected ease and grace of Ronsard and du Bellay. In method he reminds us of Mr. Gilbert Murray. He takes the English phrase, and instead of servilely translating, he re-thinks it in French. Take for instance his translation of Sidney's extraordinarily modern "Bosquet de cruelle Délices" (eighth song of Astrophel and Stella). It may, by the way, introduce the English poem to some of the readers of THE ACADEMY. The former, on account of its length, is not nearly so well known as it should be, owing to its comparative neglect by the makers of anthology, who are too much inclined to make their selections with a foot-rule. Here are the opening stanzas:

Dans un riche bosquet ombreux
Tout chantant d'oiseaux amoureux,
Quand Mai s'embaumait, jeune encore,
Des fleurs que ses pas font éclore,

Un jour Astrophel et Stella
Vinrent s'entre-consoler là :
Deux infortunes infinies,
Mais ivres d'être réunies.

Il est pâle d'un regret fou,
Elle, un joug vil mord son beau cou ;
Mais à se revoir, elle oublie
Son joug, lui sa mélancholie.

Ils avaient pleuré (ô douleurs !)
Et voici que sourient leurs pleurs :
Les yeux dirigés par les âmes
Echangent et croisent des flammes.

One would like to quote the whole. For lack of space, one can only give a few lines of the lover's appeal:

Oh ! accorde-moi—mais hélas !
Mes mots rentrent, ils n'osent pas—
Accorde—ô Dieu !—la peur m'opprime—
Mais prier ne peut être un crime ;—
Je t'en prie à genoux, Stella,
(Et sur la terre il s'agenouilla),
Que—pas moi—mais, si je t'adore,
L'heure ou le lieu pour moi t'implore !
L'air riant me donne raison ;
L'oiseau chante "C'est la saison !"
Est-il alcôve mieux fleurante ?
Est-il heure plus enivrante ?
Voici ce vent tiède se poser
Sur les feuilles et les baisser ;
Comme il fait chaque branche belle
Et souffle son désir en elle !
Le sol boit l'onde avec bonheur,
L'onde heureuse en le sol se meurt ;
Si les choses font tels échanges,
N'est-il de pitié chez les anges ?

Almost equally happy are M. Legouis's translations of the too little known sonnets of Spenser, notably of the one beginning:

Lyke as a huntsman after weary chace.

From Spenser he passes to the "dramatic" sonnets of that "megatherium" of the Elizabethan epoch,

Drayton. He lays alike under contribution and obligation, Campion, Carew, Suckling (esprit gaulois) and Herbert, forerunner of the pre-Raphaelites, subtly varying his style to suit the grave, or gay, realistic or mystic mood of each. With Herrick alone, with whom he ends this pleasant excursion, does he appear to be less successful. There is in the English, something ethereal, diaphanous, impalpable, that evaporates in the French version, due no doubt to the more precise, definite, and matter-of-fact nature of the French vocabulary, less rich in subtle shades of poetic meaning. At one period of the route M. Legouis ventures to stray into the beaten track, and translates several of the sonnets of Shakespeare. The following seems to us an admirable reproduction of the masculine note, so prominent in many of the sonnets. (Sonnet lxxi.):

Ne me pleurez pas plus longtemps après ma mort
Que ne résonnera la cloche rauque et sombre
Disant au monde vil qu'un plus vil encor
J'ai fui pour demeurer parmi les vers de l'ombre.
Oubliez, si ces mots alors vous relisez,
La main qui les traça, car je vous aime tant
Que je ne voudrais mort même en vos chers pensers
Si de penser de moi vous alliez attristant.
Oh ! dis-je, si jamais vous relisez ce mot
Quand ma chair ne fera plus qu'un avec la glaise,
N'allez point répéter mon pauvre nom tout haut,
Qu'avec moi votre amour enseveli se taise ;
De peur qu'après ma mort le monde aux yeux railleurs
Ne compte pas vos soupirs, ne me cherche en vos pleurs.

M. Legouis, in spite of his vigour, preserves a certain suavity, not to say sweetness, which admirably reproduces the undertone of the sonnets. M. Charles-Marie Garnier, to whom we owe a complete translation of the first part of the sonnets, with a promise of the rest, if less sensitive to the subtle and complex orchestration of Shakespeare, gives a singularly vigorous rendering of the dominant characteristics of his music. Unconsciously one thinks of instruments of brass and horns of iron, as one reads his spirited rendering of the xix. sonnet, that gauntlet flung in the face of Time. He has, indeed, recaptured some of the male vehemence of the poet of the sixteenth century, quite a different note from the often shrill and supersensitive violence of the Châtiments:

O, Temps, ronge au lion ses ongles acérés,
Rousse la terre à dévorer sa propre race ;
Brise au tigre cruel ses crocs de sang lustrés ;
Sur l'orgueilleux phénix de cent ans fais main basse.
Qu'en l'œil pur des saisons, les rires et les pleurs
Passent, quand passe, ô Temps, ta grande aile rapide,
Chasse de l'univers les parfums et les fleurs :
Soit, mais je te défends crime de régence !
Point ne laboureras le front de mon ami.
Point ne le rayeras de la plume alouvie ;
Tu laisseras intact et toujours raffermi
Ce moule de beauté renaissante et de vie.
Frappe à ton gré, vieillard, épuise ta rancœur :
Mon Amour par mes vers sera toujours vainqueur !

ROMA VALE!

The Life of Cavour. By EDWARD CADOGAN. (Smith, Elder and Co., 7s. 6d. net.)

The Roman Journals of Ferdinand Gregorovius, 1852-1874. Edited by FRIEDRICH ALTHAUS and translated by MRS. GUSTAVUS W. HAMILTON. (Bell, 10s. 6d. net.)

Fuit Roma. They are knocking down the walls of Aurelian in order to raze the distinction between the Romans who live in the city and the suburban who live outside it. The snobbishness which calls Maida Vale and the Edgware Road "Hyde Park," and heads its notepaper "North Kensington" when it lives on the further side of Ladbroke Vale, is merely silly: it becomes criminal when it destroys what is not its own, but is held upon trust for the world. The Romans of to-day—Romans no longer—have blocked up the approach to the Capitol—which is the world's, not theirs—with a monument, which they cannot afford to finish, in honour of a lascivious Savoyard, who, through no doing of his own, achieved the crown of the foreign kingdom of Italy. They have chosen the spot held sacred by prescription to the princes of the Church for the erection of a huge and insolent memorial to a melodramatic freebooter; and they have done their futile best to hide St. Peter's behind a modern hospital. Fuit Roma. In a few years there will be no telling it from Berlin or Birmingham. And it is no mere "despite of heart" and "love of havoc" with which Fame will tax these degenerate and unworthy men. The secret is a genuine hatred of a past they cannot understand, and a greatness they are unfit to appreciate:

Rome will forfeit the cosmopolitan, republican atmosphere which I have breathed here for eighteen years. She will sink into becoming the capital of the Italians, who are too weak for the great position in which our [i.e., the German] victories have placed them. . . . The Middle Ages have, as it were, been blown away by a tramontana, with all the historic spirit of the past; yes, Rome has completely lost its charm.

So wrote Ferdinand Gregorovius—the historian of the Rome whose decline and fall he saw with his own eyes—in November, 1870, and how true his words were any who know the Rome of to-day will realise. What Gregorovius foresaw as inevitable has been hurried on much faster than he could have expected, by the ignorance and jealousy of foes more ruthless than Goth or Gaul.

Gregorovius was a Liberal, a Protestant, and a German; but he was a poet, and he had a mind sensitive to the charm of the Middle Ages, if blind to the good and the true in the system whose death struggles he watched. He hated the temporal power; but he thought very little of the brand-new kingdom. He scorned Pio Nono (it is needless to say that he despised Antonelli), and judged him without regard to the unique circumstances of his position; but he was not taken in by Garibaldi:

Garibaldi has become a romantic sentimentalist. After having been led like a show lion through drawing-rooms by a string of roses, Garibaldi was to leave England yesterday.

Such are the terms in which he refers to the red-shirted hero. "Unfortunate Garibaldi!" is all he has to say of the leader who fled after the defeat of Mentana; while of his followers led captive in triumph past the Quirinal he draws a vivid picture, which combines the warmest sympathy with his matchless power of description.

It is due to the complex character of Gregorovius that we find his diary (which has been extremely well translated by Mrs. Hamilton) one of the most fascinating books recently published. His reverence for the past, kept sane and cool by a shrewd judgment; his German sentimentality, reined in by vast erudition and a keen sense of dignity in himself and other people; his passionate love of Rome, joined to his almost as passionate love of what he knew by the name of liberty (which was neither the "perfect freedom" nor the freedom at present enjoyed by the Italians)—all combine to make him an ideal observer of one of the most difficult and exciting periods of history. He entered Rome in 1852; he left it, in tears, in 1874. We have only to think what had happened in the interval to see how marvellous a field was this for an acute observer and a vivid writer. Out of all the historic things which he saw "from the inside," it is possible now only to take one example, though any one must seem inadequate:—

Rome, Palm Sunday (1861).

Was present to-day at the ceremony in St. Peter's. My place was immediately beside the Tribune, where sat the whole family of the dethroned King of Naples. Francis II. looked bored and misanthropic. His demeanour was unconstrained, neither military nor princely: he looks older than his years. Queen Maria pale and suffering. . . . The entire Royal party appeared in St. Peter's like a little heap of withered leaves. . . . Francis II. ascended the steps of the Papal throne and knelt to receive the palm. A dethroned king receiving the palm of resignation at the hands of a falling Pope is a sight of historic value.

While Gregorovius sat in his rooms high up in a house in "the street which almost bore his name," or dived in libraries, or walked the turbulent or empty streets, far in the north—in what was practically a foreign land—the man to whom all that Gregorovius saw was mainly due, was writing, speaking, cajoling, plotting, and brow-beating to bring about the vast change which, in all honesty, he believed to be to the advantage of Italy and mankind. It is impossible, whatever one's shade of opinion, not to respect and admire Cavour. The mind turns away disgusted from the extravagance of Mazzini, the sentimental postures of Garibaldi, to rest on Cavour's masterly statesmanship with admiration. The man who used France as Cavour used her, keeping her friendship against fearful odds, in order that he might squeeze it dry; the man who could make use even of Garibaldi, could appropriate all the good he did and disclaim responsibility for all the harm; the man who forced Turin on the Congress of Paris, and even jockeyed D'Azeglio out of the post of plenipotentiary; the man under whose rule a negligible, poverty-stricken little kingdom was exalted into the crux of all Europe, was obviously no sentimental adventurer, no shrieking revolutionary, but a statesman of genius. Cavour was strong enough to be mean, and Mr. Cadogan, whose temperate, sound biography is an admirable piece of work, simply wastes trouble in trying to pretend that the affair of D'Azeglio was anything but a master stroke of deceit. And, unpleasant as all such characters cannot fail to be, there is so much that was admirable in Cavour the man, besides what was powerful in Cavour the statesman, that one cannot but regard his death as a calamity, not only for himself, but for the kingdom he formed. "He died," says Gregorovius, "like Moses on Mount Nebo, his face turned to the promised land, which he was not to enter." It would have been well for his Israelites had he lived. Cavour would have found some way out of the deadlock: since his day there has been no statesman able to grapple with the difficulty. He would have eased the surrender and prevented the spoliation of the Papacy he loved, as a spiritual force, with all the reforming ardour of Rosmini. Fuit Roma. He made it the capital of his kingdom. But he cannot be blamed for the ignorance and spite of those who are unworthy to inherit what he won for them.

THE QUEEN OF THE ADRIATIC

Studies in the History of Venice. By HORATIO F. BROWN. Two volumes. (John Murray, 18s. net.)

THE historian of Venice is confronted with certain initial difficulties. The magnitude of the subject is bewildering, and there are not wanting the elements of paradox. For Venice is unique among the cities of the world in that, with the oldest and proudest aristocracy in Europe, she based her claims to greatness chiefly upon her commercial enterprise. The trading instinct has, indeed, characterised her citizens from the earliest times. It tempered even the chivalry of the mediæval Crusaders, who returned from the Holy Land laden with costly spoils. It formed the basis of that sense of civic responsibility which became the distinguishing note of the Venetian Republic. To the ideal of the State all private interests and ambitions were subordinated. Unlike Rome, Florence and Assisi, Venice is less a city of great names than of great movements. She boasts no Michel Angelo, no Dante, no St. Francis. Her triumphs lay in the good government of her citizens, in her freedom from attack.

in the expansion of her trade. Deeply tinged with the spirit of the Orient—her very churches betray the influence of Byzantium—she never absorbed that fatalist philosophy which has proved so detrimental to the great civilisations of the East. From the beginnings of her history to her final overthrow by Napoleon Bonaparte, she preserved a continuity of tradition which the stormiest vicissitudes and the bloodiest revolutions were unable to impair.

The English student of Venetian history owes a debt of deep and lasting gratitude to the labours of Mr. Horatio Brown. Alike as an original investigator and as the translator of Molmenti, Mr. Brown has done more than any contemporary writer to interpret the Queen of the Adriatic to English readers. His latest book consists of a series of careful studies in some of the outstanding events in Venetian history. Ten of the essays included in these volumes had already appeared in "Venetian Studies"—a work, unfortunately, now out of print. They have all, however, been revised in the light of subsequent research.

A diligent study of contemporary documents has led Mr. Brown to dissent somewhat violently from the traditional standpoint on more than one topic. In his illuminating paper on the conspiracy of Marino Falier, for instance, he demonstrates with convincing force the falsity of that view which sees in the ducal conspirator a liberator endeavouring to free his subjects from an intolerable tyranny—a conception which we owe mainly to Byron. Following Signor Lazzarini, Mr. Brown proves that the Doge was actuated throughout by motives of private revenge, and that, from the moment of its inception, the conspiracy was due to failure. There was no public sentiment behind it. The personality of the chief actor in the tragedy has invested the movement with an entirely fictitious importance. It looms far larger in the popular imagination than the conspiracy of Bajamonte Tiepolo, though, as Mr. Brown very justly says "the one created the Council of Ten, while the other merely demonstrated its supremacy."

An even more interesting paper is the one on Political Assassination. Venice has earned an unenviable notoriety as a city of assassins. But Venice has always had her enemies, and, in every age, there have been those who have not scrupled to attack the Republic with a venomous and unwarrantable malignity. An acquaintance with the actual facts of the case does not tend to the impression that life was less secure in Venice than in any other great capital, during the period when political assassination was regarded as a convenience rather than as a crime. The age was not conspicuous for its nicety in these matters. An enemy to the State was a public menace, and his removal, by whatever means, became a subject of prime consideration. The instruments employed were not the cleanest: the tools of statesmen seldom are. But the professional murderer multiplied and flourished—in Venice, as elsewhere. Mr. Brown has unearthed a curious tariff tendered by Brother John, of Ragusa, to the Council of Ten. It runs as follows:

On the 14th December, 1513, the said Brother John of Ragusa presented himself to the Presidents of the Ten, and declared that he would work wonders in killing any one they chose by certain means of his own invention, and therefore begs: First, that on the success of his experiment he shall receive one thousand five hundred ducats a year for life; secondly, that if the noble lords wish him to operate on anyone else, the annuity shall be raised in a sum to be agreed upon.

The Council were graciously pleased to close with the offer, and there followed a scale of prices:

For the Grand Turk, 500 ducats; for the King of Spain (exclusive of travelling expenses), 150 ducats; for the Duke of Milan, 60 ducats; for the Marquis of Mantua, 50 ducats; for his Holiness, only 100 ducats. As a rule, the longer the journey and the more valuable the life, the higher would be the price.

It is impossible, within the brief limits of a review, to bestow more than a cursory glance at the contents of these two volumes. We may, however, commend, as especially worthy of notice, the essay on "Caterina Cornaro, Queen of Cyprus," the brilliant and scholarly lecture on Paolo Sarpi, and the short paper on "Shakespeare and Venice," which is a model of exegetical criticism.

There are a few minor misprints. It is only fair, for instance, to assume that when the author represents the Turkish slave-girl Dorotea as saying:—(ii.-156) "Monsignor Bianchetti, chamberlain to Pope Gregory, was my sponsor at the front," the word font is intended.

GENIUS LOCI

The Sentimental Traveller. By VERNON LEE. (Lane, 3s. 6d. net.)

AGE may have its special charm and dignity. It has been written somewhere that the beauty of old age declares the triumph of the spirit. That beauty is rare, but very precious and encouraging. Moreover, it has this peculiarity, common in a less degree to all forms of beauty—namely, that it is only apparent to a very few. A certain reverence is necessary for its appreciation, and a greater self-elimination than is required to see other forms of beauty. That point is illustrated in "The Princess and the Goblin," one of the most delightful fairy tales that have ever been written. Not everyone could find the old staircase that led through deserted rooms to the garret chamber where lived that very old princess, Irene's great-great-grandmother. In reading this volume of notes on places by Vernon Lee, it is impossible not to be reminded of that exquisite old princess. Vernon Lee writes with a kind of graceful intimacy, and takes you into her confidence with dignity. There is nothing querulous, nothing acid, nothing pompous in what she writes or in her manner of writing. All is sweet and gentle, and touched with that indefinable grace which age alone can lend. Very soon you hear the low tones of her voice, you see "the great brow and the spirit-small hand propping it," you watch for the smile of pleasure at a happy expression, and the various movements of her face as she shows the humour, or the beauty, or the pathos of some matter. For you cannot but feel in the company of a very distinguished and very beautiful old lady. You cannot but listen to her words with reverence. And she is speaking about her favourite subject, what she calls the Genius Loci, the spirit that inhabits different places, and to whose influence she has grown more and more sensitive, more and more alive as the years have advanced upon her. She has travelled much and seen many places, always in her own way, always remaining quietly, firmly individual:

The places for which we feel such love are fashioned, before we see them, by our wishes and fancy; we recognise rather than discover them in the world of reality; and this power of shaping, or at least seeing, things to suit our heart's desire comes not of facility and surfeit, but of repression and short commons.

So, when she is talking of Wernigerode, she tells how she and her friend climbed the Poor Folks' Hill, and dusk overtook them as they conversed among the hills about Stevenson and the romantic parts of Meredith; how, coming suddenly upon the lights of the little town, it seemed an adventure had happened to them, and, having lit the porcelain stove, they read the Walpurgis Night and Faust's Death in the twopenny edition. And that reminds her of another memorable evening at Dessau, when she was suffering from a persistent cold, and the same friend tended her:

with temperate punch and the "Letters of Goethe and Bettina." Was the punch really as hot and as fragrant of lemon? Are those letters really so marvellous a brew of finest lyricism, humour, and romance?

She remembers how they talked and how they seemed to partake of all the finest qualities of Goethe and Bettina, and wonders whether her memory has played her false. Then answers the question with a little sigh and a half smile of sad amusement, saying:

Alas! we are, habitually, none of us one-half as interesting or appreciative or wise or childish, as lovable and loving—in a word, as happy—as we have it in us to be. And the dear Spirit of Localities, taking our shape by turns (as mocking elves were wont), did, after all, perhaps merely reveal our real self to ourselves and each other. And surely that is one of the most interesting recollections we can bring back from foreign travel.

And so she continues to talk with the same whimsical charm and precision. Whether we agree or differ with what she says is of small account. We listen with delight and out of courtesy which her manner compels, leaving our own standpoint, where necessary, and looking, as it were, with her eyes, we come to see much that is beautiful and some things which we might have missed.

Perhaps she is gentlest and most attractive (most her real self, if we may plagiarise an expression) when she is writing about the chapel of the sick children at Berck, which stands among the sandhills by the sea. She tells you what the place meant to her, and how M. Albert Besnard has expressed that meaning on the walls of the little chapel which stands among the sand-dunes, out of joy at his child's recovery, healed by the doctors of the great hospital at Berck. She feels the forces of perdition and redemption arrayed against each other at Berck with singular distinctness:

The poverty, brutality, overwork and shame of the great cities, which send out cargoes of such poor little half-living refuse; on the other side the tender skill of hand, the disciplined intuition, the impersonal motherly love, which say No to all such horrors; and the cleansing sea-tides and winds, the quickening sunshine among the sands which add their steady elemental No to the faltering human one.

And she goes on to explain how these forces fuse themselves quite naturally into visible symbols; and she describes the frescoes which M. Besnard painted. You see the gleam in her eyes as she says, quite quietly:

All evil is disease, begotten of ignorance and indifference; and the double holiness of heart and mind shall rise up and cast it forth from the world of mortal men.

Age has lent her added grace and dignity, and has taken away none of the hopefulness and vitality which are supposed to belong to youth.

MISADVENTURES AMONG MASTERPIECES

Through the Magic Door. BY A. CONAN DOYLE.
(Smith Elder, 5s.)

SIR CONAN DOYLE tells a curious story in this book "of one of several incidents in my life which have convinced me of spiritual interposition—of the promptings of some beneficent force outside ourselves, which tries to help us where it can." The particular occasion of this "perfectly marvellous" declaration of faith is that, by a piece of singular good fortune which he cannot believe to be of the nature of a mere coincidence, he was once prevented from writing a story which Maupassant had already written. Whereat he is constrained to aver, in a sudden illumination of charity: "The old Catholic doctrine of the Guardian Angel is not only a beautiful one, but has in it, I believe, a real basis of truth."

Well, we are not sure that this "spiritual interposition" (why so vague?) was not a little unnecessary. Why should one of our most popular novelists, author of seven-and-twenty books, shrink from competition with Maupassant? Surely he is something too modest. And further, if it be not a profane meddling with profoundest mysteries, why was there no "spiritual interposition, prompting of some beneficent force" when "Through the Magic Door" was darkly suggested to him? The Magic Door, we may explain, after glancing at the frontispiece, is apparently the door of Sir Conan Doyle's study. We believe the contents of the book have already appeared in one of the magazines. This we mention in justice to the author—but after all, why trouble about it when the author is not particular, in justice to himself, to mention it? Indeed, we are thinking that in justice to himself he would not have published the book at all. There are a dozen "chats about books," the "chatty" nature of which you are to understand, we presume, by the slovenliness of the style. For that style there is, we think, just one word which will describe it exactly and which the author will be quick to appreciate; the style is "slack."

From the extract already given it will be guessed that Sir Conan Doyle has distilled his criticism through the medium of his own personality. It is essentially personal criticism, though we fancy he would disclaim the title of critic; but if we do not take him as critic we don't know how to take him. And the best critics, Arnold, Pater, and Mr. T. P. O'Connor, have always made criticism personal. Sir Conan's is genially personal, as when he says of Borrow: "My word, what English the fellow could write!"—though in Borrow's case it is sometimes more to the point to say, what English he did write. Or it is intimately and deliciously personal as when, in a tribute to Macaulay, from whose essays he has had most pleasure and profit, he recalls the time when Macaulay's tomb was:— the one great object of interest which London held for me. And so it might well be when I think of all I owe him. It is not merely the knowledge and stimulation of fresh interests, but it is the charming gentlemanly tone, the broad liberal outlook, the general absence of bigotry and of prejudice.

This confession of personal qualities has the frankness of Montaigne, and even more than Montaigne's indiscretion. Perhaps it is a little lofty of Sir Conan to claim "charming gentlemanly tone"; but how thankful we must be for the "broad liberal outlook," etc.

Of our author as critic we fear we cannot speak so highly. The instinct which in Sherlock Holmes was so swift and unerring is here at fault; and, playing Dr. Watson to Sir Conan, we are reluctantly betrayed into a suspicion of his intuitions. The range of the book, says the publisher, "is very broad, for there is no branch of literature which is not discussed. Above all, it is not pedantic, but companionable and human." Doubtless they are pedantic people who hold a special or unique regard for Charles Lamb as one of the finest and wisest spirits, for our literary Sherlock has discovered an essayist to be put above Lamb—"because there is a flavour of actual knowledge and of practical acquaintance with the problems and affairs of life, which is lacking in the elfin Londoner. Both are exquisite, but—is for ever touching some note which wakes an answering vibration within my own mind." Who is it? you ask with alert astonishment. It is Oliver Wendell Holmes, the immortal detective's namesake and—surely!—intellectual compeer. It is in Holmes—the American one—that "the lightest and deftest touch is found"; in witness whereof you are given a page of the autocrat's colourless platitude.

You will not now be surprised to learn that a faulty passage from Mr. F. T. Bullen is quoted as an example of "the music of prose," a passage in which you hear of "coruscating clusters of countless stars" and a vapour that "clung clammily." You will not be surprised to hear that our author "has a strong belief in the critical discernment of the public" and does not think good work is ever overlooked. Who can speak more confidently on this than the author of "The Sign of Four?" You will not be surprised to hear that the "Lives of the Poets," that fine body of powerful writing and generally powerful sense, "are no more than a succession of prefaces;" that Sir Conan Doyle "has no great sympathy with Sterne's 'finicky' methods;" that though Hawthorne has never appealed in the highest degree to him and is dismissed in six irrevocable lines, the unhappy Hawthorne's portrait yet forms one of the embellishments of the book; or that, in asserting a resemblance between Macaulay and Scott (in a comparison of their poetry), he says, with equal elegance and acuteness, "The machines must be alike when the products are so similar." You will not, in short, be surprised at the whole book.

Do not think the author has a light view of his responsibility in calling the world to "The Magic Door." On the vital question of an artist's subject-limitation he says:—"We are of our own age and must live up to it." Who more competent to speak of the needs of our own age? If we have dealt at more length than may seem necessary with a book that, critically, may be called parasitic, it is because it affords curious evidence of the intellectual competence of a very popular figure in current literature. That he is popular is nothing to us, since it does not affect the merit of his essay in criticism. What is to the point is that a novelist of some contemporary prestige should use that prestige in behalf of a book which is, to speak generously, of the very smallest value. We need not repeat that the style is bad; that of itself is hardly pertinent to the question; Professor Saintsbury's style is bad. But what we do expect is that such a volume as this shall provide in itself and apart from its author's reputation some plain and powerful justification for itself. "Through the Magic Door," however, contains nothing of value; with the possible exception of a chapter on prize-fighters and another on Napoleonic memoirs, it contains nothing of interest. It is purely parasitic. In justice to himself, the author, we would say again—but there! our belief in guardian angels, at any rate in Sir Conan Doyle's, is sadly shaken.

THE WORLD'S RELIGIONS

What is Religion? By WILHELM BOUSSET. Translated by F. B. Low. (Fisher Unwin, 5s. net.)

IN this brilliant book Professor Bousset addresses himself primarily neither to students nor theologians. His appeal is to all who care about religion, to all who "feel within themselves at least a questioning and a seeking after this side of life." Only those who hold that religion is "merely fantasy created by man's urgent impulse and an illusion" can fail to find a fruitful source of inspiration in the volume. Professor Bousset writes as an ardent believer in Christianity. To him not only is Christianity the highest point reached, but "in it all former lines of religious thought appear to converge." He discards entirely the old idea so long clung to by theologians that to Judaism alone had Christianity any affinity. He aims at showing that all forms of religion contain phases of God's revelation to man. The beliefs of the past were not base and degrading superstitions, full of falsehood from beginning to end. They were the germs from which the truth sprang. They were Christianity in the making. Religion passed through many stages before it culminated in the Christian faith, and in order to understand it in all its aspects, we must look at it in its infancy and youth as well as maturity. It is only by means of a comprehensive survey such as this that we are in a position to attempt to answer the question as to what religion really is. Professor Bousset lays down the proposition that the whole religious life of man and his history springs from the work and action of God by means of which He draws men individually from error to truth, from imperfection to perfection, from egoism to fraternity, from the sensual to the moral, from the natural to the spiritual, and attracts them to Himself.

Starting with the most primitive condition of mind wherein the difference between man and the animal is not felt, when men are depicted as descended from animals, animals change into men and men into animals, the author proceeds to show that even in the crudest and most savage ideas lie the fixed belief that death is not the end of all things. From fetish worship and ancestor worship sprang the tribal life. National life is created by the union of different tribes and with the idea of nationality comes the death of savagery. But "the basis of national life is the basis of polytheism." As tribal distinctions fade the gods remain. Separate provinces of the national life are assigned to the separate gods according to their character. Thus the divinity of the conquering tribe remains the god of war and probably the god of the conquered tribe is considered the god of shepherd and peasant life. In forming an estimate of religion based on national life, Professor Bousset uses as concrete examples the Babylonian and the Greek religions. The Babylonian Pantheon had its Trinity who stood at the head of all its other gods. The relation of man to the godhead in the Babylonian religion is that of complete subjection. The author quotes from the litanies which have been collected under the name of the Babylonian Penitential Psalms, extracts which bear striking resemblances to the Old Testament Psalms. A great many hymns and songs have come down to us in which the believers acknowledge their sins and implore the god to show mercy:

I, Thy servant, full of sighs, call upon Thee,
I am a sinner, whose ardent entreaty Thou wilt accept;
Like the doves do I moan, I am o'ercome with sighing,
With lamentation and groaning my spirit is downcast.

Professor Bousset claims that the Greek religion stood indisputably highest among the national religions. It afforded the most striking example of a national life, permeated through and through with religion. And so through all the religions of polytheism "everywhere we are conscious of broken rays of a Divine nature which shine into the hearts of men; broken rays certainly, but rays of Divine majesty and glory, of Divine goodness and charity." Professor Bousset divides the religions of the world into religions of the law, of which Judaism and Islamism are the chief examples, and religions of the Redemption, which are best represented by Buddhism and Christianity. He does not discover in Buddhism any elements likely to appeal to the Western world:

The work of the world and the morality developed from it lies only on the outside of Buddhism. All this is regarded, as it were, as subordinate, the central idea and the final object remaining "flight from the world." Thus in attracting constantly the best and most profound minds, in calling away from the work of the world those who are striving upwards and aspiring to the higher life, by showing them the gate of deliverance, Buddhism has contributed at the same time to stagnation; for wherever it is the dominating religion, civilisation and morality have stood still, have remained in a state of torpor and sunk deeper and deeper into spiritual death.

It is, then, to Christianity that we shall turn, for as Professor Bousset concludes: "What we have learned in the course of our wanderings through the history of religion is precisely this fact, that the Christian religion is absolutely superior to all the other religions, and that Christianity represents the highest point which religious development has reached."

THE ACADEMY

JANUARY 25, 1908

EDUCATION

THE SCHOOLMASTER'S DREAM

THE boys vanished, and Mr. Horbury returned to his task: he was editing a selection called "English Literature for Lower Forms." He began to read from the slips that he had prepared:—

So all day long the noise of battle roll'd
Among the mountains by the winter sea;
Until King Arthur's table, man by man,
Had fallen in Lyonesse.

He stopped and set a figure by the last word, and then on a blank slip, with a corresponding letter, he repeated the figure, and wrote the note:—

Lyonesse = the Scilly Isles.

Then, he took a third slip and wrote the question:—

Give the ancient name of the Scilly Isles.

These serious labours employed him till twelve o'clock. He put the materials of his book away as the clock struck, and solemnly mixed himself his nightly glass of whisky and soda—in the day-time he never touched spirits—and lit the one cigar which he smoked in the twenty-four hours. The stings of the Head's sherry and of his conversation no longer burned within him; time, work, and the bite of the cane in Meyrick's flesh had soothed his spirit, and he set himself to dream, leaning back in his arm-chair, watching the cheerful fire.

He was thinking of what he would do when he succeeded to the Headmastership. Already there were rumours that Chesson had refused the Bishopric of St. Dubric's in order that he might be free to accept Dorchester, which, in the nature of things, must soon be vacant. Horbury had no doubt that the Headmastership would be his; he had influential friends who assured him that the trustees would not hesitate for an instant. Then he would show the world what an English public school could be made. In five years, he calculated, he would double the numbers. He saw the coming importance of the modern side, and especially of science. Personally, he detested "stinks," but he knew what an effect he would produce with a great laboratory fitted with the best appliances, under the charge of a highly qualified master. Then again, a great gymnasium must be built; there must be an engineer's shop, too, and a carpenter's as well. And people were beginning to complain that a public school education was of no use in the City; there must be a business master, an expert from the Stock Exchange, who would see that this reproach was removed. Then he considered that a large number of the boys belonged to the land-owning class; why should a country gentleman be at the mercy of his agent, forced for lack of technical knowledge to accept statements he could not check? It was clear that the management of land and great estates must have its part in the scheme; and again, the best known of the crammers must be bought on his own terms, so that boys wishing to get into the Army or Civil Service would be, practically, compelled to come to Lupton. Already he saw paragraphs in the Guardian and the Times—in all the papers—paragraphs which mentioned the fact that 95 per cent. of the successful candidates for the Indian Civil Service had received their education at the foundation of "stout old Martin Rolle." Meanwhile, in all this flood of novelty the old traditions should be maintained with more vigour than ever. The classics should be taught as they had never been taught. Every one of the masters on this side should be in the highest honours, and, if possible, he would get famous men for the work—they should not merely be good, but also notorious scholars. Gee, the famous explorer in Crete, who had made an enormous mark in regions widely removed from the scholastic world by his wonderful book, "Daedalus: or, The Secret of the Labyrinth," must come to Lupton at any price; and Maynard, who had discovered some important Greek manuscripts in Egypt, he must have a form, too. Then there was Randall, who had done so well with his "Thucydides," and Davies, author of "The Olive of Athene," a daring but most brilliant book, which promised to upset the whole established theory of Mythology—he would have such a staff as no school had ever dreamed of. "We shall have no difficulty about paying them," thought Horbury, "our numbers will go up by leaps and bounds, and the fees shall be £500 a year—and such terms will do us more good than anything."

He went into minute detail. He must take expert advice as to the advisability of the school farming on its own account, and so supplying the boys with milk, meat, bread and butter, and vegetables at first cost. He believed it could be done; he would get a Scotch farmer from the Lowlands and make him superintendent at a handsome salary and with a share in the profits. There would be the splendid advertisement of "the whole dietary of the school supplied from the school farms under the supervision of Mr. David Anderson, formerly of Haddanneuk, the largest tenancy in the Duke of Ayr's estates." The food would be better, and cheaper, too; but there would be no luxury. The "Spartan" card was always worth playing; one must strike the note of plain living in a luxurious age; there must be no losing of the old public school severity. On the other hand, the boys' hands should be free to go into their own pockets—there should be no restraint here. If a boy chose to bring in Dindonneau aux truffes or Pieds de Mouton à la Ste. Menehould to help out his tea, that was his look-out. Why should not the school grant a concession to some big London firm who would pay handsomely for the privilege of supplying the hungry lads with every kind of expensive luxury? The sum could be justly made a large one; as any competing shops could be promptly put out of bounds, with reason or without it. On one side Confiserie, at the other counter Charcuterie; enormous prices could be charged to the wealthy boys of whom the school would be composed. Yet, on the other hand, the distinguished visitor—judge, bishop, peer, or whatnot—would lunch at the Headmaster's house and eat the boys' dinner and go away saying it was quite the plainest, and very nearly the best, meal he had ever tasted. There would be well-hung saddle of mutton, roasted, and not baked, floury potatoes and cauliflower, apple pudding and real English cheese, with an excellent glass of the school beer, an honest and delicious beverage made of malt and hops in the well-found school brewery. Horbury knew enough of modern eating and drinking to understand that such a meal would be a choice rarity to nine rich people out of ten; and yet it was "Spartan," utterly devoid of luxury and ostentation.

Again, he passed from detail and minutiae into great Napoleonic regions. A thousand boys at £500 a year; that would be an income for the school of five hundred thousand pounds! The profits would be gigantic, immense; after paying large, even extravagant prices to the staff, after all building expenses had been deducted, he hardly dared to think how large a sum would accrue year by year to the trustees. The vision began to assume such magnificence that it became oppressive; it put on the splendour and delights of the haschisch dreams, which are too great and too piercing for mortal hearts to bear. And yet it was no mirage; there was not a step that could not be demonstrated, shown to be based on hard, matter-of-fact business considerations. He tried to keep back his growing excitement, to argue with himself that he was dealing in visions, but the facts were too obstinate. He saw that it would be his part to work the same miracle in the scholastic world as the great American storekeepers had operated in the world of retail trade. The principle was precisely the same: instead of a hundred small shops making comparatively lean and humdrum profits, you had the vast emporium doing business on the gigantic scale, with vastly diminished expenses and vastly increased rewards.

Here again was a hint. He had thought of America, and he knew that here was an inexhaustible gold-mine that no other scholastic projector had even dreamed of. The rich American was notoriously hungry for everything that was English, from frock-coats to pedigrees; he had never thought of sending his son to an English public school because he considered the system hopelessly behind the times. But the new translated Lupton would be to other public schools as a New York hotel of the latest fashion is to a village beershop; and yet the young millionaire would grow up in the company of English gentlemen, imbibing the unique culture of English life, while at the same time he enjoyed all the advantages of modern ideas, modern science, and modern business training. Land was still comparatively cheap at Lupton; the school must buy it quietly, indirectly, by degrees; and then pile after pile of vast buildings rose before his eyes; he saw the sons of the rich from all the ends of the world drawn to the great school, there to learn the great secret of the Anglo-Saxons.

Chesson was mistaken in that idea of his, which he thought daring and original, of establishing a distinct Jewish house, where the food should be "kosher." The rich Jew who desired to send his son to an English public school was, in nine cases out of ten, anxious to do so precisely because he wanted to sink his son's connection with Jewry in oblivion. He had heard Chesson talk of "our Christian duty to the seed of Israel" in this connection; the man was clearly a fool. No; the more Jews the better, but no Jewish house. And no Puseyism either; broad, earnest religious teaching, with a leaning to moderate Anglicanism should be the faith of Lupton. As to this, Chesson was certainly sound enough; he had always made a firm stand against Ecclesiasticism in any form. Horbury understood the average English parent of the wealthier classes thoroughly; he knew that though he generally calls himself a Churchman he is quite content to have his sons prepared for Confirmation by a confessed Agnostic; certainly this liberty must not be curtailed when Lupton became cosmopolitan. "We will retain all the dignified associations which belong to the Established Church," he said to himself, "and at the same time we shall be utterly free from the taint of over-emphasis of dogmatic teaching." He had a sudden brilliant idea; everybody in Church circles was saying that the English bishops were terribly overworked, that it was impossible for the most strenuous men, with the best intentions, to supervise effectually the huge dioceses that had descended from the sparsely-populated England of the Middle Ages. Everywhere there was a demand for suffragans and more suffragans; in the last week's Guardian there were three letters on the subject, one from a clergyman in their own diocese. The bishop had been attacked by some rabid Ritualistic person, who had pointed out that nine out of every ten parishes had not so much as seen the colour of his hood ever since his appointment, ten years before. The Archdeacon of Melby had replied in a capital letter, scathing, yet humorous. Horbury turned to the paper on the table beside his chair and looked up the letter. "In the first place," wrote the archdeacon, "your correspondent does not seem to have realised that the ethos of the Diocese of Melby is not identical with that of sacerdotalism. The sturdy folk of the Midlands have not yet, I am thankful to say, forgotten the lessons of our Great Reformation; they have no wish to see a revival of the purely mechanical religion of the Middle Ages—of the system of a sacrificing priesthood and of sacraments efficacious ex opere operato. Hence they do not regard the Episcopate quite in the same light as your correspondent 'Senex,' who, it seems to me, looks upon a bishop as a sort of Christianised 'medicine-man,' endowed with certain mysterious powers which have descended to him by an (imaginary) spiritual succession. This was not the view of Hooker, nor, I venture to say, has it ever been the view of the really representative Divines of the Established Church of England. Still," the archdeacon went on, "it must be admitted that the present diocese of Melby is unwieldy, and it may be fairly said, unworkable." Then there followed the humorous anecdote of Sir Boyle Roche and the Bird, and finally the archdeacon emitted the prayer that God in His own good time would put it into the hearts of our rulers in Church and State to give their good bishop an episcopal curate.

Horbury got up from his chair and paced up and down the study; his excitement was so great that he could keep quiet no longer. His cigar had gone out long ago; and he had only sipped the whisky and soda. His eyes glittered with excitement; circumstances seemed positively to be playing into his hands, the dice of the world were being loaded in his favour; he was like Bel Ami at his wedding, he almost began to believe in Providence.

For he was sure it could be managed. There was a general feeling that no one man could do the work of the diocese; there must be a suffragan; and Lupton must give the new bishop his title. No other town was possible. Dunham had certainly been a see in the eighth century; but it was now little more than a village, served by a miserable little branch line, whereas Lupton was on the great main track of the Midland system, with easy connections to every part of the country. The archdeacon, who was also a peer, would undoubtedly become the first bishop of Lupton; and he should be the titular chaplain of the great school! "Chaplain: the Right Reverend Lord Selwyn, Lord Bishop of Lupton." Horbury gasped; it was too magnificent, too splendid. He knew Lord Selwyn quite well, and had no doubt as to his acceptance; he was a poor man, and there would be no difficulty whatever in establishing a modus. Sunt certi denique fines, he murmured to himself, thinking of Burke's translation of the line. The archdeacon was just the man for the place; he was no pedantic theologian, but a broad, liberal-minded man of the world; Horbury remembered, almost with ecstasy, that he had lectured all over the United States with immense success, the American Press had been enthusiastic, and the First Congregational Church of Chicago had implored Selwyn to accept its call, preach what he liked, and pocket an honorarium of twenty-five thousand dollars a year. And on the other hand, what could the most orthodox desire safer than a chaplain who was not only a bishop but a peer of the realm? Wonderful! here were the three birds—Liberalism, Orthodoxy, and Reverence for the House of Lords—caught safe and secure in this one net.

The games? They should be maintained in all their glory, rather on an infinitely more splendid scale. Cricket and sticker (the Lupton hockey), rackets and fives should all be encouraged; and more, Lupton should be the only school to possess a tennis-court. The noble jeu de paume, the game of kings, the most aristocratic of all sports, should have a worthy home at Lupton; they would train champions, they would have both French and English markers skilled in the latest developments of the chemin de fer service. "Better than half a yard, I think," said Horbury to himself; "they will have to do their best to beat that."

But he placed more reliance on Rocker. This was the Lupton football, as ancient and distinctive in its way as the Eton wall-game. People have thought that the name is a sort of portmanteau word, a combination of "rugger" and "soccer," but in reality the title was derived from a field where the game used to be played in old days by the townsfolk. As in many other places, football at Lupton had been originally an excuse for a faction-fight between two parishes in the town—St. Michael's, the parish church, and St. Paul's-in-the-Fields. Every year, on Shrove Tuesday, the townsfolk, young and old, had proceeded to the town field and had fought out their differences with considerable violence. The field was broken land, a deep, sluggish stream crossed one edge of it, and in the middle there were quarries and jagged limestone rocks. Hence football was called in the old time "playing rocks," for, indeed, it was considered an excellent point of play to hurl a man on the other side over the edge of the quarry on to the rocks beneath, and so late as 1830 a certain Jonas Simpson of St. Michael's had had his spine broken in this way. However, as a boy from St. Paul's was drowned in the Wand on the same day, the game was always reckoned a draw. It was from the peculiarities of this old English sport that the school had constructed its game. The town field had, of course, long been stolen from the townsfolk and built over; but the boys had, curiously enough, perpetuated the tradition of its peculiarities in a kind of football ritual. For, besides the two goals, one part of the field was marked by a line of low white posts; these indicated the course of a nomenal Wand brook, and in the line of these posts it was lawful to catch an opponent by the throat and choke him till he turned black in the face—the best substitute for drowning that the revisers of the game could imagine. Again, about the centre of the field two taller posts indicated the position of the quarries, and between these you might be hit or kicked full in the stomach without the smallest ground for complaint, the stroke being a milder version of the old fall on the rocks. There are many other like amenities in Rocker, and Horbury held that it was by far the manliest variant of the game. For this pleasing sport he now designed a world-wide fame; Rocker should be played wherever the English flag floated. East and west, north and south, from Hong Kong to British Columbia, in Canada and New Zealand there should be the repêvoi of this great rite; and the traveller seeing the mystic enclosure, the two goals, the line of little posts marking "brooks," and the two poles indicating "quarries," should know English soil as surely as by the Union Jack. The technical terms of Rocker should become a part of the great Anglo-Saxon inheritance; the whole world should hear of "bully-downs" and "tokering," of "outsides" and "rammers." It would require working, but it was to be done: articles in the magazines and in the Press, perhaps a story of school life, a new "Tom Brown" must be written. The Midlands and the North must be shown that there was money in it, and the rest would be easy.

One thing troubled Horbury. His mind was full of the new and splendid buildings that were to be erected, but he was sure that antiquity counted for something, and unfortunately Lupton could show very little that was really antique. Forty years before, Stanley, the first reforming headmaster, had pulled down the old High School. There were prints of it; it was a half-timbered, fifteenth century building, with a dipping roof-line and an overhanging upper storey; there were dim, leaded windows, and a grey, arched porch—an ugly old barn Stanley called it. Scott was called in and built the present High School, a splendid hall in red brick, French thirteenth century, with Venetian detail, and it was much admired. But Horbury was sorry that the old school had been destroyed; he saw for the first time that it might have been made a valuable attraction. Then again, Dowsing, who succeeded Stanley, had knocked the Cloisters all to bits, there was only one side of the quadrangle left, and this had been boarded up and used as a gardener's shed. Horbury did not know what to think of the destruction of the Cross that used to stand in the centre of the quad.; no doubt Dowsing was right in thinking it superstitious still it might have been left as a curiosity and shown to visitors, just as the instruments of bygone cruelty—the rack and the Iron Maid—are preserved and exhibited to wondering sightseers. There was no real danger of any superstitious adoration of the Cross; it was, as a matter of fact, as harmless as the axe and block at the Tower of London. Stanley and Dowsing had been too hasty, they had ruined what might have been important assets in the exploitation of the school.

Still, perhaps the loss was not altogether irreparable. High School was gone, and could not be recovered; but the Cloisters might be restored, and the Cross, too. Horbury knew that most people thought that the monument in front of Charing Cross Railway Station was a genuine antique; why not get a good man to build them a Cross? Not like the old one, of course; that "Fair Roode with our Dere Ladie Saint Marie and Saint John, and below, the Stories of the Blissful Saints and Angels"—that would never do. But a vague, Gothic erection, with plenty of kings and queens, imaginary benefactors of the school, and a small cast-iron cross at the top; that would give no offence to anybody, and might pass with nine people out of ten as a genuine remnant of the Middle Ages. It could be made of soft stone and allowed to weather for a few years, then a coat of invisible anti-corrosive fluid would preserve carvings and imagery that would already appear venerable in decay. There was no need to make any precise statements; parents and the public might be allowed to draw their own conclusions.

Horbury was neglecting nothing. He was building up a great scheme in his mind, and to him it seemed that every detail was worth attending to, while at the same time he did not lose sight of the whole effect. He believed in finish, there must be no rough edges. It seemed to him that a school legend must be invented. The real history was not quite what he wanted, though it might work in with a more decorative account of Lupton's origins. One might use the textus receptus of Martin Rolle's foundation—the bequest of land c. 1430 to build and maintain a school where a hundred boys should be taught grammar, and ten poor scholars and six priests should pray for the founder's soul. This was well enough, but one might hint that Martin Rolle really re-founded and re-endowed a school of Saxon origin, probably established by King Alfred himself in Luppā's Tun. Then again, who could show that Shakespeare had not visited Lupton? His famous schoolboy, "creeping like snail unwillingly to school," might very possibly have been observed by the poet as he strolled by the banks of the Wand. Many famous men might have received their education at Lupton; it would not be difficult to make a plausible list of such. It would be necessary to give currency to such phrases as, "it has always been a tradition at Lupton that Sir Walter Raleigh received part of his education at the school;" or again, "an earlier generation of Luptonians remembered the initials W.S. S. on A. cut deeply in the mantel of old High School, now unfortunately demolished." Antiquarians would laugh? Possibly; but who cared about antiquarians? For the average man "Charing" was derived from "chère reine," and he loved to have it so, and Horbury intended to appeal to the average man. Though he was a schoolmaster he was no recluse, and he had marked the ways of the world from his quiet study in Lupton; hence he understood the immense value of a grain of quackery in all schemes which are meant to appeal to mortals. It was a deadly mistake to suppose that anything which was all quackery would be a success—a permanent success at any rate—it was a deadlier mistake still to suppose that anything quite devoid of quackery could pay handsomely. The average English palate would shudder at the flavour of aioli, but it would be charmed by the insertion of that petit point d'ail which turned mere goodness into triumphant and laurelled perfection. And there was no need to mention the word "garlic" before the guests. Lupton was not going to be all garlic; it was to be infinitely the best scholastic dish that had ever been served, the ingredients should be unsurpassed, and unsurpassable. But—King Alfred's foundation of a school at Luppā's Tun, and that "W.S. S. on A." cut deeply on the mantel of the vanished High School—these, and legends like unto them, these would be the last touch, le petit point d'ail.

It was a great scheme, wonderful and glorious, and the most amazing thing about it was that it was certain to be realised. There was not a flaw from start to finish; the trustees were certain to appoint him—he had that from a sure quarter—and it was but a question of a year or two, perhaps only of a month or two, before all this great and glorious vision should be converted into hard and tangible fact. Horbury wondered how Columbus felt as he saw at last the shores of his dreams take solid shape and rise above the deep weltering seas. He drank off his glass of whisky and soda, it had become flat and brackish, but to him it was nectar, since it was flavoured with ecstasy.

He frowned suddenly as he went upstairs to his room. An unpleasant recollection had intruded for a moment on his amazing fantasy; but he dismissed the thought as soon as it arose. That was all over, there could be no possibility of trouble from that direction; and so, his mind filled with glowing images, he fell asleep, and saw Lupton as the centre of the whole world, like Jerusalem in the ancient maps.

A student of the deep things of mysticism has detected a curious element of comedy in the management of human concerns; and there certainly seems a touch of humour in the fact that on this very night, while Horbury was building the splendid Lupton of the future, the whole palace of his thought and his life was shattered for ever into bitter dust and nothingness; the dread arrest had been solemnly preconised, and that wretched canonry at Wareham was irrevocably pronounced for doom. Fantastic were the elements and forces that had gone to the ordering of this great sentence; raw corn-spirit in the guise of sherry, the impertinence (or what seemed such) of an elderly clergyman, a boiled leg of mutton, a troublesome and disobedient boy, and—another person.

ARTHUR MACHEN.

SCHOOL BOOKS

It is difficult to believe that any new Latin Grammar for schools is needed. The "Public School Primer," in its various editions, has served so many generations of school-boys that any other exposition of the Latin tongue seems superfluous to those for whom "Common are to either sex" is a classic. Of more advanced grammars there are not a few; but the "First Latin Grammar," by Messrs. E. H. Scott and Frank Jones (Blackie and Son, 2s.), is, as its name implies, intended for beginners. We have no difficulty in admitting the force of its claims. It is admirably arranged, the thick type is judiciously distributed, and the extensive table of propositions, with examples of their use, is a valuable feature of the book. Two good ideas also are the blank columns for the insertion by the learner of examples of verbs of the various types, and the addition to the alphabetical list of verbs of English derivatives so selected as to aid the memorisation of the principal parts. There is a good index. Messrs. J. M. Dent and Co. publish "Aeneae Facta et Fata," by Dr. E. Vernon Arnold (n.p.). This is an attractive little book of selections from the Aeneid with a good introduction, a somewhat lengthy classified vocabulary, and grammar, with some notice of the history of Latin hexameter verse. There are also exercises based upon the text. There are many line illustrations, chiefly drawn from sculptural sources, and a couple of highly coloured and highly imaginative illustrations from the sack of Troy. The book is ingenious, in that it is practically a self-contained elementary "Latin book."

"Cicero in Catilinam, ii. and iv.," by Ralph Harvey, M.A., is published by Hachette and Co. (1s. 6d.). The two speeches with their notes are also published separately. Each paragraph is preceded by an English summary. The notes, which are designed for students who have passed the most elementary stage, are full and easily comprehensible, and special attention is paid to the close definition of shades of meaning. There is also a full vocabulary and an index of proper names. Well worth the shilling, which is its price, is the reprint of Conington's translation of "Aeschylus' Agamemnon," with an introduction and notes by Professor Churton Collins (The Clarendon Press). The introduction consists of a life of Aeschylus, and of a brief but lucid consideration of the Agamemnon legend, the moral and religious teaching of the whole trilogy of which the Agamemnon forms a part, and of the structure and plot of the play. The little book should prove most useful to University Extension students, of whose needs Professor Churton Collins has had so much experience.

To judge from the flood of English texts which is ever pouring from the publishers of educational works, the rising generation should end by knowing something about its own language and literature. We have before us a number of "readers," of "selections," and "collections" which cater for all grades of school students. We cannot quite see the value of the "selections" from Nathaniel Hawthorne's "Wonderbook and Tanglewood," tales edited by H. Hampshire, and published by Messrs. Bell (1s.). The whole of the "Tanglewood" part of the book is carved out, and the selection consists of four "Tanglewood Tales," and one taken from the "Wonderbook." There is a brief life of Hawthorne. In our opinion the books were better, and just as useful, in their original form. Nor can we commend the book from the same publishers in which "The Ancient Mariner and other English Ballads" (edited by A. Guthkelch, 1s.) are brought together. The fact that Coleridge's design was to copy the style of the old English ballads as represented by Percy's "Reliques," does not make the "Rime" a happy companion of "Chevy Chase," Otterbourne or the "Geste of Robyn Hode." And Keats' "Robin Hood" makes an incongruous finish to the whole. Messrs. Horace Marshall's "New English Reading Books, V. and VI." (1s. 6d. each), edited by C. J. Thompson, are of very varying merit. It is with a shock that we discover "Scots wha hae" carefully transliterated into English shape. And we doubt the value of a rather plodding paraphrase of the "Wife of Bath's" tale. Indeed, the trail of "adaptation" is over the whole collection. But the selected passages are well grouped, and Book V., with the sub-title "Stories of the Empire," is a valuable lesson in patriotism for youthful readers. The better selection, on the whole, is that of Book VI., "World Stories," in which Homer (in the shape of Pope's translation), Herodotus, Plutarch, Livy, find a place, while some of the later selections are long enough to be really informing.

We have three "history-books" before us. "The Groundwork of English History," by M. E. Carter (University Tutorial Press, 2s.), is, like the majority of publications from the same source, frankly no more than a collection of note-headings, designed, with a liberal use of heavy type, for "cramming" examination candidates. No doubt it will serve its purpose. "English History from Original Sources, 1216-1307," compiled by N. L. Frazer (Black's Historical Series: A. and C. Black, 2s. 6d.), is the first of a series of volumes of extracts from contemporary authors and documents, so arranged as to present a very nearly consecutive narrative of the principal events of English History. Without seeing the later volumes, by various editors, which bring the history down to 1715, it is hard to say how the scheme will work out, but the books should be most useful in giving some actuality to the teaching of history in schools, if used in conjunction with a history of the usual type. Somewhat of an innovation, of a kind likely to be appreciated in schools north of the Tweed, is an "Outline of Scottish History, from Roman Times to the Disruption," by W. M. Mackenzie (A. and C. Black, n.p.). It is written from a very decidedly Scottish point of view, and strikes the happy mean between an excess of detail on the one hand and of over-brevity on the other. The style is vigorous and rapid, and the tale, of murder, blackmail and treachery, which, first and last, makes up Scottish history, should be as fascinating to a schoolboy as "Henty." There is a certain unevenness to be noted: we doubt whether a student to whom the word "chapter" (of clergy) presents difficulties calling for explanation will be able to appreciate "the tactics of the school of Gustavus Adolphus": and in several instances we have noticed the same uncertainty in the author's mind as to the standard of intelligence he looks for in his readers. None the less the book opens up new fields for school study in a most attractive manner.

Messrs. Macmillan publish "Modern Arithmetic with Graphic and Practical Exercises, Part I.," by H. Sydney Jones (3s.). The book, which has been written mainly with a view to the co-ordination of school arithmetic with the requirements of the various University Local Examinations, seems to us to be sensibly arranged. The introduction of decimals before vulgar fractions, and the inclusion of approximations are the only variants from the plan of the usual elementary arithmetic. "A First Year's Course in Geometry and Physics" (Bell, 2s. 6d.), by E. H. Young, more generally known as the author of "The Kingdom of the Yellow Robe," is a thoroughly practical introduction to the commonsense side of the subject. The smallest boy could understand the opening chapters, and the decimal system is placed within his grasp in a page. Every lesson is practical, and, from our own experience of such teaching, it is also eminently practicable. The methods laid down for the use of simple apparatus are of the right kind to preclude all possibility of the greatest danger in the school laboratory—namely, "fooling about"; and the boy who is taught on the lines of this book will quickly learn to think efficiently. "The Elements of the Geometry of the Conic," by G. H. Bryan and R. H. Pinkerton (Dent, n.p.), is an eminently practical introduction to the study of the conic, which should find favour with students of applied mathematics, physics and engineering. Analytical geometry is not introduced, and the more advanced parts of the subject are not included. A good chapter is that on the catenary, epicycloid, hypocycloid and cardioid curves, which will serve to introduce the student to the more advanced study of these curves with the help of the Calculus. The simplicity of the language and the conciseness of the proofs render the book an excellent one for beginners.

"Steam and Other Engines," by J. Duncan (Macmillan, 2s. 6d.), is written with the object of providing students of engineering with an explanation of the elementary principle of science applicable to heat engines, and with a description of the essential constructional details of typical engines. The student is naturally assumed to possess a knowledge of practical mathematics and of the first principle of machine construction and drawing. A course of laboratory work is provided. The language of the book is simple, and the diagrams and illustrations are intelligible, though in some instances they suffer from over-reduction. The chapter on steam turbines suffers less than most in this way.

"The International Geography," by Seventy Authors, edited by H. R. Mill (Macmillan, 15s.), is not exactly an "educational" book. It is rather an invaluable book of reference: it is "neither a gazetteer nor an encyclopædia, but is intended to give a readable account of the character of all countries as regards land and people in language which is neither technical nor childish." The task has been well performed. Naturally, in a book written by so many hands, there is some inequality. The section dealing with the Balkans seems to us rather less successful than the majority. But on the whole the Editor has been admirably supported. The introductory chapter on the principles and practice of geography is excellent. Throughout the book free use has been made of the diagrammatic method, and the small maps in the text serve their purpose well. The small heraldic sketches are poor, and the line drawn between arms, "arms," and badges seems to be governed rather by fancy than fact. But a minor point like this can well be overlooked in a work of such scope. The price is extraordinarily low. The index is excellent. Altogether it is a most desirable book, and into the limited space of about 1,000 pages an immense amount of information has been compressed.

EDUCATION: A GLANCE AT PRACTICE

THE last year, and especially the latter half of it, has been peculiarly fertile in suggestions to those who are interested in the subject of education or instruction, and I propose to touch on a few of the numerous statements which have been made recently, and seem to me useful or unusually harmful. For the moment I avoid as far as possible the more particular political aspects of the question; on these I may have more to say later. I have already argued in these pages that before the State made attendance at primary schools compulsory under penalties, it ought to have rendered it possible by ensuring that the children of those parents upon whom it pressed hardest, and who had had no voice in the making of the law, were in a physical condition to bear it. It ought to have provided instruction fitted for them, rather than for any more privileged class. Common humanity and common-sense required that the State should do both—it did neither. At last, after forty years of compulsion, the Board of Education reports as follows:

It is the imperative duty of local authorities, and of this Board as supervising their work, to see that the children have at least as good opportunities for improving and developing their physique as their minds. It would be a duty to the child were a healthy body not a condition precedent to effective control of education. As it is, there can be no justification for making the national education compulsory unless this duty is fulfilled by those who inspire the compulsion.

I cannot help digressing, to wonder whether other departments of State are so ethical and self-critical in their reports. Nevertheless, since education actually is compulsory, I am glad that the Board of Education is endeavouring, at least in theory, to remedy the injustice which it has been inspiring for forty years. Whether the remedies are actual is a further question. The Education Act of 1906 allows local education authorities to provide out of the rates free meals to children attending recognised schools. Bradford, among other towns, has availed itself of the Act, and the picture which Miss Margaret Macmillan has given of the result is attractive. She tells of excellent meals, which cost on the average from 1d. to 1½d. a head, according to the numbers of children fed. Their favourite dinner costs ¾d. Croydon, I observe, cannot provide such meals under about 2½d. a head. At Bradford the menu consists of seventeen dinners of food prescribed by a resident doctor, Dr. Crowley, which contains the percentage of proteid, fat, salt, etc., which he judges that children require, from a series of elaborate experiments in feeding and weighing them. The London education authorities, like those at Croydon, are trying to feed the children by means of private subscriptions, and to exclude by systematic enquiries all but necessitous cases. Bradford appears to be lax in this respect. Meanwhile the Social Democratic Federation are doing their best, for political purposes, to wreck the voluntary scheme, by casting on the fund cases of supposititious necessity. It is also urging that clothes should be provided, whether the parents require them or not. How many suits the Federation proposes to have provided for pawning purposes we have not yet been told. These efforts are made for the personal well-being of the children during the school-day; but the Board of Education also remarks that "unless the home conditions can be improved, it is of little use to improve the conditions during the five hours' school out of the total twenty-four hours in the day." This remark follows closely on Mr. G. R. Sims's graphic repetition of the familiar story of dens emptied of everything but filth and starvation, and vast numbers of native parents (unless they be Jews by race), all over the country, whose brutality and callous neglect make these dens Hell to their children. I hope to recur to this question and the remedies suggested, in another article.

So much for the physical state of the children; I go on to their mental development. Professor E. M. Sadler attributes such important changes as these and others which extend the same principles, to the influence of modern science, which has emphasised "the importance of hygiene and of the physical nurture of children"; has by the study of the brain shown "the educational value of handwork," and has influenced modern education in many other directions, unfortunately too many for me to notice. No doubt it is the influence of modern science which has produced corporate effort, but care of the body and the value of handwork were not discovered by modern science to be essentials of education; these certainly have always been so recognised by educators. The same may be said of most of the other essentials which Mr. Sadler mentions. Applied science has indeed, as he says, "led to remarkable developments of technological training," though, again, it is obvious that the necessity of technical training was also always recognised. The care of the body has been a tradition in education from the Greek gymnasia (where it is most familiar to us), and before the Greeks, through Vittorino to Comenius, and beyond him to our grandmothers, the kind women who did their best to provide that the children voluntarily attending the dames' schools in remote hamlets from even more remote cottages, should not go to school ill-clad and ill-fed; just as they provided that they should not be kept away for lack of the small fees. In fact, where has the tradition not prevailed, except under compulsory education in England? Again, when did the training of the hand not form part of education, even when the child had not to live by handicraft? Chiefly under Gothic influence, which some of our modern educators are so anxious to substitute now for Greco-Latin. In Greece, and at the time of the Renaissance, training of the hand was secured by teaching music and drawing. Mahomet enjoined on all men the practice of some form of positive handicraft, and Richard Burton says that the Commander of the Faithful of his day made and sold cigarettes. If training of the hand was not an ancient practice in England, among those to whom it was not necessary to livelihood, it is a very old-fashioned practice. I doubt whether our great-grandfathers were not encouraged in some form of it; perhaps owing to the influence of Comenius. There were certainly more expert conservers and needlewomen among our great-grandmothers than there are cooks of edible food and good plain sewing women among the products of our primary schools now. Among children dependent on labour, training of the hand was, of course, supplied by apprenticeship, under which it was possible to make the workshop the training school for the trade. "Our system of technical education is supplying but a poor substitute in its place"—at any rate, so Mr. Alderman Hamshaw gothically says, and I find a consensus of opinion to the same effect, in spite of the achievements of applied science.

It is very likely that modern science, by co-ordinating these old saws of upbringing, has been able to reach the devious mind of politics which their direct force would never strike. Perhaps, too, those equally deviously-minded persons who have long regarded examination as the criterion of learning, who think that the accumulation of facts is knowledge, that instruction is education provided it is "public," and valuable provided it is "free," would never have grasped these common facts if they had not been able to read them set forth in a text-book. At any rate, it is well that Mr. Montmorency and Professor Sadler should draw attention to the facts on which Comenius insisted—namely, that the observation of objects, and especially of natural objects, is the beginning of true knowledge, which cannot be attained by the study of their descriptions written in books. So, school journeys, country schools, vacation schools, play centres, have been instituted by Mrs. Humphry Ward and many others. General R. S. S. Baden-Powell's "Scouting for Boys" extends the idea, as does also the demonstration of the scientific side of geography by means of the neighbouring countryside, and the vivifying of history by reference to local antiquities. The principle is still further extended by bringing the eye more into use in the teaching of history, by the revival of tables and diagrams showing its perspective at a glance. These and all such expedients, being of the nature of education rather than of cramming, are good. The value of a foreign language as a factor of education, and, above all others, of Greek and Latin, has been often insisted upon in THE ACADEMY. I have never seen the defence of Greek and Latin better stated than in Mr. S. H. Butcher's presidential address to the Classical Association of Ireland. As regards the teaching of English literature, I would emphasise Mr. J. W. Mackail's advice to teachers of English, given before the English Association: "Stand aside from between the pupil and literature. . . ." What bond of association there can possibly be between him and Mr. Raleigh on the one side, and most of the associates on the other, it is difficult to explain.

I have been much interested, not only by the speeches and letters to which I have specifically alluded, but by Mr. F. H. Matthew's book, "The Principles of Education," by Professor W. H. Woodward's "Studies in Education during the Age of the Renaissance," by Professor M. E. Sadler's remarks everywhere, by those of the writer on education of the Morning Post very often, and by the speeches delivered before the following societies:—The Headmasters' Conference, the Incorporated Association of Headmasters, the Incorporated Association of Assistant Masters, the Historical Association, the Modern Language Association, the Association of Directors and Secretaries for Education, the Conference of Teachers of Commercial Education, and many others. There has been scarcely a meeting, a speech, or a letter which has not had some suggestion to make, worth consideration, and has not shown a breadth of view and a true appreciation of education proper, which, if felt, was seldom practised thirty years ago. At the same time, I doubt whether more than two or three of these able and enlightened educators owe anything whatever, either directly or indirectly, to State instruction; the great majority I know for a fact do not. They are the product of the endowed schools, or private tuition, or the two great Universities, whose work political faction is trying to supersede by a wholly untried and undecided system of national instruction.

B. P. S.

Macmillan's Educational List.

THE INTERNATIONAL GEOGRAPHY

By SEVENTY AUTHORS. Edited by H. R. MILL, D.Sc. With 489 Illustrations. New Edition, 8vo complete. 12s. net.

The following Sections are issued separately with Exercises and Examination Papers in the Text: I. British Isles, 1s.; II. Europe, 2s. 6d.; III. Asia, 2s.; IV. Australia, 1s. 6d.; V. North America, Central America, and the West Indies, 2s.; VI. South America, 1s. 6d.; VII. Africa, 2s.

 Please write for detailed Prospectus. ***

A MODERN ARITHMETIC. With Graphic and Practical Exercises. By H. SYDNEY JONES, M.A. Part I. Globe 8vo. Without answers, 2s. 6d.; with Answers, 3s.

NEW EDITION, REVISED AND ENLARGED.

ARITHMETIC FOR SCHOOLS. By the Rev. J. B. LOCK, M.A., and V. M. TURNBULL, M.A. Extra crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

ARITHMETIC. Chiefly Examples. By G. W. PALMER, M.A. Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d.

GRAPHICS. Applied to Arithmetic, Mensuration and Statics. By G. C. TURNER, B.Sc. (Lond). Crown 8vo. 6s.

ELEGIA. Passages from Latin Elegiac Verse. With Hints and English-Latin Grads. By C. H. St. L. RUSSELL, M.A., Assistant-Master at Clifton College. Globe 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Education.—"An excellent work. It satisfies a long-felt want, and should have a ready sale among Public Schools of the higher class. . . . We cordially commend the book to masters in our great Public Schools."

DECURUS PRIMUS. A First Latin Grammar. With Exercises. By Prof. T. G. TUCKER, Litt.D. Globe 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Education.—"A really excellent little book for beginners; one of the best we have seen for some time."

AN INTRODUCTION TO LATIN PROSE. By GEORGE W. MITCHELL, M.A. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

AIDS TO THE STUDY AND COMPOSITION OF ENGLISH. By J. C. NESFIELD, M.A. Globe 8vo. 4s. 6d. Key, 4s. 6d. net.

Education.—"Mr. Nesfield's excellent little work."

ENGLISH ESSAYS. Materials and Models for Composition from the Great Essayists. Selected and arranged by J. H. FOWLER, M.A., Assistant Master at Clifton College. Globe 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Education.—"Quite the best thing of the kind we have yet seen. The little book is admirable from cover to cover. . . . We should like to see Mr. Fowler's little book in use at every second 'ary school.'"

ENGLISH LITERATURE FOR SECONDARY SCHOOLS—NEW VOLUMES.

THE AGE OF THE ANTONINES. (The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. by EDWARD GIBBON, Chapters I.-III.) Edited by J. H. FOWLER, M.A. Globe 8vo, limp cloth. 1s.

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY PROSE. Selected and Edited, with Introductions, Notes, Glossary, &c., by ELIZABETH LEE. Globe 8vo, limp cloth. 1s.

A SHORT FRENCH GRAMMAR. By OTTO SIEPMANN. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

SIEPMANN'S FRENCH SERIES FOR RAPID READING.

LA BIBLIOTHEQUE DE MON ONCLE. Par RODOLPHE TOPFER. Globe 8vo. Sewed 6d.

CAMBRIDGE LOCAL EXAMINATIONS, 1908.

RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE.

The Acts of the Apostles. Greek Text. With Notes. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 3s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.]

The Acts of the Apostles. Authorised Version. With Notes. By T. E. PAGE, M.A., and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.]

ENGLISH.

Scott—Marmion. Cantos I. and VI. With Introduction and Notes. By M. MACMILLAN, B.A. 1s. [Preliminary.]

Marmion. With Introduction and Notes. By M. MACMILLAN, B.A. 3s.; sewed, 2s. 6d. [Junior.]

Marmion, &c. Edited by F. T. PALGRAVE. 1s. [Junior.]

Quentin Durward. With Introduction and Notes. 2s. 6d. [Junior.]

Quentin Durward. Abridged for Schools. 1s. 6d. [Junior.]

Kingsley's Heroes. With Notes. 1s. 6d. [Preliminary.]

Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice. With Introduction and Notes. By K. DEIGHTON. 1s. 9d. [Junior and Senior.]

The Merchant of Venice. Eversley Edition. With Notes. 1s. [Junior and Senior.]

Coriolanus. With Introduction and Notes. By K. DEIGHTON. 2s. 6d. [Senior.]

Coriolanus. Eversley Edition. With Notes. 1s. [Senior.]

Tennyson's Select Poems. With Introduction and Notes. By H. B. GEORGE and W. H. HADDOX. 2s. 6d. [Junior.]

Milton—Comus. With Introduction and Notes. By W. BELL, M.A. 1s. 3d. [Senior.]

Lycidas, Sonnets, &c. By W. BELL, M.A. 1s. 9d. [Senior.]

FRENCH AND GERMAN.

Molière.—Le Misanthrope.—G. E. FASNACHT, 1s. [Senior.]

Goethe.—Hermann und Dorothea. J. T. HATFIELD. 3s. 6d. [Senior.]

LATIN AND GREEK.

Cornelius Nepos. Vol. I. (containing Lives of Miltiades, Themistocles, Aristides, Pausanias, Cimon). With Notes and Vocabulary. By HERBERT WILKINSON, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Preliminary.]

Cæsar. Gallic War. Books II. and III. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. W. G. RUTHERFORD, LL.D. 1s. 6d. [Junior.]

The Gallic War. Edited by Rev. JOHN BOND, M.A., and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 4s. 6d. [Junior.]

Virgil.—Æneid. Book X. With Notes and Vocabulary. By S. G. OWEN, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.]

Livy.—Book XXI. By W. W. CAPES, M.A., and J. E. MELHUISH, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Senior.]

Books XXI. and XXII. Edited by Rev. W. W. CAPES, M.A. 4s. 6d. [Senior.]

Cicero.—The Catiline Orations. Edited by A. S. WILKINS, Litt.D. 2s. 6d. [Senior.]

Horace.—Odes. Book III. With Notes and Vocabulary. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. (Elementary Classics.) 1s. 6d. (Classical Series.) 2s. [Senior.]

Xenophon.—Anabasis. Book I. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 1s. 6d. With Exercises. By E. A. WELLS, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Junior.]

Euripides.—Hecuba. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. J. BOND, M.A., and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.]

Plato.—Euthyphro, Apology, Crito, and Phædo. Translated by F. J. CHURCH. 2s. 6d. net. [Senior.]

Homer.—Iliad. Book VI. With Notes and Vocabulary. By WALTER LEAF, Litt.D., and Rev. M. A. BAYFIELD, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Senior.]

Iliad. Books I.-XII. Edited by W. LEAF, Litt.D., and Rev. M. A. BAYFIELD, M.A. 6s. [Senior.]

OXFORD LOCAL EXAMINATIONS, 1908.

RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE.

The Gospel according to St. Luke. Greek Text. With Introduction and Notes. By Rev. J. BOND, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.]

An Introduction to the Creeds. By Rev. G. F. MACLEAR, D.D. 3s. 6d. [Senior.]

The Acts of the Apostles. Greek Text. With Notes. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 3s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.]

The Acts of the Apostles. Authorised Version. With Notes. By T. E. PAGE, M.A., and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Preliminary, Junior, and Senior.]

LATIN.

Cæsar.—The Gallic War. Edited by Rev. JOHN BOND, M.A., and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 4s. 6d. [Senior.]

Gallic War. Book I. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.]

Gallic War. Books II. and III. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. W. G. RUTHERFORD, LL.D. 1s. 6d. [Senior.]

Virgil.—Æneid. Book I. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.]

Æneid. Book I. With Notes and Vocabulary. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.]

Æneid. Book II. With Notes and Vocabulary. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Senior.]

Livy.—Book V. With Notes and Vocabulary. By M. ALFORD. 1s. 6d. [Senior.]

Book XXI. By W. W. CAPES, M.A., and J. E. MELHUISH, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Senior.]

Books XXI. and XXII. Edited by Rev. W. W. CAPES, M.A. 4s. 6d. [Senior.]

Horace.—Odes. Books I. and II. With Notes and Vocabulary. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. Elementary Classics. 1s. 6d. each. Classical Series. 2s. each. [Senior.]

ENGLISH AUTHORS.

Lamb.—Tales from Shakespeare. With Introduction and Notes. By C. D. PUNCHARD, B.A. (Contains The Tempest, As You Like It, The Merchant of Venice, King Lear, Twelfth Night, Hamlet.) 1s. 6d. [Preliminary.]

Poems of England. With Introduction and Notes. By H. B. GEORGE, M.A., and A. SIDGWICK, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Preliminary and Junior.]

Defoe.—Robinson Crusoe. Edited by H. KINGSLEY. 2s. 6d. [Preliminary.]

Robinson Crusoe. Edited by J. W. CLARK, M.A. 2s. 6d. net. [Preliminary.]

Longfellow.—Hiawatha. With Introduction and Notes. By H. B. COTTERILL, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Preliminary.]

ENGLISH AUTHORS—continued.

Shakespeare.—Richard II. With Introduction and Notes. By K. DEIGHTON. With an Appendix. 1s. 9d. [Junior and Senior.]

Julius Cæsar. With Introduction and Notes. By K. DEIGHTON. 1s. 9d. [Junior and Senior.]

The Merchant of Venice. With Introduction and Notes. By K. DEIGHTON. 1s. 9d. [Junior.]

Scott.—Old Mortality. With Introduction and Notes. 2s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.]

Marmion. With Introduction and Notes. By M. MACMILLAN, B.A. 3s. [Junior and Senior.]

Marion, &c. Ed. by F. T. PALGRAVE. 1s. [Senior.]

Bacon.—Essays.—With Introduction and Notes. By F. G. SELBY, M.A. 3s. [Senior.]

Tennyson.—Poetical Works. Globe Edition. 3s. 6d. (This Volume contains the Marriage of Geraint, Geraint and Enid, The Coming of Arthur, The Passing of Arthur.) [Junior and Senior.]

School Edition of Tennyson's Works. Part III., 2s. 6d. This Volume contains The Marriage of Geraint, Geraint and Enid, The Coming of Arthur, The Passing of Arthur.) [Junior and Senior.]

Idylls of the King. 2s. net. (This Volume contains The Marriage of Geraint, Geraint and Enid, The Coming of Arthur, The Passing of Arthur.) [Junior and Senior.]

Geraint and Enid and the Marriage of Geraint. With Introduction and Notes. By G. C. MACAULAY, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.]

The Coming of Arthur and the Passing of Arthur. With Introduction and Notes. By F. J. ROWE, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.]

Kingsley.—Westward Ho! Illustrated. 3s. 6d.; 2s. 6d.; 2s. net; 1s.; sewed, 6d. Abridged Edition. 1s. 6d. [Junior.]

Milton.—Comus. With Introduction and Notes. By W. BELL, M.A. 1s. 3d. [Senior.]

L'Allegro, Il Penseroso, Arcades, Lycidas, Sonnets, &c. By W. BELL, M.A. 1s. 9d. [Senior.]

Wordsworth.—Poems of Wordsworth. Chosen and Edited by M. ARNOLD. 2s. 6d. net. [Senior.]

Helps to the Study of Arnold's Wordsworth. By R. WILSON, B.A. 1s. net. [Senior.]

Macaulay.—Essay on Addison. With Introduction and Notes. By R. F. WINCH, M.A. 2s. 6d. (English Classics Series.) [Senior.]

Essay on Addison. Edited by R. F. WINCH, M.A. 1s. (English Literature for Secondary School Series.) [Senior.]

"HOGMANAY"

THE solution of many a puzzle is extremely simple—when you know it. This is certainly the case with hogmanay, which is duly described in the New English Dictionary, with plentiful quotations. It was the name given in the north of England and in Scotland to the last day of the old year. The note in the New English Dictionary can hardly be bettered, and runs as follows: "Hogmanay corresponds exactly in sense and use to O.F. aguillanneuf, the last day of the year [New Year's Eve is the best phrase, as will be seen], new year's gift, the festival at which new year's gifts were given and asked with a shout of aguillanneuf. Of this Godefroy gives many variants." I select, in particular, the forms aguillenneu, aguilloncu, haguilennef; also aguilan, guillanneau, hoguinané, hoguino; all of which are easy enough when once we have the key.

All these extraordinary forms are mere Latin, done into more or less Frenchified disguises. The words resolve themselves into the extremely simple formula, Hoc in anno, "in this year," which was the burden or chorus of the song sung upon the occasion. The song is preserved for us in the Norman glossary by MM. Edélestaude and Duméril (Caen, 1849), who say that

De Brieux has preserved for us a sort of song without rhyme which was still sung, in his time, when les haguignettes [or hogmanay presents] were asked for, hoc in anno:

Si vous veniés a la depense,
A la depense de chez nous,
Vous mangeriés de bon chous,
On vous serviroit du rost—
Hoguino!
Donnez-moi mes haguignètes
Dans un panier que voicy,
Je l'achetay Samedi
D'un bonhomme de dehors;
Mais il est encore à payer Haguino!

Here, in the old song itself, we first find Hoc in anno in a French spelling hoguino, and secondly in the still more corrupt form haguino. This affords proof positive that haguin-, or aguin-, is the same thing as hoc in, and all the rest is easy enough. The form aguillanneuf is for hoc in l'an neuf, a delicious compound of Latin and French, and quite correct from a macaronic point of view. Hoguino is hoc in anno. Hoguinané is hoc in année. Guillanneau is hoc in anno, with the loss of ho and substitution of ll for n, and so forth.

As for hogmanay, it is a mere ghost-word, and obviously arose from misreading in as m. Restore it to its true shape—viz., hoguinanay—and it is the same as hoguinané above.

WALTER W. SKEAT.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF MUNICIPAL ART GALLERIES

BROUGHT into existence by the enthusiasm and generous energy of Mr. Hugh P. Lane, a Municipal Museum of Modern Art has been opened this week in Dublin. No great sum has been expended on the housing of the fine collection which Mr. Lane has brought together; no great palace with "all the latest improvements" has been erected at the cost of ratepayers or for the wider advertisement of a successful tradesman. The museum is simply a house, as are the Mesdag and many other famous and joyous museums; it is a Georgian house, beautifully proportioned, and if the light comes normally from the side instead of from the top, it is almost impossible to name a picture which suffers in consequence.

Of the contents of Dublin's new museum it is difficult to speak without enthusiasm. It is the only public gallery in the British Isles where the great impressionist masters of France can be adequately studied; it is the only public gallery in the world where a serious attempt has been made to represent the best and most vital elements in British painting of the twentieth century. Fully to demonstrate its unique character it would be necessary to reprint the greater portion of the catalogue, but some idea of the importance of the collection may be gathered when we recall that it includes the "Eva Gonzales" and "Garden of the Tuileries" of Manet, the small but lovely "Toilet" of Puvis de Chavannes, Monet's prismatic "Snow Effect at Vétheuil," a splendid group of vigorous Mancinis, bronzes and marble busts by Rodin, a Renoir, a Pissarro, a Sisley, a Mathew Maris, a James Maris, and a noble Daumier.

Nevertheless, these artists, if the mastery of some is veiled to certain unobservant or partial eyes, are by this time so widely recognised that the presence here of examples of their work, if eloquent of Mr. Lane's munificence, are less absolute proofs of his courage and acute judgment than the inclusion of certain pictures by the younger of our contemporaries. And here I refer, not so much to the fine examples of the art of Messrs. Orpen, Lavery, Wilson Steer, and others who have already made their names respected by connoisseurs of painting, but to works by still younger squires of Art, who are but at this moment qualifying for their spurs. As an example, I will take Mr. Gerald F. Kelly, whose portrait of "Mrs. Harrison" has been acquired by Mr. Lane from the exhibition of the Society of Portrait Painters, held last autumn at the New Gallery. Mr. Kelly has some reputation in Paris, where he is an Associate of the Salon d'Automne; but in England he has exhibited little, and his fame is yet to make. A year ago the great promise of his work was dwelt on in THE ACADEMY, but it is only within the last few months that the merits of his work have been publicly commented upon by one or two other English critics. Mr. Kelly's "Mrs. Harrison" is an excellent portrait, though personally I am of opinion the painter will go much farther. It is soundly constructed, soberly painted. The careful search for the modelling of the face and figure reveals a finely analytical eye, and gives to the representation that suggestion of life and feeling of the weight and density of the human figure which were so sadly lacking in the portraits of many more widely-known painters in the same exhibition. The pose of the old lady, naively bunching up her skirt, shows not only a designer's skill of placing his figure decoratively on the canvas, but a psychologist's penetration in expressing character by pose. Mr. Lane deserves the highest praise for his purchase of this work, a purchase obviously prompted by his own good judgment and not by a respect for the name of an artist or for the opinions of others.

This is the spirit in which purchases should be made for a public gallery, the considered decision of a competent judge to buy because the painting is good as painting, not because it has attached to it a name well known or popular, or because it represents something that may please the foolish and ignorant. Both as a whole and in many particulars this Modern Art Gallery of Dublin is a striking vindication of the policy of entrusting the formation and extension of public galleries to a single mind. Committees always end in compromises, compromises usually result in the triumph of mediocrity, and hence the Chantrey Collection and the later additions to the Walker Art Gallery, Liverpool. So long as Mr. Lane lives there is little fear of the standard he has set being lowered in Dublin, for I understand he has been appointed honorary director for life. But though we all hope that day may be far, far off, even in the hour of his triumph he should remember that one day he must have a successor. The matter is so important that it cannot be too soon to remind him to arrange, while Dublin is filled with a lively sense of gratitude, that his successor shall have powers as absolute as possible, and that his appointment or election shall be in qualified hands, likely to result in Mr. Lane handing over the reins of government to someone who will continue his enlightened policy.

To have a policy is most necessary for a public gallery, if its collection is to have any real and lasting worth, if it is to bring visitors and prosperity to its neighbourhood. The indiscriminate purchase of all styles and periods is always dangerous, and in unskilled hands it is reckless folly. Dublin has made an admirable start, and the new museum will undoubtedly attract many students and lovers of a form of Art not easily accessible in other parts of these Isles. The formation of a fine art collection is a valuable municipal asset. Already people go to Scotland to study the Raeburns, as they go to Holland for Rembrandt; to Birmingham for the Pre-Raphaelites as to Venice for the Venetians; to Manchester for Ford Madox Brown as to Assisi for Giotto. The more clearly the value of thus specialising is perceived by those responsible, the more important in every way will their museum become. In some quarters the fact appears to be recognised from the purchases made by the different museums during 1907. In Edinburgh, for example, they are careful to concentrate their attention on Scottish work. They rarely allow a Raeburn to slip through their fingers, unless the price demanded is prohibitive. They are also wisely turning their attention to the sterling work accomplished by more recent Scottish artists, and last year there was added to the National Gallery of Scotland examples of Robert Brough, W. E. Lockhart, and Arthur Melville, as well as of Allan Ramsay, Wilkie, and Andrew Geddes, the ablest of Raeburn's disciples. At Glasgow less wisdom has been shown, the chief acquisition being a Millais, at the extravagant price of £1,000. It is not even a first-class Millais, and in the week of its purchase a smaller but better example was sold at an auction for a ten-pound note. When will the petty minds of these trading councillors who govern our art galleries learn that in Art it is quality and not quantity that matters? Glasgow, after a magnificent start, has been rapidly deteriorating of late years, and a few more of these exorbitant and inferior acquisitions will bring it to the present level of Liverpool. There is the worst tale of all. The Walker Art Gallery, which once made so many fine purchases, has this year squandered about £700 on absolute rubbish. In spite of the several sterling paintings—notably one by Mr. David Muirhead—which the autumn exhibition contained, almost the worst possible selection has been made for purchase. A trumpery "literary" illustration in oil colour, "The Admonition," by Mr. Henry Woods, R.A., was purchased for something like £300, I am informed. If it was put up to auction at Christie's tomorrow I doubt if it would bring near a third of that sum. The drawing is faulty, there is hardly the attempt at a decorative composition, the values are false and there is no atmosphere, and the colour is so crude that it could please only the most mean and barbarous taste. For a water-colour by Mr. T. Young Hunter, "The Two Voices," £150 has been given; for an example of the art of Mr. Loys J. Prat, £120. And the only acquisition that has any real interest for an educated spectator, and likely to have any permanent value, is the cheapest of the lot, a fifteen-guinea sketch of Tangiers, by Mr. Terrick Williams. Such purchases virtually amount to a misuse of public moneys. I do not know the names of the gentlemen who are responsible for buying them, but they are evidently in hopeless and abysmal ignorance of the qualities which constitute greatness in a work of art. As they do not under-

RALPH, HOLLAND & CO'S LIST

Complete Catalogue Post Free on Application

A SCIENTIFIC GEOGRAPHY.

By ELLIS W. HEATON, B.Sc., F.G.S., Principal of North Shields Secondary School and P.-T. Centre. Issued in seven separate books, as under:—

- | | |
|--|---|
| Book I. The World—Broadly Treated. Ready February, 1908. | Book V. Africa. Price 1/3 net. |
| .. II. The British Isles. Price 1/6 net. | .. VI. Asia. In preparation. |
| .. III. Europe. Price 1/6 net. | .. VII. The British Empire. In preparation. |
| .. IV. North America. Price 1/6 net. | |

THE MEANING OF EDUCATION AS INTERPRETED BY HERBERT.

Being the First Volume of DR. HAYWARD'S "New Educational Science Series." By F. H. HAYWARD, D.Litt., M.A., B.Sc. (Lond.), B.A. (Cantab.), Author of "The Educational Ideas of Pestalozzi and Froebel," and "The Three Historical Educators, Froebel, Pestalozzi, Herbert," &c. Invaluable for Students of Adams' Herbartian Psychology. Price 2/- net.

CLOUGH'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND (1688-1760).

Prepared and Edited by A. A. THOMAS, B.A., of the Royal University of Ireland, Honoursman in Modern History and Joint Standing Counsel to the N.U.T.

Price 2/6 net.

THE THEORY OF MUSIC FOR STUDENTS AND TEACHERS.

By J. LIGHTFOOT, M.A., D.Sc., Mus. Bac. Author of "An Elementary and Intermediate Algebra," &c., &c. Dedicated to Dr. John Varley Roberts, of Magdalen College, Oxford. Staff Notation and Tonic Sol-fa. Price 2/- net.

THE A-B-C OF NEEDLEWORK. For Teachers & Schools.

By MISS B. L. BLACKMORE, Diplômée and Examiner to the London Institute for the Advancement of Plain Needlework. Late Lecturer at the Lond n Day Training College, Northampton Institute. With a Preface by Miss S. LOCH, Examiner in Needlework to the L.C.C. With 174 Diagrams, including two inset plates. Price 1/6 net.

SHAKESPEARE'S "RICHARD II."

Edited by C. W. CROOK, B.A., B.Sc., Head Master of the Higher Grade School, Wood Green, London, N. Crown 8vo, 171 pp. Interleaved. Price 2/-

BACON'S ESSAYS.

Complete Edition, with Introduction, Full Texts and Notes, Examination Questions and Exhaustive Index. Edited by DAVID SALMON, Principal of Swansea Training College. Crown 8vo, 343 pp. Price 3/- net.

SHAKESPEARE'S "THE MERCHANT OF VENICE."

Edited by C. W. CROOK, B.A., B.Sc., Head Master of the Higher Grade School, Wood Green, N. Editor of Shakespeare's "Richard II.," "Henry V.," "King Lear," etc., Milton's "Areopagitica," "Sonnets," etc., etc. Interleaved for Students' MS. Notes. Price 2/-

BRITISH CITIZENSHIP, ITS RIGHTS AND ITS DUTIES.

By FREDK. PEAKER, former Member of Leeds School Board, Leeds City Council, Executive of N.U.T., Lecturer to the Co-operative Union of Citizenship, with a Preface by Sir J. LAWSON WALTON, K.C., M.P. (Attorney-General). Crown 8vo, cloth, 159 pp. Price 2/-

Also in Two Parts—

ELEMENTARY, 2d.; ADVANCED, 3d. ANSWERS, 2d.

READY SHORTLY.

MORE'S "UTOPIA."

Edited by DAVID SALMON, Principal of Swansea Training College. [In the press.]

PLANT STUDY IN SCHOOL, FIELD AND GARDEN.

By J. S. BRIDGES, B.Sc., F.C.S., F.G.S., Principal of Walthamstow Technical Institute, and A. J. DICKS, B.Sc., F.L.S. [In the press.]

CONCURRENT PRACTICAL AND THEORETICAL GEOMETRY.

By W. J. FOTTER, M.A. (Camb.), Second Master, Roan School for Boys, Greenwich. [In the press.]

CLOUGH'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND (1763-1815).

Prepared and Edited by AVARY H. FORBES, M.A., Barrister-at-Law, Gold Medallist in English Literature and Senior Moderator Dublin University. [In the press.]

A SCIENTIFIC GEOGRAPHY. Book I.—THE WORLD—Broadly Treated.

By ELLIS W. HEATON, B.Sc., F.G.S., Principal of North Shields Secondary School and P.-T. Centre. A text book of Geography, showing on entirely new and original lines the relation between Geographical Conditions and Industry and Commerce. Illustrated by numerous Maps and Diagrams. This volume deals also with the "Principles of Geography" (Oxford Locals), and contains all the "Physical Geography" required for the Cambridge Local Examination. Invaluable to Matriculation Students and for those preparing for Teachers' Examinations. Books II., III., IV., and V. are already published (see above). [Ready, Feb. 1908.]

London: RALPH, HOLLAND & CO., 68 & 69, Temple Chambers, E.C.

stand these things, they should entrust the selection for purchase to someone who does. If they were going to build a town hall they would call in an architect, and not attempt to construct it according to their own uneducated plans and likings. In view of their ignorance they should similarly call in an art connoisseur if they wish to construct a fine art collection. The money at their disposal is not their own that they should consider nothing but pleasing themselves. It is trust money put into their hands to buy examples of good art—which they obviously do not like—and to misapply this as they have done, is an immoral, if not illegal, offence. Manchester has acted far more wisely. They have bought Ford Madox Brown's "Finding of the Body of Harold," which London allowed to escape her; they have bought another Cecil Lawson—"Twixt Sun and Moon"—thus intelligently strengthening their strongest features; they have bought Müller's "Turkish Cemetery at Smyrna," the "Paolo and Francesca" of Watts, and Mr. Clausen's "Winter Morning." Not an exception can be taken to any of these, for they are all pictures which would be an ornament and an asset to any art gallery. In confining their chief attention to works by deceased painters they have perhaps been wise, for it is certainly easier and requires less knowledge to admit the worth of the dead than to perceive the merit of the living. Nottingham, too, deserves a word of praise for its intelligent purchase of Bonnington's "Ruined Abbey" from Messrs. Shepherd. It is far better to buy good old pictures from a dealer than bad new ones from the artist. I know that in some quarters there is a strong feeling against purchasing from dealers for fear of secret commissions, but these objectors should be reminded that in the present corrupt state of municipal politics jobbery is always possible, and that artists can and do give "secret commissions" as well as dealers. Whenever an excessive price is paid for any picture for a public gallery, it would be wise to investigate the relations between the advocate of the purchase and the owner of the work advocated.

This brief review of some art purchases for public galleries during 1907 does not pretend to be either complete or adequate, but it may serve to show Dublin its own good fortune, and to remind Mr. Lane of the dangers against which he has to guard his gallery and his successor.

FRANK RUTTER.

THE LIBRARY TABLE

Plato's Psychology in its bearing on the Development of Will. By MARY HAY WOOD, M.A. (Oxford University Press, 1907.)

Miss Wood's essay originally appeared as a Thesis for the degree of M.A. in the University of London. It is a sterling piece of work and shows an amazing familiarity with Plato. It is excellently written. There is not an objectionable phrase except, perhaps, "belongs there," an Americanism, on page 32. Its component sections are Introduction, Activity, Appetite, Emotion, Thought and Reason, Will. Miss Wood meets the objection that the notion of Will as an element in Plato's Psychology is an assumption by pointing out that it is implied as merely one aspect of mental life, though not under a specific name, which is all the better, as the fallacy of hypostatization is thus avoided. It has been urged as an objection against the Platonic Psychology that he divides the mind into "faculties," but the divisions of soul are rightly regarded only as kinds or forms of activity, and it is to be noted that in indicating the so-called parts of the soul he avoids as far as possible the use of a noun and prefers the neuter of an adjective. In the section on Emotion we meet a very suggestive observation:

In spontaneous bodily movement, so specially characteristic of all young creatures, and when unimpeded realising itself in pleasure—it is in this that Plato finds the germ of a pleasure, an activity, eventually peculiar to man. For man, unlike other animals, realises his movements in rhythm, he alone, "dance-fellow of the gods," finds his pleasure in harmony. To this pleasure, rightly called "æsthetic," all his senses contribute. Here there is abundant scope for the training by habit. Through eye and ear and every sense the environment must conduce to evoke this activity to pleasure—an activity which, as it is distinctly human, can be developed only by specific human co-operation. In fine, as these stirrings of life are the germ of the rhythmic movements of dance and song, so it is music and art that must supply their appropriate nourishment. The æsthetic activity becomes assimilative through imitation—it is at once a power of movement and a capacity for being moved, its very receptivity marks it as emotional (ἀνακτινικόν).

In a double sense, therefore, the will of the individual is seen to be the outcome of the will of the community, the soul owes not only παῖδα but ἔξω also to the society in which it forms part. In other words the εὐφροσύνη, the harmonious nature, is itself the product of individual wills trained to act in harmony with the whole, and meeting with such training in its turn will so act as to produce similar natures, and so on in an endless progression. Of what should be the starting-point of the series, the actual origin, Plato, as we have seen, gives no account save in myths, where he attributes it to the action of a Divine Will (βούλησις) and Reason (διανοήθη δειν Tim. 39 E), a Will whose purpose and whose expression are the perfection of Beauty, Harmony, and Truth.

A Bird Collector's Medley. By E. C. ARNOLD. (West, Newman and Co., 1907.)

THE list of books on birds which had better never have been written is a long one, and we venture to think Mr. Arnold's book should be added thereto. It is a dull chronicle of slaughter, unrelieved by any signs of intelligent observation of his victim's habits during life, or the many problems which they present. It is a chronicle of "small beer," a book for "collectors," by a collector. In the course of some years spent in prowling about mud-flats he has acquired sufficient skill to detect the common species at a glance—for them, accordingly, he has no use; they are now so many animated counters, to be ignored, that all attention may be concentrated on the discovery of "rarities"—the strangers within our gate, and such species as have become, from long persecution at the hands of "collectors" and gamekeepers, and from other causes, reduced to the verge of extinction.

Knowing, for example, that the Bearded Tit, once one of the ornaments of our waterways, is now extinct in England, save in one small area of the kingdom, he cannot rest till he has arranged for "a drive," and returns, as he complacently tells us, in the evening, "possessed at last of some Bearded Tits, and having spent a thoroughly delightful day!"

You can take a horse to the water, but you cannot make him drink; and, similarly, you can take a collector into the wild places of Nature, but you cannot make him see. Observant ornithologists know well that with the exception of the "passerine" birds, all birds when they fly carry the legs held straight out under the tail. Yet, in one of his illustrations, which are by his own hand, a Great Crested Grebe is shown flying with the legs drawn up under the body, after the fashion of a crow! One of the most remarkable peculiarities about that most remarkable bird the "Ruff" is the fact that no two are ever alike in the colour of the plumage assumed at the breeding season, and this is especially true of the frill of feathers round the neck—the "ruff" from which the bird takes its name. Yet in another of his pictures he shows a pair of birds "sparring," as is their wont, which might be described as "identical twins": each looks like a mirrored reflection of the other!

He is not even really conversant with the names of even the commonest birds, as is shown by the fact that he, throughout the pages of this book, prefixes the adjective "Lesser" to the name of the Black-Headed Gull!

The illustrations, to which reference has already been made, are the crudest and most amateurish attempts at draughtmanship which we have ever seen.

FICTION

The Halo. By BARONESS VON HUTTEN. (Methuen. 6s.)

WE do not think that the authoress of "Pam" would have made her present very considerable reputation had she started her literary career with this novel. "The Halo" is not by any means a poor book; it has many light touches that go to make it distinctly interesting, but supposing it had been the first novel of an unknown author we feel sure it would not have attracted any great amount of attention. The halo apparently clings to the head of a certain Victor Joyselle, who is represented as being the first violinist of Europe. Lady Brigit out of sheer boredom becomes engaged to his son, Theo, but after a short time falls in love with Victor, who is only too ready to respond. In a lazy manner one wonders what will be the end of it all, and perhaps one is not very much surprised that Joyselle's wife has to die suddenly the very night before he and Brigit are to elope together. And so the book ends; and we at any rate feel little anxiety to know what befel Brigit and the unconscious Theo.

There is, however, a certain raciness about the book which makes parts of it distinctly amusing. Lady Kingsmead, Brigit's mother, belongs to a very smart set whose morals are still smarter; and we have many good old jokes from society plays dished up again in quite up-to-date form. Perhaps the most amusing character is Tommy, Earl of Kingsmead, aged twelve, who has, when he likes, all the manner of the head of his family and an invincible desire to understand everything, which leads him into strange paths. The latter part of the story takes us to Falaise, where Joyselle's peasant relations live, and there are interesting descriptions of the Norman golden wedding ceremony. From no point of view can we think "The Halo" a work of art. The problem arouses no desire to grapple with it, and the setting is not particularly new. The authoress, too, raises a doubt as to her knowledge of the more out-of-the-way places described by her inaccuracies as to London topography. Are the descriptions of Falaise any more correct than her account of the old house in Tite Street with its wonderful and historic studio? The authoress should take a peep at Tite Street, where she will certainly find many studios, but nothing earlier than Whistler and the æsthetic movement.

Shakespeare's Sweetheart. By SARAH H. STERLING. Illustrated by C. E. PECK. (Chatto and Windus, 6s.)

THE publisher's note to "Shakespeare's Sweetheart" asserts that the book will be of "real service to any reader of Shakespeare's plays who finds it difficult to realise the man himself or the times in which he lived." Readers will certainly find things new and strange to them in Anne Hathaway's love story, written at Ben Jonson's request, after the poet's death. To many it will be nothing more than a fantastic tale, others may see in it an attempt to whitewash certain incidents. The cloak of conventional respectability is stretched and smoothed out until it not only covers, but gracefully drapes the two figures who masquerade as Shakespeare and Anne Hathaway. Anne vouches for it that she was Will's only sweetheart; that he wrote the sonnets to her alone, or with the friendly design of furthering Count William's wooing of the Dark Lady. Again, Anne was secretly married to Shakespeare, but her pride forbade her to publish the fact when neighbours' tongues began to clack about the birth of Susannah. Disguised as a boy she travels to London in search of Shakespeare; unrecognised by him, becomes his servant, Cesario, and plays Juliet to his

The De La More Press

LOGIC, DEDUCTIVE AND INDUCTIVE.

By CARVETH READ, M.A., Professor of Logic at University College. Third Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Crown 8vo. 6/-

THE STUDY OF PLANT LIFE FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

By M. C. STOPES, D.Sc., London. Designed Cover. Illustrated with plates and numerous diagrams. Royal 8vo, cloth. 2/6 net.

A FIRST GERMAN COURSE FOR SCIENCE STUDENTS.

By Professor H. G. FIEDLER and F. E. SANDBACH. With diagrams. Square 8vo. [Ready.] 2/6 net.

This book is intended for science students who desire to read, with the expenditure of the minimum amount of time, scientific text-books in German. The grammatical portion is simple in arrangement and brief, while the leading examples will be found of great assistance, and the diagrams illustrating scientific instruments and experiments help to fix the names in the memory.

A SECOND GERMAN COURSE FOR SCIENCE STUDENTS.

Readings from recent German scientific publications, selected, arranged, and annotated by H. G. FIEDLER, Professor of German at the University of Birmingham, and F. E. SANDBACH, Lecturer in German at the University of Birmingham. Square 8vo, cloth. 2/6 net.

THE NORLAND SERIES

THE FIRST BOOK OF SONG AND STORY FOR LITTLE CHILDREN.

[Ready.] A first reader on improved lines for little children. Post 8vo, cloth gilt, full gilt edge, picture cover, 2/6 net. Also in cheaper form, 2/-

MY LITTLE FRENCH FRIENDS.

By LINA OSWALD. Demy 8vo, cloth. 2/- A first book in French, written in everyday speech, profusely illustrated and containing songs with simple music, as well as stories. Uniform with "Little German Folk."

LITTLE GERMAN FOLK.

By MARGARETA SCHRAMM and ARTHUR I. MAYHEW, B.A., of New College, Oxford, and Berlin University. [Ready.]

With illustrations on nearly every page. PART I.—Simple Sentences illustrating the occupations of child life. PART II.—Children's Stories, Poems, School Songs, Riddles, etc. Attractive Picture Covers, and printed in English type throughout. Post 8vo, cloth. 2/-

THE NORLAND READERS.

Edited by E. E. SPEIGHT, B.A., Editor of "The Temple Readers." A New Series of Readers in Romance and Literature for Primary Schools. Profusely illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth, picture covers. 10d. net.

BOOK I. CONTENTS.—The Boy in the Barn—The Red Cottage—Hop, Hop!—Robinson Crusoe—Simple Simon—Jack and Jock—Granfa Gig—My Little Husband—Mary and the Stram—The Two Sparrows—My Black Hen—Little Briar Rose—The Wind—The Clucking Hen—Little Robin Redbreast—The Elves—The Babes in the Wood—The Little Hen—The Piper's Son—Over in the Meadow—This Little Pig—The House in the Wood—The Little Man's Gun—Cock Robin—Riddles—Three Men in a Tub—Old Mother Hubbard—Booman and Cockadoodle-doo—The Cowboy's Song—Little Poll Parrot—The Princess and Her Shoe—The Elves' Dance—Skyhigh and Cloudbear—Spelling Lists—Multiplication Table.

LATIN PICTURE STORIES.

For original Latin Prose Composition. A series of Twelve Cards, each containing six illustrations, with short sentences in Latin as keys to the story depicted. 1/- net per set.

The object of these cards is to afford practice in composition which will prevent it from degenerating into a merely mechanical search for Latin equivalents of English words and phrases. Such exercises are meant to supplement and not to supersede translation.

ENGLISH COMPOSITION.

A Text Book for Primary Schools with sets of Graded Exercises. An important new work on new lines written by AMY KIMPSTER, Lecturer in the Derby Training College, late of the Royal Holloway College. Part I. (300 pages).—The Teaching of English Composition—a study of style and a guide to Literary Composition, largely illustrated by means of quotations from the best prose and verse in the English language. Crown 8vo, cloth. 2/-

NOTE.—The exercises can be had separately in Six Stages or Standards at 2d. each.

Any number not less than twelve of these will be sold at trade price.

LATIN GRAMMAR RULES.

With an Introduction by W. H. D. ROUSE, M.A., D.Litt., Head Master of the Perse School. Interleaved. In paper wrappers. 6d. net.

This book is intended to supply a series of headings under which (with his Teacher's supervision) a boy may class the simpler syntactical constructions he will meet with when first attempting an easy Latin author.

GAMMER GRETHEL'S FAIRY TALES.

A New Edition of these charming stories, in which the original and best English translation, by EDGAR TAYLOR, is used, and CRUIKSHANK'S inimitable illustrations are reproduced in facsimile. Mr. LAURENCE HOUSMAN contributes a Preface. New and attractive cover design printed in colours. Full gilt edges. Square 8vo. 5/-

The edition with simpler cover and gilt top can be supplied at 3/6 net.) "This is far away the best collection of fairy stories which the season has brought. . . . It speaks much for the vivacity of the narrative that, numerous as were the claims upon our time, we read through the volume from cover to cover."—Notes and Queries.

"The Cruikshank illustrations are inimitable."—Outlook.

THE DE LA MORE PRESS
Alexander Moring, Ltd., London, w.

Romeo before Queen Elizabeth. All this and more of Anne's adventures, even to her befooling of the Dark Lady, may be found in these pages, where the author "aims at historical accuracy—up to a certain well-defined limit." Exact reproduction of Elizabethan life and speech is not attempted; the "Star of Poets," when not quoting from his own plays, does not disdain to use the phraseology of to-day. He can regret that "such an opportunity may not occur again," like the rest of us; he expresses a hope that his "dream-world shall materialise into comforts" for his wife and child, just like the ordinary man round the corner. These familiar touches should help the reader to understand what manner of man Shakespeare was in domestic life. Regarded simply as a romance of Elizabethan times or thereabout, Anne tells a pretty, lively, readable tale. That it entailed upon the author some labour and a careful study of the period we can readily believe. The six coloured illustrations are ridiculously ill-drawn.

The Adventures of a Respectable Bohemian. By ELIZABETH P. RAMSAY-LAYE. (F. V. White, 6s.)

A LITTLE more than a third of this book deals with the adventures of a "respectable Bohemian," the rest being composed of a collection of short stories. Of the two divisions, the second is by far the better, for Margaret Day's reminiscences are most uninteresting, and to call a few trivial episodes "adventures" is interpreting that word with a freedom we have seldom seen surpassed. The five short stories, however, are of good average magazine merit, and, if this is not very high praise, it may induce the reader to persevere in spite of the discouraging beginning. "Kleptomania" and "An Old Proverb" are the best of the stories, but the book as a whole bears the stamp of the ready-made novel.

The Thornton Device. By the HON. MRS. N. GROSVENOR. (Constable, 6s.)

AFTER reading the "Bands of Orion" we looked forward to Mrs. Grosvenor's next book with interest. "The Thornton Device" passes agreeably beyond our expectations, which were considerable. It is carefully observed, quietly written, and well constructed—an admirable piece of work. There is nothing original in the main theme of the story, but the line-by-line detail, which matters, is handled with complete originality. That is to say, Mrs. Grosvenor is inspired, not by books or other people's ideas, but by what she sees herself of the life around her, and by her own thoughts, simply and sincerely recorded. She does not see very deeply, but she sees accurately and without bias. Madeline Urquhart comes to live with Geoffrey Thornton and his invalid wife. She is a girl full of vitality and unselfishness, and she helps to bring happiness into the life and household of the Thorntons, on whom things have pressed somewhat too heavily. She practically saves Geoffrey from becoming a drunkard. Living as neighbours to the Thorntons are the Delamains; Jack Delamain has married a practical busy American woman, with much money and little insight. He is a weak, attractive creature, and is very sorry for himself; the more so because he finds that he is able to get much sympathy from other ladies. Her best qualities lead Madeline into the snare of sympathising with him, and blind her to his weakness and selfishness. She loves him. He seduces her. Up to that point the story has been told with quite remarkable skill. Delamain and his wife and Madeline stand out vividly for the excellence of their drawing, Geoffrey Thornton a little less so, because on him rests the weight of a clumsy solution to the difficulty in which Madeline is placed when she finds that she is going to have a baby. He becomes less and less of an individual and more of a puppet to help the writer. She manages him very cleverly, but he carries no conviction with him. But, in spite of this ultimate fault, the book is a good one, and well worth careful reading. The Delamain ménage is one of the ablest bits of character drawing that we have had the pleasure of reading for some time.

The Heart of the Northern Sea. By ALVIDE PRYDZ. (Allen, 6s.)

MISS ALVIDE PRYDZ is generally acknowledged to be the greatest woman writer of Norway. Such critics as Henrik Ibsen and Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson have endorsed public opinion, and the Norwegian Government, with that generosity to the Arts which is so characteristic of un-English countries, have on three occasions presented Miss Prydz with honorariums to enable her to travel in Germany, Austria, France and Italy. And now one of her works is translated for the benefit of the English reader. "The Heart of the Northern Sea" is a great piece of Nature writing. There is always the atmosphere of the sea; indeed, it may be said to be the principal character. The Haero family live by the Northern Sea, and seem to be part of it. From it they derive all their emotions, their sorrows and their joys. When Gunvor—a splendid figure of a woman—loses her lover, she goes to the sea for peace, and one feels instinctively that it is from whence she came. The other characters show the same traces of the fascination of the deep, and on every page of the book its influence is seen. The story told by Miss Prydz is not new, but the manner of telling it decidedly is. Fru Elin and her daughter, Gunvor, inhabit an ancient mansion overlooking the sea. Gunvor is engaged to a young medical student, who displays an indolence out of all proportion to the restless energy of the girl. She tries to reform him, only to send him into the arms of her protégé, Irmild Myrland. Gunvor, with all the willingness of her native pride, surrenders Svein Torgensen to Irmild, and tries to forget him. There is the local judge, an artist in bric-à-brac and wines, who falls in love with her, and for a moment the young girl with the soul of a woman fancies herself in love with him. But the struggle is soon ended, and when, after an interview with Edmund Falck, the judge, she realises the strength of her dreams, she cannot resist the call of the storm, and in the sea she finds the peace denied her since Svein Torgensen allowed his passion for another to overcome his love for her. That is the whole story, but slight as it is, it should gain for Miss Prydz a large audience of English readers. She knows the secret of describing a storm without being stormy, and depicting passion without being passionate. In these subtle distinctions lie the art of writing a great Nature novel. The translators, Tyra Engdahl and Jessie Rew, have done their work well, choosing their English with great care and discretion. "The Heart of the Northern Sea" is one of those books which tempt the reviewer to copious extracts to prove the quality, for it recommends itself, and it should pave the way for the regular translation of all its authoress's productions.

Cynthia in the Wilderness. By HUBERT WALES. (Long, 6s.)

THIS is a second-rate book about second-rate people. The writing is clever and slipshod; the point of view is clever and narrow; the frankness, for which Mr. Wales has made a name, is clever and false. It is as if the animals were celebrating their loves, as a great man once remarked; only in this case there is no gusto and abandon. At one period Mr. Wales seemed to have something to say; he seemed to care for his work, and to fashion his characters with truth. There is no trace of motive in the present novel, other than that of profit. The book is sensational with a pornographic flavour—the kind of book which used to be considered fit reading for the servants' hall, but is so no longer.

CORRESPONDENCE

ADDLED ANTIQUITIES AND NATURAL HISTORY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Leeds, in point of population, is the sixth city in the United Kingdom; it is the commercial capital of the largest county in the United Kingdom; and it is not without literary and scientific distinction, historical and existent. The City of Leeds can boast of this fact also: it possesses materials for an antiquarian and natural history museum—local and general—second to few cities in the Empire, but these are housed in such a manner that renders them absolutely useless for educational purposes. The natural history collection is not so valuable as it was ten years ago, several of the finest specimens of the "Milner Collection" having been either sold or transferred to other museums. A few fine specimens, however, remain. These it is impossible to study with comfort and advantage. There are, I have been informed, also a large collection of skins of great value. These are as safely, as sacredly, and as usefully hidden from inspection as the treasures of the Imperial Library at Pekin, which can only be seen once in a hundred years, and that by a favoured few. As far as orderly classification is concerned there is only one word equal to the description: "higgledy-piggledy" (a cant word, corrupted from higgle, which denotes any confused mass, as higglers carry a huddle of provisions together.)—Dr. Johnson). The whole mass is of the nature of an ornithological haggis ("A confused mangle-mangle of divers things jumbled together."—Cotgrave). And many of the "things" are so vilely "stuffed" and so woodenly set up, so mouldy and tattered and torn, that the merest novice cannot examine them without feelings of disgust and contempt. No adequate effort has been made to label and describe the specimens, and there is no printed guide to the collection; it cannot be seen properly either as a whole or minutely inspected in detail, and in all respects, as an educational factor in Science progress, it would disgrace the most obscure Eatenswill village from John O'Groats to Land's End.

With regard to the antiquities, even a cursory glance is sufficient to show that Leeds possesses an exceptionally fine series of specimens illustrating the developments that have been made in human handiwork from prehistoric times to a comparatively recent period. In the art gallery, in the municipal buildings, can be seen a collection of prehistoric stone and bronze implements of an altogether unusual completeness. There are also bronzes, etc., of ancient Egyptian, ancient Greek, Roman, and other civilisations, whilst here and there Chinese, Peruvian, South Sea Island, and relics from other sources can be seen. There is just such a collection as could be arranged to form an attractive and educational series, showing the developments of the arts in different areas. Instead of this, what do we find? Mixed up together without any attempt at classification are various implements crowded in a way which makes them most unattractive. The specimens are not labelled or described in any way, excepting by a usually brief and inaccurate ticket, which frequently seems to be as ancient as the specimens themselves. Amongst the prehistoric stone implements are several belonging to Yorkshire which are of great value; but with them are some from America and other parts of the world, and there are some forgeries which had been made to sell. As there is nothing to distinguish the local from the foreign or forged specimens, the collection as it stands is not only doing no good, but is probably doing harm; though from the way in which they are "arranged," it is quite possible that in view of the few people who will pause to look at them, this harm may not be very great. In the same way the Ceramic products of pre-Roman, Roman, Saxon, Mediæval, and later times are "arranged," apparently according to their size. From some small labels, which, with the aid of a good reading glass, can be identified, it appears that several of these specimens at one time belonged to former Leeds antiquaries, who must have spent much time and money in getting them together, and the knowledge of the present condition of the specimens would surely make them turn in their graves.

In addition to this, the floor upon which these specimens are exhibited is so crowded with cases that it almost seems difficult at times to wedge oneself in between them: whereas the journey upstairs reveals large rooms almost bare, and exceedingly unattractive, which, however, seems to serve some use in providing a playground for young children. In the museum of the Leeds Philosophical Society in Park Row matters are not quite so bad as regards the labelling, but

Oxford University Press

THE OXFORD BOOK OF FRENCH VERSE: Thirteenth Century to Nineteenth Century. Chosen and Edited by ST. JOHN LUCAS. Second Impression. Fcap. 8vo, 6s. net; on Oxford India paper, 7s. 6d. net.

School World.—"Would make a very good school prize."

SIDNEY'S APOLOGIE FOR POETRIE. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by J. CHURTON COLLINS. 2s. 6d.

Birmingham Post.—"Professor Collins' introduction is an interesting and scholarly piece of work."

THE WRITING OF ENGLISH. By P. J. HARTOG and Mrs. AMY H. LANGDON. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

Athenæum.—"If parents and schoolmasters will pay heed to the good counsel and practical suggestions in this handy and valuable little work, no future writer on literary studies in our schools will, we think, be able to begin his first chapter—as Mr. Hartog begins his—with the discouraging statement, 'The average English boy cannot write English.'"

THE RISE OF THE GREEK EPIC. Being a Course of Lectures delivered at Harvard University by GILBERT MURRAY. Demy 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

Tribune.—"This treatise of Dr. Murray's is a notable illustration of the ever widening sphere of Homeric study. Philology, archaeology, anthropology, comparative mythology, and higher criticism of every kind are combined in this work with the scholarship, the acute detective faculty, the splendid darning, and the humour of an exceptionally brilliant man."

A HISTORY OF MUSIC IN ENGLAND. By ERNEST WALKER. 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

Standard.—"Worthy in every way to rank as the standard work on a most important subject."

Select List of Educational Works (32 pages) and Complete Catalogue (144 pages) post free.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press, Amen Corner, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART.

PRICE THREEPENCE.

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION:

Inland, 15s. post free, Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free.

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, 95 FETTER LANE, E.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____ months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

even Mr. Crowther himself will admit that the accommodation for the antiquities is exceedingly inadequate, that it is absolutely impossible to show them in anything like a proper way, and that in their present crowded, dark cases they do not serve the good purpose that they might were better accommodation, classification and display available. "Classification" is a word which does not seem to be known much about in either of the Leeds' museums.

The student of history situated in Leeds must feel at a great disadvantage from the way in which he is catered for, compared with what exists in even small towns in other parts of the north of England, and if nothing else, the present condition of the historical and archaeological collections in the municipal buildings and Philosophic Hall at Leeds demonstrate the necessity for a proper rate-paid museum, in which the specimens might be attractively exhibited, intelligently displayed and accurately labelled. The present position of having two collections going, and both badly arranged, is not a credit to the city. Fortunately, the specimens are there: and the collections are such that when the time arrives they will unquestionably prove exceedingly attractive, and enable Leeds to hold its own in the matter of antiquarian treasures, and so we must live in hopes of the future. At present things are certainly depressing.

G. W. M.

THREE UNILITERAL EMENDATIONS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In Thomson's "Liberty," Part IV. 668:

Then (sad relief!) from the black coast, that hears
The German Ocean roar, deep-booming, strong,
And yellow-hair'd, the blue ey'd Saxon came is the reading of the edition of Thomson's works published in 1788, "with his last corrections and improvements," and seemingly of all subsequent editions. The passage is also so quoted in "Ivanhoe." But the second line of the passage should certainly be:

The German Ocean roar deep-booming, strong, with which we may compare Shakespeare's "deep-mouthed sea" and "the booming billow" that closed over Ulysses and his companions in Cary's translation of Dante.

Sidney in his "Apologie for Poetrie" refers to the oracular consultation of chance verses of poetry, "whereupon," according to the editio princeps of 1595, "grew the worde of sortes Virgilianae." Probably "worde" here is a misprint for "werde" (= weird) used in the sense of "prophecy," "omen," as often in the ballads which Sidney loved so well and in Bellenden's translation of Livy (1540), where we read that the "unchangeabil seit of God Terminus" was accepted by the Romans as a "werde of perpetuite."

In the Arden edition of "Julius Cæsar" I have ventured to suggest that the true reading of III. i. 38, 39 might perhaps be obtained by altering the "lane" of the folios into "lune," meaning "humour" or "caprice." The passage would then run "turn pre-ordinance and first decree into the lune of children." This emendation is, I find, supported not only by the comparison of "varying childishness" in the "Winter's Tale," but also by the close parallel of the following passage in the 1603 Quarto of "Hamlet":

For the principal public audience that Came to them, are turned to private plays
And to the humour of children, where we have the same combination of noun and verb, except that, instead of "lune," we have the equivalent term "humour." Such repetition of similar combinations of words with slight changes in different plays is a characteristic of Shakespeare abundantly illustrated by every commentator. For instance, Malone compares in the hundred and twenty-second sonnet:

Thy tables are within my brain
Full character'd in lasting memory with "Hamlet" I. iii. 59:

And these few precepts in thy memory
Look thou character, and with "The Two Gentlemen of Verona" II. vii. 4:

Who art the table wherein all my thoughts
Are visibly character'd and engrav'd.

MICHAEL MACMILLAN.

"TELEGRAPH" AS AN ENGLISH WORD

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—On page 24 of "A Monument of Parental Affection to a Dear and Only Son" (Fourth Edition), printed at Wellington (in Salop), 1811, Mr. Joshua Gilpin, the vicar of Wrockwardine, writing in 1808, and referring to some kind of a machine or toy contrived by his son about the year 1800, says: "His printing press is no longer employed; his telegraph stands still, and his yeomanry troop is called out no more." The youth in question had been entered as a gentleman commoner at Christchurch in Oxford. In what sense was the word "telegraph" then used? At what date did it come into use as an English word? Probably Dr. W. W. Skeat will be able to give an answer.

EDWARD G. DODGSON.

January 18.

THE DAILY NEWS READING CONTEST.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Some weeks back I wrote expressing disagreement with certain remarks of yours. I am glad to be able to-day to say I thoroughly coincide with you on above subject. Mr. Gardiner is entirely in the wrong and you are entirely in the right. I have studied the matter of newspaper competitions for years, and although I have won on several occasions I can safely say that the Legislature would never do a better day's work than if it prohibited them altogether. They dull the edge of husbandry, they excite false hopes, they rouse jealousy and bitterness of spirit, they are honeycombed with chance and fraud.

Four years ago I met a man who told me he had once been sent by a certain religious society, together with other temporary clerks, to help in the work of adjudicating in some mammoth competition promoted by a "Snippety" journal. They worked by piece-work, he said, and whenever they got the chance they threw away solutions by handfuls. Of course somebody won, and the editor's decision was final and binding. The whole thing is done behind closed doors and is vitiated from that very fact. The prizes go where the promoters want them to go.

I can see nothing in the conditions of the Daily News competition, nor in the questions set, that makes it anything else but a gamble. Fees are not solicited, but people are encouraged to buy unnecessary copies of the paper. What, however, makes it fundamentally a lottery is this: An average half-educated man is made to think—and rightly—that an average half-educated man can win. If Macaulay were to come to life and enter that competition under an assumed name, he would be declared beaten by Farmer Giles, of Slushton-in-the-hole, Mangel-Wurzelshire; or John Smith, employed in a Sauce Factory.

ARCH. G.

"FAUST AND MEPHISTOPHELES"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Another painting by Delacroix seems to have been overlooked—namely, the "Faust and Mephistopheles" in the Wallace Collection. It is No. 324, next to Meissonier's "Print Collector," and underneath and a little to the left of the same artist's "Polichinelle."

January 19.

CALEB PORTER.

MIRABEAU

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Rowland Strong is apparently a rival to Mr. Machen, whose power of invective Mr. E. P. Baker finds refreshing, for in his letter he favours Mirabeau with fourteen opprobrious epithets, beginning with "gas-bag" and ending with "consummate swine," that remind the reader of the insults of the Parisian populace when escorting a victim to the guillotine. If we contrast the term Mr. Trowbridge uses—"the demi-god"—with these choice epithets we find a vast gulf between them. In Mr. Strong's long tirade there is one

The Times

describes its new publication

The Historians' History of the World

25 Volumes
17,000 Pages
3,000 Illustrations
And Yet Only
7s. 6d. per volume.

There is no other English work of similar scope and extent. It is a book for both the general reader and the scholar; a luminous and fascinating narrative, a standard work of reference.

We will send you a 200-page Descriptive Booklet, exhibiting the main features of the History, gratis and post free on request.

Authentic and Readable

World-history is one unbroken drama, as Freeman says, no part of which can be rightly understood without reference to the other parts which come before and after it. The Historians' History of the World describes human evolution in its broadest aspect. It ranges from 5,000 B.C. to 1907 A.D., and covers the globe from Pole to Pole. It deals with more than five hundred peoples, each of which has played a part in the great drama of world-history. Test its wide and universal outlook at our expense, by accepting our offer of a week's free examination of the complete work in your own home.

The first commandment of history is to be authentic. The Historians' History of the World is the product of the highest modern scholarship applied to the most authentic sources. It utilises the best accounts written by the greatest historians of the leading events in world history. Wherever possible, the actual words of the first-hand authorities are quoted. Thus the book represents the closest approach yet made to the ultimate truth on world-history. Test this claim at our expense, by accepting our offer of free examination.

A good history must be readable as well as authentic. The Historians' History of the World describes all great events and personalities in the language of the best writers. The "purple patches" of the great historians fall into their orderly place in the narrative. The result is a book that unites the human interest of the best fiction to the authenticity of real life. We cannot prove by mere assertion that no reader will find the book dull, but we invite you to test it at our expense, by accepting our offer of free examination.

Many-sided and Impartial

An adequate world-history must take account of all departments of human activity. The Historians' History of the World describes what men and women have done and thought and said, so that the world will not willingly let it die. It deals fully with the political and military achievements of mankind, their social conditions, their religions and philosophies, their industry and commerce, their arts, sciences and literatures. Test it at our expense, by accepting our offer of free examination.

All adequate world-history must be impartial. But it is well-nigh impossible for any single historian to free himself from the various kinds of bias—patriotic, political, educational, theological.—which insensibly colour his views. A high standard of critical impartiality can only be attained by the co-operative efforts of such a cosmopolitan group of scholars as are responsible for The Historians' History of the World. Test the scrupulous impartiality of the work at our expense, by accepting our offer of free examination.

A Great Work of Reference

The Historians' History of the World is a great question-answerer, or work of reference. It contains all the important facts of world-history, shown in their true atmosphere and relations—not set forth in the dry and disjointed fashion of an encyclopædia. Yet each fact is readily discoverable, thanks to an elaborate system of guides to the text. By far the most important of these is the unique encyclopædic index which fills the twenty-fifth volume. The total experience of humanity is thus put at the instant service of the inquirer. We invite all readers of The Academy to test this at our expense, by accepting our offer of free examination without delay.

We offer to send you a complete set of The Historians' History, in 25 volumes, carriage paid, for free examination in your own home. You may keep the books for a whole week, and use them precisely as if they were your own. Should you not decide to purchase them, we will pay the return carriage, and you will incur no obligation or expense of any kind. You need assign no reason for returning them. You will have no trouble in unpacking or packing them, since they will be sent ready for use in a special oak bookcase. The utmost you need do is to loosen a few screws in the lid of the packing-case, and there will be no litter of straw or paper. This offer is the best guarantee of our confidence in the book.

Why the Book is so Cheap

The Times has long contended that books are too dear. It demonstrates this by selling The Historians' History of the World at 7s. 6d. per volume, though each volume contains four times as much as the average book at 7s. 6d., and compares favourably in paper, print, and binding with guinea books.

The price of a new book is determined by three factors, which depend respectively on the capital outlay, the cost of manufacture, and the publisher's profit. There is a generic difference between the old and new methods of treating capital outlay. Publishers insist on recovering their whole capital outlay by the sale of a small edition at a high price. We prefer to distribute the capital outlay over the whole sale of the work. This sale we estimate as not less than 50,000 sets, whereas no publisher would issue a first edition of more than 10,000 sets at the outside. Thus we diminish the Capital Factor by at least four-fifths, besides making the first edition the cheapest. The Production Factor, which is the actual cost of manufacturing each volume, is similarly reduced by the expectation of a large sale, permitting considerable economies in printing, binding, and the price of raw materials. The Profit Factor can also be reduced by preferring a small profit per volume on a large sale to a large profit per volume on a small sale.

Many book-buyers prefer to limit their monthly expenditure. For their benefit The Times will accept payment for the work by monthly instalments of 10s. 6d. for the cloth-bound volumes, and slightly more for the other bindings. For details see the Descriptive Booklet, gratis and post free on request.

INQUIRY FORM.

Date.....

The Times (Book Club),
380 Oxford Street, London, W.

Please send me, gratis and post free, the Descriptive Booklet of the Historians' History of the World, with specimen pages and particulars of prices in various bindings.

Please send me (carriage paid) a complete set of The Historians' History of the World for a week's free examination. If I do not purchase it, you will pay the return carriage, and I shall incur no expense or liability of any kind.

Strike out one of these paragraphs

Name.....
(Please write clearly.)

Address.....

Age.....

Rank, Profession, or Occupation.....

The Descriptive Booklet

If you wish to know more about The Historians' History before receiving it for free examination, you should apply for the Descriptive Booklet, which will be sent gratis and post free on request. In its 200 pages an attempt has been made to give some idea of all the various features of the History, with the aid of many specimen extracts and illustrations taken from the Book itself. It includes a full account of the new method of publishing which enables us to publish it at so low a price.

opinion worth note. He says: "The men of the North have discussed the men of the South without bearing in mind or in ignorance of the essential distinctions which divide the mentality of Northern Europe from that of the South of France." There is, however, an exception to this rule, besides Mr. Strong, in M. Dumont, a man of the North, a Swiss, and an intimate friend of Mirabeau, who appears to understand this, and in his "Souvenirs sur Mirabeau" gives a very clear appreciation of his character.

Carlyle did not obtain his notion that Mirabeau was a hero or demigod from this memoir, for Dumont distinctly states that Mirabeau was not a great man, but a very remarkable man of rare talents. He makes no apology, which is impossible, for his private life, partly, he thinks, due to his father, the self-styled friend of the people, who, as the French say, was a tyrant to his family. Mr. Strong says nothing of Mirabeau's public career. To read his letter no one would suppose that he had been the most powerful leader of the Assembly, the idol of the people, and that at his death he received almost regal honours. This in the eyes of Mr. Strong was no doubt silly and out of place. Nor was he a mere hunter after popularity; as he said himself he was populaire but not populacaire. He opposed the fusion of the orders, which cost him his popularity for a time, and when the motion was carried by Sieges did all in his power to hold in check the Jacobins, clearly perceiving that their object was to thwart and master the Assembly. After his death they succeeded, if it can be called success, to throw their country into a state of anarchy. Mirabeau told Dumont that he expiated very cruelly the errors of his youth, which had thwarted his endeavours to bring order out of chaos. There was in him, says his biographer, much evil and much good. The good was devoted to obtain what he believed was for the good of his country, a constitution resembling the British as far as circumstances would allow, with some checks on popular opinion. He failed, and probably would have done so had he lived.

With good will a Republican stable constitution might have been evolved after the flight of the King, but the Jacobins opposed all attempts of the kind. The fiasco of the Revolution was due to many causes combined. M. Dumont puts first the want of character in that blameless man in private life, the King, who lost his prestige and frittered away all his opportunities.

H. D. BARCLAY.

[Mr Strong writes: I am not a rival of Mr. Machen's, and my strictures upon Mirabeau were contained in a review of Mr. Trowbridge's book, and not in a "letter" to THE ACADEMY. It is not the fact that I said "nothing of Mirabeau's public career"; on the contrary it was his public career that I have been at pains to define. Its details are elaborately set forth by Mr. Trowbridge, but to rehearse them one by one does not come within the scope of a review. To call a spade a spade and Mirabeau a thorough-paced rogue is not invective, but the plain duty of the impartial historian and the dispassionate critic. If any one of your readers is reminded by such definitions as "gas-bag" and "consummate swine" of "the insults of the Parisian populace when escorting a victim to the guillotine," he must have a very inadequate idea of the resources of the French language in the mouths of the Parisian canaille, and of what the French Revolution really was. A Swiss is not necessarily a man of the North (your correspondent is here confusing the Matterhorn with the North Pole—altitude with latitude). Dumont's opinion that his friend Mirabeau was "a very remarkable man with rare talents" is beside the question. So was Jonathan Wild. It is characteristic of the cant which prevails in North Britain (and parts of South Britain, to say of a man that "no apology is possible for his private life," and then, on party grounds, to seek an apology for his equally dirty public life. Public immorality is no better nor worse than private immorality. Your correspondent should take a few lessons in French. There is no such word as "populacaire" (pou-poul' au Caire?), and Mirabeau could not have used it. He may have said that he was not "populacier," thereby meaning that he did not address his audiences in the unspeakably filthy slang which was common to many of the Revolutionary leaders. He deserves no credit for opposing, when it was too late, the theoretical fusion of the classes, which in practice never took place. His first public step was to associate himself with the Tiers Etat. When he opposed the Jacobins he was in the pay of the Monarchy. To paraphrase a familiar expression of Dr. Johnson's, "the man was a rogue, and there's an end on't."]

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART

Gilbey, Sir Walter. George Morland. Black, 20s. net.

BOOKS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

White, Joan. Dorothy's Little Tribe. Collins.

Hudson, Robert. Two Princes of Science. Collins.

Le Feuvre, Amy. Robin's Heritage. Frowde, and Hodder & Stoughton, 2s.

Leila: and her King Cophetua. By Mrs. Rowland Carmarthen. Spurrell, 2s. 6d.

Uncle Tom's Cabin. Robinson Crusoe. Siegle Hill.

Humbly Rhymes. By Sir Francis Burnand. Sisley's, n.p.

Calthrop, Dion Clayton. The Pirate's Pocket-Book. Sisley's, 1s. 6d. net.

EDUCATIONAL

La Légende des Siècles. By Victor Hugo. Edited by G. F. Bridge. The Clarendon Press, 3s. net.

Contes et Nouvelles. By Prosper Mérimée. Edited by J. E. Michell. The Clarendon Press, 2s. net.

The Methodical Arithmetic. Edited by W. J. Greenstreet. Parts V. and VI., 3d. each; Part VII., 4d. Dent.

Black's Literary Readers. Book III. Written and edited by John Finnemore. Black, 1s. 4d.

FICTION

A Spahi's Love Story. From the French of Pierre Loti. London: Charles Carrington, 10s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS

The Clyde. Painted by Mary T. and J. Young Hunter. Described by Neil Munro. Black, 20s. net.

Molmenti, Pompeo. Venice. Translated by Horatio F. Brown. In 2 vols. Murray, 21s. net.

Kremer, Frau Ida. The Struggle for a Royal Child. Long, 6s.

Huntingdon, Ellsworth. The Pulse of Asia. Constable, 14s. net.

Long, William J. Whose Home is in the Wilderness. Ginn, 5s. net.

Ames, Hugo. The Red God. Ouseley, 2s. net.

Pollak, Gustav. Franz Grillpaizer and the Austrian Drama. New York: Dodd, Mead, $2.50.

Smith, Garden G. Sidelights on Golf. Sisley's, 3s. 6d. net.

Hurll, Estelle M. The Bible Beautiful. Sisley's, 7s. 6d. net.

Barbour's Bruce. Translated by George Eyre-Todd. Gowan & Gray, n.p.

West Ham. A Study in Social and Industrial Problems. Compiled by Edward G. Howarth and Mona Wilson. Dent, n.p.

Reed, Ellen Leah. Napoleon's Young Neighbour. Boston: Little, Bröwn, n.p.

Yeats, William Butler. Discoveries: a Volume of Essays. The Dun Emer Press.

Seeley, E. L. Artists of the Italian Renaissance. Chatto & Windus, 7s. 6d. net.

Mayer, E. V. Pompeii as an Art City. Siegle Hill, 1s. 6d. net.

Shakespeare. Der Dichter und sein Werk. Von Dr. Max J. Wolff. Zweiter Band. München: C. H. Beck.

Duncan, Edmondstone. The Story of Minstrelsy. Walter Scott Publishing Co., 3s. 6d.

The Practice of Instruction. Edited by John William Adamson. National Society's Depository, n.p.

St. Clair, George. The Secret of Genesis. Griffiths, 5s. net.

James, George W. The Story of Scraggles. Chatto & Windus, 2s. 6d.

Henderson, M. Sturge. George Meredith. Methuen, 6s.

William Allingham. A Diary. Edited by H. Allingham and D. Radford. Macmillan, 12s. net.

The Story of Isis and Osiris. Told and translated by Lily Schofield. Dent, n.p.

Graham, Harry. Familiar Faces. Arnold, 3s. 6d. net.

The Elzevir Library: Fancy and Humour of Charles Lamb, Wit and Imagination of Benjamin Disraeli, Vignettes from Oliver Goldsmith. Seeley, 1s. 6d. net each.

Selections from the Writings of John Ruskin. Melrose, 2s. 6d. net.

THE CITY OF THE SOUL

By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS.

This volume was issued anonymously in May, 1899. The first edition of 500 was exhausted within a few months of publication, and a second edition of 500 was issued in December, 1899.

Owing to the failure of the Publisher the book has been unobtainable for several years. 150 copies, all that remain of the second edition, are now offered for sale at the original published price, 5/- net, by MESSRS. BICKERS & SON, LEICESTER SQUARE, LONDON, from whom alone they can be obtained.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The Late Mr. LIONEL JOHNSON in the OUTLOOK in an Article entitled "A Great Unknown."

"The title of these arresting poems is taken from that of an opening set of four sonnets, and it well describes and defines the writer's poetical attitude. . . . Here is not the impeccable dulness of an accomplished imitator, of the soulless craftsman who has caught some master's style; behind or within these poems is a personality. The pieces which will probably win most admirers are three ballads. . . . Youth in its white, fresh grace, its wistfulness and joyousness, wonder and simplicity, sings and sighs in these ballads, of which one is a legend, one historical, and the third a beautiful invention. . . . But possibly finer than these fine fantasies are the more personal, or at least more intimately conceived and meditative poems. . . . Let the reader turn to 'Rejected,' a mystical lyric worthy of Blake and impossible to describe otherwise; if he has any sense of poetry he will feel and confess that we have here an authentic poet. Among crowds of clever versifiers here comes a poet."

THE SATURDAY REVIEW.

"Delicate imagination and sense of words are not the only qualities that entitle 'The City of the Soul' to peculiar distinction. The writer adds to these a technical judgment no less completely at home with the ballad than with the lyrical or sonnet form. As a criticism of verse, this would be exhaustive praise. But these pieces contain just that element of passion which transforms skilful verse into fine poetry. . . . The ballad soliloquy 'Perkin Warbeck' is extraordinarily good. . . . Among the rest of the poems are two translations from 'Les Fleurs du Mal.' In daintiness of expression, often married to exotic sentiment, the translator himself has no slight affinity with Baudelaire. The book is full of things which tempt one to linger."

THE SUNDAY SPECIAL.

"This poignant accomplished singer."

"A PARISIAN" IN THE ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

"These poems, 'The City of the Soul,' by an anonymous author, were known in part to the Parisian public before they were printed in England, for some of the best among them—and the volume, it seems to me, is a treasure-house of gems—first appeared in the 'Revue Blanche,' with the accompaniment of a French translation. That is some three years ago, and the great masters of French poetry, chief among them the late Stéphane Mallarmé, were not slow to applaud."

"The remarkable success which I hear the book has since had in England does credit, I think, to the judgment of our French critics, which is often singularly just in its estimate of English poetry, especially if it belongs to the Elizabethan period of our literature, or be animated by the Elizabethan 'Souffle.' . . . and surely it is this 'Souffle,' a pure invigorating wind from heaven which blows and whispers and weeps in this new poet's verses. . . . The two translations from Baudelaire are as perfect in form and in the repetition of the frisson of the original verse as Baudelaire's own translations from Poe and Longfellow. It is a pleasure to find so complete, so temperamental a sympathy between a great French and great English poet."

The Late MR. FRANCIS THOMPSON IN THE ACADEMY.

"He has a rich sense of language, a true gift of mellifluous versification. Few poems are without cunning and iridescent diction; and all have a rich, youthful passion for beauty which is in itself an inspiration. . . . No poem at once complete and brief enough for quotation will exhibit altogether the glow of his diction, the luxuriance of his fancy, and the melodious quality of his verse."

MR. GEORGE STREET IN THE PALL MALL MAGAZINE.

"In my case, I reckon but very few of the contemporary writers of verse known to me, as poets—how few I should hardly like to say. Among them I place without hesitation the anonymous author of the 'City of the Soul.' . . . This inspiration I take to be first of all the beauty of visible things freshly impressive on the senses. It is as though a child said 'Look, how beautiful!' but a child able to see minutely and variously. . . . and the power to see beautiful things and to express them beautifully is so rare, that one is justified [taking my view of it] in thinking the appearance of this little book a most fortunate event."

THE STANDARD.

"The verses have a character of their own, and are at times quite exquisite in point of workmanship. . . . this accomplished and skilful hand."

THE SCOTSMAN.

"This is a book of anonymous poetry of a rare distinction. . . . This is a verse of the proud kind that scorns a vulgar appreciation, and looks for the approbation of connoisseurs. . . . In all these the feeling is always wrought to a high pitch of intensity, yet cautiously and solemnly, without weakness of hysterics."

THE TIMES.

"He is by turns æsthetic and introspective, and is at his best in his ballads, especially the ballad of 'St. Vitus,' almost every stanza of which is a Pre-Raphaelite picture."

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"These are the verses of a poet. The volume is small, but it would be most unjust to call it the production of a minor bard. . . . It is a work of a remarkably high order. The author has achieved great distinction in his sonnets. . . . Indeed, all through the book one comes upon lines which are astonishing in their beauty and their distinction. . . . a poet who proves himself capable of the very highest work. There can be no doubt as to the fate of these poems."

THE STAR.

"The fresh, clear voice of a poet sounds unmistakably in 'The City of the Soul.' . . . I have no space for a tenth of the glorious poetry with which this little volume is strewn. . . . a scroll of poems this which before many days will set the world wondering, and the name of the author? Well, the world will know it also before long. He cannot disguise his genius."

"N.O.B." IN THE ECHO.

"A new poet who is of serious account is something of a rarity to-day. Yet such I fancy is a true description of the anonymous author of 'The City of the Soul.' . . . The lovely little ballad of 'St. Vitus' is one of the most arresting things in the volume, for here it is that the formal grace of the anonymous poet makes its first irresistible appeal. . . . But to my mind the new bard's claim to attention might be established on a single poem. Scarce a line is there of 'Wine of Summer' which Keats might not have contentedly signed."

THE SUN.

"His thoughts are poetic and so is his expression of them. He is a master of technique, and he has in his lines a lilt and a rhythm that is musical and fascinating. . . . His 'Perkin Warbeck' is an exquisite specimen of the ballad. . . . The whole book is full of gems."

THE GLASGOW HERALD.

"Nothing could be finer than the treatment of these subjects (the ballad of 'St. Vitus' and 'Perkin Warbeck'), and they clearly show that the author, whoever he is, possesses the ballad-making faculty. . . . Some fine lyrics and sonnets help to illumine the volume."

THE DUNDEE ADVERTISER.

"Work of so fine a cast ought to have borne the author's name. Only rarely amongst books of poems published nowadays does one appear distinguished by such really lovely and lofty fancy. . . . One or two of the poems are introspective without being morbid; some have their music and colour taken direct from nature, and convey much the same impressions as may be derived from exquisite water-colour drawings. Others are like dreams that 'go out like tapers,' caught and preserved in magic lines."

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

"The anonymous author of 'The City of the Soul' has genuine talent. . . . He moves easily and gracefully in various measures; he has imagination and sense of colour and an excellently full vocabulary."

THE WESTERN MAIL.

"From the first page to the last every piece has not only something, but a good deal to lift it above the common-place. . . . Indeed, although we are afraid to say it, we thought we recognised sometimes a timbre of which no other English poet than Swinburne is capable."

THE BRITISH MERCURY.

"We need only read the opening pages of this little book to be amply convinced that it is the work of a true poet. . . . The volume begins with a sequence of four sonnets. They ought to be carefully pondered over by the reader. . . . For ourselves we regard them as the crowning effort of his genius. . . . The writer of this book handles the ballad with consummate skill."

THE IRISH INDEPENDENT.

"This is a volume of poetry to which the author does not append his name. We admire his modesty. . . . They appear to us to be suffused with the colour and the atmosphere we find in Keats. . . . We shall eagerly look forward for another volume by the same writer."

THE BIRMINGHAM GAZETTE.

"The anonymous author of 'The City of the Soul' has indubitable power, rich imagery, and a deep vein of thought. There is an intensity about his utterances which grips the reader, and the plaintive tone reaches the heart. . . . As a proof of a different power take the subtle 'Impression de Nuit,' the picture of London which this author can trace in fire and blackness, in marvel and misery."

ABERDEEN FREE PRESS.

"In this almost luxuriously simple little volume we have some of the sweetest song that we have chanced upon for a long time. The name 'Poetry' is no misnomer for the work of this tuneful singer."

MONSIEUR LAURENCE JERROLD IN LA REVUE BLANCHE.

"Parmi les innombrables volumes de vers qui s'accumulent et dont il est vraiment préférable de ne rien dire, en voici un, anonyme, du plus haut intérêt. Il y a une émotion intense et une belle musique des mots dans cette Cité de l'âme, et l'âme est celle d'un vrai poète. . . . Le volume se termine par une sorte de péan magnifiquement simple, une 'ode à mon âme' orgueilleuse et triomphale, où s'affirme une outre-cuidante fierté dans un chant rapide, d'un style parfaitement pur et d'un souffle large. Cependant il y a de meilleures choses peut-être encore dans le volume. . . . Le volume—qui contient en outre plusieurs sonnets d'un beau style—est l'œuvre d'un vrai poète."

MESSRS. BICKERS & SON, LEICESTER SQUARE, LONDON.

ESTABLISHED 1807.

EAGLE INSURANCE CO.

LIVES ANNUITIESHead Office*—79 PALL MALL, LONDON, S.W.City—41 Threadneedle Street, E.C.Branches—Eagle Insurance Buildings in BIRMINGHAM, BRISTOL, LEEDS, MANCHESTER

The Surplus disclosed at the Valuation (1902) produced an average Cash Bonus of 30 per cent. of the Premiums paid during the Quinquennium; being a return of one and a-half Premiums.

The Company's Debenture Policies, with Guaranteed Benefits, afford an attractive form of Insurance in the Non-Participating Class, at very moderate rates.

APPLY FOR XXth CENTURY PROSPECTUS, SHOWING SIMPLE AND LIBERAL CONDITIONS.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEERED

DRINK THE

WHITEDELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
& AFTER DINNER.& BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

The Best Tonic

For the restoration of energy and vitality; the relief of mental and nervous exhaustion, impaired digestion or appetite, there is no remedy so beneficial as

Horsford's Acid Phosphate
(Non-Alcoholic.)

It is a scientific and carefully prepared preparation of the phosphates that provides the tonic and nerve food needed to improve general health.

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

PUBLIC OPINION

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF
CURRENT THOUGHT & ACTIVITY.TWOPENCE EACH FRIDAY.ESTABLISHED 1860.An Interesting Review of World Events.

To get a broad, comprehensive and clear view of the great movements afoot on the globe, to catch the inmost spirit of the activities of the world—to grasp their full meaning—read PUBLIC OPINION.

This paper compels reading by the tremendous interest of its subjects and their cosmic sweep. It is a journal of timeliness that appeals to intelligent men and women who wish to know the best that is said and done in all fields of human activity.

Its pages are brimful of information and discussion on Politics, Science, Religion, Literature, Art, Music, and the Drama, and of the people who keep the world turning around. It gives the best from all periodicals and keeps one abreast of the culture of the age in all lines of thought and achievement. To the busy man and woman it is indispensable. It is the paper that keeps you educated.

PUBLIC OPINION is the ideal paper for every home, of interest to every member of the family, a luxurious necessity and a necessary luxury. Its circulation increases each week, and it is read by people in all parts of the world.

*Specimen Post Free on application.Offices: 30 & 31 Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1865

FEBRUARY 1, 1908

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON
(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON).

DEPARTMENT FOR TRAINING
TEACHERS FOR SECONDARY SCHOOLS.

Theory, Practice, and History of Education.—
J. W. ADAMSON, B.A., Professor (Head of the Department).

Ethics.—Reverend A. CALDECOTT, D.Litt.,
D.D., Professor.

Psychology.—C. S. MYERS, M.A., M.D., Professor. W. BROWN, B.A., Lecturer.

The Department is recognised by the Board of Education as a Training College for Secondary Teachers under the Teachers' Registration Regulations.

The Course, which includes Practical Work in Secondary Schools, extends over one academical year, beginning in October or January. It is suitable for those who are preparing to take the Teachers' Diploma, University of London, and for the Certificate of the Teachers' Training
Syndicate, University of Cambridge.

The Fee is £20 for the year, if paid in advance,
or 8 guineas per term (three terms in the year).

Application should be made to

PROF. ADAMSON,
King's College, Strand, W.C.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN,

ALBEMARLE STREET, PICCADILLY, W.

Tuesday next, January 28, at Three o'clock,
Professor F. J. HAVERFIELD, M.A., LL.D., First
of Two Lectures on "ROMAN BRITAIN: a, Its Frontiers and Garrison; b, Its Interior Civilisation." Half-a-Guinea the Course.

Thursday, January 30, at Three o'clock, Major
MARTIN HUME, First of Three Lectures on "THE STORY OF THE SPANISH ARMADA." Half-a-
Guinea.

Saturday, February 1, at Three o'clock,
LIONEL CUST, Esq., M.V.O., M.A., First of
Two Lectures on "ANTHONY VAN DYCK." Half-
a-Guinea.

Subscription to all the courses in the season
Two Guineas. Tickets may be obtained at the Office of the Institution.

THE MOSHER BOOKS

THE NEW CATALOGUE FOR 1908 is now ready, and will be sent free on request
to booklovers anywhere that can be reached by mail. This Catalogue, like those that preceded it, is not made up of old and hackneyed quotations
concerning books. You are not wearied by "a jollie good book" jingle and that sort of thing,
but you are treated to some very genuine prose
and verse not seen in every cut and decidedly
dried anthology.

THOMAS B. MOSHER, PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

QUEEN SQUARE CLUB.

A social club for men and women interested in politics, literature or art. Lectures, entertainments, chess and bridge. An exquisite Queen
Anne club-house, close to the British Museum,
and Russell Square Station. Inexpensive lunch
and dinner. Subscription two guineas.—Apply
Secretary, 9 Queen Square, Bloomsbury.

NOTICE.

All communications to the Editor should be addressed
to 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields,
W.C.

All business communications must be sent to The
Manager of "The Academy,"
95 Fetter Lane, E.C.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately
done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens
and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The
Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds of Typewriting carefully done at home (Remington). Good paper.
Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from
3s. 6d. per 100.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road,
Clapham, S.W.

MS. TYPED with care, 8d. per 1000 words.
Circulars duplicated from 2s. 6d. per
100 (testimonials). Shorthand.—Mrs. JACKSON,
37 Constantine Road, Hampstead, N.W. (late of Rosebery Square Buildings).

Books for Sale

ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA, a set in half-morocco, 35 vols., issued by the Times,
for nine guineas net; good condition.—Apply
W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

THACKERAY'S WORKS, The Pocket Edition, 27 vols., small fcap. 8vo., bound in green cloth, gilt tops. Illustrations by the Author.
Published by Smith, Elder at 27s. net. Offered at 21s.; new.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

BOOKS AT ONE-THIRD COST.—

Thousands of the Best Books at from 25 to 80 per cent. below the original prices. Largest and best Stock of Secondhand and New Remainder
Books in the World. Write for our January
Catalogue.—W. H. SMITH & SON, Library
Department, 186 Strand, London, W.C.

Books, etc., Wanted

THE CAMBRIDGE LITERARY AGENCY,
which is placing Novels, Short Stories,
Articles, and Poems with over 100 (one hundred)
Publishers and Periodicals, sold, on December 31,
12 Short Stories and a Serial by UNKNOWN
WRITERS. Hundreds of unique testimonials.
All MSS. submitted by GEORGE G. MAGNUS,
115 Strand, London.

WILL PURCHASE AT ANY TIME.
ILLUMINATED MANUSCRIPTS, from
the earliest times till the beginning of the XVth
Century; Incunabula and other Early Printed
Books; Illustrated Books, Prints, from the XVth
and the beginning of the XVIth Century. Rare
Old Books and Prints.—JACQUES ROSENTHAL,
Munich, Bavaria. 10, Karlstr. 10.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT
INSTITUTION

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest
the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity
as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical Advice by eminent Physicians
and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley, Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A Furnished House in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense
when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary,
Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

JUST PUBLISHED. 8vo, boards, 1s. net.

THE SLING.

Remarks in connection with Lectures delivered
in the Royal Institution,
May, 1905, to June, 1907.

By WM. LEIGHTON JORDAN.

London: Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co., Ltd.

FOR QUIET WORK OR REST CURB.—

To be LET, Furnished, very small well-built HOUSE on cliffs away from traffic; S. coast; bracing air. Rent, for long period, very moderate.
Photo. Write F. Q., Willing's, 73 Knightsbridge.

THE CITY OF THE SOUL

By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS.

This volume was issued anonymously in May, 1899. The first edition of 500 was exhausted within a few months of publication, and a second edition of 500 was issued in December, 1899.

Owing to the failure of the Publisher the book has been unobtainable for several years. 150 copies, all that remain of the second edition, are now offered for sale at the original published price, 5/- net, by MESSRS. BICKERS & SON, LEICESTER SQUARE, LONDON, from whom alone they can be obtained.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The Late Mr. LIONEL JOHNSON in the OUTLOOK in an Article entitled "A Great Unknown."

"The title of these arresting poems is taken from that of an opening set of four sonnets; and it well describes and defines the writer's poetical attitude. . . . Here is not the impeccable dulness of an accomplished imitator, of the soulless craftsman who has caught some master's style; behind or within these poems is a personality. The pieces which will probably win most admirers are three ballads. . . . Youth in its white, fresh grace, its wistfulness and joyousness, wonder and simplicity, sings and sighs in these ballads, of which one is a legend, one historical, and the third a beautiful invention. . . . But possibly finer than these fine fantasies are the more personal, or at least more intimately conceived and meditative poems. . . . Let the reader turn to 'Rejected,' a mystical lyric worthy of Blake and impossible to describe otherwise; if he has any sense of poetry he will feel and confess that we have here an authentic poet. Among crowds of clever versifiers here comes a poet."

THE SATURDAY REVIEW.

"Delicate imagination and sense of words are not the only qualities that entitle 'The City of the Soul' to peculiar distinction. The writer adds to these a technical judgment no less completely at home with the ballad than with the lyrical or sonnet form. As a criticism of verse, this would be exhaustive praise. But these pieces contain just that element of passion which transforms skilful verse into fine poetry. . . . The ballad soliloquy 'Perkin Warbeck' is extraordinarily good. . . . Among the rest of the poems are two translations from 'Les Fleurs du Mal.' In daintiness of expression, often married to exotic sentiment, the translator himself has no slight affinity with Baudelaire. The book is full of things which tempt one to linger."

THE SUNDAY SPECIAL.

"This poignant accomplished singer."

"A PARISIAN" IN THE ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

"These poems, 'The City of the Soul,' by an anonymous author, were known in part to the Parisian public before they were printed in England, for some of the best among them—and the volume, it seems to me, is a treasure-house of gems—first appeared in the 'Revue Blanche,' with the accompaniment of a French translation. That is some three years ago, and the great masters of French poetry, chief among them the late Stéphane Mallarmé, were not slow to applaud."

"The remarkable success which I hear the book has since had in England does credit, I think, to the judgment of our French critics, which is often singularly just in its estimate of English poetry, especially if it belongs to the Elizabethan period of our literature, or be animated by the Elizabethan 'Souffle' . . . and surely it is this 'Souffle,' a pure invigorating wind from heaven which blows and whispers and weeps in this new poet's verses. . . . The two translations from Baudelaire are as perfect in form and in the repetition of the frisson of the original verse as Baudelaire's own translations from Poe and Longfellow. It is a pleasure to find so complete, so temperamental a sympathy between a great French and great English poet."

The Late MR. FRANCIS THOMPSON IN THE ACADEMY.

"He has a rich sense of language, a true gift of mellifluous versification. Few poems are without cunning and iridescent diction; and all have a rich, youthful passion for beauty which is in itself an inspiration. . . . No poem at once complete and brief enough for quotation will exhibit altogether the glow of his diction, the luxuriance of his fancy, and the melodious quality of his verse."

MR. GEORGE STREET IN THE PALL MALL MAGAZINE.

"In my case, I reckon but very few of the contemporary writers of verse known to me, as poets—how few I should hardly like to say. Among them I place without hesitation the anonymous author of the 'City of the Soul.' . . . This inspiration I take to be first of all the beauty of visible things freshly impressive on the senses. It is as though a child said 'Look, how beautiful!' but a child able to see minutely and variously. . . . and the power to see beautiful things and to express them beautifully is so rare, that one is justified (taking my view of it) in thinking the appearance of this little book a most fortunate event."

THE STANDARD.

"The verses have a character of their own, and are at times quite exquisite in point of workmanship. . . . this accomplished and skilful hand."

THE SCOTSMAN.

"This is a book of anonymous poetry of a rare distinction. . . . This is a verse of the proud kind that scorns a vulgar appreciation, and looks for the approbation of connoisseurs. . . . In all these the feeling is always wrought to a high pitch of intensity, yet cautiously and solemnly, without weakness of hysterics."

THE TIMES.

"He is by turns æsthetic and introspective, and is at his best in his ballads, especially the ballad of 'St. Vitus,' almost every stanza of which is a Pre-Raphaelite picture."

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"These are the verses of a poet. The volume is small, but it would be most unjust to call it the production of a minor bard. . . . It is a work of a remarkably high order. The author has achieved great distinction in his sonnets. . . . Indeed, all through the book one comes upon lines which are astonishing in their beauty and their distinction. . . . a poet who proves himself capable of the very highest work. There can be no doubt as to the fate of these poems."

THE STAR.

"The fresh, clear voice of a poet sounds unmistakably in 'The City of the Soul.' . . . I have no space for a tenth of the glorious poetry with which this little volume is strewn. . . . a scroll of poems this which before many days will set the world wondering, and the name of the author? Well, the world will know it also before long. He cannot disguise his genius."

"N.O.B." IN THE ECHO.

"A new poet who is of serious account is something of a rarity to-day. Yet such I fancy is a true description of the anonymous author of 'The City of the Soul.' . . . The lovely little ballad of 'St. Vitus' is one of the most arresting things in the volume, for here it is that the formal grace of the anonymous poet makes its first irresistible appeal. . . . But to my mind the new bard's claim to attention might be established on a single poem. Scarce a line is there of 'Wine of Summer' which Keats might not have contentedly signed."

THE SUN.

"His thoughts are poetic and so is his expression of them. He is a master of technique, and he has in his lines a lilt and a rhythm that is musical and fascinating. . . . His 'Perkin Warbeck' is an exquisite specimen of the ballad. . . . The whole book is full of gems."

THE GLASGOW HERALD.

"Nothing could be finer than the treatment of these subjects (the ballad of 'St. Vitus' and 'Perkin Warbeck'), and they clearly show that the author, whoever he is, possesses the ballad-making faculty. . . . Some fine lyrics and sonnets help to illumine the volume."

THE DUNDEE ADVERTISER.

"Work of so fine a cast ought to have borne the author's name. Only rarely amongst books of poems published nowadays does one appear distinguished by such really lovely and lofty fancy. . . . One or two of the poems are introspective without being morbid; some have their music and colour taken direct from nature, and convey much the same impressions as may be derived from exquisite water-colour drawings. Others are like dreams that 'go out like tapers,' caught and preserved in magic lines."

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

"The anonymous author of 'The City of the Soul' has genuine talent. . . . He moves easily and gracefully in various measures; he has imagination and sense of colour and an excellently full vocabulary."

THE WESTERN MAIL.

"From the first page to the last every piece has not only something, but a good deal to lift it above the common-place. . . . Indeed, although we are afraid to say it, we thought we recognised sometimes a timbre of which no other English poet than Swinburne is capable."

THE BRITISH MERCURY.

"We need only read the opening pages of this little book to be amply convinced that it is the work of a true poet."

"The volume begins with a sequence of four sonnets. They ought to be carefully pondered over by the reader. . . . For ourselves we regard them as the crowning effort of his genius. . . . The writer of this book handles the ballad with consummate skill."

THE IRISH INDEPENDENT.

"This is a volume of poetry to which the author does not append his name. We admire his modesty. . . . They appear to us to be suffused with the colour and the atmosphere we find in Keats. . . . We shall eagerly look forward for another volume by the same writer."

THE BIRMINGHAM GAZETTE.

"The anonymous author of 'The City of the Soul' has indubitable power, rich imagery, and a deep vein of thought. There is an intensity about his utterances which grips the reader, and the plaintive tone reaches the heart. . . . As a proof of a different power take the subtle 'Impression de Nuit,' the picture of London which this author can trace in fire and blackness, in marvel and misery."

ABERDEEN FREE PRESS.

"In this almost luxuriously simple little volume we have some of the sweetest song that we have chanced upon for a long time. The name 'Poetry' is no misnomer for the work of this tuneful singer."

MONSIEUR LAURENCE JERROLD IN LA REVUE BLANCHE.

"Parmi les innombrables volumes de vers qui s'accumulent et dont il est vraiment étonnant de ne rien dire, en voici un, anonyme, du plus haut intérêt. Il y a une émotion intense et une belle musique des mots dans cette Cité de l'âme, et l'âme est celle d'un vrai poète. . . . Le volume se termine par une sorte de péan magnifiquement simple, une 'ode à mon âme' orgueilleuse et triomphale, où s'affirme une outre-cuidance fiévreuse dans un chant rapide, d'un style parfaitement pur et d'un souffle large. Cependant il y a de meilleures choses peut-être encore dans le volume. . . . Le volume—qui contient en outre plusieurs sonnets d'un beau style—est l'œuvre d'un vrai poète."

MESSRS. BICKERS & SON, LEICESTER SQUARE, LONDON.

CONTENTS

Page	Page
Life and Letters 407	Menander 416
The Watch Below 409	In Defence of Dreaming 416
Literature :	Edward and Eliza : A Sentimen-
Nocturn Phantasmata 409	tal History 418
Bartolozzi 410	The Library Table 419
Parliamentary Hash 411	Fiction 420
The Censorship of Plays:	Drama :
1544-1907 412	"Cupid and Commonsense" at
New Medieval Library 413	the Stage Society 422
On Unbending over a Novel 413	Correspondence 423
Japanese Fairy Tales—II. 415	Books Received 425

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields.

The publishing offices of THE ACADEMY are at 95 Fetter Lane, E.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

THE Evening Standard is, we believe, a "Conservative" journal. This is the fashion after which it comments on the theft of the late Archbishop Richard's palace:

A crowd of monarchists and friends, some 3,000 in number, conveyed him with much show of pomp and indignation, which fell rather flat, to the house of the devoted adherent of the Church, M. Denys Cochim.

And the agreeable Evening Standard adds in its pleasant, reminiscent vein:

By a strange irony of fortune, the palace which Mgr. Richard had just quitted was promptly turned over to the Ministry of Labour, which is presided over by M. Viviani, who has given frank expression in the Chamber to his atheistic views.

And one wonders what it is precisely that this "Conservative" organ exists to "conserve." Not the rights of property, surely, since the title of the chief pastor of Paris to a house in his archdiocese must be considerably more than a thousand years old. Not the true democratic principle, which leaving the hereditary noble, the hereditary peasant proprietor the just enjoyment of that which they have inherited, takes care that there shall be some career open to talent as apart from descent, that there shall be a few prizes left for those who are not so fortunate as to be born rich and distinguished. Not religion, certainly, unless the "frank" M. Viviani, the atheist (why is an atheist always "frank," and a Christian always "bigoted"?) is the representative of the religion of the future. What, then, does the Evening Standard desire to conserve? Well, there are fourteen columns in the issue from which we have quoted devoted to such matters as "Latest Tape Prices," "Market Movements," "Wall Street Cables," "Closing Prices," "Dividends and Reports." One wonders whether there were any hot-headed Cavaliers who felt that the enthusiasm over King Charles the Martyr was overdone, and fell rather flat, that it was funny to think of Cromwell in Whitehall, and that after all the best thing was to "do business," and to see what could be done with the widow and orphan—in affliction, certainly, but still with a small capital awaiting investment. Conservatism? Mr. Sikes was a violent fellow, but at least he is not recorded to have professed an oily enthusiasm for the Decalogue.

We commented last week on the curious fact that youth or youthfulness is so often alleged against writers in newspapers as a term of reproach, and in the Sphere of January 25th Mr. Clement Shorter gives us one more case in point. Mr. Shorter is annoyed, and quite rightly so, because someone in the Daily Graphic has been advising him to read his Milton and Shakespeare. Mr. Shorter says, "I note that some youthful writer in the Daily Graphic has," etc; and again, "The youthful impertinence of the Daily Graphic writer was doubtless due to an interregnum caused by a change of editor." The implied assumption is that only very young people are ever impertinent, but experience shows that impertinence, or, to speak more correctly, impudence, is by no means confined to youth, nor even particularly characteristic of it. We can think of several middle-aged people who could give points in impudence to a whole college of undergraduates. For ourselves, when, as occasionally happens, people say very rude things about us, we prefer to think of them as victims of senile decay. The insults of youth can be borne with comparative equanimity, but the gibes of the bearded and the abuse of the bald are hard to bear.

It appears that Father Adderley has been inviting a Mr. P. W. Wilson to "preach Protestantism" to his congregation of working-men at Saltley. One would have thought that the energies of a Catholic priest would have been more fittingly directed to the suppression than to the encouragement of "false doctrine, heresy, and schism." This, however, is by the way. What is of interest is the mental attitude of the Protestant preacher, as revealed in a recent issue of our Nonconformist contemporary, the Daily News. Mr. Wilson is careful to inform his readers that "the Hon. and Rev. J. G. Adderley . . . is brother to Lord Norton, and, therefore, almost a peer of the realm." The statement, coming as it does from a representative of our free and independent Protestant democracy, is too delightful to require comment. As if, however, the cup of Mr. Wilson's bliss was not already quite full, we are subsequently informed that the Protestant preacher was permitted to meet and converse with another Anglican priest, "also related to various aristocratic titles." Truly, a red-letter day in the life of Mr. P. W. Wilson! We understand that Mr. Wilson is the recently-retired Radical Member for South St. Pancras, and we congratulate South St. Pancras on its acquisition of so virile an exponent of democratic sentiment.

We protest against the indiscriminate publication of names in Police-court cases, and are amazed that some of our respectable daily contemporaries should fall into this solecism against public order. During the past few weeks the following case has been proceeding. A perfectly honourable foreign lady was charged with shop-lifting, on December 20, by a well-known Regent Street firm. After having been arrested and charged before Mr. Mead, she was released on bail. On January 25 she surrendered to bail a second time. The lady then went into the witness-box, and on the conclusion of her evidence the counsel for the prosecution, Sir Charles Matthews, said that he had listened carefully to her evidence, which "was verified by witnesses called on her behalf, and if the magistrate should feel a doubt in his mind, or find that the effect would be to make a jury feel that the case should be dismissed, he would be perfectly content to leave the case where it stood. Mr. Mead said he was very glad that the evidence of the lady impressed Sir Charles as favourably as it did himself. She gave her evidence in a clear, composed, and dignified way. . . . He was satisfied with the explanation she had given. It was much to be regretted that a lady of her position should have been a subject of suspicion, but it was an unfortunate circumstance for which no one was to blame."

Possibly not, but nevertheless the lady had been arrested, had had to appear three times before the magistrate, and has to pay her solicitor, Mr. Barrington Matthews, and her counsel, Mr. C. F. Gill, K.C., Mr. Bodkin, and Mr. Bruce, for conducting her defence. On the third hearing the charge against her is dismissed after nearly a month's vexation and annoyance. The publication of her name at all, before she had been committed for trial even, could serve no purpose whatever. It will injure the prosecutors, in spite of any justification they may have had in bringing the charge. Customers who cannot be bothered to carry about with them elaborate guarantees of their status and character, will avoid dealing with them; and an entirely superfluous and irreparable injury has been done by the Press to an innocent and honourable person. Had the lady been of a different character, it would have been quite soon enough to publish her name, after she had been committed for trial. Our quotations are made from the pages of a contemporary of high reputation; we print "the lady" where our contemporary, by unaccountable lapse from decency, prints her name. "Wragge" has been "in custody," and that fact still appears to our contemporaries generally a sufficient reason for blasting a reputation as far as it is within their power to do so. As regards the Regent Street firm, we give them the benefit of Mr. Mead's remark that no one was to blame, otherwise we would print their name without the lady's, and take care that our remarks should be copied by the Continental Press.

At a well-known bookseller's shop in Piccadilly there is a certain gentleman who has, by careful and deferential treatment of that portion of "Society" which likes to think itself "literary," raised himself from a very humble position to one of trust and affluence. Mr. — has lately taken to giving advice, not only of a positive kind (which was harmless and pleased those who mistook the shop assistant's tricks of the trade for a real knowledge of books), but of a negative kind. Thus, in the case of a book which was the work of some author who had incurred the displeasure of this "adviser in literature to the aristocracy," he actually strongly advised a chance customer, a lady, not to buy it, and offered her something of the same sort, "only a good deal better." The lady in question was a simple soul, and would not have ventured to dispute the judgment of so renowned a critic, but she happened to be the aunt of the author of the book, and as she was probably buying it more from a sense of family duty than for any other reason, she felt aggrieved, and ventilated her grievance, and it was then discovered that other inquirers for the same book had fared in the same manner in the same shop. Now these people are looking out for a bookseller's where the methods of the cheap drug-store are not in use, and the matter having been reported to the publisher of the book, there is some talk of a possibility of further developments. We shall await these with great interest.

It was at the same highly fashionable "resort" that the writer of this note once tried to obtain a copy of Barnfield's poems. He mentioned that they were published in the English Scholar's Library, and the omniscient gentleman to whom we have referred graciously promised to get him a copy if possible. Months, and finally years, went by, and still it was apparently impossible to obtain a copy, although no particular limit as to price had been mentioned, and although the gentleman referred to assured him that he had advertised for the book and made every conceivable effort to obtain a copy. About three years after the commission to obtain the book had elapsed, the search was abandoned, and some three weeks afterwards the writer of this note commented to a friend on the extraordinary difficulty of getting Barnfield's poems. The friend, who was wise, merely smiled, and appeared on the following day with two copies of the book, purchased at Glashier's in the Strand, where there had been all the time a plentiful supply of these volumes in the identical before-mentioned "English Scholar's Library" Series, and at the original price!

It is to be supposed that daily newspapers know their own business best, but it is sometimes very hard to understand the principle on which they apportion their space to various topics. For instance, that admirable journal, the Daily Telegraph, has thought it necessary to have half a column or so almost every day for the last three weeks in the most prominent part of the paper concerning the marriage of a certain Miss Gladys Vanderbilt to "a young Hungarian nobleman," of the name of Count Szechenyi. A visitor from another planet, on seeing this prominence given to a marriage, would naturally suppose that it excited the greatest interest in England. But the truth is that not one person in a hundred thousand in England had ever heard of Count Szechenyi or Miss Gladys Vanderbilt until all the violent and unnecessary publicity was given to them. In England people of infinitely greater social importance than the Vanderbilts are constantly being married, and no fuss at all is made about it; and if people are vulgar enough to spend £50,000 on a wedding the depressing fact remains a secret between themselves and their bankers. Why, then, we ask, is this ridiculous prominence given to the doings of absolutely insignificant people? We ask purely for information.

An important legal decision has been recently given by the Court of Appeal equally interesting to the Press and the public. Mr. F. B. Mason, proprietor of the Tenby Observer, appealed from a judgment of the late Mr. Justice Kekewich, granting to the Tenby Borough Council an injunction excluding Mr. Mason from their meetings. The Court of Appeal upheld the judgment, and the Master of the Rolls said that no member of the public, whether he was a burgess or not, had a right to attend the meetings without the permission of the Council. We know nothing of the quarrel between Mr. Mason and the Tenby Council, but the gratitude of the public is due to Mr. Mason for having upheld its rights by bringing the action. We are by no means extreme advocates of the liberty of the Press in cases where publication merely excites morbid curiosity, but if it is to be of any service to the public at all, the meetings of local governing bodies, among which the most shameless nepotism and corruption are rampant, are precisely the occasions when the liberty of the Press is of the utmost value to the public. As a legal correspondent of our contemporary, the Morning Post, points out, in commenting on this case:

"Closed doors may result in a Star Chamber in a legal body or wholesale corruption in an administration." He remarks further that local inquiries at Poplar, West Ham and elsewhere have shown the necessity of publicity in order to check to some extent this wholesale corruption. As long as local affairs are "run" on political or sectarian lines, or with regard to the interests of secret societies, some check on nepotism and corruption is as much as we can expect.

The most important features in the speeches delivered at the opening of Parliament are Lord Lansdowne's remarks on the failure of the Government to attempt to deal with the House of Lords, which it represents as the main impediment to legislation; his attack, and that of Mr. Balfour, on Mr. McKenna's administration; and the faintness of Mr. Birrell's defence of Mr. McKenna. We do not pretend that the last implies disagreement within the Government, for we are not political partisans. It was not Mr. Birrell's business to defend Mr. McKenna, and the fact that he only did so tamely does not warrant the assumption that he radically disapproves of his administration; it merely reminds us that his own action while he held the same office was totally different. Criticism of the Government's education policy is peculiarly within the province of a literary journal, but Lord Lansdowne's and Mr. Balfour's criticism of its administration deals with a more important question, and one of still wider interest. Both statesmen corroborate the charges which we have repeatedly made against Mr. McKenna, of usurping the functions of the Legislature. We quote from Lord Lansdowne's speech:

Upon education I will only say this one word. I am full of gratitude to the Government for announcing that their proposals are to take the form of a Bill, because the recent action of the Education Minister has suggested the idea that he considers himself free to dispense with the assistance, not only of the House of Lords, but of the House of Commons also, and by executive action of his own department to do things not only not authorised by any existing statute but diametrically opposed to the spirit of the existing law.

THE WATCH BELOW

The bell has sounded and the watch is done,
The dawn enlightens all the darkened sea—
That cold relentless friend of such as we—
The bell has sounded, brother: soon the sun.

No more to stare on dreary sheets of foam,
No more to scan the stars in any wise,
No more to clamber riggings hard with ice;
Lo! on the port repeat the lights of home.

Oh, we were weary, weary, and the best
That life could give us was to plough the main
Through the wide night till dawn loomed up again;
But God at last has covered us with rest.

The bell has sounded, 'tis the watch's knell;
Let us make haste below where it is warm,
Out of the cold and fog, the dark and storm:
The bell has sounded, brothers. All is well.

VINCENT O'SULLIVAN.

LITERATURE

NOCTIUM PHANTASMATA

A History of the Christian Church since the Reformation. By S. CHEETHAM, D.D. (Macmillan, 10s. 6d.)

THE title of this book is an improper one. The Christian Church is composed of the Latin, Greek, and Anglican obediences: neither the Baptist, Lutheran, Calvinist, Moravian, Presbyterian, or any other sect has any claim to be included under the style which Archdeacon Cheetham has chosen. True, a Lutheran, having been duly baptised, is a Christian; but there is no such thing as a Lutheran Church. And, again, by no stretching of terms can the Oneida Community be termed Christian, and it must be a large charity indeed which could apply the term to the followers of Mary Baker Eddy. This defect of title apart, the book is to be commended as a useful work of reference, as a store-house of names, and facts, and dates. Of course, in the compass of five hundred pages it would be foolish to expect minute detail or anything approaching it; the history of Christendom and of the Christian and semi-Christian sects for the last three hundred years is too complicated a matter to be dealt with effectively in so small a space. Still, Dr. Cheetham has provided an excellent skeleton outline, and if one wants to know the dates at which American Calvinism passed into Unitarianism, and Unitarianism again into amiable (or apparently amiable) deliquescence, these things are to be found in this "History of the Christian Church." Here and there, perhaps, there are statements which are questionable: it is doubtful whether the author has made sufficient allowance for the survival of the Laudian (and Catholic) teaching into the eighteenth century, and even into the nineteenth. Dr. Johnson was not a Latitudinarian, and Dr. Routh was alive in the 'fifties of the last century; and one must not forget that during the darkest days of Whiggery in the sanctuary there was a certain Bishop of Sodor and Man so famed for Apostolic holiness that the French King ordered that his see should be left untouched in time of war. Again, the notice of John George Gichtel, the disciple of Böhme, should have contained a reference to the Theosophic Correspondence of St. Martin and Liebistorf, and one is sorry to see that the index contains no reference either to St. Martin or to his master, Martinez Pasqually. Still, after all deductions, this story of the Church and the heretics remains, as we have said, a very useful book.

Useful, perhaps, above all, as giving us in a brief compass a comprehensive view of multifarious, multi-coloured error. To read it is as though one saw a succession of nightmares thrown on the white sheet by the magic lantern; and as we read we realise that we hold, each one of us, all these heresies potentially in our hearts. Just as every man is potentially a madman, so is every man potentially a Presbyterian, a Baptist, a follower of Elias Eller, a Latter-Day Saint. We know what fantasies we gladly harbour in our dreams, what wild seas we navigate, what horrors we perpetrate without horror and without astonishment. And in waking also most men trespass into paths that lead to no sane abodes; moment by moment we skirt the region of the monstrous, and do so with a kind of pleasure, as some will walk by the edge of a high cliff, testing the imagined terror of the fall upon the rocks, well aware that they are in no real danger. Well, we can do these things and be secure against madness so long as we are careful to keep within certain bounds, so long as we are conscious all the while of our true standpoint in reality. But, let this standpoint be forgotten for a moment; then the fantastic dreamer is in danger of becoming a raging madman. And, again, there are certain dreams which, in a sense, are true—as dreams—which once translated into the logical speech of waking hours are at once transformed into maniacal or ridiculous delusions. And so with many or most of the sects which have flourished, which flourish still to the prejudice of good art, holy living, and clear thinking: to the destruction of all true religion where they reign unchallenged. Once these schemes and systems were, perhaps, harmless if fantastic dreams, some certainly were nightmares from the first; still, if a man wakes up and shakes the ugly fancy from him, not much harm is done. If Calvin had kept his monstrous system of Ill Will to Men in some odd corner of his brain, as one keeps an ugly idol in a locked drawer, how much misery, how much horror, how much of hideousness, how much atheism and blasphemy had been spared the world. St. Augustine, we may believe, had seen all that Calvin saw, and was able to refrain himself in time; and it may be that there is no extreme madness of these our days, no crack-brained error of the craziest sect in all the United States of America that has not been presented to the vision of some one or other of the most illuminated saints. And it may be that the distinction between the heresiarch and the saint is chiefly in this: that whereas the inventor of heresy sees a great deal, the saint sees all, beholds the beautiful error trailing away into a hideous serpent, whose slime befouls the earth, whose breath blasts all that is lovely. Literally it is not likely that St. Austin foresaw the work of the Covenanters, the Salem of Cotton Mather's time, or modern Glasgow on Sunday; but it is probable that he saw images and similitudes of these desolations and abominations, and realised that the ladder whose first step seemed so firm and so fair led to no pleasure or paradise, but to the fields of burning marl. The first saints of the Church could reason gently with Pagans; violence they reserved for the dissenters or Gnostics. A child is, in the natural order, ignorant about many things, unreasonable about most things; in this ignorance and unreason there is nothing uncomely, and we teach the child better, and the more kindly we teach, the more swiftly will the child be enlightened. But very differently do we treat the grown man who sees snakes crawling over his bed, the grown woman who has a mission from heaven to cut her children's throats, since delirium tremens and homicidal mania are far removed from the ignorant simplicity of tender years; nor is homicidal mania mitigated at all if it be complicated with religious melancholia. We do not scold a little boy because he does not pile his wooden bricks into a form that recalls St. Peter's at Rome; we have every reason to scold the people of mature years who build, or cause to be built, the hideous structures called Dissenting Meeting-houses.

Procul recedant somnia Et noctium phantasmata.

BARTOLOZZI

Francesco Bartolozzi, R.A. By J. T. H. BAILY.
(Connoisseur, Extra Number. Otto and Co., 5s. net.)

To the collector of artistic small ware, such as prints and drawings, irrespective of anything but its intrinsic beauty or its historical interest, the name of Bartolozzi is a continual exasperation. He (the collector) discovers a fresh and distinctly promising-looking shop, but his enquiry for anything in the way of prints is met with a reflective shake of the head and "We've no Bartolozzis"—as though there were nothing else fit to be considered. His fair friends, to whom he is displaying his collection, ask pointedly, or disappointedly, if he hasn't got any Bartolozzis; while his sister or, worse still, his wife, shows him a Bartolozzi which she has picked up for a tenth of its market value, and he has not even the satisfaction of knowing enough about it to point out that it is an undoubted "fake." A plague on these alien immigrants!

At the same time, it is no use denying to Bartolozzi the high place to which his talent and industry undoubtedly entitle him; and though stipple engraving was by no means the only, or even the best, method of reproducing the works of Reynolds and others who in Bartolozzi's time were making English art famous, there is no question that in his own line he was a superlative craftsman, and we need have no hesitation in allowing him one of the foremost places in the history of his art.

Making due allowance for the absurd over-estimation in which Bartolozzi is held by a host of fair or foolish collectors, of whom most have never heard of anybody else, and many could hardly be expected to tolerate anything but ecstatic praise of their idol, Mr. Baily has certainly produced a very useful and acceptable book. A hundred excellent reproductions of the prints, most of them in colour, are a feast in themselves; and Mr. Baily's biographical sketch is a very suitable accompaniment to the banquet, saying much that is interesting about the artist and some of his contemporaries, without going too deeply or seriously into his subject. Nobody is always right, and there are various occasions on which he incurs the liability of contradiction—as in stating that Sir Peter Lely was a German, or that Bartolozzi's prints were directly inspired by the Italian Renaissance—but as a whole it is a very pleasant and useful sketch.

For the long and important Appendix I. ("A List of Published Engravings by Bartolozzi") it is difficult to believe that Mr. Baily himself can be responsible, and we can only suppose that it was left in other hands. The number, no less than the nature, of the mistakes in it makes mention of them imperative, and we can only regret the oversight (for it can hardly be otherwise) of letting the list go out as it is. Half an hour's work on it would have sufficed. Many of the errors are obvious to any reader—such as "Ranelagh Mosque" for "Ranelagh Masque," "Colia" for "Celia" in "As You Like It" (this occurs twice), "Aemilius Paulus and her Children," "Sacrededge," "Elliott, T. Knight" for "Sir Thomas Elliott," "Raphael Zanzio" and "Raffael pines" in two consecutive lines, "Confirmation" for "Confirmation," or "Triolus and Cressida." But there are others by which collectors who have no special, or even general, knowledge of art and artists might easily be misled. Such are the names of painters given as R. Westal, B. Rebecca, P. da Cartona, Dom Zampieri, Coates, W. Marten, Andrea Vanechi. Worse still are such entries as the two following:

Northumberland, Duke of: Hugh Smithson.
Spencer, Countess: G. Pointz.

which, from the form adopted throughout the appendix, would imply that Smithson and Pointz were the painters of the portraits. Nor is the following quite happy:

Spencer, Countess: G. Pointz—
Ditto with naked shoulders.
Woman with a Turban.

It is obvious, in fact, that whoever compiled, or copied, this appendix knew nothing of the subject in hand, and was not even a competent indexer.

PARLIAMENTARY HASH

Fourteen Years in Parliament. By A. S. T. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN, late M.P. for the Tonbridge Division. (Murray, 10s. 6d. net.)

THE sort of Parliamentary hash which is provided in this book by Mr. Boscawen, whom we remember as a fluent speaker with a rather strident voice at the Oxford Union, is not without its uses, provided it be tolerably served. And we must say at once that the cook is not a bad one. But the mess is at best but reference journalism, and cannot be treated as history, and so strong is the prejudice of the present reviewer against anything of the former kind making an attempt to pass as the latter, that he has attempted to draw a line between the two by leaving uncriticised the last hundred pages of the book. The procedure may be illogical, and the line drawn at the retirement of Lord Salisbury, somewhat arbitrary; but the compromise is consoling to his mind.

The author, one of the Conservatives slaughtered at the polls of 1906, is a strong party man and does not pretend to be anything else; but his boasted attempt to be fair to his opponents may be granted to be successful upon the whole. So that they and the general reader may use his record, if they will. Moreover, as we shall see, he shows that there were times when party had not entire possession of his soul.

We wish that his spelling and composition were equally blameless. He is terribly fond of that literary bugbear, the improper use of the words "phenomenon" and "phenomenal"; writes of something being "fully availed of," of one thing as "different to" another, and "the latter" in reference to the last of several; whilst he employs the unusual forms "agressive" and "siezed," and misspells the name of a former Russian Ambassador and more than one member of Parliament. Yet we believe Mr. Boscawen took a first class at his University, and has, presumably, enjoyed some leisure of late.

There is no question here of the quorum pars magna fui; and Mr. Boscawen's name does not figure once in the useful index appended to his work. Yet he was something more than a mere spectator, having been Parliamentary Secretary to Sir Michael Hicks-Beach when Chancellor of the Exchequer, and afterwards Parliamentary Charity Commissioner—a curious position which carries with it no salary, and the holder of which ceases to be a private member without becoming a member of the Government. The former point of vantage enables the author to let his readers into the secret of the restorative used by his chief on Budget days and to retail one of those tempestuous asides by which he relieved himself on occasion. Moreover, Mr. Boscawen has always been a zealous member of the Church party, and on at least one occasion successfully moved the rejection of the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill. In this connection we note his denial of the supposed Cecil plot, by means of which that now triumphant measure was once prevented from reaching Grand Committee. "It was the absolutely spontaneous action of a large number of members who felt that they had not been treated quite fairly"—nay, more: "among the most conspicuous loiterers, I saw some of the oldest and most respected members of the Cabinet."

In reference to the second reading of Mr. Balfour's Education Bill (the last one), we get a quaint little piece of revelation as to the methods of Parliamentary orators:—

For my part, I rose in my place eleven times before I could fire off a speech, for which I had hastily prepared an equal number of impromptu exordia to rebut the statements of the previous speaker, a well-known device calculated to make the speech appear extempore.

Another personal incident which Mr. Boscawen quite pardonably introduces is that of his being dragged out of his bed (to which he was confined with influenza), and driven down to the House in a closed carriage to support a vote of censure. "When I got there I was placed in a warm room behind the Speaker's chair, where were two other Unionist members in the same condition as myself; in the Opposition room were three supporters of the Government, similarly situated." It was a case for pairs, as he remarks: as it was, "we all risked our lives and doubtless spread the influenza germs far and wide through the Palace of Westminster." Some years later, the member for Tonbridge, though in general faithful enough to the call of the party whip, on one occasion preferred a college dinner to Parliamentary duty.

In an early chapter of his book Mr. Boscawen, in recording Mr. Gladstone's retirement (which he thinks was occasioned by his unwillingness to deal with the Welsh Church question), praises his "marvellous old-world courtesy," and naïvely remarks: "I remember that he sat through my maiden speech, which is more than any of my own leaders did."

As to these last, Mr. Chamberlain is obviously his hero, though Mr. Balfour's dexterity is appreciated, and his wide and generous sympathy towards the Church, "of which he is usually believed not to be a member," gratefully acknowledged.

We are glad also to see that so ardent a Tariff Reformer is fair to the unfortunate Mr. Brodrick, who has had to bear an undue amount of obloquy; and his remark on one of Mr. Wyndham's "beautifully phrased speeches"—that as it gave satisfaction neither to the Nationalists nor to the Ulster party, it was "probably an exceedingly wise one"—commends itself to our judgment.

Our Parliamentary recorder severely criticises Conservative Cabinet appointments, especially those of 1900, and his dictum that the reconstruction of that year amounted to "a sort of twentieth-century reproduction of the old Whig system in the eighteenth century" is quite felicitous. He admits that in the first session of the Unionist Government of 1895 things were shockingly mismanaged; that the committee on the Jameson Raid was unsatisfactory, "and the matter remained an unsolved mystery"; that the Conservatives were "far too easy-going" about Ministerial directorships of companies; and he thought that Mr. Balfour's new rules of procedure were "the chief causes of the disintegration of our party." Nor does he defend the way in which Mr. Balfour on two notable occasions threw over two of his colleagues, though one of these was Sir John Gorst—certainly not a favourite with the writer.

Mr. Boscawen acted with the small band of members who advocated a Chinese policy less cautious than Lord Salisbury's. He confesses, however, that the China party had no debating "giants"; and concedes that, not having the information open to the Government or their breadth of outlook, the action of the group may have been ill advised. The question whether the rise of Japan is likely or not to prove of ultimate advantage to the world has been propounded before, but it is none the less a highly pertinent one.

One is glad to find that the author's experience in the matter of the National Telephone Company and other questions has led him to Burke's view of the functions of a member of Parliament, "that a member must not be a mere delegate, but owes to his constituents the use of his judgment."

We do not share the ex-member's views of the complete futility of debates on the Address, and are of opinion that he does something less than justice to the career of the late Lord Ritchie. He is capable on occasion of making merry over the weaknesses of his own particular favourites as well as of those with whom he has little sympathy. Thus in treating of Mr. Chaplin's conduct in Committee of the Agricultural Rating Bill, he remarks that the then President of the Local Government Board "made really great speeches on the smallest amendments," so much so that it was remarked that he seemed to consider it "not a Rating, but a perorating Bill." We only hope that the conversation that is supposed to have taken place on the Treasury Bench, the outcome of which was Mr. Balfour's tardy perception of the advantages of a legal training, may have been historical.

It probably, however, gave Mr. Boscawen more genuine pleasure to tell his readers that Mr. Ian Malcolm once explained to him "that he occupied a middle position between Mr. Balfour and the Free Fooders"—a place he confesses that he himself "could not find on any map." But here we are trenching on that dire fiscal question which we have vowed to ourselves to keep outside this review.

In treating of his political opponents, Mr. Boscawen is sometimes very severe, but seldom patently unjust. This last epithet should, however, one thinks, in view of recent information, be applied to his description of Gladstone's conversion to Home Rule as "sudden." The present Premier, we are told, only escaped succeeding Mr. Peel as Speaker ("he was undoubtedly covetous of the position and excellently qualified") because "he was the only Cabinet Minister who was on speaking terms with all the other members of the Rosebery Cabinet!" He admits, too, that the Conservatives underrated his "tenacity" when in Opposition.

Two obiter dicta met with in the book are amusing—that apropos of Mr. Yoxall, the Liberal representative of the N.U.T.—"Elementary school teachers are always well dressed"; and that evoked by the late Sir Michael Foster's opposition to the Pure Beer Bill—that scientists "regarded the making of anything out of something different from what the public expected as progress." The Welsh farmer "who had previously supported disestablishment, hoping to get rid of the tithe," but when he heard that the money was to go to museums said that "he would sooner support the parson than an old bones house," is still, it is to be hoped in existence.

Mr. Boscawen writes well and dispassionately, considering the nearness of the events, of the South African War. He has, however, his own little fling at the War Office in reference to the delay in the granting of his own leave from garrison duty in Malta. His account of the two worst "scenes" in the House during his career is of some interest. In the free fight during the Home Rule debates of '93 he declares that "no real damage was done," but that débris were collected in the shape of "a broken arm of a bench, some buttons, several shirt studs, and a false tooth." He recalls the fact that during the prolonged committee proceedings of this period, when the terrace became "the most fashionable lounge in London," passengers on the penny steamers used to chaff members, calling out to them "to go in and look after the Home Rule Bill."

These are a few of the humours of the book; but the recorder is, all the while, very much in earnest, and expresses his opinion that the best speech he ever heard in Parliament was one of those fervid lay sermons for which Lord Hugh Cecil, in the last Parliament, became famous. And, as we hinted at the beginning, there are evidences in this book, however slight its claims to be read as history, that its author is something more than a mere party politician.

THE CENSORSHIP OF PLAYS: 1544—1907

The Stage Censor. A Historical Sketch, 1544-1907, by G. M. G. Illustrated. (Sampson Low, 1s. 6d. net.)

THOSE persons—and they appear to be tolerably numerous just now—who are interested in the long quarrel between the English dramatists and the Licensor of Plays, should be grateful to G. M. G. In his book, "The Stage Censor," he sums up for them in a brief hundred and twenty pages the history of the relations between State and Stage in England during the past three hundred and fifty years in a vivacious and interesting manner. A writer in the Times recently published two very instructive articles on the subject, full of information extracted from reports of commissions and other not very accessible works. But those articles dealt mainly with the Post-Walpole Censorship. Sir Robert is, of course, the father of the institution in its modern form. G. M. G., on the contrary, devotes a large part of his volume to the earlier period, when the drama was still under the control of the King's Master of the Revels. The history of the censorship in this country is not a pretty one from whatever point of view one regards it. Neither English art nor English statesmanship cuts a very creditable figure in it. We have instances of tyranny and oppression, instances of dubious financial practice, instances without end of crass stupidity, and, lastly, a general flavour of corruption, political and otherwise, which produce an impression the reverse of agreeable. From Sir Henry Herbert, the Master of the Revels of seventeenth century days, squabbling over his fees and receiving £3 from Mr. Hemmings, "for a courtesie done him about their Blackfriars Hous"—what was the nature of that "courtesie," we wonder?—to the younger Colman, Censor in the days of George IV., who made up for the laxity of his own plays by being ludicrously strict about everyone else's, the chronicle is equally odious and absurd. Colman is the gentleman who would not allow a lady to be called an "angel" on the stage because angels were beings of a celestial order, and, therefore, unfitted to be mentioned in a theatre. But that, of course, has been more or less the censorial attitude towards the drama in this country ever since a censorship has existed, and it is still the attitude of those persons who support the censorship as an institution. The theatre, according to these people, is a lewd and disreputable institution, which must be very carefully watched by specially-appointed guardians, lest it should get out of hand. Dramatists and managers are terrible fellows, who are only waiting for their chance to swoop down upon an innocent public with plays of the most blasphemous and indecent character. Only the interposition of the censorship prevents our playhouses from being flooded with the grossest improprieties, and if ever that beneficent check were withdrawn managers would "find themselves compelled"—that is the phrase—to stage entertainments of an objectionable character in order to fill their houses! Why theatre managers, any more than the members of any other decent calling, should "find themselves compelled" to do something which their own consciences do not approve does not appear, especially as we are told in the same breath that the production of these dubious entertainments would lead to riotous protests from the audiences, owing to the inherent virtue of the English people, and, therefore, must be prevented in the interests of public order. Theatre managers are not very intelligent people, but they can be trusted not to put up plays which would be both improper and unpopular as well. However, that is not the view of the censorship and its supporters, their view for the last three hundred and fifty years having been that only assiduous watching can keep the playwright from the worst excesses. Of course, this attitude of the modern licenser is well meant, just as the identical attitude of the Master of the Revels was well meant. Theatres, being in their nature wicked, or at least frivolous institutions, must be strictly controlled, like other wicked or frivolous things and people. They must be prevented from laying their profane hands on subjects which religious or serious people take seriously. They may stage light farces and comedies "from the French," but they must not expose political abuses, and "angels" must not be mentioned on their stages. One can quite understand that such prohibitions were intended to put a salutary restraint on playwrights and purge their work from offence. But one can also understand how in practise such regulations had precisely the opposite effect. If you single out one of the arts for special police supervision, and frankly proclaim that you consider it unfit to deal with a large class of subjects which are allowed to its sister arts, the resultant degradation of that art is inevitable. If you cut it off from dealing with the higher, more vital and significant subjects, and confine it to the frivolous and the trivial, you are necessarily weakening its influence, starving its powers, and turning away the more vigorous minds from devoting themselves to it. In England the novel is free from all censorship other than that of the police. The drama is fettered by the ridiculous rule-of-thumb restrictions of the Lord Chamberlain's Office. Hence it is to the novel or the essay that the man of letters who has anything to say turns as a vehicle of expression. While the man who writes for the theatre, if he is wise, frankly recognises that his business is to provide, not a drama which is a work of art or a criticism of life, but an entertainment, and shapes his plays accordingly. The result may be a quite amusing and even wholesome evening's entertainment, but it does not make for great drama. And if it be desirable for a nation that its art should be great rather than puny, even in so grovelling a sphere as that of the theatre, the attitude of the censorship is scarcely calculated to contribute to that result. But this is too large a question to go into in the limits of a brief review. We will only add that "The Stage Censor" is furnished with some interesting illustrations, including several portraits of men of letters and others who have been brought into collision with the Lord Chamberlain's licensing authority at various periods.

NEW MEDIEVAL LIBRARY—II.

Of the Tumbler of Our Lady and Other Miracles. Translated from the Middle French, with introduction and notes, by ALICE KEMPE-WELCH. With eight illustrations. Title page, repeated on cover, designed by MISS B. C. HUNTER. New Medieval Library, vol. 2. (Chatto and Windus, 5s. net and 7s. 6d.)

In this second volume Mrs. Kempe-Welch gives us versions of the now well-known story, "Tombear nostre Dame," with the following other legends:—(1) How Our Lady appeared to a knight, said to be an Englishman, while he prayed; a story introduced into France by Abbot Eustache II. of St. Germer, at Flaix, who journeyed to England in 1200-1201: (2) how Our Lady fought at a tourney in the person of a knight who had forgotten to present himself at the lists, absorbed in his devotions to her, a story related by Jacobus de Voragine in "The Golden Legend": (3) the story long

"La Vénus d'Ille," concerning Theophilus, the Eastern clerk, who placed a ring upon the finger of a statue of Venus or of the Virgin, as related in the "Gesta Romanorum" of William of Malmesbury, in the "Speculum Historiale" of Vincent of Beauvais, and elsewhere: (4) of the monk who daily recited in the Virgin's honour five psalms commencing with the letters of her name, Maria, and in whose mouth were found five miraculous roses after his death: (5) of the delivery of the city of Chartres from the army of the Norseman, Rollo, through the holy camice of the Virgin, presented to Charlemagne by the Empress Irene, and to the city by King Louis de Debonnaire: (6) of the drowning man saved by Our Lady's veil, a legend, it we mistake not, depicted on the south wall of the Lady Chapel at Winchester with many more: (7) of a Jew who took in pledge an image of the Virgin; a legend of the tenth century connected with the church of S. Sophia at Constantinople: and (8) of a renowned troubador, Peter de Siglar, on whose head a lighted taper descended thrice as he prayed before the ancient shrine of Roc Amadour, in Lot. Most of these legends, as Mrs. Kempe-Welch tells us, are to be found in the MS. of Gautier de Coinci, in the Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal, and in the MS. which belonged until recently to the Seminary at Soissons, and has now been seized by the Freemasons who govern France. We commend it to the attention of American millionaires. Fortunately it was edited by Poquet, in 1857, under a more liberal régime. Gautier de Coinci was a monk at Saint Médard, at Soissons, and later prior of Vic-sur-Aune, where he died at the age of 59, in 1236. His "Miracles de Nostre Dame" consists of a poem of 30,000 lines, written in a very elaborate style, with many "rhymes riches." He indulged in violent denunciations of the corruption of the clergy, of the evilness of the Jews and of all Christians who held any communication with them. A second collection was compiled by Jean de Marchant, a secular priest, of Chartres, about 1240. It was largely composed of legends connected with Chartres, which he patriotically also endowed with others actually belonging to Soissons. He borrowed much from Coinci, and both derived from a Latin collection made by Hugues Farsit in the twelfth century. There are also two other anonymous collections, with many isolated legends, such as versions of Theophilus and the ring, told, among many others, by Rustebœuf, who died about 1280; of Our Lady at the tourney; and of the "Tombear nostre Dame," a legend most widely spread, which may have been brought to Europe by Crusaders, even from India. We do not find that Mrs. Kempe-Welch tells us precisely from what originals her stories are derived. In the case of these legends, the French text is more than ever necessary to the appreciation of their beauty; the text of most of them has been published. Mrs. Kempe-Welch gives us excellent notes, among them information about Roc Amadour, and elaborate derivations of the ancient battle cry, "Monjoie." The latter are interesting but only partially credible. For "setueille" we suggest the translation, "lampern," a word which was, and for aught we know is still used in the western counties. Yarrell so designates the river—lamprey. Dame Juliana Berners recommends as bait for trout in April, "juneba, otherwyse named vii-eyes" ("setueille").

ON UNBENDING OVER A NOVEL

I HAVE been allowed to take as a peg on which to hang a few remarks at large upon sensational fiction Mr. Joseph Conrad's recent novel, "The Secret Agent" (Methuen).

This is an excellent novel told in an appropriate manner. It is terrible, amusing, and convincing. There would be impropriety in giving away the ingenious plot, for, being frankly a detective tale, it will be part of its charm for many readers that they do not know what to expect. But the plot is only one thing by which the book appeals. The drawing of the characters and the suggestion of the environments in which they move is completely skilful. Sometimes the effect of probability is obtained by the minutest touches and sometimes by the broadest lines, but whichever way Mr. Conrad works he shows himself an accurate as well as an imaginative observer of men and things. The leading villain, an agent provocateur and a lazy, verbose man; his wife, a smouldering fire; his mother-in-law, ready to endure all loss of personal dignity to secure the well-being of her weak-minded son; the assistant commissioner of police, who was not to be bounced by his chief inspector; the chief inspector, a sly ass made up to look like an acute and trustworthy fellow; and the Russian attaché, alike a social evil and a social success—all these are housed and clothed exactly as they should be; they conform sufficiently to type to make elaborate explanations of their words and actions unnecessary, but their traits are brought out with a sharpness which renders them realisable individualities. If the anarchists seem to fall a little below the supporters of law and order in their level of portraiture, we must ask ourselves whether Mr. Conrad does not know more of those people than many of us do—it may be that he is right and that popular conceptions are wrong; and if the grande dame and the Minister of the Crown savour of burlesque we must remember that their originals may have done the same when playing their parts in the real world, for these two persons are not quite the creation of Mr. Conrad's imagination.

The pleasure to those who love a good story, who read novels mainly for the story, and who often regard as the subterfuge of writers who have not much story to tell any long disquisitions upon a political question or delicate definitions of a moral scruple—the pleasure to such readers is very great when a "simple tale" like this falls into their hands. Mr. Conrad means, of course, by his sub-title that he has employed a simple manner of telling, not that the events narrated are of an everyday character, for, on the contrary, the things that happen in "The Secret Agent" are bizarre as well as melodramatic, while the way in which they are made to happen has required great dexterity in composition. The simplicity lies neither in the events nor the planning, but in the author's method. The tale is unfolded without parade of psychology and as directly as possible, with a wholly impersonal pen. Mr. Conrad does the telling, and you do the thinking, with very little indication from him as to what direction the thinking should take. The vast relief of it! "Easy writing makes damned hard reading," said Lord Byron (or somebody else); but that is not the situation here. Nor have we the usual instance of very difficult writing made to look facile by the author's subtlety. It is rather the case of the man who can do much harder things showing that he can undertake a lighter task without falling away from a high standard. The talent is not universal. Here is a picturesque writer, who has set down for us in other works passionate passages in men's inmost lives and tremendous upheavals in Nature, turning from the recording of moral and oceanic typhoons and the describing of the indescribable, to write a detective story, and taking care to do it extremely well, with an ease that never degenerates into slovenliness. Of course, such a book is bound to delight those who love a novel for the sake of the story. It may be said, even by many of those who have read "The Secret Agent" with great gusto, that there is no need to talk so expansively about it—that, at best, to praise it is only to say that Mr. Conrad, who has done greater things, shows, as might have been expected, that he can do less, and that it is hardly complimentary to dwell on a writer's success at the moment when he is lessening his efforts. I know the irritation that is provoked among the friends of an author by praising his simpler works. To prefer "Daisy Miller" to "The Turn of the Screw," "Under the Greenwood Tree" to "Jude the Obscure," "The Sign of Four" to "The White Company," and "The Wrong Box" to "The Master of Ballantrae" is always to run the risk of the accusation of "sighting" the author. But there is no sense in the accusation. It is a perfectly intelligible frame of mind to admire "Le Lys dans la Vallée," and yet to find Vautrin's final escapades more congenial reading. Granted that in making sweeping assertions about one book by an author being better or worse than another we are always doing a careless thing, and trying to erect a matter of personal, and perhaps temporary, taste into a general law, yet the fact remains that a large class of readers love a story for its story; and as they are not all housemaids or invalids who make us this class, many of them possess the strength of body or mind to be doubly pleased if the presentation is good. What accounts for the perennial popularity of "The Moonstone" and "The Woman in White," "La Corde au Cou" and "M. Lecoq," and the disappearance into oblivion of all the works of G. W. M. Reynolds and Boisgobey? The telling of the tale. And the telling of good tales is generally simple. There are improbabilities enough and to spare in the incidents of all these four famous sensational novels, but the author's meaning is never in doubt. The mysteries are not deepened either by the inability of the artist to draw or by his uncertainty as to what he should put on to his canvas. They are simple tales, because of the way that they are told.

Cannot more good writers, sound thinkers, and artistic observers have consideration for those who want to "unbend over a novel"—I quote the phrase because I have seen it used as a text for a scornful tirade against a slack-backed class? I write as one of that class. My idea of a novel is not primarily that it should be a work which will instruct me, or widen my sympathies, or move me to better things. I ask, in the first case, that it should interest and amuse me, detach my mind from worries, and accompany pleasantly my tea and muffins on those fortunate afternoons when I can make time for debauch. If it will do the other famous things for me, why, so much the better. Thackeray and Dickens, Balzac and Scott can be read for relaxation alone, although their position in literature is what it is; their works can be unbent over, although they are great masters of fiction, and in spite of the knowledge that the unbending process may lead to occasional lapses in our appreciation of the author's higher aims; why should writers with less claim on our attention than these masters insist on trying to keep us in a strained attitude of respectful attention? Not long ago an author wrote to a newspaper describing the resentment with which he had witnessed a girl on a steamer-deck run her eye in a desultory way down pages the writing of which had caused him aching pain. This was a ridiculous letter, for it revealed in a naïve manner the unfortunate seriousness with which the writer took himself. But there was nothing singular in his consequential attitude. Dozens of decent novelists take up the same; nay, more than dozens, for if we are without archbishops in fiction we have just now many archdeacons in the hierarchy of the circulating library, able to instruct us up to a respectable literary pitch. All what may be termed our leading writers of fiction, being properly and nobly filled with other wishes than merely to amuse us, regard as a slight upon their art the desire of a reader to unbend over their books when there is nothing else more pressing to do. It is to be regretted that some of our best writers of fiction have such fine and uncomfortable ideals of work, so that they are always inspired with the intent to elevate us or to make us sit up; and I believe that a good many publishers share this view. To unbend over a book exactly represents what a large class of readers want to do, and their gratitude to the author who gives them a story which neither irritates them by its absurdities nor hypnotises them by its lofty aims or its psychological subtleties is deep. Why are they given so little to read? Why are there no more such books written as "The Secret Agent"? If it were possible to cross-examine the prominent publishers as to their probable attitude towards the author of a good, straightforward, sensational novel, thoroughly well-planned and thoroughly well-written, their answers would reveal them as not averse from risking the issue. And if, further, we spoke of the matter to the booksellers, in whose behalf it is now understood that the publishers wish to be found acting, it is probable that the booksellers would declare, one and all, that such a book is an easy commodity to sell. And there is a large public ready to buy it. If we have the wholesale and retail machinery ready to sell, and the market ready to buy, the fault of the non-supply must be with the producers.

Our leading writers do not attempt the simple, sensational story; they do not try to give us anything of the thrill that we get when we take from our shelves "Les Esclaves de Paris," "Uncle Silas," "Edwin Drood" (perhaps much of the charm of the last for those who unbend over a novel lies in its not having been finished in some unconvincing way), "Le Fiacre No. Trieze," or "It's Never Too Late to Mend." The feeling of these leading writers may be that the simple, sensational novel is in some way a trivial or inferior piece of work. They may believe that such productions appeal only in a vulgar way to an uncritical audience; that their author convicts himself of having low aims, and of being still in the 'fifties. Perhaps our leading writers are not quite so absurd as this, but, at any rate, the mere fact that there are scores of abominably bad sensational novels written every year indicates that to write a good one is not an easy task. It is a task that is too hard for those who make a habit of essaying it, and they seem to show that they know their inability to meet the strain upon their intellect. It is impossible to account in any other way for the output of some six or seven prolific writers of the sheerly sensational school. Having industry and inventiveness, these gentlemen and ladies can only fail time after time because they do not try in any definite way to write what it lies within their power to write. Feeling that they have no arts of description, no powers of suggestion, and little knowledge of life upon which to depend, they serve up a hodge-podge of impossibilities and horrors in the hope that all the murders, abductions, arson, sorning and regrating will not be wasted—in the hope that some one terrific event will at least capture the attention of a reader. But upon most of us their primitive strategy is wasted, for these are not books that can be read by educated people. The fact that persons can be found to publish them ought not to prevent our leading writers from giving us, now and again, the old sort of sensational novel, part of whose charm lay in an excellent construction, while the possibilities of the plot were made the most of by due exercise of literary craft. May Mr. Conrad's example be followed! May some of the other writers who stand in public esteem as high as he does—they are but a small band—be moved to give us occasionally a simple tale on the old-fashioned lines! Affectionate regard and much money awaits the skilful author who is not above meeting the demands of those who want to unbend over a book.

S. SQUIRE SPRIGGE.

JAPANESE FAIRY TALES—II.

HERE is a story that, psychologically, touches profound issues. It is about a haunted house, and it is told in this manner:

"You must learn that in the East there are two sorts of haunters, the Shi-ryo and the Iki-ryo. The Shi-ryo are merely the ghosts of the dead; and here, as in most lands, they follow the ancient habit of coming at night only. But the Iki-ryo, the ghosts of the living, these may come at all hours, and they are much more to be feared.

"Now, the house of which I speak was haunted by an Iki-ryo. The man who built it was an official, wealthy and esteemed. He designed it as a home for his old age, and when it was finished he filled it with beautiful things, and hung tinkling wind-bells along its eaves. Artists of skill painted the naked, precious wood of its panels with sprays of blossoming cherry, and plum, and figures of gold-eyed falcons poised on crests of pine, slim fawns feeding under maple shadows, herons flying, and iris flowers blooming, and long-armed monkeys clutching at the face of the moon in water—all the symbols of the seasons, and of good fortune.

"And fortunate the owner was. Yet he knew one sorrow, he had no heir. Therefore, with his wife's consent and according to antique custom, he took a strange woman into his home that she might give him a child—a young woman from the country, to whom large promises were made. When she had borne him a son she was sent away; and a nurse was hired for the boy that he might not regret his mother. All this had been agreed to beforehand, and there were ancient usages to justify it. But all the promises to the boy's mother were not fulfilled when she was sent away.

"After a little while the rich man fell sick, and he grew worse thereafter day by day. And people said there was an Iki-ryo in the house. Skilled physicians did all they could for him, but he only became weaker and weaker, till at last they confessed they had no hope. The wife made offerings and prayed to the gods, but the gods made answer: 'He must die, unless he obtain forgiveness from one whom he hath wronged. And undo the wrong by making just amend. For there is an Iki-ryo in your house.'

"Then the sick man was conscience smitten, and sent out servants to bring the woman back to his home. But she was gone, lost somewhere among the forty millions of the Empire. And the sickness grew ever worse and worse, and the weeks passed in vain. At last there came to the gates a peasant, who said that he knew the place to which the woman had gone, and that he would journey to find her if means were given him. But the sick man, hearing, cried out: 'No, she would never forgive me, because she could not; it is too late.'

"And he died.

"After which the widow, and the relatives, and the little boy abandoned the house. And strangers entered thereto."

Curiously enough, and herein lies the interest of the tale, the people spoke harshly of the mother of the boy, holding her to blame for the haunting. Yet an Iki-ryo goes forth without the knowledge of the person whose emanation it is. There is nothing voluntary about the sending forth of this spirit. She, from whom the Iki-ryo proceeded, was not blamed by the people as a witch. They never suggested that it might have been created with her knowledge. They even sympathised with what they deemed to be her just plaint. They blamed her only for having been too angry, for not controlling sufficiently her unspoken resentment, because she should have known that anger secretly indulged can have ghostly consequences."

This story is told as illustrating an Oriental belief. Yet we, in the West, are not without our traditions of the consequence of evil thought. They have taken shape in the belief in the Evil Eye, only with us, this truth, which is none other than the power of conscience, suffers the same inversion as in this story from the East. The finality and despair in the man's exclamation "She would not, because she could not," had less relation to the woman, had he known it, than to himself. It was because he, though perhaps half consciously, knew he was to blame that he had lived all those years with a weight on his prosperity, and had at last succumbed to its force.

In the tradition of the Evil Eye the illiterate mind, sensible of having warred against its diviner self, attributes its disease to the exerted will-power of the injured. So superstition, growing from a twisted portion of truth, like fungus upon a living tree, regards the results of self-condemnation as an active spirit of revenge.

There is a saying in our religion that touches on this theme, disowning, as it does, so completely any personal correction, any idea of an avenging God: "I judge him not, but the word that I have spoken judgeth him."

Its message is of the spiritual sequence of thought and act—a force, some may think, influencing even the outward circumstances of our lives.

In the existence of the Shi-ryo, who are, as this story so pleasantly says, merely the ghosts of the dead—in the existence of the Shi-ryo you may, or you may not, believe. But the Iki-ryo, the ghosts of the living, these, surely, are true? But it is lives they haunt, not houses.

To the self-accusing there may be irony in the austere compassion of the words: "And let the counsel of thine own heart stand, for there is no man that shall be more faithful unto thee than it."

PAMELA TENNANT.

MENANDER

THE large new pieces of Menander found in Egypt, which have been so eagerly awaited, have now been published by M. Lefebvre, with the aid of M. Maurice Croiset; and all students will offer to him and the French Institute their warm thanks and congratulations on a discovery of so great importance. We have here no less than 1,300 lines, in several large fragments. If they still deny us the material for estimating Menander's management of a whole play, there are nevertheless complete scenes which show us very clearly his light touch and vivacity of style. But, as M. Lefebvre recognises, before we can appreciate them fully, there is much restoration and correction to be done. Bis dat, as he says, qui cito dat: he promises us presently a facsimile, and then a second edition embodying what other scholars can contribute. One such contribution I make here.

P. 9, vv. 40, 47 Τίβειος: so in frag 231 read εὐθυμία, Τίβειε (for βίε), τὸν δούλον τρέφει, and in 331 ἄλλ' οὐ Τιβεῖον (for τὰ βίου) νῦν ἴσως δει φροντίσαι. v. 57 ἔρια

P. 35, v. 10 εἰ δὲ σε 32 καθίζομαι σου 41 ἐκπρίσσω 129 φῆσ' 139 [δὲ καὶ] ἐπεξιόντος τὰδικεῖν (i.e. τῷ ἀδικεῖν) μέλλοντί σοι. 150 αἰσ[χρ]ά 192 ἡ μοι δός, αὐτῷ ἴν' εὐ παρέχω σὼν 258 ἐν[ε]παίσε· καὶ μοι γὰρ 261 αὐτῇ θ' [ὁμοῦ σου νέπαιζον 263 παῖδά γ' 273 ἀπολωλεκυῖ (or—λέκειν) 278 εἰ γὰρ ἐστ' ἐλευθέρως παιδός, τί τὸ γεγονός; 280 ἦτις ἐστίν, 281 ἐμοὶ σὺ or σὺν; read νῦν σύνθελε; 294 ποιήσῃ 301 τὰκεῖν (rather than τὰ γ' ἐκεῖν) 310 ὡς δ' ἀναιδῆς ἦσθα 326 πάντων γ' ἐμάντῃ σ' αἰτιον ἡγήσομαι τούτων. 333 μετέχεις or μετέβεις 340 ὡς ἐπέπεισθ' ὅτι 382 ἵνα καὶ τὰ γ' ἄλλα 433 νιοῦ δὲ καὶ 435 κατὰ μόν[ας] 442 νῆ τὴν φίλῃν Δήμητρα 451 περιμείνω; 460 σε (or ἴσθι;) ταῦτ' ἐμοὶ φρονεῖν 488 ἀπαγαγεῖν σαυτοῦ παρ' ἀνδρὸς θυγατέρα 504 οἷδ', ὡς ἐγὼ μ. α. 507 νυνὶ

δ' καὶ ἅπαντ' ἀγαθὰ or ἅπαντα τὰγάθ. ΣΜ. ἱερόσυλε γραῦ, τί φῆς: 517 εἰ τοῦτ' ἀληθές

P. 113, v. 31 ὑπὸ τοῦ <τον>, 43 ἵνα οὗτος ἀφίκοιτ' or ἀφίκοιτ' 58 τὰνταῦθα κρύψῃ 83 οὐχί (or οὐν οὐ) κατὰ τρόπον 87 ποῖ 107 [ὅπως] ἔχει 110 ἐνδύμαθ', οἱ φαίνεσθ', οἷα δ' (i.e. φανείται), ἡνίκ' ἂν οὐ γὰρ ἐόρακεν γε πῶ 114 λαλῶν. ΠΑΤ. μὰ τὸν Δί' (deleto οὐδ' ἐν) 117 οὐκ ἐκφθερεῖσθε 118 εἰς πεπηδήκασιν μοι. νεοττιῶν δ' οὐκ ἂν δύναντ' ἂν ἐξελεῖν 141 αὐτὸς ἐμελέτων λόγον (for ἐμὲ λέγων). 145 ἐγν[ω]κας εἴ 147 τοῦτό μ[οι]. Παραχρήσεται. τοῦτό <γε> γελῶν; 151 Εγὼ δ' ἄλλ' ἄρισθ' οὕτως ἔχεις 168 ἐχθρὰν τε πρα[όνως] φέρειν

P. 149, v. 52 ὥσθ' ὅτι μὲν αὐτῆς ἐστὶ τοῦτο 70 δοκεῖς γ' ἐμ[οί, νῆ τοὺς θεο]ύς 81 'Εμὲ τις καλεῖ; Ναί, <ναί> χι. 94 'Εγώ; μὰ τὸν Διόνυσον, μὰ τὸν 'Απ[όλλω, γ' ὡ μὲν σὺ 115 [ἡ] 'ναγκασμέν[ος] 124 κοῦκ ὄντ' ἐν αὐτοῦ. πολλὰ δ' <ἐξ> ἐργάζεται [τοιαῦτ' 159 διὰ τοῦτ' ἱμάντι καὶ— 160 τοιοῦτ' ἦν <τι> 178 for ἐταίραι read ἐτ' ἐραι 183 τάλαινα τῆς ἐμῆς τύχης ἐγώ 192 τί ποτε (deleto ἐστὶ) τὸ γεγονός; 203 πάντα, τέλος ἔχει τὰ πράγματ', 238 σεαυτὸν 243 μικρὰ μετ' ἐμοῦ καὶ σεα[υτὸν ἀν]άλαβε οὐκ ἀκήκας λεγόντων, εἰπέ μοι, [σὺ πάπο]τε χρυσὸς δ' Ζεὺς ἐρρήη 255 ἐστ' or θεῖον δ' ἀκριβῶς ἐστὶ 261 παῖδας 263 σὺ δ' ἀποφαιλέεις (or rather ἀποφλαυρίζεις) σεαυτὸν; (or—εἰς) 268 ποιήματ' ἄττα (or ἦν τὰ) παρ' ἐμοί 289 περισπτόον 317 ποίει 320 μόν' ἐνθαδὶ 322 προσ—or (πεισ—) θήσομ' αὐτῷ. πῦθανόν εἶναι δαί μόνον. 327 διὰ κενῆς (for διακινεῖς) σαυτὸν ταρατταί, ἐμὲ δὲ 329 θυμία (or some form), not οὐ μία 336 δῆπως; ἴθι 338 [μὴ δέη]τ', 341 ὀχέτ' εἰ 383 οὐκ ἀηδῆς (for ἀτελής), ὡς εἰκεν, εἰμ' ἰδεῖν, οὐδ' ἐντ[υ]χεῖν 388 ἐστὶν, 400 "μὴ καί τι τούτων" φῆσ', ["ὅ παῖς ἀκήκας; 401 Dele καὶ 403 φῆ]σ', "ἴκοιο. ἀλη[θ]ές 409 ΔΑ. μὰ τὸν 'Απόλλω τούτον, as 251, where give the phrase to Demeas. 417 ΔΑ. μὰ τὸν 'Ασκληπιόν. 434 οὐκ ἐστὶ γὰρ ταῦθ' 440 κακοδαίμων' οὕτω δεσπότην ὦ τῆς π[ικρ]ᾶς 445 ἂν ἐξ ἀγροῦ θάπτον [πάλιν] ἔλθῃ, ταραχὴν οἷαν ποήσει 454 τίς πόθεν; 474 καὶ τετρωβόλους καλεῖς; 'Επαῖζον. <ὥς> σκατοφάγος εἰ.

WALTER HEADLAM.

IN DEFENCE OF DREAMING

TWENTY philosophers, backed by all their wealth of logic and law, are of no avail against a man in love, for he pits his rhyme against their reason, his transcendent faith against their cold argument, his living, breathing woman against their chiselled statues, from which no rosy ray of dawn can ever strike the music of dreams, and, somehow, he has the best of it. Let the wise men, if they will, invent unpleasant names for his state of mind—call it sex-attraction, the law of perpetuation, or worse things—the lover, with a fine tolerant laughter, puts them all to scorn—that is, if he be a real lover. And the lover, safe in his enchanted citadel, is only the dreamer in excelsis, with the re-awakened mystery of childhood suddenly flung over this world that he views through manhood's eyes; a mystery that enfolds and enwraps his life as the net of shining gossamer, softly falling, veils and enchants the green October meadows. The child and the lover are the two great visionaries. Coventry Patmore had that knowledge at heart when he wrote:

Love wakes men once a lifetime each;
They lift their heavy lids and look,
And lo, what one sweet page can teach
They read with joy, then shut the book;
And some give thanks, and some blaspheme,
And most forget; but either way
That and the child's unheeded dream
Is all the light of all their day.

Let us look at the lover's state of mind. When first he comprehends the sublime and simple thought expressed by Gabrielle Rossetti:

Not in thy body is thy life at all
But in this lady's lips and hands and eyes—more often than not he is rendered intensely practical, and will leave his pocket volume behind that he may carry a railway time-table, wherewith to discover how he and she may more easily meet; the time-table has become full of poetry, a book of romance. "If we let romance go," says Mr. Meredith, "we exchange a sky for ceiling," and twice in our lives, when we are children and when we are lovers, we realise this. Those letters which are never written in cold pen and ink—the letters which a woman writes in her heart to the man she loves while she hears the night-hours passing or walks the busy streets—are among life's perfect things. Those words which lovers never say—the words which lie below every conversation, yet which to each one are as assured as though they rang out upon the air—are the perfect language for which no symbols can ever be wrought. Lovers meet life with a song. And why not? In these times, when ninety out of a hundred books are "love stories," and nine out of the remaining ten are thin attempts to break down the divinity of love, there is urgent need, surely, for such singing. We sound the futile profundities of oceans of print with few pearls to show for our diving. Below stairs Em'ly must have her twopence coloured account of the unhealthy amours of the dashing, totally fictitious guardsman and his impossible lady, or their equivalents, crammed with hyphenated adjectives and scenes by moonlight, served up with unlimited cash and, if possible, a murder. There are a dozen such travesties now running in London papers alone. Alys above stairs assimilates her daily rechauffée of half a dozen divorce scandals offered between daintily tooled and tinted covers with a tempting name. This is the false dreaming which loses itself in the contemplation of second-hand loves and the tawdry trappings of the author who writes down to it, vulgarising literature as his peer vulgarises the stage—for the sake of a big haul of money. Not always, of course, are those held within its spell to be blamed. They simply worship the god provided, and "there is a long twilight between the time when a god is first suspected to be an idol and his final overthrow."

Consider the child and his visions for a moment. We are so busy making the world smaller, so engrossed in our experiments, our negotiations, our getting and spending, that we are apt to forget how once we used to dream, in spite of the fact that the little inhabitants of that wonderful land wherein we ourselves dwelt for some secure and happy years are all round us. The heart of a child is the sweetest, purest thing in life, and we do not understand it, often do not try. Problems of sin have not touched it; mysteries of sex and sorrow are as yet ahead of it; the skies of children's dreams are the brave skies of morning; the country of their thoughts is the veritable Faëry Land, full of

Dim twilight-lawns, and stream-illuminated caves,
And wind-enchanted shapes of wandering mist.

To them the dry clatter of blown autumn forest-drift is the scamper of invisible fairy feet; the curled leaf sailing down the stream is a shallop laden with an elfin crew, whose merry steersman, "doffing his cap, which was an acorn's cup," laughs farewell and waves his grassy oar as he vanishes round the bend; the garden holds a hundred tiny, wordless voices; half amused, half afraid, they watch the shadows on the nursery wall and fit them with impish names and attributes. It is well for that man and woman who can remember the fantasies of childhood, for they get nearer to the kingdom of heaven in this life than do most people. They are fortunate in that these things have not been wrenched out of them at school, where, as boy and girl, they had to go. Of course, it is right and proper that they should go to school; but, sorrowfully enough, most children leave then the moonlit rose-garden for the shrubbery; presently the shrubbery gives place to the sandy, shelterless open with its scrubby, stunted undergrowth, which is all most of us can show for gardens, and the cool, green sea-light is challenged and vanquished by the hard, hot glare of day. Our own dreams take us back to "the gold-encircled Island of Once"; the child's dreams take him behind that, to his own fairyland. Fairies do not consort well with algebra and domestic economy; henceforth they only venture near in sleep, happy if they may tarry and dance awhile in that dusky, indeterminate borderland which has never yet been understood. One cannot take notes in dream-land, and memory is deceitful, but it is much better to try to remember than calmly to disregard the echoes that drift and whisper from that strange, elusive country. We become children again in dreams, taking upon us the thoughts, the fears, the gaiety, the helplessness of the child. Our little wagons are again hitched to the stars. And all about us, talking with us day by day, unable to tell one-tenth of their thoughts and speculations, but trying to make us comprehend, are those who live in that land of wonderful adventure, who never for one moment enter our world of grown-up, where the flowers are too often faded and scentless—who cannot. Yet, if we care to, we can view theirs from a distance.

Over the edge of the purple down
Ere the tender dreams begin,
Look—we may look—at the Merciful Town,
But we may not enter in;
Outcasts all from her guarded wall
Back to our watch we creep;
We—pity us! ah, pity us—
We wakeful—ah, pity us!—
We that go back with Policeman Day,
Back from the City of Sleep.

Mr. Kipling was right; we are to be pitied, and not the children. Sometimes, if we are very much in earnest, we can set the gates swinging, stand with the child's hand in ours, just inside, catch sweet or sad unexpected imaginings, as we might listen to the sound of a fountain in a far-off place.

There was never so much need for real dreamers as there is to-day. The business man, caring only for "his beef, his beer, and his pew in eternity," will laugh scornfully and want to know how his balance-sheet would appear did he give way to dreaming, forgetting that his operations originated years ago in the vaguest of visions, also that happiness is not a necessary complement of a heavy cash-box. First the dream, then the business—there is no irreconcilable incongruity between the two. Paul, one of the finest dreamers the world has ever known, was recognised through the Roman Empire, evidently, as a competent man of affairs, yet we overhear him, as though talking in a low voice to himself, "It doth not yet appear what we shall be"; and again, caught and held and spun in the very vortex of a magnificent dream, "I am persuaded," he shouts defiantly, his eyes shining, "that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God." It is tempestuous, passionate, indomitable. Yet all his dreaming did not prevent him from being let carefully down the wall in a basket from an upper window—most prosaic of exits!—when his life was threatened; or from advising the captain of the ship on which he was a prisoner, when, driving too near the rocks, "they cast four anchors out of the stern, and wished for day."

To fight the ceaseless battle of the living world uninspired by dreams is a miserable, thankless task, for when it is over there will be sorry work sitting by a burnt-out fire and listening to the dry click of fallen cinders. The state of spiritual destitution in which many people exist to-day is simply amazing. Blind, they live on the edge of a beautiful world, for ever denied the sense which would enable them to perceive it. On the Channel one man sees nothing but the bar and the glitter of whisky glasses; to another the waters are haunted by numberless phantoms of years gone by—ships of Raleigh, white-sailed caravels of Drake, towering galleons from the Spanish Main; the love and strife and passion of men long dead. Life is neither a sermon nor a farce; it is an adventure, a romance, with which a thousand joys and sorrows are entangled. The dreamer comprehends the paradox that "beauty is, in spite of death, in some irrational way, at once divine and immortal." When at last, laying down his lance and shield (for your true dreamer is ever ready to fight for his dreams), he hears old Charon's hail ring with a certain sweet austerity through the glow and lingering light of his vision, he is willing, haply even eager, to take the ferry down in the shadows, steadfast, unflinching, with a smile on his lips and a word of thanks to the gods who let him stay so long. All that happens to him is divinely great; his is the alchemy which transmutes the dross of weariness into the gold of delight; he holds the keys of hell and heaven.

The essential thing, when death comes, is to have dreamed; and the essential thing in life is to be able to dream.

WILFRID L. RANDELL.

EDWARD AND ELIZA: A SENTIMENTAL HISTORY

Who was Edward? Who was Eliza?

Dear reader (as Edward or Eliza might have said), I can tell you little about them save that they were distressed lovers, and as such claim your pity and mine. Their memory is enshrined in two small octavo volumes bearing the date 1768—two little books of such delightfully unconscious humour, and such delicious naïveté, that 'twere a pity they should be forgot entirely. It was an Age of Sentiment. And from their leathern tomb the voices of Edward and Eliza cry aloud to sympathising ears. Fluent pens they wielded, these lovers in distress. For fate held them apart—aye, and in the end played them such a scurvy trick as would bring the iron into the most sentimental soul.

"Deprived of my dear Eliza's conversation, I receive no small comfort from her letters," writes Edward, deploring his enforced absence from Eliza—due to the behest of the lady's stern parent. Indeed, "so out of humour with society" is the gentle lover that he retires frequently to his lodgings "a mere cynic."

"Can Edward be a Diogenes?" cries tender Eliza in alarm. "The last man in the world whom I should suspect of adopting the manners of a cynic." Alas! Eliza had little reason for optimism. "Locked up from the world in this mournful Mansion House I feel all the misery without enjoying any of the comforts of a monastic life. My vigilant aunt watches me with such cruel assiduity. . . . Ah, trust a woman to get her love-letters through somehow!" "Charming moralist! Thou art an ornament to thy sex!" Edward exclaims, and in his rapture quotes the lines of old Rowe:—

Oh, were they all like thee man would adore them,
And all the business of their lives be loving!

Then comes a hideous turn of affairs. From that "lively girl," Sophy, Eliza's cousin, Edward has learned that her stern parent has "admitted old Sir Luke as a lover" for Eliza, "for the sake of his title and his estate contiguous to his own."

"Have I not reason to be alarmed? Can Edward be composed," he wails, "when Eliza is on the brink of being sacrificed to old age, ugliness, and riches? . . . If I write wildly you cannot wonder."

Of course we cannot, especially as in a postscript to her next epistle, as terrible as it is laconic, Eliza says "Sir Luke is your rival!"

"Racks and tortures! Racks and tortures!" cries the agonised youth, calling on love and heaven to forbid the monstrous union. But the lady only chides him with fond gentleness; is, indeed, a little angry with him for being unhappy about "so contemptible a creature" as Sir Luke, and for "entertaining any doubts concerning my fidelity or my love." She summarises Sir Luke's defects; the catalogue is interesting. He is—

1. "The most hideous object I ever saw on two legs."

2. "Odious to the last degree."

3. "Doubly odious by the ridiculous efforts he makes to render himself agreeable in my eyes."

We must applaud her determination that "rather than encourage his addresses I would submit to the greatest inconveniences."

"Avaunt, my fears! Edward's himself again," sings the lover on receiving this dispatch, and makes a jest of that "lively girl," Sophia, of whom Eliza says coyly, "If she was in my place she would certainly give you cause to be jealous." Happily Sir Luke, in spite of his age, his ill looks, and his superfluity of cash, is a gentleman. Finding he can make no impression on the alabaster heart of Eliza he throws up the sponge. Whereon Eliza graciously says that, though she could not accept him as a lover, she will "always stand up for his behaviour as a man."

"My father," she continues, "frets and fumes like a madman on his disappointment," even deriding Eliza's aunt, whose heart is now enlisted in her unhappy niece's favour. Neither filial affection nor fear can moderate the lover's transports over Sir Luke's dismissal. Another shock, however, awaits the much-enduring Edward. With starting eyes he reads this announcement in his favourite news-sheet:

We are credibly informed that a treaty of marriage is on foot and will be speedily consummated between Sir Charles T— and —

"Let me not blot the sheet with the sequel!" the maddened youth cries, rending the noxious journal "into a thousand pieces."

"Oh, fye, Edward, fye," Eliza rallies her beloved. For, as you have guessed, the girl of Sir Charles's choice is that agreeable young creature, Sophia. "Correct that self-tormenting propensity in your disposition," says Eliza, "and tear no more news-sheets." Excellent advice, oh, estimable Eliza!

Their discourse, however, is not always of love, for art and literature has each its place, as becomes polite correspondence in the year of grace 1768. Eliza thinks that "there are beauties in almost every page of 'Rasselas,'" but Edward prefers "more cheerful compositions." As an example of his taste he quotes "a little thing of my own," perpetrated some years before, but brought to mind again by the misdeeds of his cousin Jack, "now grown to be a buck." Edward evinces a nice literary Bacchanalianism in his ballad.

"Did I not know you to have more of the milksop than the Mohock in your composition I should set you down as a very formidable buck," is Eliza's refreshing, if disconcerting, comment. She has read the "poem" with double satisfaction by reflecting that "while you wrote it you despised the object" (the Jack aforesaid) "who occasioned it."

Thus enlivened by elegant extracts from the poets and criticism on the people about them the loving correspondence between these dear superlative prigs continues. From it we learn that cousin Sophia has smallpox. When she recovers Sir Charles takes the fever. It is an unfortunate family. "Inflexibly firm and immutably sincere" Edward now signs himself. "Sophy has lost her name" is Eliza's humorous way of announcing that lively girl's wedding. Sir Charles proves a regular brick. He extorts a grudging consent from Eliza's father in Edward's favour. Indeed, things are now beginning to "hum." Edward "takes possession of a very genteel and lucrative employment." Whereon from excess of joy his mother promptly dies. No wonder that the impatient Eliza finds the situation "particularly embarrassing." Nevertheless, she assures the grief-stricken Edward that she feels for him "very sincerely."

At last the interview between Edward and the stern parent takes place. It is attended by the most favourable results, Edward winning golden opinions for his modesty, the stern parent commanding the ardent lover's respect and gratitude. Things are in train for the wedding. But this is an uncertain world, and life is an uncertain thing. On Friday Edward is to arrive. The air seems heavy with the clangour of joy-bells. Eliza's heart leaps with happiness.

Friday has arrived, but not with Friday has Edward arrived!

For God's sake, Edward, when this comes to your hands dispatch the messenger who brought it with the reason of your delay, without staying to write about it: a verbal message will be sufficient, for I shall not have a moment's peace till he returns. The poetical ravings of distracted lovers are nothing to the pangs which at this instant tear the heart of your

ELIZA.

"To this letter," says the editor of the correspondence, "no answer was returned; no answer could be returned." For Edward had been "seized with a fever in his head, which in a few hours put an end to all his prospects in this world." Eliza came to her lover, but "too late to hear him articulate." He expired in her arms a few moments after her arrival, and we agree with the editor "that those whose hearts are not devoid of sensibility will imagine the situation of Eliza at that juncture, without the assistance of any rhetorical flourishes to heighten their compassion."

Poor Edward! Poor Eliza! My tears fall in sentimental tribute on your leathern tomb.

ANTHONY L. ELLIS.

THE LIBRARY TABLE

The Book of Living Poets. Edited by WALTER JERROLD. (Alston Rivers, Ltd., 7s. 6d. net.)

New Songs. Edited by FRED G. BOWLES. (Chapman and Hall, Ltd., 2s. 6d. net.)

The Call of the Homeland. Selected and Arranged by R. P. SCOTT, LL.D., and KATHERINE T. WALLIS. (Blackie and Son., Limited, 4s. 6d. net.)

MR. JERROLD'S volume appears to a flourish of trumpets. "Every contemporary poet of distinction" (so runs the publisher's advertisement), "from whose pen verse has been recently published, is represented." The "poet of distinction" having been differentiated from the mere versifier, it was with a shock of surprise that we discovered that such names as George Meredith, Stephen Phillips, John Davidson, Lord Alfred Douglas, W. B. Yeats, "A. E.," John Bannister Tabb,

A. E. Housman, Moira B. Neill, George Francis Wilson, Madame Duclaux, and "Olive Custance," were apparently consigned to the latter category. Does Mr. Jerrold seriously imagine that the verses of Mr. Charles Kennet Burrow are likely to have a more permanent influence on the future of English poetry than "The City of the Soul," or that the absence of the author of "A Shropshire Lad" from these pages is amply atoned for by a selection from Miss May Bate-man's elementary experiments in the art of versification? Mr. Jerrold, indeed, continues to convey the impression that he has no real liking for poetry at all, and that the few good poems in this volume are the result rather of accident than of deliberate design. His selections are scarcely less amazing than his omissions. The poet who wrote

We are children of splendour and flame,
Of shuddering, also, and tears.
Magnificent out of the dust we came,
And abject from the Spheres, is represented by the dreary didacticism of "The Things that are More Excellent." We have, it must be confessed, two fine poems by Mr. Robert Bridges, but we miss

Her beauty would surprise
Gazers on Autumn eves,
Who watched the broad moon rise
Upon the scattered sheaves.

But, as Mr. Jerrold truly says, "it is inevitable that a selection of the kind must in a measure represent the individual preference of the compiler."

"New Songs" is described on the title-page as "an anthology of contemporary verse." The majority of the verses included in the volume have never before been published, nor, indeed, would they have ever been (it is safe to assert) but for the somewhat superfluous industry of Mr. Bowles. The most promising of them hardly reaches the level of current magazine verse, but we have frequently encountered work of finer quality in the "poet's corner" of some provincial newspaper. With the best will in the world, we cannot regard "New Songs" as a success. It is badly produced, badly edited, and, for the most part, badly written.

It is a pleasure to turn to such a volume as "The Call of the Homeland," which is far and away the best anthology of patriotic verse that we have yet seen. The compilers have permitted themselves a wider range than the late W. E. Henley in "Lyra Heroica," or Mr. Langridge in "Ballads of the Brave." The longing for home of the sea-weary exile, the changing seasons, the triumphs of peace, the charm of the English countryside—these, no less than "the sound and splendour of England's war," find expression in the poems included in this volume. There are but few omissions of any importance, and full justice is done to modern and contemporary poets. Mr. Henry Newbolt, for instance, has no fewer than ten poems, while Messrs. A. C. Benson, Laurence Binyon, Walter de la Mare, Alfred Noyes, and William Watson are all well represented. "The Call of the Homeland," indeed, helps us to realise that the spirit of poetry has not vanished from the land of Shakespeare and of Keats, a fact we were in danger of forgetting after having read Mr. Jerrold's "Book of Living Poets."

The Happy Moralist. By HUBERT BLAND. (Werner Laurie, 3s. 6d. net.)

MR. HUBERT BLAND is an ingenious person, and this collection of essays ought to command a ready sale in suburbia. His style is affected, and his periods often clumsy in the extreme, but the same criticism may be urged against practically all modern essayists, and Mr. Bland certainly succeeds in persuading the unknowing reader that his laboured perorations are spontaneous clevernesses, and that he is a profound and able thinker offering the fruits of an after-dinner chat in the smoking-room. That is very clever of Mr. Bland, and we admit and almost envy his cleverness in this direction, for he knows that he is scarcely the profound and able thinker of his pose, and that the fruits of his after-dinner chats would be much less likely to find favour in the eyes of Mr. Werner Laurie than were these studied essays. His conversations here are well done, though their apparent insouciance—paradoxical though it may sound—betrays, at times, traces of the wet towel. If Mr. Bland would be more natural, he would be, for us, at least, more readable. He would not then (we quote at random) write this sort of thing quite as often as he does:

And yet I don't know—that's where it bothers me; if the poet is right—and poets usually are right in the main—and it is better to have loved and lost than never to have loved at all, is not one bright February day all to the good even though March winds scarify our skins?

Or this:

Rather, just now, would I remember that if February passes and March comes, come also May and June and high midsummer with its pomp and pageantry. Good heavens! if we can get a trifle of comfort from the contemplation of the seasons, in the name of common-sense let's do it. I will, at any rate, so here goes.

And (good heavens) might not Mr. Bland have stopped short at that foolish pretence of ignorance so common in young men and judges, and in so doing have spared us painful variations of old and outworn jokes? Did it never strike him that that nice particularity in the matter of cabs is more than a little snobbish; that even though, as he tells us, he has never been to Peckham, it suggests that he cannot rise above Peckham's standard, and that Peckham should really have the privilege of numbering him among her distinguished sons? And did it not occur to him that "The Happy Flycatcher," would have been a more appropriate title than the one he has chosen? For Mr. Bland's time is spent in catching and analysing flies; he would never, we feel sure, approach too near an uncaged lion. However, he is occasionally entertaining and is never dull, and his work is all very suburban and smart and respectable. Mr. Bland should run an Academy for Young Ladies (or the Daughters of Gentlemen)—preferably at Peckham.

Storia do Mogor, 1653-1708. By NICCOLAS MANUCCI, Venetian. Translated, with Introduction and Notes by WILLIAM IRVINE. Vol. III. (John Murray, 12s. net.)

THE third volume of this interesting series carries on the story of Manucci's adventures through several stages of his curious experiences in India, and fully maintains that simple form of narrative which the translator has caught with considerable spirit and accuracy. The notes show profound study of the works of contemporary and later writers, and are in every case elucidating and illuminating. The quaint details of local customs and habits of thought bring a new light to bear upon the India of the period, and they are enhanced by some excellent coloured plates. Those of the Hindû Cosmogony, the plan of a Hindû temple, and particularly the fanciful portrait of the God Agastya are especially interesting.

FICTION

The Unpardonable Sin. By JAMES DOUGLAS. (E. Grant Richards, 6s.)

THE Irish poet still seeks inspiration in damp fairies and lachrymose minstrels, but the prose writer is to-day the most intensely modern of novelists, having long since abandoned the use of the legend and other characteristically Irish sentimentalisms. Mr. James Douglas belongs to this new school, and in his first novel he gives us a study of life in Belfast, sparing us none of the realism of pessimism until he grows tired, and without any warning takes the reader into the clouds. It would seem that Mr. Douglas started out with the intention of writing a realistic story on the lines of Mr. George Moore, but, discovering his limitations, decided to introduce romance, and, as a result, "The Unpardonable Sin" is a complete failure. To say otherwise would be doing an injustice to a man of Mr. Douglas's abilities, for one who has been for years pointing out the deficiencies and mistakes of contemporary novelists ought surely to be able to avoid some of the elementary errors common in "first novels." Mr. Douglas begins with the birth of Gabriel Gordon in the city of Bigotsborough, a thin disguise for Belfast. Having brought his hero into the world he devotes several pages to hysterically summing up the good and bad points of Belfast, and in the course of this we learn, first, that Belfast is a city with a soul, and, secondly, that it is a city without a soul. The contradiction must be explained by the author, who makes each statement with consistent bluntness. Orange riots and other religious disturbances for which the northern capital is notorious are well described by Mr. Douglas, who appears to know thoroughly the model city of the vast army of English philanthropists which is attempting to "convert" Ireland. Gabriel Gordon is one of the "converted," and in due course leaves business for the ministry. He is not successful, however, for he dislikes outrages on the persons of those who profess another religion. Consequently the self-styled followers of God drive him out of the city and back to the Scarlet Woman, whose introduction completely alters the course of the story. She is a woman of immense wealth and vast influence—the sort of person Mr. William Le Queux might be expected to know. She loves Gabriel, who does not love her, and, to tempt him back, she builds a cathedral on the banks of the Thames and installs him as minister at a salary of £100,000 a year. It is all so absurd and uninteresting as to be unworthy of criticism, and the reader soon catches the spirit of boredom which induced Mr. Douglas to seek refuge in the ridiculous. The woman who can alter the destinies of Europe at will has been long since the puppet of the writers who spell literature with an £, and it is a pity Mr. Douglas did not keep to Bigotsborough instead of bringing Gabriel and Aileen to London. Of course the fiery preacher and his League of Humanity had to find an opening in London, but this mixture of Father Vaughan and General Booth advocating the creeds of the Morning Leader is the least original part of an unoriginal book. Mr. Douglas seems to know too much to be really original, and his quotations would fill several chapters, but a dictionary of quotations would not make a very interesting serial story. "The Unpardonable Sin" will not occupy a prominent place amongst the two thousand works of fiction published during 1907, and its author should confine himself to his critical work for the future. After all, it is the easiest profession in the world—when such novelists as Mr. Douglas are about.

The Wine of Life. By MAUD ANNESLEY. (Lane, 6s.)

MISS ANNESLEY has the ability to write a pleasant novel about pleasant people, if she would be content to be simple. She is able to endow her characters with a certain degree of charm, and that is a considerable gift. She takes pains over the details of her work in a way that shows that she takes her work seriously, and executes it with care. But in the present novel, which appears to be her first, she has aimed at achieving a great study of passion, freed from all conventional trappings, and has succeeded in being feebly sensational. Lady Uli Branton is quite a charming person when she is not dragged into impossible love scenes; we like to accompany her and Dorry on their travels. Their gaiety and happiness when they make the acquaintance of the French artists at Versailles is delightfully contagious; their adventures in Hungary are well told. We agree with most of her ideas, too, about love; but when the attempt is made to lift the story into the passionate sphere, it fails signally, and is comparable only with the foolish sensational ending. This is a great pity, because nearly all the characters have an agreeable semblance of vitality (except the Hungarian lover, who walks straight out of the cheapest melodrama), and we are interested in them and like them. If Miss Annesley would cultivate the gift she has and leave sensation to its proper place in the feuilleton, she would write a very pretty story.

The Plains of Silence. By ALICE AND CLAUDE ASKEW. (Cassell and Company, Limited, 6s.)

THE title of this book is the best thing about it, but it would make an admirable feuilleton for the Daily Mail, or some other halfpenny paper, where style is a matter of no importance. As a novel bound in cloth and priced at six shillings it is absurd.

Partners of Providence. By CHARLES D. STEWART. (Duckworth, 6s.)

AMERICAN humour is not popular in England for a variety of reasons, but mainly because of its extreme artificiality. This charge, however, cannot be laid against "Partners of Providence," which is quite the best Transatlantic importation we have seen for some time. Mr. Stewart tells the story through the medium of a fifteen-year-old boy, and Sam Daly makes a first-rate interpreter. Of course, we have the crude grammar—needlessly inaccurate in some places—and slang of the river, whilst the boy shows all the 'cuteness' tradition ascribes to the American youth. His adventures begin with an offer of five hundred dollars for the finding of Mrs. Valdes and her daughter, and, accordingly, he tours the Mississippi and Missouri in the quaint American wheat-boats, amongst their even quainter inhabitants. An amusing account of a show-boat, a sort of water-circus, is very entertaining, especially to readers who know nothing of Mississippi theatricals. Professor's Lagorio's "Consolidated Aggregation and Floating Musee" is our old friend the village circus transferred to a river boat, and the professor's eccentricities and the home life of his troupe are treated with a seriousness by Sam that only adds to the humour of his account of life behind the scenes. The boy, anxious to get to New Orleans, and finding the professor's boat the only one available, readily assents to taking the rôle of the Human Dictionary, and meets with great success, probably due to the fact that every page of the dictionary handed to a member of the audience for the purpose of examining the marvel is the same. But these incidents form only a small part of a long book. There is a capital account of negro ways, together with reproductions of their sacred songs, which consist of one line, repeated in the manner beloved of American evangelists. The chapters dealing with Sam's adventures in New Orleans are also very good, and the story of Clancy's search for work in London is characteristically American. Splendidly illustrated by Mr. C. J. Taylor, "Partners of Providence" is altogether an admirable production, and artist and author are to be heartily congratulated on the result of their collaboration.

A Devil's Bargain. By FLORENCE WARDEN. (John Long, 6s.)

ANOTHER "Florence Warden"! As the fat boy of Dingley Dell, so this indefatigable authoress, faint but pursuing, still persists in her self-appointed task of "making our flesh creep." The fact that she succeeded only too well in more than one of her earlier works does not make "A Devil's Bargain" any easier to read. We must confess to having skipped some of the more tedious portions of the book. The plot, though simple, might have been made the groundwork of an eventful story, if the reader's interest were not clogged by the wooden banality of the characters. The book is full of people who only exist in the pages of "shilling shockers," where they certainly lead a fairly strenuous life. Miss Warden's work does not, or did not, belong to this class of fiction, and she has shown herself capable of more skilful character drawing than this.

The Sacred Herb. By FERGUS HUME. (John Long, 6s.)

THE sacred herb is a plant used in religious ceremonies by the inhabitants of Easter Island. Mr. Fergus Hume's story would lose half its point were we to give away the plot here; it is enough to say that the herb plays a large part in the two murders which form the main interest of the book. There are other mysterious properties: a green domino and a jade-handled paper cutter, while the characters in the story (and they are many) are more mysterious still. Of the real "villain" there is no doubt from the beginning. Slim, dark, with furtive eyes, more than a dash of black blood, and an unrequited passion for the lovely heroine, there can be no question as to his character, but whether he himself committed the murders is another matter, and the secret is well kept until the end. Though belonging to a type of novel in which the plot is necessarily the main object, the success of Mr. Hume's books has always depended to a great extent on his very life-like characters. "The Sacred Herb" is no exception to this rule. Though he has an unusually large cast, each member of it is interesting, and endowed with a distinct personality.

The White Rose Mystery. By GERALD BISS. (Greening, 6s.)

WHETHER Mr. Biss is really serious, and intends this story as a warning to the House of Hanover, or, on the other hand intends it simply as a work of the imagination, will matter little, we think, to the ordinary reader. They will be content to enjoy the excitement of the narrative and not distress themselves about its possibility. Such of them, though, who are Jacobites may feel inclined to be annoyed at Mr. Biss; but even the most convinced of these will probably not sympathise with the methods of Mr. Biss's Society of the White Rose.

Mr. Biss's idea is ingenious. It so happens that the "heir" to the English and Scottish crown at the date of his story is a capable and energetic young man, worthy to be king. A Society is accordingly formed in England for the purpose of establishing this youngest of the Pretenders on the Throne of his ill-fated ancestors. Cabinet Ministers belong to this Society, which is headed by a Royal Duke and Duchess. The proselytising methods of the Society are delightfully simple. They consider the Home Secretary would be a useful addition to their ranks. They accordingly bring him, all unconscious and unsuspecting, to a meeting, and state their case. He refuses, and is promptly murdered on his way home, and his body—with a white rose in the coat—discovered next day. Such means are simple and effective so long as no mistake is made. How discovery eventually comes and consequent failure the curious will discover by reading the book. If they do this they will certainly not be bored. They may at times be moved to smile, but certainly not to yawn.

The Spanish Prisoner. By MRS. P. CHAMPION DE CRESPIGNY. (Nash, 6s.)

WHEN Señora Paloma Cuevedos learned to fence she qualified at once for the strenuous life she is called upon to lead by her biographer. Mrs. Philip Champion de Crespigny tells a romantic story in "The Spanish Prisoner," and from the time the girl is waiting for news of the expected Spanish and French victory at Trafalgar to the last chapter, where she is claimed by the gallant English officer, the narrative is most exciting. Paloma's cousin, to whom she is engaged, has gone to fight the English, but the battle of Trafalgar upsets his calculations and those of the girl's, and he is taken prisoner and sent to England. The girl, however, does not forget him, and immediately begins a campaign amongst her relatives with the object of securing Gonzalo Cuevedos's release. She is referred to an adventurer of the name of Diego Var, and after a harmless duel and other incidents, she is about to accomplish her task when she suddenly meets her cousin on Spanish soil. The girl quickly guesses that Gonzalo has escaped by breaking his parole. In her indignation she orders him to return. He declines, and "the scene changes." Porchester is the next scene, and we are introduced to the war prisoners' quarters, with the announcement that the Spanish officer who dishonoured his name has voluntarily returned. Then follow numerous exciting incidents, among them a duel in which the Spanish prisoner wounds the bully, Captain Sinclair. But the most important character is Eustace Mitford, who solves the prisoner's secret, and when the disguised senora is released by Diego Var and returns to Spain, Mitford follows her and wins her as his wife soon after the girl has discovered that Diego won a fateful promise from her by means of loaded dice. She is, therefore, free to become Mrs. Mitford. "The Spanish Prisoner" should prove the most successful of Mrs. Philip Champion de Crespigny's books.

DRAMA

"CUPID AND COMMONSENSE" AT THE STAGE SOCIETY

WITH the performance of Mr. Arnold Bennett's play the Stage Society have scored another success, and discovered another dramatist, for Mr. Bennett uses his medium—that odd mixture of clumsiness and delicacy—with astonishing dexterity, when it is remembered that he has not had the opportunity of seeing one of the many plays, which he has actually sold, performed until now.

The scene is laid in the Five Towns which Mr. Bennett knows so well. Eli Boothroyd is a stern parent and a stern man of business, a widower, and a miser. He lives with his two daughters, Emily and Alice. It is Alice's twenty-fifth birthday, and accordingly he hands over to her the large fortune which her mother left her, and tells her, among other things, that old Dad Beach, who has just resigned his post of superintendent of the Sunday school, owes her five quarters' rent for the works, which are part of her property, and that Willie Beach, his son, is coming to call that evening about the matter. He instructs her what to say to him. Ralph Emery is also coming on the business of a partnership, in which she must join with him to the amount of £2,000—there is money in the scheme. She sees the two young men, who meet on the way and arrive together. Willie Beach begs her for yet another month's respite; Ralph Emery begs for her hand in marriage. She grants both their requests. The star of Ralph rises, and the star of Willie Beach sinks, sinks pitifully. His father and he forge a bill when old Eli refuses to hear of postponement: and the father, fearful of discovery, commits suicide. The lower Willie sinks the greater is the pity which Alice feels for him. She saves him from prison by burning the bill, thereby incurring the undying hatred of her father, and tells Willie what she has done. You are made to feel that if Willie were to raise a finger she would go with him to Canada, where she implores him to try his luck again. But Willie calls her an angel and goes alone. That is the end of the third act. Mr. Bennett has drawn a faithful dramatic picture of the life in the Five Towns: none of the characters are in any way exalted, but all are living people, admirably observed and depicted. The fourth act is a complete surprise and a complete success, though it is a daring change, in that he relies for his effect wholly upon dramatic irony. Six years have elapsed. Alice has become Mrs. Emery and Mayoress. Prosperity shines on her. She is waiting for guests to come to the mayoral reception, with Ralph's aunt and her sister; old Eli comes in: he has grown a crazy miser, and desires to borrow a shilling off anybody. Then enter Willie Beach, fat and prosperous, with the American millionairess—a Pittsburg girl who has married him for his wistful blue eyes, about which Alice has not ceased to dream. Prosperity has made the weak man blatant. "How he has changed!" says Alice. "Not a bit: he's exactly the same Willie Beach," cries Ralph's aunt, who knows the whole story, and congratulates Alice on her disillusion. "Willie Beach married," says the sound, dull Ralph, entering in his mayoral robes. "Well, come along." The curtain falls and the play leaves you with the idea that where a choice does exist between Cupid and Commonsense (Cupid grown beyond a fanciful boy allows no choice), for the Land's sake, as Mrs. Willie would say, choose Commonsense.

The play was remarkably well acted. Whoever cast Miss Sybil Noble for the part of Emily has capacity for his business little short of genius. Who else could have looked a girl of fourteen in one act and a young woman of twenty in another with such complete success? Mr. Bennett certainly set a problem for the caster, and is no doubt properly grateful that it was so brilliantly solved. Her performance, too, though inclined to exaggeration, was excellent. Miss Lucy Wilson, though she has a name in the provinces, is not so well known in London as her performance of Alice Boothroyd proved that she deserves to be. Miss Sydney Fairbrother, who in some ways is quite the cleverest actress on the stage, and whose art has far greater scope than is realised, gave a finished and beautiful little study of the Beachs' old servant, Miranda Finney. Mr. Fisher White gave a brilliant, restrained rendering of Eli Boothroyd. To his performance in the first acts the success of the play was largely due. Mr. Walter Pearce, as Willie Beach, and Mr. Nye Chart, as Ralph Emery, did good work, but did not play the characters quite as well as they were written. Miss Mary Brough was good as Ralph's Aunt, though she did not convey quite sufficiently the old woman's personal charm, and Miss Hazel Thompson was in the last act as dashing and gushing as the Pittsburg heiress should be.

Altogether it was a performance of which the Stage Society should be proud, and Mr. Frank Vernon deserves much praise for the production which was his work, and which was as nearly faultless as is possible.

H. DE S.

CORRESPONDENCE

OUIDA

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The painful news relative to the death of Ouida is full of pathos. Since the date of my recent letter to THE ACADEMY, July 16th, it was only a question of a few months, when, as the Giornale d'Italia put it, "she awaited the embrace of death after experiencing all the sorrows of life."

Wonderfully little is known of this writer, so completely have her last days been shrouded in obscure Village Communes. But of all the discoveries of those who do not know the strangest is surely that of several penmen who assert that Ouida accepted pecuniary aid from the Italian Government. Such a false estimate of her conduct and opinions would be impossible had they known Ouida's nature as expressed in her writings. Moreover, Italian Governments are not made of stuff elastic or generous enough to support their hostile critics. The Depretis, Melegari, and Crispi rulers of modern Italy felt the lash of Ouida's castigation too deeply to kiss the hand that held the rod.

By the way, I see with satisfaction that an article in THE ACADEMY of 25th inst. is, as I hope, the harbinger of a school of writers who may have courage to kick against the figment called "the traditional friendship" of Italy to England. For a vaporous soap-bubble this phrase has lasted to satiety!

If the fable of Ouida's acceptance of Italian aid gains belief and solidarity, let me recall that a similar pretext was evolved in the Italian Press by a statement that Mr. W. J. C. Moen's ransom was refunded by the Italian Government's payment of £6,000 to the brigands at Salerno who captured him. I was authorised by Mr. Moens nearly thirty years ago to deny this fraudulent assertion, which I did by means of a letter published by the Gazetta d'Italia, formerly printed in Florence.

I will concentrate a few extracts from twenty or thirty letters written by Ouida to me, if you can find space for them, and again ask if a proud, self-willed woman could bend her haughty spirit to accept aid of any kind from the men who have long governed Italy so wrongfully:

Sept. 29 (?).—All the conditions of Italy have been totally changed for the worse since the events of this May. The prisons are crammed with starving men; thousands will never leave them alive.—OUIDA.

Jan. 6 (?).—I thought your letter on Paola L— admirable, and sent it to her. Stillman is impudent, as the Prince of Liars always is. Here he is universally despised, but in England and America he seems to be accredited. Of course, he hates me, for I have constantly exposed his falsehoods. [So did I, in the Bath Chronicle.] None of the difficulties of the country is being solved, and I suppose things will go on until there is another revolt, and so on, da Capo. Many thanks for your sympathy.—Ever yours, O.

Nov., 1898.—It is almost impossible to get anything published which injures the prestige of their beloved ally, Italy. I have scarcely any belief in there ever being a good Government here. The evil is in the national character. Besides, every hectare of land is loaded with debt, and usurers, mostly Jews, are masters of the soil.—Ever yours, OUIDA.

Dec. 2 (?1898).—I could supply you with odious facts concerning the hateful . . . if you care to reproduce them. They put enclosed in Morning Post, much to my surprise. Kindly return.—Ever yours, OUIDA.

Nov.—Thanks very much for all you send me. Mr. Cook sent me tardily two copies of my letter. The thought of the destruction of the Roman cemetery is sickening, like all else. It makes Rome to me so intensely painful that I have ceased to go there. The prisoners are to be supplied with papers and ink, and allowed to spend one franc on food per diem. But the ——— of the long, black, bitter nights is unchanged. Rudini could have turned out the Cabinet last week; what a fool not to do it!—Ever yours, OUIDA.

June 28.—What can one hope to do with Stillman? The Times and Post give him big print, and affect to believe all he says. His propaganda for Crispi in the English Press is disgraceful to the Press. He always replies that his opponents know nothing, and considers that conclusive. [Precisely as he answered me, rudely.—W. M.] I have never got at the root of the English idolatry of Crispi; it may be because he is the enemy of France. I am very glad to hear you are better and stronger.—Ever yours sincerely, OUIDA.

I stop my quotations as my strength fails me to continue. I daresay these scraps, mostly dated incoherently from S. Alessio, near Lucca, will convey a just idea of the beautiful character of Ouida to people who only know her from her romances.

Her sympathy with the oppressed and her love for dumb animals remain, to my mind, her insurpassable claims to our everlasting approval.

WILLIAM MERCER.

January 27.

CHARLES VAN LERBERGHE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Last autumn Charles van Lerberghe passed away in his native Ghent, the town of still waters and dreaming churches, where he had spent his life. A grateful and tender word is due to the memory of this musician of delicate verse.

He was born in 1861. A studious boy, he was nothing of a prodigy. Later, a doctor of philosophy and letters, as well as a poet of tender and charming talent, he always held himself aloof from literary groups and coteries of mutual admiration. His first published work was a play, Les Fleurs, acted at Brussels in 1890. Lerberghe respected the public sufficiently to offer them only what he considered truly finished and worthy of himself. Success rewarded him. And this saddened him somewhat, for he was of those rare spirits who rather fear for the plant of glory to cling about their names. He would willingly have been forgotten.

Lerberghe wrote with deliberation, and left his early verses with regret, seemingly pained at the thought that he must write and love others later. It was only at the urging of his friends that he consented, very tardily, to publish Entrevisions. In 1904 appeared La Chanson d'Eve. Up to then his name had been known in a restrained and discreet way. This poem brought him fame, and when, the next year, the Théâtre de l'Œuvre played his Pan, a mythological piece, curious and tormented, the Ghent poet was no stranger to the Parisian audience. He was putting the last touches to a new gathering of poems, when death, the inflexible, came.

Lerberghe read much—Banville, Musset, Poe, Baudelaire—but he imitated no one. His mood at times approaches each of those poets, but it is only with Verlaine and Samain that he has a close affinity. Like those divine poets, he sings of the sweetness of loving and of the beauty of life. Like them, he has a delightful lack of energy, and even in his most ardent verse a philosophic preoccupation is suggested. Throughout his work he is looking back at life, and the things of life that interest him are the pale evening, the clear blue mist that kisses the dying lips of summer, the eastern bark in which:

S'en revenaient trois jeunes filles,
Trois jeunes filles d'orient.

Une qui était noire
Et qui tenait le gouvernail
Sur ses lèvres aux roses essences
Nous rapportait d'étranges histoires
Dans le silence.

Une qui était brune
Et qui tenait la voile en main
Et dont les pieds étaient ailés
Nous rapportait des gestes d'anges
En son immobilité

Mais une qui était blonde
Qui dormait à l'avant,
Dont les cheveux tombaient dans l'onde,
Comme du soleil levant
Nous rapportait sous ses paupières
La lumière.

Again, he trembles with the unknown anguish that comes over us with night. None, in fact, of the subtler human emotions escapes him. A poet has said of him :

Jamais son pas égal n'hésite au carrefour,
Car la marche qu'il suit dans la vie est guidée
Par le même visage et par la même idée.

And, indeed, he was always faithful to his lofty motto :

N'aime que la beauté et qu'elle soit pour toi toute la vérité.

CTE. SERGE FLEURY.

"COCKNEY RHYMES"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—My protest against these, countersigned by you as Editor, has elicited no reply. Users of these rhymes have not come forward to defend them. Yet some high authority might have been quoted in their support. Mrs. Woods, embodying Oxford and London culture, in her preface to "A Princess of Hanover," contends that they are allowable. Prof. Leaf, representing Cambridge scholarship, in the preface to his "Versions from Hafiz," asserts that, except in provincial English "r" is never sounded before a consonant or a mute vowel. The Professor, apparently, does not frequent theatre or concert-room. Has anyone ever heard a singer declaim, "Ahm, ahm, ye brave," or an actor shout, "My kingdom for a hoss"? And should not poetry postulate a deliverance at least as careful as that of the stage or the concert platform?

But the matter does not end with rhymes; other evils follow neglect of phonetics. A gross case of critical ineptitude has been quoted in a weekly journal since I last wrote to you. Mr. Herbert Trench, in his "New Poems" (p. 46), has this line :

Nor shall one law to unity restore.

One of his reviewers actually objected to this line as containing triple repetition of the same vowel-sound, evidently reading it "Naw . . . law . . . restaw." Is not this monstrous, and does it not open a dismal prospect of what is in store for poets? Their music is to be analysed by critics whose ideas of elocution would disgrace a Board School.

The Greeks had a weakness for the sound of "e." Even in classical times this showed itself, while in modern Greek I understand that at least three diphthongs and two vowels have taken this one sound, so that poluphloisboio is now poleephlees-beeo. Do we want English to undergo like debasement? If not, let us maintain distinctions between our vowels, recognising for example that for, fore, and flaw contain three different vowel-sounds, not one and the same. Let any critic who confounds them be discredited, any poet who makes them homophonous be pronounced defective in ear. A little more exactness in discriminating between closely allied sounds can do no one any harm, and will help in some measure to preserve unimpaired the language we received from our fathers.

January 25.

T. S. O.

"TELEGRAPH" AS AN ENGLISH WORD

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Telegraph as an English word probably did not come into use until the end of the eighteenth century, perhaps later. As a child I well remember the line of telegraphs between Portsmouth and London, the last in the series placed on the roof of the Horse Guards. The telegraph was a lofty post with four movable arms. The code probably was somewhat similar to that of the flag-waving signals now in use in the Army. Reliance was placed on them during the long war to give notice of any sign of invasion. They were used for transmitting naval and military matters or any official message requiring despatch. Their successors in its early days were always distinguished as the "electric" telegraph.

January 27.

P. W.

SIR,—The word is in Todd's Johnson (1827). Todd copied it from George Mason's "Additions to Johnson," printed in 1801. It had even then been in use for some time. Of course, the reference is to the old semaphore system by means of posts with arms. There was one that conveyed news from Dover to London. One of the stations was at Forest Hill, and I have myself often seen it at work. See the article on "Telegraph" in the English Cyclopædia, where there is a reference to an essay "on the Tellograph," which was "reprinted at London in 1797."

WALTER W. SKEAT.

THE HON. JAMES WINNEGATE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your Journal is usually so accurate that I venture to draw your attention to an error which has crept into the last paragraph of your 380th page. It is there stated that a puppet in a play "cannot be the Hon. James Winnegate and at the same time the cousin and heir to the Earl of Kerhill." I beg to suggest that James's father was a law-lord or an Indian viceroy. Sors tertia manet: James endured the awful ignominy of serving as a member of some Colonial Parliament and visited Birmingham on behalf of the Little Loaf.

JIM CROW.

MUNICIPAL GALLERY OF MODERN ART, DUBLIN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have read with very great interest Mr. Rutter's article in THE ACADEMY dealing with "The Administration of Municipal Art Galleries."

It is gratifying to find one who is so well qualified to speak with authority giving such enthusiastic commendation to the works which Mr. Hugh P. Lane has brought together and which we citizens of Dublin now proudly possess. There are two points, however, which Mr. Rutter emphasises, and which, I think, are specially important in regard to the future well-being of our Municipal Gallery. The first is that the executive and purchasing power should be entrusted to one man. Mr. Rutter writes :

Both as a whole and in many particulars this Modern Art Gallery in Dublin is a striking vindication of the policy of entrusting the formation and extension of public galleries to a single mind. Committees always end in compromises; compromises usually result in the triumph of mediocrity.

The second point is this: that the right man should be appointed, which can only be assured by the competence and qualifications of those who elect him.

I do not profess to know anything of the composition of the governing bodies of other municipal galleries, but I think the Corporation of Dublin has acted wisely in providing that the constitution of the Libraries' Committee, which is the authority empowered to deal with the management of our Gallery, shall be so altered "that there may be added thereto (for art purposes) two persons nominated by the Royal Hibernian Academy, two by the National Gallery—from their members or directors—and four nominated by the Modern Art Gallery Committee."

I fully endorse all that Mr. Rutter has said as to the paramount importance of entrusting the formation and extension of public galleries to a single mind. We cannot, I think, over-estimate the extraordinary good fortune which has given us here the untiring zeal and selective and widely-sympathetic range of appreciation to which Mr. Lane's achievement testifies. We feel confident that as long as the directorship remains in his hands the character and standard of our Gallery will be upheld. Mr. Rutter's article raises the serious question as to his successor, which, of course, must some day be faced. Mr. Lane's post is an honorary one, undertaken with enthusiastic unselfishness. In a comparatively poor city, such as Dublin is, it is unlikely that in the future such a salary could be attached to the post as would enable us to attract the most highly qualified, and so the question of future directorship is one of special importance to us.

The article further insists on the necessity of having a "policy" guiding the director in all such galleries as ours. This opens up a wide and difficult question. The policy of an individual director will be always defined and recognisable if he be a man of personality, but a consecutive policy, maintained by successive directors, is hardly to be hoped for. Mr. Rutter seems to define his meaning of "policy" as a settled intention to make each gallery eminently representative of the work of one master or of one particular school, and says :

People go to Scotland to study the Raeburns as they go to Holland for Rembrandt; to Birmingham for the pre-Raphaelites as to Venice for the Venetians.

What, then, should be the political attitude of our future directors? (Mr. Rutter will confess that the word "policy" is an unfortunate one in an Irish connection!) Long may Mr. Lane hold the helm for us here; yet, however much we may hope for good results in the future with the representative governing body which we possess, one cannot but remember how many a splendid personality has been wrecked on the treacherous rocks of Irish administration.

January 28.

R. CAULFIELD ORPEN,
Hon. Sec., Municipal Gallery of Modern Art.

BOOKS RECEIVED

MISCELLANEOUS

- The Pocket Ruskin.* Edited by Rose Gardner. Routledge, 2s. 6d. net.
- Hackwood, F. W. Old English Sports. Unwin, 10s. 6d. net.
- Trowbridge, W. R. H. Mirabeau, the Demi-God. Unwin, 15s. net.
- Nightingall, Arthur. My Racing Adventures. Werner Laurie, 7s. 6d. net.
- Fraser David. The Marches of Hindustan. Blackwood, 21s. net.
- Hammerton, J. A. In the Track of R. L. Stevenson and Elsewhere in Old France. Arrowsmith, n.p.
- Aldis, Janet. The Queen of Letter Writers. Methuen, 12s. 6d. net.
- Crane, Walter. India Impressions. With some Notes of Ceylon during a winter tour, 1906-7. Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.
- Miles, Eustace. The Power of Concentration. Methuen, 3s. 6d. net.
- Masson, John. Lucretius, Epicurean and Poet. Murray, 12s. net.
- The Letters of Robert Schumann.* Selected and edited by Dr. Karl Storck. Murray, 9s. net.
- Rands, William Brightly. The Young Norseman. David Nutt, 3s. 6d.
- Dare, Phyllis. From School to Stage. Collier, 1s.
- Francke, The Rev. A. H. A History of Western Tibet. Partridge, 2s. 6d. net.
- Besant, Annie. London Lectures of 1907. The Theosophical Publishing Society, 2s. net.
- Browne, Edith A. Great Buildings and How to Enjoy Them. Black, 3s. 6d. net.
- Austin, Alfred. Lamia's Winter Quarters. Black, 7s. 6d. net.
- Bourne, George. Memoirs of a Surrey Labourer. Duckworth, 6s.
- Polak, S. The Theory and Practice of Perspective Drawing. University Tutorial Press, 5s.
- Harrison, Austin. England and Germany. Macmillan, 2s. 6d. net.
- Lee, Vernon. The Sentimental Traveller. Lane, 3s. 6d. net.
- Graham, Sir Reginald. Foxhunting Recollections. Nash, 10s. net.
- Austin, Alfred. The Garden that I Love. Second Series. Macmillan, 5s. net.
- The Century Magazine.* May to October, 1907. Macmillan, 10s. 6d.
- The Vision of Aridæus.* By G. R. S. Mead. Theosophical Publishing Society, 1s. net.
- The Hymn of Jesus.* By G. R. S. Mead. Theosophical Publishing Society, 1s. net.
- Colum, Padraic. Studies. Maunsell, 1s.
- Stocker, R. Dimsdale. Seership and Prophecy. Samurai Press, 2s. net.
- Ward, John J. Some Nature Biographies. Lane, 5s. net.
- Calvert, Albert F. Granada and the Alhambra. Lane, 3s. 6d. net.
- Dargan, Edwin Preston. The Æsthetic Doctrine of Montesquieu. Baltimore; J. H. Furst, n.p.
- Hutchinson, W. M. L. The Golden Porch. A Book of Greek Fairy Tales. Arnold, 5s.
- Charles, M. The Story of Faust. The Theosophical Publishing Society, 5s. net.
- Wendell, Barrett. The France of To-day. Constable, 6s. net.
- Robson, A. W. Mayo. Cancer of the Stomach. Nisbet, 4s. 6d. net.
- Slaughter, Frances. "The One" Dog and "The Others." Longmans, Green, 5s. net.
- Archer, William, and H. Granville Barker. A National Theatre. Duckworth, 5s. net.
- Isaacson, The Rev. Charles S. The Story of the English Cardinals. Elliot Stock, 6s. net.
- Williams, E. Crawshaw. Across Persia. Arnold, 12s. 6d. net.
- Anderson, Sir Robert. Criminals and Crime: Some Facts and Suggestions. Nisbet, 5s. net.
- Hill, Joseph. The Book Makers of Old Birmingham. Birmingham: Cornish, 7s. 6d. net.
- Crosland, T. W. H. Who Goes Racing? Collier, 3s.
- Leaves from the Note Book of Lady Dorothy Nevill.* Edited by Ralph Nevill. Macmillan, 15s. net.
- Bleackley, Horace. The Story of a Beautiful Duchess. Constable, 21s. net.
- Gleanings After Time.* Chapters in Social and Domestic History. Edited by G. L. Apperson. Elliot Stock, 6s. net.
- Virgil's Messianic Eclogue.* Three Studies by Joseph B. Mayor, W. Warde Fowler, and R. S. Conway. Murray, 2s. 6d. net.
- Robinson, W. The Garden Beautiful. Murray, 7s. 6d. net.
- Hueffer, Ford Madox. The Spirit of the People. Alston Rivers, 5s. net.
- The New Century Sunday School.* The Discussions, edited, with an introduction, by the Rev. Frank Johnson. Sunday School Union, 1s. net.
- The Book of Fair Women.* By Federigo Luigino of Udine. Translated by Elsie M. Lang. Werner Laurie, n.p.
- Harrison, Frederic. The Philosophy of Common Sense. Macmillan, 7s. 6d. net.
- Letters of Dr. John Brown.* Edited by his son, D. W. Forrest. Black, 10s. 6d. net.
- Cradle Tales of Hinduism.* By the Sister Nivedita. Longmans, Green, 5s. net.
- Dickinson, Captain F. Big Game Shooting on the Equator. Lane, 12s. 6d. net.
- The Golden Humorous Reciter.* Seeley, 3s. 6d.
- Golden Thoughts from Thoreau.* Lane, 1s. net.
- Gibson, Elizabeth. A Book of Reverie. Lane, 1s. net.
- Pirie-Gordon, C. H. C. Innocent the Great. An Essay on his Life and Times. Longmans, Green, 9s. net.
- Love-Letters of King Henry the Eighth.* Griffiths, 1s. net.
- Crawford, F. Marion. Gleanings from Venetian History. Macmillan, 8s. 6d. net.
- Roberts, Charles G. D. The Haunters of the Silences. Duckworth, 6s. net.
- Biddulph, Colonel John. The Pirates of Malabar and an Englishwoman in India Two Hundred Years Ago. Smith, Elder, 6s. net.
- Seymour, Thomas Day. Life in the Homeric Age. Macmillan, 17s. net.
- Smith, Bertram T. K. How to Collect Postage Stamps. Bell, 6s. net.
- Stopford, Francis. The Toil of Life. Being a collection of essays on the philosophy of joy and pain. Walter Scott Publishing Co., 5s.
- Redfern, Percy. Tolstoy: A Study. Fifield, 2s. net.
- Holland, Clive. Things Seen in Egypt. Seeley, 2s. net.
- Lilly, W. S. Many Mansions. Chapman & Hall, 12s. 6d. net.
- The New Word.* Owen, 5s.
- Merz Teresa. The Junto. With introduction by W. F. Lord. Andrew Reid, 3s. 6d. net.
- Golf.* Greening, 6d. net.
- The Letters of Samuel Reynolds Hole.* Edited by George A. B. Dewar. Allen, 15s. net.
- Another Book of Verses for Children.* Edited by E. V. Lucas. Wells, Gardner, Darton, 6s.
- The Church Monthly.* 1907. "The Church Monthly" Office, n.p.
- Nietzsche Friedrich. Beyond Good and Evil. Foulis, 5s. net.
- Lucas, Bernard. The Empire of Christ. Macmillan, 2s. 6d. net.
- Sharp, Cecil J. English Folk-Song. Simpkin & Co., n.p.

- Catalogue of the Historical Exhibition of Liverpool Antiquities at the Walker Art Gallery, 1907.* Liverpool: Lee & Nightingale, n.p.
- Davies, Randall. English Society of the Eighteenth Century in Contemporary Art. Seeley, 7s. net
- Rushton, William Lowes. Shakespeare's Legal Maxims. Liverpool: Henry Young, n.p.
- Densmore, Emmet. Sex Equality. Swan, Sonnenschein, 6s.
- Theal, George McCall. History and Ethnography of Africa South of the Zambesi. Vol. 1. Swan, Sonnenschein, 7s. 6d.
- Ramè anu Lahari.* Edited by Sir Roper Lethbridge. Swan, Sonnenschein, 5s. net.
- Harvard Studies in Classical Philology.* Volume XVIII. Longmans, Green, 6s. 6d. net.
- Rey, Guido. The Matterhorn. Fisher Unwin, 21s. net.
- The Charm of London.* An Anthology compiled by Alfred H. Hyatt. Chatto & Windus, 2s. net.
- Wroth, Warwick. Cremorne and the later London Gardens. Elliot Stock, 6s. net.
- Loneragan, W. F. Forty Years of Paris. Fisher Unwin, 10s. 6d. net.
- Smyth, Eleanor C. Sir Rowland Hill. The Story of a Great Reform. Unwin, 5s. net.
- Knight, E. F. Over-Sea Britain. Murray, 6s. net.
- Gregory, Lady. A Book of Saints and Wonders. Murray, 5s. net.
- Westell, W. P. The Story of Insect Life. Culley, 5s. net.
- Shaw, F. G. Dry Fly Fishing and Salmon Fly Casting. Murray, 10s. 6d. net.
- Rayleigh, Peter. The Cogers and Fleet Street. Elliot Stock, n.p.
- Smith, Robinson. English Quotations. Routledge, 7s. 6d. net.

POETRY

- Rossetti to Tynan.* Edited by Alfred H. Miles. Routledge, 1s. 6d. net.
- Betham-Edwards, M. Poems. Nutt, 1s. net.
- The Works of Tennyson.* Annotated. Edited by Hallam Lord Tennyson. Macmillan, 4s. net.
- Fotheringham, the Rev. David Ross. War Songs of the Greeks. Cambridge: Deighton Bell, 3s. 6d. net.
- Gore-Booth, Eva. The Sorrowful Princess. Longmans, 2s. 6d. net.
- Gurney, Elise Eleanor. Poems. Longmans, 2s. 6d. net.
- The Book of Living Poets.* Edited by Walter Jerrold. Alston Rivers, 7s. 6d. net.
- Haworth-Booth, Ben. The New Life. Harrap, 3s. 6d. net.
- A Treasury of Ballads.* Selected and arranged by M. G. Edgar. Harrap, 1s. 6d. net.
- A Treasury of Verse for Little Children.* Selected and arranged by M. G. Edgar. Harrap, 1s. net.
- Hole, W. G. New Poems. Bell, 1s. net.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS

- Stories from the Arabian Nights.* Retold by Laurence Housman. Hodder & Stoughton, 15s.
- Pratt, Edwin A. The Licensed Trade. Murray 1s.
- Carroll, Lewis. Alice in Wonderland. Routledge, 2s. 6d.
- Lodge, Sir Oliver. Modern Views of Electricity. Macmillan, 6s.
- Sadler, S. H. The Education of the Young. Routledge, 3s. 6d.
- Norris, W. E. Matthew Austin. Nelson, 7d. net.
- Molière, J. B. Poquelin. L'Etourdi ou les Contre-Temps. Dent, 1s. 6d. net.
- The New Mediæval Library—The Chatelaine of Vergi, Of the Tumbler of Our Lady, The Duke of True Lovers.* Chatto & Windus, 5s. net. each.
- The Poems of George Herbert.—Palgrave's Golden Treasury.* Oxford University Press.
- Scott, Sir Walter. Quentin Durward. Frowde.
- Jefferies, Richard. The Life of the Fields. Chatto & Windus, 5s. net.

- Hope, Anthony. The Prisoner of Zenda. Arrowsmith, 2s. 6d. net.
- Swinburne, Algernon Charles. The Queen-Mother and Rosamond. Chatto & Windus.
- Lyall, Sir Alfred C. Poems. Routledge, 1s. net.
- Browning, Robert. Dramas and Dramatis Personæ. Routledge, 1s. net.
- Poems, Letters, and Prose Fragments of Kirke White.* Edited by John Drinkwater. Routledge, 1s. net.
- The Spectator.* Vol. IV. With introduction and notes by George A. Aitken. Routledge, 1s. net.
- Ruskin, John. A Joy for Ever, The Two Paths. Allen, 1s. net.
- Private Life of Marie Antoinette,* by Madame Campan.—Memoirs of a Cavalier, by Daniel Defoe.—A Journey Round my Room, by Xavier De Maistre.—A Christmas Carol, by Charles Dickens.—Letters to Clarinda, by Robert Burns. Sisley's, 1s. net each.
- Critical Essays,* by Matthew Arnold.—Sonnets, by William Wordsworth.—Selections from the Speeches and Writings of Edmund Burke.—Counsels Civil and Moral, by Francis Bacon.—Minor Poems, by John Milton.—The Journal of a Voyage to Lisbon, by Henry Fielding.—Essays, by James Anthony Froude.—Scenes from Harry Lorrequer, by Charles Lever.—Poems, by Ben Jonson.—Grace Abounding, by John Bunyan.—Poems, by Percy Bysshe Shelley.—Mr. Gilfil's Love Story, by George Eliot. John Long, 6d. and 1s. net each.
- Mathers, Helen. Comin' thro' the Rye. Collins, n.p.
- The Priest and the Acolyte.* With an introductory protest by Stuart Mason. London: The Lotus Press, 5s. net.

THEOLOGY

- Harper, Thomas Greathead. Christ in Evolution. Sisley's, 6s. net.
- Bailey, the Rev. George. Leading Ideas of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Dublin: Hodges, Figgis, n.p.
- Knowing, R. J. Literary Criticism and the New Testament. S.P.C.K., 2s.
- Kennett, Robert H. In Our Tongues. Arnold, 3s. 6d. net.
- Gutch, A. P. My Father's House. Mowbray, 6d. net.
- Notes on the Parables of Our Lord.* By Archbishop Trench. With an introduction by A. Smythe Palmer. Routledge, 2s. 6d. net.
- Shepard, the Rev. James William. Light and Life. Macmillan, 6s.
- Psalter Prayers.* With a preface by G. S. Cuthbert. Mowbray, 1s. net.
- Messages of Love.* With verses by Rose Bourdillon. Mowbray, 9d. net.
- Macmillan, Hugh. The Isles and the Gospel. Macmillan, 4s. 6d.
- The Private Devotions of Bishop Lancelot Andrewes.* Allenson, 2s. 6d. net.
- The Modern Reader's Bible.* Edited, with introduction and notes, by Richard G. Moulton. Macmillan, 10s. net.
- Freeth, J. F. The True Theology. Allenson, 1s. 6d.
- Woodward, Allen B. The Inner Man. Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner, 5s. net.

TRAVEL AND TYPOGRAPHY

- The Savage South Seas.* Painted by Norman H. Hardy. Described by E. Way Elkington. Black, 20s. net.
- Scotland of To-day.* By T. F. Henderson and Francis Watt. Methuen, 6s.
- Seton, Mrs. Ernest Thompson. Nimrod's Wife. Constable, 6s.
- Enock, C. Reginald. The Andes and the Amazon. Fisher Unwin, 21s.
- Fisher, Gertrude Adams. A Woman Alone in the Heart of Japan. Sisleys, 7s. 6d. net.
- Woodward, Ida. In and Around the Isle of Purbeck. Lane, 21s. net.
- Holland, Clive. Old and New Japan. Dent, 15s. net.
- South Devon.* Painted by C. E. Hannaford. Described by Chas. R. Rowe. Black, 6s. net.
- Alexander, Boyd. From the Niger to the Nile. In 2 vols. Arnold, 36s. net.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEERED

DRINK THE

WHITEDELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
& AFTER DINNER.& BLUEIn making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

Nervous Disorders

A deficiency of the phosphates causes a lowering of nervous tone, indicated by exhaustion, restlessness, headache or insomnia.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate

(Non-Alcoholic)

supplies the nerve cells with health-giving life force, restores strength and induces restful sleep without the use of dangerous drugs.

An Ideal Tonic in Nervous Diseases

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.
 Fullest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

The February BOOK MONTHLY. 6d. net.

CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR

A Town and Country Journal of Book Affairs; the same Embellished with many Pictures.

CONTRABAND!

Books Seized in His Majesty's Customs.

TREASURE FINDERS!

Forged and Faked MSS., and How to Detect Them—By Tighe Hopkins.

SUPPRESSED!

Some book Pictures that we know no More.

A LONDON LETTER

New Lamps for Old at the "Times" Book Club—By the Editor.

ANNALS OF PRINT

Four Centuries of the Cambridge University Press.

A BY-WAYS SERIES

The Bookseller and the Publisher as Topographer—By R. Cochrane.

LIGHT AND LEADING

New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.

THE GENERAL READER

Snap-shot Reviews of the Best and Best-Selling Books.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY

Particulars of Interesting Volumes likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH

A Classified Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions, and Reprints of January.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

PUBLIC OPINION

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF
CURRENT THOUGHT & ACTIVITY.
TWO PENCE EACH FRIDAY.

ESTABLISHED 1860.

An Interesting Review of World Events.

To get a broad, comprehensive and clear view of the great movements afoot on the globe, to catch the inmost spirit of the activities of the world—to grasp their full meaning—read PUBLIC OPINION.

This paper compels reading by the tremendous interest of its subjects and their cosmic sweep. It is a journal of timeliness that appeals to intelligent men and women who wish to know the best that is said and done in all fields of human activity.

Its pages are brimful of information and discussion on Politics, Science, Religion, Literature, Art, Music, and the Drama, and of the people who keep the world turning around. It gives the best from all periodicals and keeps one abreast of the culture of the age in all lines of thought and achievement. To the busy man and woman it is indispensable. It is the paper that keeps you educated.

PUBLIC OPINION is the ideal paper for every home, of interest to every member of the family, a luxurious necessity and a necessary luxury. Its circulation increases each week, and it is read by people in all parts of the world.

Specimen Post Free on application.

Offices: 30 & 31 Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART.

PRICE THREE PENCE.

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION:

Inland, 15s. post free, Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free.

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
 THE ACADEMY, 95 FETTER LANE, E.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____ months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

SECOND EDITION IN THE PRESS. 2s. 6d. net.
ENGLISH SOCIALISM of TO-DAY :
ITS TEACHINGS AND ITS AIMS EXAMINED

By the Right Hon. H. O. ARNOLD-FORSTER, M.P.
DAILY TELEGRAPH: "He is a book with a great heart and a great purpose: a book which deserves and which we expect to attain the very widest circulation. . . . We should like to see a copy of this volume upon the table of every working-men's club in the country."

MY ALPINE JUBILEE, 1851-1907.

Crown 8vo. By FREDERIC HARRISON. 3s. 6d. net.
M. AROLD SPENDER, in the DAILY CHRONICLE, says: "A fascinating addition to an Alpine club library: brimful of that natural wisdom which ennobled all the earlier Alpine literature, buoyant, eager, passionate, happy."

LORD WANTAGE, V.C., K.C.B.
A MEMOIR. By his WIFE. With 8 Portraits.

Large 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.
SECOND EDITION IN THE PRESS.
GUARDIAN: "With rare dignity, self-restraint, and sense of proportion, in a style at once distinguished, correct, and lucid. Lady Wantage has here told the story of a consistently noble life."

THE SOCIAL FETTER.

By LADY GROVE. Demy 8vo. 5s. net.
SECOND EDITION, with a NEW PREFACE, Ready in a Few Days
COUNTRY LIFE: "Amusing essays on social solecisms in which Lady Grove displays a delightful sense of humour."

HUMOURS OF THE FRAY :

Rhymes and Renderings. By CHARLES L. GRAVES. 3s. 6d. net.
DAILY TELEGRAPH: "All lovers of skillful and witty light verse should get Mr. Graves' volume at once."

REMINISCENCES OF OXFORD.

By the REV. W. TUCKWELL, M.A. Revised and cheaper Edition.
 Considerably Enlarged. With 16 illustrations, large post 8vo. 6s.
PUNCH: "Mr. Tuckwell's good things illuminate every page, and are told with the brevity which is essential to success."

A HISTORY OF THE MINORITIES.

By the REV. E. M. TOMLINSON. With 4 Portraits in Photogravure and 9 Half-tone Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 18s. net.
TRIBUNE: "An admirable example of historical research, and should be read by every student of London's great past."

London: SMITH, ELDER AND CO., 15 Waterloo Place, S.W.

MACMILLAN'S NEW BOOKS.

RAMBLING RECOLLECTIONS.

By SIR HENRY DRUMMOND WOLFF. With Photogravure and other Illustrations. Two vols. 8vo. 30s. net.

The Times.—"At every turn the Recollections bring us into contact with people and things that must interest all who care for character and political history. . . . The book, as we have said, well deserves to be read, and it is certain to interest a large public."

THE COMING STRUGGLE IN EASTERN ASIA.

By B. L. PUTNAM WEALE, Author of "Manchu and Muscovite," "The Re-Shaping of the Far East," &c. With numerous Illustrations and a Map. 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

A NEW BOOK ON BUDDHISM.

THE INWARD LIGHT. By H. FIELDING HALL.
 Author of the "The Soul of a People," &c. 10s. net.

THE EVERSLEY TENNYSON.

Annotated by ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON. In 9 Vols. Vol. II. Poems. 4s. net.

GOLDEN TREASURY SERIES—New Volume.

APHORISMS AND REFLECTIONS FROM THE WORKS OF THOMAS HENRY HUXLEY.

Selected by HENRIETTA A. HUXLEY. Pott 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. Also cloth elegant, 2s. 6d. net; limp leather, 3s. 6d. net.

JAMES THOMSON. By G. C. MACAULAY. Crown 8vo.

2s. net.
 English Men of Letters.

A NEW VOLUME OF ESSAYS.

CONFESSIO MEDICI. By the Writer of "THE YOUNG PEOPLE." Extra Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., London.

GREENING'S BOOKS OF THE WEEK

A NEW ROMANCE BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SCARLET PIMPERNEL."

BEAU BROCADE

BEAU BROCADE

A Dashing Romance of the Road, by BARONESS ORCZY, Author of "The Scarlet Pimpernel," "I Will Repay," &c. Price 6/-
AS GOOD AS THE FAMOUS "SCARLET PIMPERNEL." First Edition. 15,000 Copies, sold out. Second Edition now ready.

WHO STOLE THE CROWN JEWELS? See THE GANG

By DAVID WHITEHEAD, Author of "MacStodger's Affinity," Illustrated by the Author. Cloth, 3/6

JUST PUBLISHED.

VINCENZO'S VENDETTA.

A Novel by JOSEPH PRAGUE. Author of "The Abductors." 6/-

LADY LILIAN'S LUCK

A Society Novel by the COUNTESS DE BREMONT, Author of "Daughters of Pleasure." Cloth, 6/-

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE GOLDEN HORSESHOE

A Romance by ROBERT AITKEN, Author of "Windfalls," "The Redding Strain," &c. Cloth, 6/-

LET ERIN REMEMBER

By MAY WYNNE. 6/-

A CHARMING GIRL

A delightful Story by ESME STUART, Author of "In the Dark." 6/-

Fiction Lovers must not miss the NEW STORY by Mr. GERALD BISS. SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

THE WHITE ROSE MYSTERY

A Tale of Conspiracy by GERALD BISS, Author of "The Dupe." 6/-

The DAILY TELEGRAPH says: "A breathlessly exciting novel. It is a wonderful story. In some imperious fashion of its own it compels attention. You simply cannot help reading it. Its vivacity is infectious."

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE LOVESEEKERS

A Brilliant Novel by MARY WALPOLE. 6/-

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE HARVEST OF DECEIT

A Thrilling Tale by CLIVE PEMBERTON. 6/-

Send a p.c. for Greening's Catalogue. It will be sent you post free.

LONDON: GREENING and CO., LTD., 91 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1867

FEBRUARY 15, 1908

PRICE THREEPENCE

SEVEN BOOKS FROM THE GRANT RICHARDS LIST

By ARTHUR MACHEN

¶ "The House of Souls" and "The Hill of Dreams" contain between them all Mr. Machen's contributions to modern fiction that have so far found their way between two covers. Each book has a frontispiece by S. H. Sime. The first contains those classics of the horrible "The Great God Pan," and "The Three Impostors," and the second is a long novel, 6s. ea.

By FILSON YOUNG

¶ An indispensable book to all who attend the Opera is Filson Young's "The Wagner Stories," with Portrait. 5s. net. "The Daily Telegraph" says: "What Charles Lamb did for Shakespeare Mr. Young has achieved for Wagner." Also uniform with this volume is his collections of essays on music, entitled "Mastersingers," bound in yapp Persian, price 5s. net.

By JAMES DOUGLAS

¶ "The Unpardonable Sin," the first novel by James Douglas, the distinguished literary critic, has been called the most original novel published for many years. "I sat down 'astonied,' like the old Jews, when I had finished it," says Dr. Robertson Nicoll in "The British Weekly." "A fine and imaginative romance," says The Daily Telegraph. 6s.

TWO NEW NOVELS

¶ (1) "The Armada Gold," by Edgar Turner and Reginald Hodder, authors of "The Purloined Prince." "Vigorous and entertaining," says "The Morning Leader." (2) "The Individualist," by Philip Gibbs. "A strong, real, vital piece of work."—"The Observer," Price 6s. each. Send for complete list of new novels. Grant Richards, 7 Carlton St., S.W.

THE MOSHER BOOKS

THE NEW CATALOGUE FOR 1908 is now ready, and will be sent free on request to booklovers anywhere that can be reached by mail. This Catalogue, like those that preceded it, is not made up of old and hackneyed quotations concerning books. You are not wearied by "a jollie good book" jingle and that sort of thing, but you are treated to some very genuine prose and verse not seen in every cut and decidedly dried anthology.

THOMAS B. MOSHER, PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

NOTICE.

All communications to the Editor should be addressed to 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

All business communications must be sent to The Manager of "The Academy," 95 Fetter Lane, E.C.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN,
ALBEMARLE STREET, PICCADILLY, W.

Saturday, February 15, at Three o'clock, SELWYN BRINTON, Esq., M.A. First of Three Lectures on "THE ART OF FLORENCE." Half-a-Guinea. Tickets may be obtained at the Office of the Institution.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds of Typewriting carefully done at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical Advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley, Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A Furnished House in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

Books, etc., Wanted

THE CAMBRIDGE LITERARY AGENCY, which is placing Novels, Short Stories, Articles, and Poems with over 100 (one hundred) Publishers and Periodicals, sold, on December 31, 12 Short Stories and a Serial by UNKNOWN WRITERS. Hundreds of unique testimonials. All MSS. submitted by GEORGE G. MAGNUS, 115 Strand, London.

WILL PURCHASE AT ANY TIME. ILLUMINATED MANUSCRIPTS, from the earliest times till the beginning of the XVIth Century; Incunabula and other Early Printed Books; Illustrated Books, Prints, from the XVth and the beginning of the XVIth Century. Rare Old Books and Prints.—JACQUES ROSENTHAL, Munich, Bavaria. 10, Karlstr. 10.

BOOKS AT ONE-THIRD COST.—

Thousands of the Best Books at from 25 to 0 per cent. below the original prices. Largest and best Stock of Secondhand and New Remainder books in the World. Write for our January Catalogue.—W. H. SMITH & SON, Library Department, 186 Strand, London, W.C.

QUEEN SQUARE CLUB.

A social club for men and women interested in politics, literature or art. Lectures, entertainments, chess and bridge. An exquisite Queen Anne club-house, close to the British Museum, and Russell Square Station. Inexpensive lunch and dinner. Subscription two guineas.—Apply Secretary, 9 Queen Square, Bloomsbury.

Books for Sale

HARMSWORTH'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF UNIVERSAL KNOWLEDGE, New and Revised Edition, 10 vols., cloth, gilt tops. Published at £2. 16s. net. 21s.—W. E. GOULDEN, Bookseller, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

FRENCH ENGRAVERS AND

DRAUGHTSMEN OF THE XVIIIth CENTURY, by Lady Dilke. 9 Photogravure Plates and 38 other Illustrations. Imp. 8vo, cloth. Published by Bell & Son, 1902, at 28s. net, for 2s. 6d. net.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

The Autotype Company

74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON

MONOCHROME COPIES

BY THE PERMANENT AUTOTYPE CARBON
PROCESS OF PICTURES BY OLD MASTERS
From the PRINCIPAL COLLECTIONS OF NOTE.

NUMEROUS EXAMPLES OF WORKS BY MODERN ARTISTS

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY'S Processes of Permanent Photographic Reproduction are extensively employed by the Trustees of the British Museum, the Local Government Board, many of the Learned Societies, and leading Publishers.

COPIES OF COINS, SEALS, MEDALS, MSS., DRAWINGS, ENGRAVINGS, ART OBJECTS, MICROSCOPIC WORKS, &c.

For Limited Editions the Autotype Processes of Book Illustrations are cheaper than any existing methods of Block Reproduction, and yield infinitely superior results.

Inquiries are invited from those requiring Book Illustrations of the very highest quality. SPECIMENS AND ESTIMATES SUBMITTED.

The Autotype Fine Art Gallery

74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Open Free Daily, 10 to 6

The Booklovers Library

delivers books in London and to any part of the United Kingdom. Its books are unlabelled, fresh, clean and inviting. It gives you a carriage-paid service or not, just as you wish. It gives you the books you want when you want them.

FOR LONDON AND COUNTRY.

ORDINARY SERVICE.

	Twelve Months	Six Months	Three Months
One Book ...	£1 1 0	£ 12 0	£ 7 0
Two Books ...	1 11 6	1 18 0	10 6
Three Books ...	1 17 0	1 1 0	12 0
Four Books ...	2 2 0	1 4 0	14 0
Six Books ...	2 12 6	1 11 6	16 0
Eight Books ...	3 3 0	1 16 0	18 0

Subscribers to the above service may exchange their books personally or by messenger as often as desired at the Library in Harrod's Stores, and at 17 Hanover Street, W. Country Subscribers to the above service may exchange their books by Rail or Parcels Post, as often as desired, paying carriage both ways. All boxes of books are forwarded to subscribers in advance; the finished volumes being returned to the Library upon receipt of fresh supply. The cost of carriage on four books, by rail, is in almost every case the same as on two or three books.

Booklet giving full terms of Subscription, the latest Monthly Book List, etc., will be sent Post Free upon application.

The Booklovers Library

17 Hanover Street, London, W.

And at Harrods Limited, Brompton Road, S.W.

SECOND EDITION READY ON TUESDAY. 2s. 6d. net.

ENGLISH SOCIALISM of TO-DAY : ITS TEACHINGS AND ITS AIMS EXAMINED

By the Right Hon. H. O. ARNOLD-FORSTER, M.P.

DAILY TELEGRAPH: "Here is a book with a great heart and a great purpose: a book which deserves and which we expect to attain the very widest circulation. . . . We should like to see a copy of this volume upon the table of every working-men's club in the country."

MY ALPINE JUBILEE, 1851-1907.

Crown 8vo. By FREDERIC HARRISON. 3s. 6d. net.

DAILY TELEGRAPH: "Mr. Harrison has always about him something of an infectious enthusiasm. Alike to those who know Switzerland and to those who do not we would cordially commend this very pleasant little volume."

LORD WANTAGE, V.C., K.C.B.

A MEMOIR. By his WIFE. With 8 Portraits.

Large 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

SECOND EDITION IN THE PRESS.

GUARDIAN: "With rare dignity, self-restraint, and sense of proportion, in a style at once distinguished, correct, and lucid, Lady Wantage has here told the story of a consistently noble life."

THE SOCIAL FETTER.

By LADY GROVE. Demy 8vo. 5s. net.

SECOND EDITION, with a NEW PREFACE. Now ready.

NATION: "Full of vivacity and pleasant illustration, and makes a very readable volume."

HUMOURS OF THE FRAY :

Rhymes and Renderings. By CHARLES L. GRAVES.

3s. 6d. net.

DAILY TELEGRAPH: "All lovers of skilful and witty light verse should get Mr. Graves' volume at once."

REMINISCENCES OF OXFORD.

By the REV. W. TUCKWELL, M.A. Revised and Cheaper Edition.

Considerably Enlarged. With 16 illustrations, large post 8vo. 6s.

PUNCH: "Mr. Tuckwell's good things illuminate every page, and are told with that brevity which is essential to success."

A HISTORY OF THE MINORIES.

By the REV. E. M. TOMLINSON. With 4 Portraits in Photogravure and 9 Half-tone Illustrations, demy 8vo. 13s. net.

TRIBUNE: "An admirable example of historical research, and should be read by every student of London's great past."

London: SMITH, ELDER AND CO., 15 Waterloo Place, S.W.

THE GEORGE MEREDITH BIRTHDAY CELEBRATION

All admirers of the great Novelist should read the Monograph,

GEORGE MEREDITH

An Essay towards appreciation, by WALTER JERROLD, in the English Writers of To-Day Series.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d., with a Portrait of George Meredith.

London: GREENING & CO., LTD., and all Booksellers.

The Pongo Papers

By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS

With Illustrations by DAVID WHITELOW. 2/6 net

The book consists of a series of verses satirising the methods of modern scientific controversialists. Included in the volume is "THE DUKE OF BERWICK," an extremely amusing nonsense rhyme.

THE PONGO PAPERS. 2/6 NET

London: GREENING & Co., Ltd., 91 St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
Life and Letters	455	February Fill-dyke	467
Brown-Tailed Filly	457	The International	467
Literature :		The Library Table	468
Tennyson on his Art	457	Fiction	469
Homer Again	458	Drama :
The Poet of "The Seasons"	460	"Rosmersholm" at Terry's
An Ambitious Quest	460	Theatre	471
Controversial History	462	Correspondence	471
Also Sprach Campbell	463	Books Received	474
The Matter of Romance	466

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields.

The publishing offices of THE ACADEMY are at 95 Fetter Lane E.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

THE organisers (whoever they may be) of the memorial addressed to Mr. George Meredith on his eightieth birthday did not give to the Editor of THE ACADEMY the opportunity of adding his humble name to the list of signatories. The list consists of names under the following heads: Literary, Public Life, from Oxford University, from Cambridge University, from Edinburgh, from Trinity College, Dublin; Artists, Dramatic, Editors; from France, and from the United States. Under the heading of Editors are to be found the signatures of thirty editors of papers, none of which we can safely say has the same claim to represent pure literature as THE ACADEMY. We speak advisedly and with every respect for our literary contemporaries, The Spectator, The Saturday Review, and The Athenæum. The first-named two papers are primarily political, and The Athenæum has a "trade" element about it which bars its claim to be considered as a purely literary organ. We do not complain of this lack of courtesy on the part of the promoters of the memorial, we merely note it, and we venture to think that the congratulations of THE ACADEMY which we now offer to our greatest living novelist will be no less acceptable to Mr. George Meredith than those of the Daily Mail, the Daily Express, the Daily News, and the Review of Reviews, to take a few names at random from the list.

It is with regret rather than surprise that we chronicle the death of the Tribune, London's one and only "penny morning Liberal daily paper." The Tribune departed almost immediately after celebrating its second birthday, but its brief career contains a record, over which, in many respects, the organisers and staff of the paper may feel reasonably proud. From the very outset of affairs the enterprise was an adventure. The paper appeared fated to destruction almost immediately after it had started out on its hazardous career. An enormous amount of money was expended, in all close on £350,000, and up to the last hour of the paper's life there was always a possibility of further capital being forthcoming. In the early autumn of 1906, when the outlook for the paper was the reverse of encouraging, Mr. S. J. Pryor assumed the editorship. Those who know the resources at his command in comparison with the results achieved by his enterprise must realise that his management of the Tribune was not the least of Mr. Pryor's achievements. Under his control the paper improved in all directions. Commercially it doubled its revenue from circulation and from advertisements in twelve months; politically and socially the paper expanded, gathered force, authority, and enterprise. If the necessary further capital had been forthcoming last week the paper, allowing for a rate of progress commensurate with that enjoyed in 1907, would have established its commercial prosperity inside twelve months. Such a result might have proved profitable to Liberalism, which to-day may be accurately described as "the ha'penny paper party."

The failure of the Tribune gives rise to many obvious reflections. In the first place it is apparent that official Liberalism declines to disburse any moneys from the party's coffers for Liberal enterprises collateral to the work of electioneering, and it is also plain that official Liberalism will not encourage its wealthy friends to draw upon their resources for purposes not directly concerned with party expenditure. Wealthy Radicals eager to join that "moribund institution" the House of Lords clearly understand that they can force an easier passage to the peerage by swelling the party exchequer than by assisting enterprises such as the Tribune. Such concerns as the latter are to be regarded with benevolent patronage so long as they are preaching the gospel of the party and assisting it to win elections, but should they ask for any active aid or support it would be dangerous to accede to their requests without official sanction. And as the saying is in those circles of Liberalism which read Liberal newspapers for the purpose of following "Captain Coe's" racing prophecies, "the whisper goes round" amongst the wealthy stalwarts of Radicalism that officialdom would greatly prefer any loose or moving capital to be transferred to the sanctuary of its own coffers. In the case of the Tribune it is safe to say that practically every source of Liberal wealth in the country was approached for assistance. The result of these negotiations provides its own commentary.

We have been asked to draw attention to the first number of Representation, the Proportional Representation Society's little monthly journal, which can be obtained from the Society's offices, 28 St. Martin's Lane, Cannon Street, for one penny. We do this the more readily since we are inclined to sympathise in the main with the Society's objects. At any rate, the composition of the Executive Committee is sufficient to show that the Society is no part of a scheme in party politics, since it includes politicians of such various political complexion, and in some cases of such independent character as Sir William Anson, Lord Balfour of Burleigh, Mr. Thomas Burt, Lord Carlisle, Lord Hugh Cecil, Sir W. R. Cremer, Sir John Gorst, and Sir Frederick Pollock, with the constant advocate of Proportional Representation, Lord Courtney, as Chairman, and Lord Avebury as President. The aims of the Society are thus succinctly stated:

(1) To reproduce the opinions of the electors in Parliament and other public bodies in their true proportions. (2) To secure that the majority of electors shall rule and all considerable minorities shall be heard. (3) To give electors a wider freedom in the choice of representatives. (4) To give representatives greater independence from the financial and other pressure of small sections of constituents. (5) To ensure to parties representation by their ablest and most trusted members.

The methods advocated for the attainment of these ends are: (1) the union of single-member constituencies in larger two- or three-member constituencies; and (2) the adoption of some proportional voting system such as the one called the "Single Transferable Vote." This particular system is simply explained on the cover of the journal, but members have not to pledge themselves to it in preference to any other. As regards aim (2), we are totally indifferent whether the majority of the electors rule or no. Probably the most innocuous Government we are likely to have under existing circumstances would be a Government with a bare majority, because the various Opposition elements could combine to prevent it from passing all but the most necessary measures. We do desire the Government which would govern least. Without committing the Society to any such desires, it appears to us at least to aim at the curtailment of the powers both of fictitious majorities and of small combinations such as caucuses, and at sending to Parliament representatives who, independent of party prejudices, admittedly possess the best legislative faculties. In such aims it has our sympathy.

"In the Upper House [of Convocation] the Bishop of Hereford said that racing prophecies did much harm." A sentence like this is as satisfactory to the soul, as pleasing to the æsthetic sense, as the recurrence of the refrain in an old song, as the constantly repeated references of Mr. Micawber to the possibility of something turning up. It is so perfectly and exactly the sort of remark that a Bishop is expected to make. And the folly of it! It is as if a man had said, in the midst of the ravages of the Black Death, that colds in the head and corns on the toes did much harm. Both propositions may be (and doubtless are) quite true, and are also of a quite monstrous impertinence.

One understands, of course, that the Bishop was denouncing the gambling instinct. Well, if he desire to do this, let him leave the poor little gutter-snipe with his "bob" on this horse and his "half-dollar" on that alone; let him turn his attention to the great gambling engine of the Stock Exchange, to the accursed gang of company promoters whose trade it is to rob the widow and orphan, and the simple generally, of all they possess. The Turf is, no doubt, far from clean; but it is pure, shining honesty in comparison with "the House" and its purlieus. What a curious thing it is that, when a man utters his ostentatious profession of "Liberal" principles, he is pretty certain to be found doing his best to make the wretched lot of the poor still more grey, wretched, and unhappy. It is a fine sight, indeed, to see a stout man, a "convinced Liberal," rolling his Sunday evening's port over his tongue, and declaring that in the interests of morality the public-houses must be closed on Sundays.

A poor, rather squalid, interest, that of "all the winners"? Certainly; but what else have the Bishop's friends left the working man? The robber tyrannies of Henry VIII. and Edward VI. destroyed between them the old fair world in which the poor man once dwelt; his guilds, his churches, his social framework were all cast down together into ruin for the benefit of shopkeepers and Reformation parvenues. All the good things of life were taken from the poor man; he was given in exchange the whipping-post and the workhouse and the gallows. Then came Cromwell to rivet the chains, and last of all came industrialism, a gospel which showed that the only end of the poor was to earn a fortune for the rich. An enlightened piety declared that for a working man to play cricket on Sunday was a horrible offence; thus we have come to "All the winners and S.P." The Bishop of Hereford is, of course, a "broad-minded" man; it would be well if he could recognise that a poor man requires some excitement in his life. It is, of course, great fun to vote for "simple Bible teaching" and fraudulent naval contractors; but even such sports as these require occasional relief.

The performance given at the Shaftesbury by the Sicilian players in a Sicilian play is astonishing. Malìa is a melodrama taken from actual life; and is played with absolute realism. The effect is heightened and not diminished by the language which is used, and which few are in a position wholly to understand. The action is perfectly straightforward and easy to follow. It takes place in a village near Etna. The tragedy is of the simplest, and crudest, of passion and jealousy and revenge. It is the wedding day of Tana's sister, and Tana is waiting for the return of the bride and bridegroom. She is betrothed to Ninu, but is passionately in love with Cola, the man whom her sister has married. In the second act she gives herself to Cola; in the last act Ninu finds out from her, and, mad with anger, cut's Cola's throat with a razor. That is the story of many a melodrama; Signor Grasso and Signora Ferrau play in Malìa, however, so that the drama seems to be a hideous tranche de la vie rather than a melodrama.

We sympathise with the objects of the forthcoming International Art Congress for the development of drawing and Art teaching in so far as they are applicable to industries. We should be glad to see "a closer working contact between art schools and manufactories," and "art schools freely used as recruiting grounds for factories and workshops." We think it would be well for as many boys and girls as possible to be taught to see objects on the flat and to reproduce them, and to have their eyes trained to some extent to observe proportions of tones and colours. But we do not at all desire to see greater facilities provided in England for teaching Art unapplied. There are far too many "schools of art," in which the youth of England, and indeed their elders, with inherent capabilities for only the strictest mediocrity in attainment, are cruelly encouraged to start on the difficult and unremunerative profession of picture painting or book illustration. The result is not only a flood of worthless productions, but troops of wasted lives passed in very straitened circumstances. These lives might have been spent happily enough in the exercise of some craft in which a sense of beauty is useful, or in some trade or profession likely to bring in at least enough to secure comfort.

The Council of the Protestant Alliance has distinguished itself by passing a resolution protesting against the presence of the King at the requiem mass for the late King and Crown Prince of Portugal. The Alliance "humbly points out to his Majesty that, by Act of Parliament, 1689, 'all and every person and persons that is or are or shall be reconciled to or shall hold communion with the see or church of Rome shall be excluded, and be for ever incapable to inherit, possess, or enjoy the Crown and government of this realm, and the people of these realms shall be and are hereby absolved of their allegiance.'" The Protestant Alliance has a quaint idea of humility, and its expression of "astonishment and distress at his Majesty's attendance at a mass for the dead" appears to us as an unmitigated piece of impudence, founded on an almost inconceivable stupidity. Does the Protestant Alliance seriously suppose that the King, by performing the kindly and gracious act of attending the requiem mass of his dead friend and brother Sovereign, has become reconciled to or in communion with the Church of Rome? And are we to take it that the members of this alliance seriously intend to intimate that they consider themselves absolved of their allegiance? Truly one can say: Beati Mortui they shall escape the prayers of the Protestant Alliance.

BROWN-TAILED FILLY

BROWN-TAILED filly in the dim fir-wood,
Gallop away to me;
Along the fence and over the knoll,
And I will set you free.

She whinnied and pranced at my halloo,
And tossed her blinding mane.
She met me at the high-barred gate
In the narrow, mossy lane.

A home-spun halter wreathed her neck,
No saddle did I need;
She was a pony mountain-born,
And I of the moorland breed.

We trotted away through the brushwood copse,
And past the waterfall,
To the music of the missel thrush
And the kestrel's mating call.

We thundered on the level tracks,
Clearing rock and rut,
Until we reached a little tarn
And a lonely shepherd hut.

Brown-tailed filly, you can take your ease
In the meadows of my love;
I'll come to you when the night has gone,
And the morning star's above.

NOEL SOMERS.

LITERATURE

TENNYSON ON HIS ART

The Works of Tennyson. Annotated by the Author and edited by his Son. Vols. I. and II. (Macmillan, 4s. net per volume.)

Is it simply in reaction against the smooth Tennysonian tradition that our living writers of verse seem bent less on expressing their conceptions melodiously than on getting clear and powerful conceptions to express? There is scarce one of them, now that Mr. Watson is silent, whose work has not something of the harshness and perverseness of form and diction which at one time was the common attribute of immaturity. But if there is one fault from which, say, Mr. Sturge Moore, Mr. Hardy, or Mr. Doughty is free, it is manifestly the fault of immaturity. Nor can it fairly be said that our living poets are derivative. Mr. Doughty especially seems absolutely uninfluenced by any English model. By the side of the Victorian "Idylls of the King" the epic of "The Dawn in Britain" stands in magnificent alien majesty, dwarfing them as our Abbey dwarfs the petty vanity of a Royal procession at the opening of our egregious Parliament. The whole Tennysonian tradition is discredited. Yet it is still Beauty that is worshipped, still Truth that is sought, only we are no longer oppressed with scientific revelations, delicately distracted with doubts, blown to and fro with every wind of doctrine; we no longer argue in verse. Necessarily, the present is always influenced powerfully by the immediate past, but our poets have now, in plain words, left school; they are, in the true sense, living, with eyes for seeing clearly and directly, and a desire

To thrust a naked phrase
Like a lean knife between the ribs of Time.

But observe, this directness of vision and apprehension, though it finds an expression that is often defective in melody, has yet not led to the violence and uncouthness, the emphatic crudeness, which disfigure and discolour so much of Browning's work, itself reputed intensely "modern." There is a clearness, a distinction of manner, a simple earnestness for which you must look far and long in the work of the author of "Old Pictures in Florence."

An excellent test of poetry is, of course, parody. You may parody Mr. Doughty's epic with all imaginable ease by applying his vehement singularity of vocabulary and diction to a grotesque theme, but you cannot achieve more than a verbal parody. You cannot parody the essential poetry of "The Dawn in Britain," you cannot parody the essential poetry of Mr. Sturge Moore or the late Francis Thompson. Not so with Tennyson. Mr. Swinburne, who has parodied his own verse with a delightfully candid exactitude, has also parodied "The Higher Pantheism" absolutely, its idea as well as its form; and the fact that such parody is possible and perfect is in itself a sorrowful judgment of the intellectual and spiritual value of the original. You feel the grotesque inadequacy of Higher Pantheism itself as a creed or attitude of personal acceptance of the wonderful world. And that is the true parody which is at once criticism and laughter.

People are accustomed to speak of Tennyson as the poet of the later nineteenth century, and to bring for proof his stainless personal life, his religiousness, his patriotism, the purity and restraint of his love-poems, his metaphysical tendency. But these do not make a poet, any more than Browning's unique fondness for discussion in verse and surprising, often disconcerting, mental alertness, of themselves, make him a poet. All these may well be, we say; and yet, for depth of passion, for spiritual poignance, for profound apprehension of eternal things, we turn, among poets of our own time, not to Tennyson or Browning, but to Coventry Patmore, to Francis Thompson, to a contemporary and a successor. Their work is far smaller in bulk, lower in level; but what indefinable reflection is it of "unaccustomed brightness," of heavenliness, that we discover in the few pages of their best poems. It is only (to change the metaphor) when hearing this loftier music that we know verily the incomparable breath of song. And by reason of this inevitable preference, simply because of finding in these poets what we can never find in Tennyson, we are apt to regard the latter a little unjustly perhaps, and to disparage the serene excellence of his best work, the lavish perfection and dainty triumph of poems full of pure delight.

Well, the two volumes before us, commencing a new edition, as comely and desirable as heart could wish, give occasion, not simply for the foregoing desultory reflections, but for a recollection of the early Tennyson. And here is a singular thing. Take the first series of Mr. Swinburne's "Poems and Ballads"—you are conscious of a personality behind those astonishing melodies; that they are but a casual breath of sense-confounding genius, genius that unites and makes them definitely one, the authentic utterance of a dominant voice. But how vague and elusive is the personality of these early poems of Tennyson! They are, you feel, the result of a diffusion rather than an insuppressible outpouring of genius; a river has been dammed, has gently overflowed—and lo! the beauty of "Mariana" and "The Lady of Shalott." Who was that Tennyson, you ask, marking the vagueness of the waters?

The notes which, under the editorship of the poet's son, are now first printed, do not greatly help in the answering of that question, which remains a vain one, perhaps a foolish one. They are often trivial, explaining the obvious with emphatic precision. But they are valuable when Tennyson speaks of his own aim and position, demurring at the description of himself as "artist first, then poet":

I suppose I was nearer thirty than twenty before I was anything of an artist, and in my earliest teens I wrote an Epic between 5,000 and 6,000 verses, chiefly à la Scott, and full of battles, dealing, too, with sea and savage mountain scenery. I used to compose sixty or seventy lines all at once and shout them about the fields as I leapt over the hedges. I never felt so inspired, though of course the poem was not worth preserving, and into the fire it went.

Interesting, too, is the identification of certain places and incidents, and the recollection of journeys, visits, conversations, impressions, which give an autobiographical value to these notes. Some of the uncollected verse which is here printed has already appeared in the "Life," but it is mostly new to us. In an appendix is given the prize poem, "Timbuctoo," and another early piece, "The Hesperides," which was published and suppressed, and is now finally recovered. Be it frankly said that "The Hesperides" might well have remained suppressed; but it was very meet and right at length to reprint "Timbuctoo," the verse of which is unmistakably and prophetically Tennyson's in its fluency and frequent rapidity. You may remark already the technical felicity, the pure artistry, which seldom failed him, and seem as surely at his command in his early as in his later work. Poems he wrote, later, more grandiose in conception, loftier in dignity, but never aught more perfect in form than the two "Marianas" or "Morte D'Arthur."

In the midst of delightful notes on birds and woods and flowers, notes that are an added testimony to Tennyson's loving and cunning observation of Earth's infinities; in the midst of fragments of letters, references to the ever-welcome FitzGerald, to Carlyle and

Spedding, it is disconcerting to discover such a comment as this upon a line from "The Lotus Eaters":

Weary the wandering fields of barren foam.
Made by me on a voyage from Bordeaux to Dublin (1830). I saw a great creamy slope of sea on the horizon, rolling toward us. I often, as I say, chronicle on the spot, in four or five words or more, whatever strikes me as picturesque in nature.

And there are several notes here which reveal Tennyson's habit of carefully noting similes and fancies and transmuting them to verse years after. Every man to his taste; but we confess the frequent candid exemplification of a practice which we had only assigned to impoverished rhymsters seems to us a little curious. Poetry, said Wordsworth, takes its origin from emotion remembered in tranquillity. Poetry, says Tennyson, is an epithet remembered in tranquillity.

Let it not be thought, however, that notes of this sort abound. For the man who wants to know his Tennyson from roof to foundation, every stair, room, closet, window, door and tapestry—only, not expecting so much as the smell or shiver of a ghost, nor secret hiding-place, nor secret oratory, nor altar unknown—who wants to apprehend, if only in retrospect, the fascination of a commanding figure in modern letters, this edition, so far as we are able to consider it at present, is quite indispensable.

HOMER AGAIN

The Rise of the Greek Epic. By GILBERT MURRAY, LL.D., Fellow of New College, Oxford, and formerly Professor of Greek in the University of Glasgow. (Clarendon Press, 1907. 6s. net.)

THE book consists of ten lectures, constituting the Gardiner-Lane Course for 1907, delivered by Dr. Gilbert Murray at the invitation of Harvard University. Dr. Murray has taken the line which we should have expected from a scholar of his great learning, originality, and sense of literary beauty and style. His theme must always be fascinating, and, treated as it is in a bright, almost buoyant, fashion, must have been very attractive to his American audience.

His theory of the Homeric epic is that the poems do not represent the inventions of one man, but are the birth of the ever-shifting traditions of many generations. The early Ægean races, whose civilisation is attested by recent discoveries in Crete and Mycenæ, founded what may be called (having regard to the primitive scale of things) empires, which fell before successive waves of invasion from the North and North-west. This Ægean civilisation, according to the lecturer, was not Greek:

As a matter of fact, there were no Greeks in the world in those days, any more than there were Englishmen before the Angles came into Britain, or Frenchmen before the Franks invaded Gaul.

These Ægean empires, Troy, Mycenæ, Crete, were succeeded by a Dark Age lasting several centuries. The second city founded on the site of Troy dates as far back as 2000 B.C. The position of Troy must have been peculiarly favourable, for no less than six cities rose on her site. When Troy fell all Achæan Greece fell with her.

We find in the earliest ages of which we have any knowledge those influences which Dr. Murray calls "strongholds of the primitive beast in man." But it is a great mistake to regard these as Hellenic. On the contrary, Hellenism is always found waging an arduous war against human sacrifice, slavery, the subjection of women, unchastity, and cruelty. In support of his warning against such a conception of Hellenism, Dr. Murray takes instances chiefly from the "Iliad," because he believes the "Iliad" to have been the more "Homeric" of the two poems. The nameless redactor, to whom we owe so much, could not wipe out these blots in the pre-Hellenic lays which he moulded into the two epics, but he dwelt on them as little as possible, if he could not absolutely banish them. Neither incest nor the sin of Sodom and Gomorrah has any place in Homer. As to cruelty—there is no torture in the “Iliad.” There is a passage in Il. xiii., 572, where the sufferings of a wounded man are dwelt on, and he is compared to a bull struggling in a net. This comes from some older poet. But Homer adds, “so he struggled a little while, not at all long,” willing to spare the feelings of his hearers or readers. The very same phrase is used in reference to the hanging of the handmaidens in the “Odyssey,” xxii., 473. It is the most painful passage in Homer. But Dr. Murray remarks that the “Odyssey” is not so carefully expurgated as the “Iliad.” In Il. xxiii. it has to be recorded that twelve Trojans were sacrificed on the grave of Patroclus. But the poet averts his eyes from the scene. He gives it only a line and a half (175). The sacrifice of a bull occupies five lines, or ten, if we include the roasting (i., 458-467). Slavery is deplored much as Aristotle deplored it, as a necessary evil. “The day of enslavement robs a man of half his manhood.” Even Helen is not upbraided, and she testifies to the kindness of Priam. Everyone remembers the Andromache scene in the sixth book of the “Iliad.” But throughout that poem there is a suppression of female interest, due in Dr. Murray’s opinion to the prevalence in ancient times of a taboo on warriors on the war-path, taking the form of wearing the hair long, and especially of abstaining from familiar intercourse with women. However, we find on very ancient cups, seals, and pottery of various kinds long-haired men engaged in quite pacific pursuits. Then, how the poem is governed by the guardian goddesses Athena, Hera, Thetis, to whom Achilles brings all his troubles, proud as he is of that great “saga-figure,” Peleus, his father! The pre-Hellenic races were matriarchal. On this we would quote from Lecture II. an eloquent passage:

The influence of the patriarchate on religion is, of course, overpoweringly great. Protestant and Mahometan countries are entirely dominated by it. Yet if one tries to think for a moment of the vast volume of prayer that is steaming to heaven at any one hour from all corners of the world, I wonder if he will find any more intense, more human, more likely to achieve its end, than the supplication which rises from all parts of Southern and Eastern Europe, to that most ancient and many-named Madonna, who has sat throned upon her rocks and been a mother of many erring children from thousands of years before the coming of Christianity. And, further, if a man, who believes somehow in the reality and ultimate worth of some religion of gentleness or unselfishness, looks through the waste of nature to find some support for his faith, it is probably in the phenomena of motherhood that he will find it first and most strikingly.

Dr. Murray observes that in the early vases, while men are freely caricatured, women are always idealised.

The fourth lecture on the ancient book is full of interest and instruction. The earliest books were not meant to be read by the student. The master would read or declaim it to his disciple. So in the Middle Ages. Not even Merlin could penetrate to the innermost chambers of the mystic volume:

None could read the text, not even he,
And none could read the comment but himself.

Dr. Murray, developing the method of Prof. Seymour, whose book on the Homeric age was recently reviewed in THE ACADEMY, illustrates largely from the history of the Hebrew Scriptures, in which he appears to be profoundly learned. Taking up the subject again in the seventh lecture, he asks what would the Homeric bard have done with the Book of Judges, if he had tried to mould it into an epic poem? He would probably have chosen Gideon for his hero, and the Song of Deborah would come finely in. But Jephthah’s story and sacrifice is too good to be omitted. When the embassy comes to the men of Gilead, calling them to join Gideon, their spokesman will explain how their aged chieftain Jephthah cannot lead them in person, seeing that he is not yet purified from the slaying of his daughter. The whole story would then be told. If the dates did not quite tally, the poet would “ignore the dates and let the Muse have her way.” The tale of Samson could be told by some character like Nestor, Gideon’s father, Joash, or his armour-bearer, Purah. We hope Dr. Murray is meditating such an epic. He could do it well in English, ay, and in Greek, too. Homer could have borrowed from Hesiod or even from Eumelus. Masses of tradition were growing up side by side for centuries, and each could be quoted by the other, as easily as Judges by Samuel, or Samuel by Judges:

Both these books, if we are to believe the most careful Biblical scholars, had begun to exist by 900 B.C.; but “Judges” was only finished a little before B.C. 200, and “Samuel” not quite finished then. “Isaiah” is full of quotations from the “Second Book of Kings.” On the other hand, the “Second Book of Kings” quotes not merely “Isaiah,” but the much later “Jeremiah.” All the great books were growing up together, and passages could be repeated from any one to any other.

These books were evolved from primitive material, which was originally polytheistic. So through the dark ages which followed the Achæan period successive generations of poets “lived in the Epic Saga and by it and for it.” At last some nescio quis made a long poem out of them all. Such is Dr. Murray’s theory. But it is hard to believe in successive generations of inspired epic poets. It is still harder to believe in the unknown genius who, out of this mass of epic tradition, evolved the “Iliad” and the “Odyssey.” And our credulity is taxed to breaking point when we find that the unknown genius, who constructed out of disconnected epic saga “the greatest poem that ever sounded on the lips of man,” committed faults which show “a lack of originality or even of sincerity.” The subject of the “Iliad” is second-rate—a chieftain sulking over a personal slight. We find lack of finish, contradictions, loose linguistic forms, ready-made similes, which sometimes seem to be inserted in the wrong place. These are indeed serious faults, but they cannot dislodge the poems from their thrones. The marvellous hold which the poems have maintained on the human mind is due to that intensity of imagination which tells us how Helen let the tear down fall for her husband of yore and her city and her parents, and how the Trojan elders said “strangely like is she in face to the immortal goddesses.” So we hear for once, and once only, of the furious driving of Jehu, the son of Nimshi. But the intensity of imagination which lies behind the presentment of Helen and of Jehu makes thoughts about them live and vibrate thousands of years after their first utterance:

The driving of Jehu, the weeping face of Helen—these have behind them not the imagination of one great poet, but the accumulated emotion of the many successive generations who have heard and learned and themselves afresh recreated the old majesty and loveliness. . . . There is in them, as it were, the spiritual life-blood of a people.

We cannot believe in an epic saga treated throughout at least five centuries with “uniformity of splendour,” nor in the “diligent and reverent” person who gave the poems their present shape.

Dr. Murray holds broadly the Reichelian armour theory. But this hypothesis must be abandoned, until the objections brought forward against it by Mr. Andrew Lang and others are answered. They are founded on the evidence of ancient Minoan works of art, and are in our opinion unanswerable.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

THE POET OF "THE SEASONS"

James Thomson. By G. C. MACAULAY. (Macmillan and Co., Ltd., 2s. net.)

THE publication of Mr. Macaulay's excellent monograph may do something to revive an interest in one of the most neglected figures in the history of English literature. Few poets have suffered so severely at the hands of time as the author of "The Seasons," yet few have assisted more materially the development of English poetry.

Of Thomson's life, which would appear to have been a peculiarly uneventful one, but little is known, and we are indebted to Mr. Macaulay for the acquisition of some further details. Born at Ednam, in Roxburghshire, some time in the year 1700, Thomson was educated at Jedburgh Abbey, and afterwards at Edinburgh University. He came to London in 1725, where he appears to have made a living by the writing of poetry. In 1730 he travelled to France and Italy as tutor to Charles Richard Talbot. Subsequently he held the office of Secretary of Briefs, and in 1736 he purchased a house in Kew-foot Lane, Richmond, where he resided until his death in 1748. He seems to have been a man of convivial habits, somewhat shy and self-conscious, a generous friend and an entertaining companion. The traditional stories of his indolence of disposition rest on no very secure foundation, and are probably based upon the fact that he was a very late riser, and devoted the night to the labours of composition.

It must be conceded that his poetry exhibits some of the worst defects of his period. His constant use of inelegant Latinisms, his unrestrained tendency to periphrasis, his deliberate avoidance, on many occasions of simplicity of expression, his curious fondness for compound words—these remain as permanent blemishes on his finest work. It is scarcely possible to read a page of Thomson without alighting upon such words as "amusive," "exanimate," "successless," "irriguous," "inexhaustive," "constringent," and "luculent." His style is closely modelled on Milton's, but, while reproducing many of Milton's weaknesses, he lacks too often his sublimity.

These admissions having been made, however, it remains to be said that modern criticism is in danger of under-estimating the essential greatness of Thomson's poetry. More than any poet of the nineteenth century, he delivered us from the thrall of those artificial conventions which Pope and his immediate successors had sought to impose upon English verse. That Renaissance of Wonder which, at a later period, was to capture the imagination not only of England, but of civilised Europe, was due in no small degree to the assiduous labours of Thomson. While lacking the spiritual perception of Collins, he first conceived of the phenomena of Nature as objects worthy to inspire the pen of a great poet. He approaches his subject in a somewhat timorous attitude. He finds it necessary to apologise for singing of the life of beasts and birds, and of the seasons, with their infinite variety and golden pomp. He shelters himself behind the authority of the classical poets:

Nor ye who live
In luxury and ease, in pomp and pride,
Think these lost themes unworthy of your ear.
Such themes as these the rural Maro sung
To wide-imperial Rome, in the full height
Of elegance and taste, by Greece refined.

Even so, he is careful to diversify his narrative by the introduction of irrelevant and wearisome stories of the loves of country nymphs and swains. When, however, he abandons himself to the inspiration of the moment, he is seldom at fault. He wrote invariably with his eye on the object. He was a keen and accurate observer, and he described what he saw in language charged with a deep passion and intimate feeling for Nature. His poems abound with the happiest of descriptive touches. Such pictures as the snowstorm in "Winter" or the well-known angling scene in "Spring" have seldom been excelled. There is a minuteness of detail about such a passage as the following, which is singularly alien to the spirit of eighteenth-century verse:

When from the pallid sky the sun descends,
With many a spot, that o'er his glaring orb
Uncertain wanders, stained; red fiery streaks
Begin to flush around. The reeling clouds
Stagger with dizzy poise, as doubting yet
Which master to obey; while rising slow,
Blank, in the leaden-coloured east, the moon
Wears a wan circle round her blunted horns.

He has enriched our language with many a homely proverb:

Books are but formal dulness, tedious friends.

Delightful task! to rear the tender thought,
To teach the young idea how to shoot.

Or sighed, and looked unutterable things.

Loveliness
Needs not the foreign aid of ornament,
But is, when unadorned, adorned the most.

Where wisdom loves to dwell,
With friendship, peace, and contemplation joined.

There, studious, let me sit,
And hold high converse with the mighty dead—

these—and a dozen others might be quoted—have passed into the currency of familiar speech.

Thomson was not, perhaps, a great poet—though even this statement must be accepted with certain reservations—but his finest work entitles him to the respectful consideration of all genuine lovers of poetry, and even the Englishman who does not care for poetry at all should treasure with some affection the memory of the man who wrote "Rule Britannia!"

All students of literature will welcome Mr. Macaulay's volume, which is a model of scholarly research and discriminating criticism.

AN AMBITIOUS QUEST

From the Niger to the Nile. In two volumes. By LIEUTENANT BOYD ALEXANDER, Rifle Brigade.
• (Edward Arnold, 36s. net.)

THESE two handsome volumes contain the history of a great journey, and are profusely illustrated with very graphic and interesting photographs, while they include valuable maps. The tale is told very gracefully—with an artist's hand and a poet's mind. Lieutenant Boyd Alexander first conceived the idea of connecting up the two great rivers (the Niger and the Nile) by routes hitherto ill-explored—some sections of the journey having never been visited before—with Lake Chad as the middle objective. Our author confesses himself under the spell of the great desert lake: "Chad became the pendant that I aimed at, hanging on the links of our other enterprises," and so in 1903 an expedition was planned and gradually developed to undertake this very ambitious quest. Those that took part in it were: Lieut. Boyd Alexander, Rifle Brigade; Captain Claud Alexander, Scots Guards; Captain G. B. Gosling, Rifle Brigade; Mr. P. A. Talbot, B.A., and José Lopez, an invaluable interpreter.

The objects of the expedition were comprehensive, combining with pure exploration and geographical survey a very thorough study of all animal life, birds, beasts and fishes, and all the sport that could be had on the way. It did further include a most intelligent appreciation of the many peoples whose countries were passed through. The party were well equipped for their task. Mr. Talbot was an expert surveyor, and his work on the Liberian frontier had already attracted attention; Captain Claud Alexander, to a natural talent in the same field, had added the study which had gained him the diploma of the Royal Geographical Society (these were the two geographers, strictly speaking); Captain Gosling was a first-rate soldier and sportsman and a careful naturalist; Lieut. Boyd Alexander was a finished and enthusiastic ornithologist and a keen observer in all fields. He was also a valuable assistant in the map-making, and ended by doing many hundred miles of survey alone. José Lopez, an old henchman of the author's for many years, besides being a competent interpreter, was a skilled skinner and a fearless sportsman. Provided with two boats of beaten steel in sections, and an ample store of ammunition, medicines, provisions, and trade goods, the party were on the Niger on the 18th March, 1904, and then their work began.

It is a long journey through which we must follow our heroes, and it takes many pages to tell of it, but we do not think that the reader will tire much in his passage through them. By the rivers Niger, Benue, Gongola, and Yo, the boats reached Lake Chad on 13th October, 1904. Meanwhile, a wide detour was made to the north by the two geographers of the party, from Ibi on the Benue, over the Murchison range, by the Bam hills and Banchi to the mountains of the Kerri-Kerri cannibals, and so through the country of the comparatively civilised Fulani and Kanuri (the survey being here over eighty miles from north to south), into the Bornu country, and at last to Lake Chad. Kukawa, the last survey station, was reached on 8th December. But not reached, alas, before heavy toll had been taken of the expedition. On November 13th, and before he reached the lake, Captain Claud Alexander died at Maifoni from gastric enteritis, in the fort of the West African Frontier Force. His death is very pathetically described by his brother, who pays a generous tribute to Dr. Allan C. Parsons, who tended him, and to the late Lieut. Farmer, the commander of the fort, and writes the epitaph to a dear brother, brave soldier, and delightful friend.

The remaining three Englishmen spent Christmas Day of 1904 at Kaddai, on Lake Chad, and the contrast of their surroundings with those of an English Christmas evoked this graceful thought:

I doubt not the scene was more like the first Christmas of all on the night of the wonderful star, when Gabriel came to the shepherds and bade them be first on the road which led kings to Bethlehem.

The next day Mr. Talbot returned to England via the Benue and Niger, bearing with him the maps and over eight hundred birds. The months between Christmas and May, 1905, were spent in exploring Lake Chad. These explorers have established definitely the fact that Chad consists of two lakes separated by fifteen miles of reedy marsh. The northern half (lying north and south) is about fifty miles long and forty miles wide at its widest; the southern (lying north-east by south-west) is smaller, and nowhere more than thirty miles across. The lakes are fed by the rivers Yo on the north and Shari on the south, and the writer thinks that the action of these rivers has caused a silting up between the two halves, which has given the idea that the volume of water is decreasing. The water is sweet to drink, but nowhere is it found more than four feet deep, and generally it is much shallower, making navigation difficult. A graphic and picturesque impression of the lake is found on page 319, volume I.:

Imagine a large pool in a grass-grown plain, lying shallow, like water in the palm of an outstretched hand formed by the rivulets of the rain coming to rest in the gentle depression of an otherwise flat surface, and you have a miniature Lake Chad.

Then, the writer surrounds it with a colouring all his own. The Bedumas, the lake people, are as mysterious as the lake itself, and are very difficult to get in touch with. From the specimens brought home it has been found that most of the Chad fish are found in the Nile and the Niger—proving that geologically the high country between the two rivers is new. Lieut. Alexander's report of the climate is a distinctly good one—almost a white's man's land.

From Lake Chad the two remaining English explorers, with José Lopez, ascended the river Shari, passing the German fort of Kuseri on the south bank and the French fort Lamy on the north bank. We have here brought back to us the story of the occupation of this country, after many reverses, by those heroic Frenchmen, Lamy and Gentil, and the death of Lamy at the hands of Rabeh Lebeir—once the scourge of the Sahara—himself wounded and dying, and our author writes:

So died in greatness Rabeh, the slave boy, who, by his genius for war, had created a kingdom and carried it through a continent upon the points of his spears. (Vol. II., page 177.)

Four hundred miles of travel up the Shari brings us to the confluence of the two rivers, Bamingi and Gribingi. The former was quite unexplored, so it was ascended for one hundred and twenty miles and mapped; back to the confluence, and the Gribingi is ascended two hundred and ten miles to Fort Crampel—named after a French explorer who was murdered there. Following the course of a minor stream, and then a five-days' portage brings the party to the river Tomi, and so on October 28th, 1905, to the great river Ubangui—"the drinker-up of little rivers"—and the Ubangui soon enters the Belgian Congo country.

Christmas Day, 1905, is spent at a village near the Seltema rapids, with much meat and palm wine, and a theatrical performance by the natives of the expedition. Then we come to the real forest land of Central Africa—full of the "fear that rests on the forest like a spell"—the haunt of the mysterious Okapi. Chapter 29, volume II., records the long chase of all three sportsmen, Alexander, Gosling, and José, after this quarry, and José's final success—the first Okapi seen alive by a European. The Ubangui merges into the Welle, which is followed up to the Belgian fort of Niangara, nearly seven hundred miles from the place where the expedition joined the Ubangui, and here the second tragedy overtook them. On the 15th June, 1906, Captain G. B. Gosling died of blackwater fever. A second soldier's funeral is recorded, a second cross was raised, and our author was left alone to pass over the several hundreds of miles that lay between him and his goal. Undaunted, he alone explored the rivers Kimbali and Yei, mapping them both. The Yei flows into un-navigable sudd some fifty miles before it empties into the Bahr-el-Jebel, which river our author reached at Gaba Shambi, but with only one boat (one had been sold to a Belgian post as a ferry boat), which had navigated six thousand miles of water. There the goal was reached, for it is all plain sailing from Gaba Shambi, via Gondokoro to Khartoum. From Khartoum Lieut. Boyd Alexander returned to England, and his fifteen remaining West Coast boys went on a pilgrimage to Mecca.

The history of this long journey (full of daily detail, as such must be) is everywhere brightened by admirable accounts of the natives of the countries traversed—in which the origin of tribes has been traced as carefully as amusing anecdote has been stored—by vivid sporting tales, by pleasing sketches of scenery, and by impressions of animal life, and, above all, of bird life, which often are veritable prose poems. Never is our author more happy than when telling of his feathered friends. We would quote only one instance of many, the song of the red thrush (vol. I., page 202):

... first whispering notes like puffs of wind through green leaves, then a soft soliloquy of liquid sounds like the stream that runs below his singing bough, so sad that it is surely here beneath these waters that Narcissus lies. Quicker and louder mounts the song, to break in long notes that swoop and thrill with a passion that is all the sweet bird's own.

Sufficient practical result may be claimed for this expedition.

1.—The finished survey and map made in Northern Nigeria.

2.—The mapping of Lake Chad, and the definite knowledge that the lake is in two parts. It is interesting, too, to learn that Chad fish are almost identical with those of the Nile and Niger.

3.—The exploration and mapping of three rivers, of which the last explored, the river Yei, should, when developed, form a valuable waterway for the supply of the Soudan posts in the Bahr-el-Ghazal.

4.—A quite unusual natural history collection, containing many new specimens.

A hearty tribute is paid to the generous help given by the representatives of France, Germany and Belgium when the expedition passed through their territories. And in this connection it is worthy of remark that Lieut. Boyd Alexander speaks very highly of the administration of that part of the Belgian Congo territory through which he passed, and in which he spent a year. He reports generally a just and beneficent rule. Frequent inquiries from village chiefs failed to elicit one tale of "atrocities." His long discussion of the question is sufficiently critical to add value to the good impressions that he has formed and expressed.

We would make one suggestion: In a book of this character and length it would be convenient if dates were inserted occasionally in marginal notes. It is sometimes difficult to realise the passage of time.

CONTROVERSIAL HISTORY.

The Elizabethan Religious Settlement; a Study of Contemporary Documents. By HENRY NORBERT BIRT, O.S.B. (London: George Bell and Sons, 15s. net.)

WE are almost inclined to doubt whether it is possible for historians of the Reformation Settlement in England to adopt an impartial attitude, separate from controversy. It is true that the heated form of argument, which is so inimical to judicial reflection, is giving place to the method of historical investigation. But where religion is concerned few, even modern, writers seem able to form unbiassed estimates. Mere logomachies may be avoided. But deductions more or less controversial remain.

This seems to be the case with the book before us. It is a model of patient research, and represents hard work spread over many years. It is crammed full of references and quotations from historical documents, State papers, and chronicles. As the work of a scholar it is certainly a valuable book of reference for all students of the Reformation period. Our interest is sustained in reading this mass of evidence, chiefly because the personal element is largely predominant.

The actors on the Elizabethan religious stage stand before us. We can, as the author claims in his preface, "read the very words and sentiments of the people whose actions have had such a momentous influence on the religious life of England, and can form our own judgment."

True; but the author is careful in his endeavour to influence our judgment. Nor can we feel that he has succeeded in reaching that goal of Lord Acton's ideal writer of history, which he declares to have been his constant aim:

trying always to remember "that in history the historian has to disappear and leave the facts and ideas objectively to produce their own effect."

This is precisely what Dom Birt has failed to do. His book is full of his own inferences, surmises, and speculations as to the course of events.

Another passage in the preface must be cited:

Controversy I have studiously avoided, preferring that the actors in the religious changes of the period should themselves inform us of what they did, what they thought, what they desired. Comment in such cases is not only needless, it is impertinent in both senses of the word.

Here indeed is a counsel of perfection; less easy to follow than to give.

There are pages of comment in this book, which the author obviously considers both needful and pertinent to the cases discussed.

Nor is it unfair to him to say that his main object is to answer the vexed question, Did the English people for the most part accept the Reformation readily or was it forced upon them by Act of Parliament and penal threats?

We can hardly imagine a question more controversial at the present day, whether from the point of view of High Anglicans, of Protestants, or of Roman Catholics in England. Each party has its own object in proving the other wrong. Dom Birt admits that the conclusions of Bishop Creighton and Dr. Gee "ran completely counter to his own convictions." Naturally he opposes their views, and has written with a view of disproving a thesis already held. If the question at issue be the number of clergy who resigned their livings or were deprived for conscience' sake, we submit that, in the admitted defective state of the records, which are entirely wanting in many dioceses, it is quite impossible to obtain an absolute result.

The 192 of Bishop Creighton may be below the mark—we venture to think it is; but we find no proof on his own showing, for Dom Birt's estimate of 2,000, a number arrived at by much ingenious speculation, nor yet for his deliberate assertion, of several thousand beneficed clergy, who took the oath of supremacy, that:

it was self-interest alone, the dread of loss of liberty and goods that in the end prevailed against conscience and conviction,

And again, that:

if they finally acquiesced in the changes forced upon them it was due, not to conviction, but to a desire to escape molestation in purse, property and person.

Apart from any other criticism merited by such a wholesale charge of dishonesty (quite unsupported), it does not seem to us like a studied avoidance of controversy. Would any impartial student of the life of Bernard Gilpin allow that such motives could have influenced that fearless champion of the North and the clergy who followed his lead?

Having told us in the preface that "all serious students of Elizabethan history have discovered that Mr. Froude's pages are dangerous, because he wove a fancy of his own on the warp of facts," Dom Birt somewhat frivolously, if not inconsistently, quotes for his own purpose a notorious and highly controversial passage from Froude's history:

The Church of England was a limb lopped off from the Catholic trunk; it was cut away from the stream by which its vascular system had been fed; and the life of it, as an independent and corporate existence, was gone for ever.

This statement fits in exactly with Dom Birt's view expounded in pages of "commentary," that "Parliament was the founder of the Church of England, which is now not continuous with the pre-Reformation Church"; while, on the other hand, volumes have been written to prove the contrary.

In the last chapter, which deals with the attitude of the laity towards religious changes, Dom Birt cites a number of instances of men who were persecuted for conscience' sake—a fact which no one questions. But in considering the general feeling he is obviously puzzled by the extant list of over a thousand justices, spread over every county, who took the oath of supremacy, adding that:

any reader versed in the biographies of the period will be struck by the large number who are known to be loyal Catholics, and who later proved themselves to be so.

A list of their names would have given more force to this assertion. In any case, as he vaguely observes, the elasticity of their consciences "must remain a mystery."

We are not concerned with any decision as to whether Dom Birt has succeeded in proving his own case or disproving that of his religious opponents. It would be interesting to read a work compiled with like infinite pains on the other side—by, for example, so learned a scholar as Dr. Gee.

We are glad to note that this book is remarkably free from religious bitterness, though we detect perhaps a slight animus towards Mr. W. H. Hutton, who quite rightly maintains the integrity of St. John's College records in the case of Dr. Belsire; and we also feel that there is a strain of cleverly veiled satire on the position of the Anglican Church.

We consider that, in estimating the attitude of the people of England towards the Elizabethan settlement, Dom Birt has neglected two very important factors—the effects produced upon their minds, first by the previous polity of Henry VIII., and secondly, by the events of Mary's reign. None understood these things better than Elizabeth, who was peculiarly sensitive to the feeling of the country, and was therefore careful to maintain certain Catholic essentials while repudiating the supremacy of a foreign power.

We have insisted at some length on the divergence between the author's preface and his work, because in the preface he hoists a sort of literary white flag and lays ostentatious claim to an uncontroversial position, which, we are bound to say, he has not maintained. But we admit that it would be an Olympian feat for any ecclesiastical historian, whether Roman or Anglican, to discuss without bias or controversy the religious events of the sixteenth century.

ALSO SPRACH CAMPBELL

ONCE upon a time (in all probability) there was a very good man named Jesus. His sayings (we may assume for the sake of argument) are recorded with more or less accuracy in the Synoptic Gospels; the Gospel according to St. John may be disregarded as a literary device through which the writer expressed his religious views in narrative form. The Epistles of St. Paul represent an early corruption of the Teaching of Jesus, who would not have been able to understand their meaning. In any case, and in dealing with any of the books of the New Testament, we are at perfect liberty to reject every passage which conflicts with our particular standpoint; since if an apostle or evangelist record any saying or utter any teaching which is opposed to our private views it, of course, follows that the apostle and evangelist were wrong—unless, indeed, the peccant passage were inserted by some writer of the second century. Still, as Liberal Theologians, we may be generous and grant, as premised, that a young man named Jesus did exist, and that considerable traces of His teaching are to be found in the New Testament. His doctrine was a very simple one: its purpose was to abolish every kind of social wrong and oppression and establish society on a just basis: this is the meaning of the phrase, "the Kingdom of Heaven." It is doubtful whether Jesus Himself altogether comprehended the nature of His mission; He wavered probably between the various Messianic ideas current in His day. There is no proof that He transcended the level of His time in His religious beliefs; many of His maxims are perfectly impossible for present-day civilization; He paints no pictures of the future at all comparable to Mr. Bellamy's "Looking Backward" or Mr. H. G. Wells's "Modern Utopia"; His social ethics are inchoate—they leave whole regions of modern life untouched. St. Paul mixed the simple ethics of Jesus with Græco-Jewish superstitions—a capital example of this admixture is to be found in the fifteenth chapter of the Epistle to the Corinthians—"for as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive," etc. The unknown author of "that strange book called Revelation" was subject to the like failing; still he follows precisely the same ideal as that of Rousseau and Mazzini, though he was perhaps more pious and mystical. The first disciples had no communistic theory behind their action; they neither approved nor disapproved of private property; what moved them was simply a feeling of comradeship and their joyful anticipation of the good time (on earth) coming. Other-worldism had no place in primitive Christianity. We need not trouble about any traces of "ecclesiastical Christianity" because "it does not relate itself to the pressing needs of the age, and it is an insult to the intelligence."

And the conclusion of the whole matter is that modern Socialism is simply the religion of Jesus making its appeal to modern needs with its original end in view. If the total income of England were fairly divided up and the Divorce Laws made more "liberal," the "Kingdom of Heaven" would be established in England; and the establishment of this "Kingdom of Heaven"—that is, of pleasant social conditions all round—was precisely and exactly the object of primitive Christianity. Such, in very brief but not (I think) unfair analysis, is the substance of Mr. R. J. Campbell's book called "Christianity and the Social Order" (Chapman & Hall). Over the latter portion of the work, which simply treats in detail of the methods of attaining the end, "the communal ownership and administration of the sources of wealth," I have passed very lightly, since Socialism is a much discussed subject which may be studied in many handbooks and in many articles, and, so far as one can see, Mr. Campbell brings no very new light to the consideration of this difficult question.

But before examining the precise value of the Campbellian "Religion," it may be interesting to note one or two little points that seem to require some explanation. In the first place Mr. Campbell is, I fancy, mistaken in thinking that those English Christians who do go to church simply do so because in England there is no café life, and so the church has become a "club or public-house to which people must go in order to meet one another and enjoy one another's company." In Germany they have beer-gardens, so the church is not required, and therefore people do not go to church. Now this, we may say very mildly, is not true. No doubt the "institutional" meeting-house, the place where under a thin and watery pretence of religion "young men and maidens" go to meet each other, to listen to mostly indifferent music, to politicians on the stump, to vague discourses from the pastor, is the "church" that Mr. Campbell has in his mind; but he may be very seriously assured that Catholic Christians do not go to Mass for the sake of social opportunities. They go to Mass in search of that unseen "Kingdom of Heaven" which is quite independent of economic conditions and communised sources of wealth. Truly does Mr. Campbell say that Baxter, Bunyan, and Wesley would be surprised if they could see an "institutional church" of to-day; Wesley, one may suppose, did foresee something of what was to come to pass when he uttered his famous prophecy as to the doom that would fall on the Wesleyans if they separated themselves from the Church. And another point: Mr. Campbell says, very frankly, that he means to treat the Bible precisely as he should treat Froissart or the Saxon Chronicle. This is very well, though I had always understood that both Froissart and the Chronicle contained many true statements; but a few pages farther on the author quotes from Isaiah—"And the wolf shall dwell with the lamb," etc. And he adds:

This was really a beautiful dream, and something more than a dream; it is still the world's hope. The wonderful thing is that an Israelitish prophet should have seen this ideal so clearly nearly three millenniums ago, and that all through the later history of the people to whom he belonged this ideal should have been continuously presented by men of vision and faith.

And then of another passage he says:

This is all the more remarkable when we remember that it was written long before the great captivity. . . . It indicates an exalted belief in the coming of a universal divine order.

But then it seems a little stupid to treat a book which contains such wonderful visions as if it were Froissart or the Saxon Chronicle, neither of which works has any pretensions to millennial foresight. There are capital things in Euclid and the Latin Grammar, and some profound truths in the Multiplication Table, but it would hardly do to sit down to criticise Keats in the spirit with which we approach these admirable works of science.

Then Mr. Campbell is rather puzzling in his treatment of the growth of the Messianic idea amongst the Jews. He says that the Kingdom of God was regarded as simply:

a revival of the ancient Jewish monarchy, as they pictured it coupled with the additional advantage of affording to the oppressed Jews the satisfaction of triumphing to the fullest degree over every foreigner, but especially those who had ever done them any mischief. . . . In its main features it was, therefore, purely political and materialistic.

And then the author goes on to say that the Book of Daniel is the most important representative of this Messianic ideal; and the following passage is quoted:

I saw in the night visions, and behold there came with the clouds of heaven one like unto a Son of Man, and He came even to the Ancient of Days, and they brought Him near before Him. And there was given Him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all the peoples, nations, and languages should serve Him: His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and His kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.

One could hardly, with much seeking out, find an ideal less "narrow," "political," or "materialistic" than this. It is evident that Mr. Campbell does not recognise in the words "dominion," "glory," and "kingdom," the Sephiroth, Netzach, Hod, and Malkuth. If Mr. Campbell were forced to quote this passage, surely the better way would have been to stigmatise it as evidently an interpolation of a much later age. The author's discovery that "Messiah" means "Sent-one" (not "Anointed-one") will doubtless prove interesting to Hebrew scholars.

I do not much care for Mr. Campbell's improved version of certain words uttered by St. John the Baptist (if we may be allowed to believe that any single person in the Old or New Testaments ever existed, and if we may grant also that any single utterance of any such person is ever reported correctly). In "archaic English," as Mr. Campbell calls it, the passage stands thus:

Ye offspring of vipers, who warned you to flee from the wrath to come. . . . And even now is the axe laid to the root of the trees; every tree, therefore, that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire. . . . And He will gather His wheat into the garner, but the chaff He will burn up with unquenchable fire.

In Campbellese these sentences appear as:

You venomous deceivers! How have you found out that a social revolution is at hand? I suppose you want to make sure of being on the safe side. . . . You are right to be apprehensive, for the reign of hypocrisy and oppression is well-nigh over; the rotten trees will soon be hewn down and consumed. . . . Only the grain will be garnered: the chaff will be burned up in the flame of His judgment. All shams and tyrannies will have to go, and the world will make a fresh start.

It is charming English, of course, but is not the translation of "wrath to come" by "social revolution" rather free? Then there is nothing about "tyrannies" in the original; we could almost say that Mr. Campbell was behaving in the reprehensible fashion of those "interpolators" who have given so much trouble to the "Higher" Critics. And, again, the author in pointing out that there is no "other-worldism" in St. John the Baptist—how can there be if the "wrath to come" is translated into "social revolution"?—merely "social ethics" rendered necessary by "the manners of the time, and the dual oppression of foreign rule and materialistic ecclesiasticism," adds in his bright way:

John the Baptist was exactly the kind of man who would have led the attack on the Bastille, or who would nowadays be found addressing a Labour demonstration in Hyde Park.

But surely not! For in the previous page Mr. Campbell quotes the Great Precursor to this effect:

And the soldiers also asked Him, saying: "And we, what must we do?" And He said unto them: "Do violence to no man, neither exact anything wrongfully; and be content with your wages."

Clearly this would never do at a Labour demonstration. St. John—the Campbellian St. John—would have said, "Massacre your officers, sack the Governor's palace, and divide up the regimental chest. Then strike for a minimum wage of three denariuses a day, and keep a sharp look-out for blacklegs. If you find them let them cop it."

There is some difficulty, too, in Mr. Campbell's views as to the teaching of the Christ:

On the whole, to be honest, I feel we must admit that there is very little, if anything, which differentiates the essential teaching of Jesus from that of the other teachers of His time beyond the fact that it was simple and clear and went straight to the root of the matter in hand.

And at the end of the paragraph is quoted the Evangelical saying:

Ye have heard that it was said: "Thou shalt love thy neighbour and hate thine enemy." But I say unto you, love your enemies, and pray for them that persecute you.

"Nothing," comments Mr. Campbell, "could be much more completely in contrast with the mood of the time than this particular utterance." So, after all, there does seem something which differentiates the teaching of the Christ from the "mood of the time."

So also with the treatment of the parable concerning the Judgment of the Sheep and the Goats. In the first place we are told that there "is no need to suppose that Jesus actually uttered these words as they now stand; in fact, it is quite probable that He did not, for there is a universalism about them which did not find a place in primitive Christian teaching"—therefore the parable must have been composed after the fall of Jerusalem. And then on the very next page, speaking of the qualification for the Kingdom of Heaven required by the parable, Mr. Campbell says:

That qualification was goodness . . . a goodness which showed itself in works of mercy and compassion to suffering human kind. It is here that I seem to hear the voice of Jesus. Not a word about belief; not a word about correctness of creed:

not a word about piety; not a word even about the duty of confessing the Master Himself. . . . But the central truth of the parable, the truth concerning the genuine test of righteousness, was not what everybody thought; and it is, therefore, not unreasonable to infer that this is the part of the parable in which we have the teaching most characteristic of Jesus.

So, according to Mr. Campbell, in the first place there is nothing to differentiate the teaching of the Christ from the ordinary teaching of the time; and secondly, nothing could be more in contrast with the teaching of the time than the words of Jesus; and thirdly, the Parable of Judgment cannot be attributed to Jesus because of its universal and catholic teaching; and fourthly, in virtue of this very teaching none but Jesus could have uttered it. It is certainly difficult, this Campbellian process.

On page 83 we have this declaration:

He laid down no principles for the guidance of His followers in their social relationships, marriage, the family, and citizenship.

On page 84 we read:

This view as to the future co-existed in His mind with strong and definite opinions concerning the sacredness of the marriage bond under present conditions.

It is not every controversial writer who is kind enough to confute himself page by page, paragraph by paragraph; it need scarcely be said that it would be difficult to imagine a more definitely false statement than that contained in the former of these two sentences. By precept or by example, or by precept and example, the Christ most fully directed His followers on their social relationships, marriage, the family, and citizenship.

I have already mentioned Mr. Campbell's citation of St. Paul's wonderful teaching as to death and immortality; to the preacher of the City Temple this great mystic doctrine is an example of Græco-Jewish superstition. He compares with it a passage from the Epistle to the Romans: "He that raised up Christ Jesus from the dead shall quicken also your mortal bodies through His spirit that dwelleth in you," and he says:

Here the assertion is that the followers of Jesus are to be made immortal, not by dying and going to some distant heaven, but by having their physical bodies transformed in such a way that they will never again be subject to death.

It would appear that Mr. Campbell has forgotten the rather important fact that St. Paul lays very special stress on the necessity of death as a precedent to immortality—"that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die."

Mr. Campbell states that all the hopes of the "first Christians" were bound up with the restoration of the Jewish nationality and the removal of the foreign yoke. All their hopes? The writer has been at pains to dwell on the great visions of the early prophets surpassing all the bonds of nations, he has dwelt on the theosophy of Philo as importing new and transcendental elements into the Jewish religion, he has asserted that no earthly politics entered into the mind of the Christ; and he quietly declares that the disciples had no hopes but purely national ones. "They had no other conception," he says, "of the Kingdom of God." No other conception! And they had seen the works of the Christ, they had heard the words of the Christ (e.g., the parable of the Mustard Seed), they had seen the Crucifixion of the Christ, and (even according to Mr. Campbell) they had received certain assurances that Christ had overcome death. And in spite of these things the Kingdom of God was to them simply and solely a sort of glorified Home Rule for Jewry! It is a characteristic of Mr. Campbell to assert that St. Paul opposed compulsory circumcision because he knew that the Gentiles would not stand such a thing for a moment; it is characteristic of Mr. Campbell to describe the Benedictus as "a sort of 'Marseillaise' with a religious flavour." I hardly think I need trouble the readers of THE ACADEMY with any more quotations. I cannot help calling their attention to two finely contrasted passages. One declares that the early Christians (in common with their Master) were utterly devoid of any economic system, of any systematic ethics, of any teaching about property, public or private, of any vestiges of social order or regulation; many of the teachings of the Christ are pronounced, indeed, to be utterly impossible in the light of modern civilisation. And yet we are assured on another page that if the world had been ready for the Gospel of the early Christians the result would have been the rise of a world-State in which the dream of present-day Socialism would have received fulfilment. I think the readers of THE ACADEMY are in a position to judge of the qualifications of the City Temple preacher for the task of restoring all things; they will be able to esteem at its right value the "critical" faculties of a gentleman whose self-contradictions are well-nigh as numerous as are the pages of his book. Mr. Campbell is not an author who demands refutation; he refutes himself from the beginning to the end of this melancholy volume.

It is indeed strange how far a man may go away from God. Those who know, know that Religion has but one aim, and that aim is called the Union; the return to a home from which man has strayed, the voyage in vastissimum pelagus Divinitatis, the realisation of all dreams, the fulfilment of all desire, the quenching of all thirst, the reward that is every pleasure and delight. The mortal life is a part of this process of return to the "Abiding City," to the urbs in portu satis tuto, and the method of the way is the method of Love as it is exposed in Holy Writ and in the writings and adventures of the Saints. But there is but one end and that is God, and all the ways and the works of this life are but passages to the Eternal. Mr. Campbell has some references to sin, to the futility of the sense of sin and failure which would be offensive in any other writer, which, for certain reasons, are harmless enough when signed by him. But by them we can measure his deep ignorance of all the things of the Spirit; his nescience of all that belongs to the Eternal Rest, where there are pleasures for evermore. For what man, who is sane, has not experienced in temporals the feeling which is analogous to the sense of sin—what man, I say, of sound mind has not perceived again and again how wretchedly he has fallen short in his work of the common day? We all know of what make and of what value is the artist—painter, poet, musician, or what not—who is perfectly satisfied with his own work; and those who are true artists know well that the masterpiece which is lauded as a great achievement is in truth, judged by the high and austere standard of art, but a miserable failure at bottom, but a mean and sorry copy in thick clay of the image in living fire that was beheld for a moment's space. And if this be so in things temporal, how infinitely more true it is in the everlasting world of spiritual realities. If the painting and the poem are but approximations—grey roses for scarlet roses, as Henry Harland said so well—what, then, of the magnum opus of the soul, of the endeavour of mortal imperfection to be re-united to immortal perfection? Mr. Campbell laughs at the old preacher who would persist, after all argument, in declaring himself a sinner; for, as Mr. Campbell says, he was really an estimable man. An estimable man! The old voice cried:

Quid sum miser tunc dicturus?
Quem patronum rogaturus?
Cum vix justus sit securus.

It is surely not necessary for me to overset, sentence by sentence, absurdity by absurdity, the Campbellian dogmas as given at the beginning of this article; as well might one dispute with a blind man concerning the colours of a painting.

I have said nothing, or next to nothing, on the question of Socialism, which may be or may not be a good economic remedy for certain economic evils. To judge of Socialism is not my affair, in this place at all events. But one opinion, latent in all the book, is demonstrably false, that corporal ease, freedom from care, possession of earthly goods will in themselves make men blest or even moderately happy. This opinion is directly opposed to the teaching of the Christ Himself; He bids His followers to take no care or trouble at all about any earthly possessions whatsoever, for to Him and to His Disciples at first, to the Blessed St. Francis and his companions in the Middle Ages, to all the saints of all ages poverty was desirable, wealth a curse. Mr. Campbell, I think, makes this an example of the inchoate ethics and impossible commands of early Christianity, while he shows how everybody ought to have £5 a week or £3 a week or whatever the sum may be. It is odd that all experience shows the folly of this Regnum Cælorum on two hundred and fifty a year; how all history shows that greatness may arise from the gutter, how the mere observation of a keen novelist has depicted to us a land where everybody has a sufficiency, where nearly everybody is sunken beneath the beasts in utter vileness, in every hideous cruelty and abomination. The French peasant proprietor is one of the most prosperous of men; his picture has been drawn (not by an ecclesiastic) in La Terre.

The first paragraphs of Mr. Campbell's book deal with the fact that the teaching of "the Church" does not commend itself to the modern mind. The teaching of the Christ failed to commend itself to the Jewish mind, as Calvary witnessed, nor was the Roman mind pleased with it, witness the torches of Nero. So it is just possible that the modern mind may also be mistaken. There are certain matters on which "most votes" do not carry the day.

I do not care to give the reasons which make me dismiss this book as quite inoffensive; and this in spite of much that might lead the casual reader to the contrary opinion.

ARTHUR MACHEN.

THE MATTER OF ROMANCE

It has been said that the thoughts of youth are long thoughts, but it would be no less true to say that the thoughts of childhood are eternity. Certain impressions or experiences detach themselves from their surroundings, and from henceforth they make up the whole of life. They form the sole abiding realities in a world of transient shadows. For the child is incapable of forgetfulness. He has seen a vision of a land beyond the sunset, with pleasant meadows and the tapering spires of great cathedrals, and, though he has set out times without number on that mysterious quest, he has never so much as reached the city walls. The road is very long, and he is very weary, and to-morrow is just the same as to-day, and his heart grows hard and hungry at the non-fulfilment of its splendid promises.

I do not know how old I was when first I became aware of the existence of the Magic Inn. I remember that it haunted me in dreams, and dogged every moment of my waking thoughts. It confronted me in the pages of the books I read. Marryat knew it well, and when I read "Treasure Island," I discovered that Stevenson, too, had been there. I knew that I should find it one day, but the time seemed very long. It would be quite easy to recognise. Outside there was a long, low trestle round which, in the summer afternoons, bearded and weather-beaten sailors from the world's great ports sat quaffing beer from incredibly large mugs. These mugs were replenished from time to time by the landlord's daughter—I think her name was Sally—a tall, strapping wench of eighteen, with pearl-white teeth and dangerously blue eyes. Her father, a man of rubicund face and portly presence, stood invariably in the doorway, surveying the scene with a smiling satisfaction. Inside—if you could get inside—the walls were hung with the pictures of old sea fights. The floor was strewn with sawdust, and, in one corner of the bar, there was a cuckoo clock which wouldn't go. But the chief object of interest was a small and stuffy parlour, the door of which opened into the outer bar. Strange, sinister-looking men would occasionally pass into this parlour, and remain closeted there for hours. They carried themselves jauntily, and walked with an exaggerated swagger. This affected nonchalance, however, did not deceive me, for I knew in that parlour plots were hatched and piracies arranged which would set the blood of honest, law-abiding folk pulsating with horror. Occasionally disputes would arise, words gave place to blows, and deeds were done which it were better not to name. The inn kept its secrets well.

I have set all this down in order to tell you that, after many years, I did actually discover the inn. Circumstances had sent me to Belfast, but it was a pure whim which set me prowling round the docks one August evening some three or four years ago. There had been rain earlier in the day—no unusual occurrence in Belfast—and, in the radiant splendour of the afterglow, the grim and sordid town was transformed into a city of dreams. The tall masts of the ships in the river loomed darkly against the background of a golden sunset. The air was full of the salt, pungent odour of shipping. Turning aside into a mean and narrow street, I found—the Magic Inn.

I knew it at once. It was a small and ill-ventilated tavern with a low, gabled roof. I had no sooner entered the door than my eye fell on the cuckoo clock. There were the long remembered prints on the wall, and, just behind the bar, its door invitingly ajar, I found (believe me) the fateful parlour. The tall bearded seamen of my boyhood's dreams jested, swore, and drank heavily, and the mingled murmur of many tongues arose from the bar like an incantation. My first sensation was one of incredulity. The whole thing seemed too amazingly real to be quite true. Then, in a flash, I understood. I had not been deceived, after all. Those old sea-writers had spoken the truth. Life, it appeared, was very true to Marryat, and the Spirit of Romance still lingered in the slums of an Irish manufacturing town.

Perhaps no word in the English language has been put to such strange and alien uses as this word "Romance." It meant ten years ago, in the realm of fiction, impossible imitations of Dumas. And always it is associated with the drawn sword, with the pomp and pageantry of a bygone age, with the pleasures of princes and the gallantries of men-at-arms. It is opposed to realism by a false antithesis, as though the world we know were as shabby and sordid as our minor novelists would have us believe. The pessimistic philosophy of the nineteenth century has much to answer for, and among its most fatal bequests is this conception of a life from which all heroism and nobility of character have vanished, as the only reality. Happily, the common people have remained untainted by this most devastating of heresies. For them life is still rich with unimagined possibilities, women are still worth loving, and honour is still something more than a name.

We need to-day a writer who shall re-create for us the world in which we live. Among the great Victorian novelists the name of Dickens stands out proudly pre-eminent as an interpreter of the lives of the poor. He captured for Romance vast tracts of hitherto unexplored territory. He gave us a new standard of heroism. He found it in the populous life of cities, in grey suburbs and squalid slums, and among small shopkeepers, domestic servants, and elderly gentlemen with bald heads and spectacles. But he was curiously lacking in spiritual insight, and in the deeper knowledge of the soul. It was not given to him to behold:

With unaffrighted eyes
The horrors of the deep
And terrors of the skies.

He never succeeded in freeing himself from the baleful influence of a cramping and narrowing materialism, and he was apt to mistake the Crystal Palace for the Kingdom of Heaven.

He has had many imitators, but no successor. Mr. Pett Ridge has more than once come very near to achieving greatness, but he views life through the haze of a false sentimentalism. Mr. Jacobs, who is content to be merely amusing, works within self-imposed limitations of the narrowest order. Mr. H. G. Wells, in "The Wheels of Chance," and, later, in "Love and Mr. Lewisham," was permitted a distant glimpse of the Promised Land, but he has abandoned himself to sociological vanities and futile speculations. In the meanwhile, there is Mr. Arthur Machen, who, forsaking the somewhat gloomy macabrisms of his earlier work, has given us at least one study of suburban life, perfect alike in its sympathy and intuition. He alone of modern novelists (it seems to me) possesses the needful qualifications of the true romanticist, for he alone has a direct vision of great spiritual forces sustaining and transforming the lives of men.

It may be that when we have tired of ransacking the centuries and of inventing new kingdoms, we shall find at our own doors the object of our quest. After all, Richmond is nearer than Ruritania.

T. MICHAEL POPE.

FEBRUARY FILL-DYKE

FEBRUARY has a good deal of the character of Black Janiveer, and often sets forth to fill his dyke with the chill of melting snow. Yet these early months are full of colour. The cold days are wonderfully clear. The skies are often high and blue at noon, stormily golden at sunset. The high downs have amethyst shadows and stretch round cinnamon and purple woods. And the fields break, tentatively, into the light green of winter wheat.

Sometimes the skies pearl over, and become like the wet, grey lining of a sea-shell. The wind blows strong and free, bringing the breath of frozen ground with it. Then the clouds seem to close down upon the earth, and the hailstones pelt and spring upon the lawn, while the sparrows crowd and scuffle in the ivy.

It was Richard Jefferies who, when he had been long in city pent, had so strong a craving for the sea that the feeling would come on him like a great hunger. He wanted the wind in his face and a wide untrammelled sky. A sky not cut into strips and ribbons by the town. And when this longing was upon him he had to get to these things, though he walked all the way to reach them.

For such another spirit as his there is beauty in these February days. The garden is still for the eye of faith, yet the slow year is stirring.

Tits sound their insistent and see-saw notes, and here and there a thrush starts singing:

Did he do it? Did he do it?
Come and see! Come and see!
Cherry sweet, cherry sweet,
Knee-deep, knee-deep,
Pity you, pity you,
To me! To me! To me!

His voice rings out clearer for the winter stillness that is round him, as he sits in the bare tree.

On the uplands the mild faces of plough-horses turn in the furrow of their work. The air has the breath of the turned sod that shines from the weight of the plough-share. There are the faint yellow bents of last year's grass and the clean flint in the furrow.

And the plough draws, with leisurely creak and rattle, with its wake of walking rooks, towards the Down's low horizon, where the windy skies meet the grey-green fields and the stacks stand against the sky-line.

PAMELA TENNANT.

THE INTERNATIONAL

ALTHOUGH the present collection of works at the New Gallery forms only its eighth exhibition, the International Society appears to be nearing the condition of the young man d'un si beau passé. Critics still treat it tenderly for the sake of the past, and whisper among themselves their disappointment at its present state, their forebodings for its future. We tread on tip-toe through its galleries as if we were approaching the sick-bed of one we loved, and we scarcely dare to admit to ourselves our real opinion of its critical condition. We remember so well the first-coming of the International, a ministry of all the talents for the governance of Art. But now the cabinet of the elect has been torn to pieces by death and internal dissension; prominent members have resigned, and from the residue a provisional government has been formed actuated by the party spirit which has led to the undoing of so many other bodies. For the old liberal, disinterested policy a narrower conservatism has been substituted, and this policy, though successful in keeping outside many of the younger artists of talent, fails to keep within many of the older and more respected members.

What does the eighth exhibition represent? It cannot claim to reveal the flower of contemporary British painting, nor does it adequately represent the original strength of the society. Without dwelling on the loss the International has sustained by the secession of such painters as Messrs. Austen Brown, Maurice Greiffenhagen, George Henry, Bertram Priestman, etc., it is impossible to refrain from commenting on the curious fact that to the present exhibition no works are sent by Sir James Guthrie and Mr. Crawhall, nor any one from Messrs. D. Y. Cameron, David Gauld, E. A. Hornel, Augustus John, W. Y. MacGregor, Harrington Mann, Gerald Moira, James Pryde and Macaulay Stevenson. It is inconceivable that none of these should have had in his studio a single work ready and fit for showing, and the only possible deduction is that, for one reason or another, some of them did not desire to participate in this exhibition. Matters are not greatly improved when we turn from home to foreign affairs. Among the French supporters of the society this year we miss Aman Jean, Besnard, Boldini, Chahine, Hellew, and Carolus-Duran; among the Dutch, Bauer, Breittner, and Mesdag; among the Spanish, Anglada and Zuloaga; among the German, Dill, Hans van Bartels, Franz von Stuck, Hans Thoma and Von Uhde; among the American, Chase and Timothy Cole. If these artists could not be prevailed upon to contribute, surely some attempt might have been made to atone for their absence by inviting the co-operation of some of the many other distinguished artists who live in these countries.

But the eighth exhibition shows little that is new to take the place of the missing, apart from the large decorative oil paintings of M. Maurice Denis, whose art, obviously inspired by that of Mr. Walter Crane, is, like his, more enjoyable translated into tapestry than in the hard colours of the original. In the same North Room are a charming trio of still-life studies—Storm van Gravesand's "Vieux Delft" (195), Vuillard's "Sur le Sofa" (194), and Sauter's "The Little Bouquet" (191); good landscapes by the late Herbert Goodall (218-20), Frank Mura (229, 232), Grosvenor Thomas (234), and Alexander Jamieson (186); two original interiors by Simon Bussy (211) and Vallotton (228); Carrière's huge "Theatre de Belleville" (242)—less intimate and haunting than his smaller portraits and renderings of maternity—and good portraits by Morley Fletcher (199), Mancini (237), and William Nicholson (225). Mr. Nicholson is, perhaps, better represented than any other exhibitor, and his "The Costumiers" (162), in the West Room, is excellent as a decorative rendering of a fragment of modern life, though it might have been carried further and pitched in a rather higher key of colour. In this room also are two of the most delightful exhibits—Mr. Sauter's exquisitely delicate "Frost and Mist" (169), with its subtle symphony of whites, and Mr. Joseph Oppenheimer's joyous "A Spring Morning" (165), with its lyrical rendering of light streaming through a window and glorifying an ordinary interior. Mr. H. Mann Livens, an accomplished painter in water-colours, shows a large and well-painted tea-table group, "To-Day" (146), in oils; Mr. Ricketts's "Resurrection" (141) has the dramatic and designing qualities we expect from him, but is not the complete masterpiece we still await. M. Simon's "Old Lady" (168), and M. Cottet's "Lucien Simon" (137), and Mr. C. H. Shannon's "Miss Kathleen Bruce" (177), are the best of the portraits, and H. S. Teed (125) and Oliver Hall (126) are responsible for the best of the landscapes.

The South Room, as usual, is chiefly devoted to black-and-white. Lithographs are much in evidence from E. J. Sullivan, A. J. Hartrick, and Belleroche. Pastels come in numbers from the clever but diabolic Louis Legrand, the accomplished and more soothing Henry Muhrmann; and there are good water-colours from Mann Livens, Anning Bell (on silk), and W. W. Russell. Scattered throughout the rooms are examples, mostly early, of the French impressionist masters, among which Monet's "Fruits" (172) is the most perfect; and in the Central Hall is a representative group of works by the late Jules Dalou. This loan collection is the outstanding feature of the exhibition. Dalou's vigorous and expressive modelling reduces to insignificance the majority of the remaining exhibits in this section, and unmasks elsewhere a shallow search for form in face and feature. Mr. Havard Thomas's three marble medallions are most successful in sustaining comparison, but the busts of Rodin do not gain and the plaster enlargement of his "L'homme qui Marche" rather spoils our memory of the smaller bronze original.

In the balcony are several paintings, wisely exiled, if they could not be excluded; but it is astonishing to find in such company a Gauguin, if not a very good one, and a characteristic example of M. Paul Signac's neo-impressionism. Considering how little these artists are known in England, and the extent of their influence on the contemporary art of France, they should certainly have been given greater prominence.

FRANK RUTTER.

THE LIBRARY TABLE

Pompeii as an Art City. By E. v. MAYER. The Langham Series of Art Monographs. (Siegle, Hill & Co., 1s. 6d. net.)

THE author of this little book is inclined to mistake "gush" for criticism, and enthusiasm for exposition.

Not that Dr. v. Mayer lacks the critical faculty, rather he is induced to sink it in his over-appreciation of the undeniably beautiful features of Pompeian art, to the extent of finding flaws in all art outside the narrow range of the provincial watering-place. Nor indeed is he always willing to acknowledge the manifest debt of the Pompeian artist-craftsman to the Hellenic art of which his work is generally the shadowy reflection. Even in the case of the "Marriage of Hera," no mention is made of its obvious prototype, the Selinus metope from Temple A. It is only fair to Dr. von Mayer, however, to note that this anonymous translation of his "Pompeji in seiner Kunst" is somewhat brutally abridged, and that he himself has described it as an "apocryphal, incomplete, maimed translation."

A good instance of the author's strong bias is to be found in the following passage:

The generality of Pompeians depended for their expression solely on the artistic skill of worthy artisans. But it is at least more pleasing to see animals rendered with artificiality and man depicted with animation and truth than to find beasts and flowers portrayed, as in Japanese art, with astonishing fidelity, while the human figure remains at a dead level of stiff and sprawling conventionalism.

Such a statement as that contained in the last words of the passage quoted argues a very limited acquaintance with Japanese art.

The orthographical hydra "Discobulus" rears its ugly head here once more. It seems to have taken fresh life lately. We have noticed it in several books in the last few months.

The author selects for his admirably reproduced frontispiece the charming Narcissus. Our own fancy would have dictated the putting of the Dancing Faun in the place of honour, for we find it difficult to admire the modelling of the lower part of the torso of the Narcissus, whose extremely heavy neck also has always appeared to us in the light of a grave defect. But, when all is said, the little book is a most useful one, from the wealth of its excellent illustrations; and the enthusiasm of the author may do good service in arousing a more temperate interest in his readers in the treasures of the long-buried city.

The Widening Refinement in Rheims Cathedral. By WILLIAM H. GOODYEAR. A pamphlet. (Privately printed.)

MR. W. H. GOODYEAR, the Curator of Fine Arts in the Brooklyn Museum has long been occupied in observing what he calls generally "Widening Refinements" in architecture—that is to say, intentional slight divergence from geometrical accuracy. He now publishes his discovery of a use of this expedient which has not been registered before. He has proved by measurement, that in the interior of Rheims Cathedral the nave is not perpendicular from the spring of the vaulting to the floor. The piers are perpendicular from the vaulting downwards, but immediately above the capitals the vaulting shafts and all surfaces slope outwards in straight lines up to the spring of the vaulting. This, he argues, is intentional, because, if subsidence had occurred, the weight would have forced the piers to slope inwards, whereas they are perfectly perpendicular. The responds, or engaged pillars of the aisles, also have an outward inclination like the nave, and the walls of the aisles, like the piers of the nave, are perpendicular. Further, the outward slope of the vaulting shafts and surfaces becomes greater towards the middle of the nave. M. Léon Margotin, Inspecteur des Travaux, and M. J. Martin, Chef du Chantier of the Cathedral, corroborate these details, which were new to them when pointed out by Mr. Goodyear. The other "Widening Refinement" occurring at Rheims was, of course, familiar to them; Mr. Goodyear connects with it the one he has now first discovered. It was already proved that the piers of the nave do not stand in parallel straight lines. The lines of their ground plan bow outwards in the centre, so that the floor of the nave is wider in the centre than at the ends. Mr. Goodyear observes that similarly the outward slope of the vaulting shafts and surfaces above the capitals increases according to the width of the nave floor. This feature is found in most of the Gothic churches of Northern France.

Of course, the declension of the ground plan of the choir or chancel from the line of the nave, so as to form a slight angle with it, is quite a different matter. It is generally to be found in Gothic churches, and is often quite apparent. It will probably be familiar to our readers from the fanciful explanation that the declension is intended to symbolise the drooping Head of Christ upon the Cross. The writer of this notice, being merely an unskilled amateur of architecture, also reminds readers who fall under the same category, of a fact that has long been noticed concerning Greek columns, and is mentioned by Ruskin. The most beautiful ones do not taper in straight lines, but in curved lines, though their smallest girth is at the apex their greatest girth is near, but not at the base, and the curve is most abrupt between this point and the actual base, and least abrupt as it approaches the apex. When the curve is at all exaggerated, it strikes the "straight-eyed" observer immediately. It may, we suppose, be taken as another example of the "Widening Refinements" which Mr. Goodyear is observing so carefully. We believe that modern architects generally deny with some warmth the truth of Mr. Goodyear's conclusions that "Widening Refinements" were intentional expedients. It appears to us amateurs, that the burden of disproof now rests on them. Their case against Mr. Goodyear would be strengthened if they had been able to produce, by a disregard of such traditional expedients, any Gothic building since the Renaissance comparable to Rheims Cathedral.

A Pocketful of Sixpences. By GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL. (Grant Richards, 7s. 6d. net.)

THERE is nothing to indicate that the thirty-eight sketches of which this volume consists are reprinted from the daily papers—except the sketches themselves; though the quotation from "Lothair" on the title page, "He was not an intellectual Cræsus, but his pockets were full of sixpences," is certainly happier than the customary mention of the author's previous works. In these lay sermons must be a sad shock for anyone who might be expecting a further instalment of "Collections and Recollections," and it is difficult to imagine why they should have been thought worth reprinting. Anything more dull and commonplace, less inspired or inspiring, it would be difficult to find, and one can hardly help comparing the volume to an armchair stuffed with wads of padding without any springs. The most lively subject touched on is "Caricature," and this is the concluding paragraph of the essay:—

In more recent years Sir F. Carruthers Gould has given us in the Westminster Gazette a masterly series of political sketches. Perhaps he is a little too much obsessed by Mr. Chamberlain, but we must admit that the monocle was an irresistible temptation. I cherish among my most valued possessions some pen-and-ink caricatures by the late Sir Frank Lockwood, as good in pure outline as anything I know. There is a young cartoonist in Manchester whose work has, I see, been denounced by a clergyman as "irreverent," but it seems to me full of quite legitimate fun; and I reserve for my final word of eulogy the anonymous author of a picture called "Denominational Teaching in Provided Schools: how it may be harmoniously arranged," which appeared in the Daily Graphic of November 5th, 1906. I have never seen a more remarkable combination of humour and common sense.

"Baps in Council" is another of the lighter themes (the majority being religious or political), and is enlivened with a beautiful quotation from that master-wit, Mr. G. F. Anstey. What a sad contrast is Mr. Russell's opening sentence! "Breathes there a man with soul so dead—who boggles at this title and asks, 'Who is Baps?'" Or, a little further on: "Another Professor of the Terpsichorean Art (I commend this title to the Imperial Council as more adequate than 'Dancing Master')." . . . No; Mr. Russell's sixpences are too dull; or when they do occasionally flash, it is not the true metal; and we could only recommend the volume for the bedside of a Nonconformist insomniac.

Handbook of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston. (Boston, U.S.A., n.p.)

WE have often been inclined to grudge to Transatlantic museums and galleries the treasures of European art, both ancient and modern, that they have acquired. But the appearance of this handbook modifies, if it does not extinguish, our discontent. Seldom have we seen, in the small compass of 300 pages, so admirable a review of the contents of a notable collection of objects of art. Good paper and admirable type go far to make the handbook attractive, but above all the illustrations, printed, as is the text also, in a rich shade of brown that is almost black, and profusely distributed on every page, give the book a real value as a work of reference for students of art who may never see the collection represented. Of necessity the objects selected for illustration can only represent a very small proportion of the collection; but they are admirably chosen, and the brief note which accompanies each is so written as to be not merely explanatory, but of real educational value. If anything could induce the present reviewer to travel westward, it would be this handbook, and his goal would be the Boston Museum of Fine Arts. Egyptian, Classical, Western, and Chinese and Japanese art are all represented here, in all their principal branches, and the representations are worthy of their theme.

FICTION

The Pulse of Life. By MRS. BELLOC LOWNDES. (Heinemann, 6s.)

MRS. LOWNDES has written a good book, of which the workmanship is sound and thorough. The sub-title, which is "The Story of a Passing World," is singularly apt. For not only is the novel about people who would be called old-fashioned, but the novel itself is written with a lack of hurry and a suavity which are not usually found in modern fiction. Many types of character are depicted, but there is no bias in favour of any. Mrs. Lowndes has no burning message to deliver: she goes her own way quietly, and watches life, as it passes, acutely and with such interest that she desires to record the varying impressions which the strange pageant has set upon her mind. She knows well the wisdom of the old saws, and to what are called modern tendencies she quietly applies their age-proof test with a smile of humour at the result. This treatment is the more pleasant, because the subject is, as may be supposed from the title, one which modernity is inclined to claim for its own—namely, love. Two men's affaires du cœur are skilfully related—of Francis Domville and Paul Feyghine. Domville is an English gentleman of old Catholic family. He is at first discarded by a rich manufacturer's daughter, with whose money he hoped to reinstate the fortunes of his house. At length he meets and loves the Margravine of Moravia, under quite natural yet romantic circumstances, and wins her love. His cousin, Paul Feyghine, is a Russian, who is under the spell of a Spanish dancer, Joaquina, and has wasted his youth in her service. He is loved by a saintly woman, Anne Leycester, and at last comes to appreciate her worth just as he is starting for the war in Manchuria. The background in front of which these figures move is large in scope, and is described with knowledge. The old houses in which the characters are privileged to live are written of with such charm and skill that it is impossible not to breathe something of their atmosphere. Anne Leycester's house in Westminster, Gaynsford, the Domville's place in the country, the house in Islington, which Feyghine bought for Joaquina and her child—all stand out in a remarkable way, and add largely to the interest of the book. Mrs. Lowndes is certainly to be congratulated on a piece of work which is as sane in idea as it is sound in execution.

A Nurse's Bequest. By LILLIAS HAMILTON, M.D. (John Murray, 6s.)

THIS is a book written with a very definite purpose. The author's principal object is to bring before the public the scheme, elaborated by Mrs. Close, for the transferring of children from the workhouses of the various large towns of England to farms in Canada, where they will receive a sound technical education which will enable them to find employment and hold their own against foreign workmen should they return to the Mother Country. The story deals entirely with the life of the nurses in one of our large workhouse infirmaries, and is written by one who, from long personal experience, is peculiarly fitted to speak with authority on the subject. There is something very convincing in the clear, unvarnished narrative of Miss Hamilton, who has tried to give a true picture of a nurse's life as it was some twenty-five years ago. The actual plot is a minor matter compared with the purpose the author has in view, and we could almost wish she had dispensed with the story altogether, and given us in its stead a volume of reminiscences, though, no doubt, in its present form the book will bring Mrs. Close's scheme under the notice of a larger public than if it were issued under a more serious title. The author's secondary object, that of interesting the nurses of to-day in the work and trials of their fore-runners, is one she will hardly fail to achieve.

Eve's Apple. By ALPHONSE COURLANDER. (Fisher Unwin, 6s.)

MR. COURLANDER has written an agreeable enough tale, which is mildly interesting. There is nothing distinguished in the characters or in the way in which the characters are drawn. They are sufficiently reasonable and sufficiently interesting. The style is of the same calibre, mild and painstaking, without individuality and without distinction. David Ingersby is interested in homes for poor children, in which good work he is helped by his friend, Helen Carron. But he goes to Paris for a holiday and meets a lovely woman, whom he marries, and who ruins him financially and leaves him. Eventually he is saved, after an exciting interlude, by his guardian angel, Helen, who has always loved him, as he learns from his brother, whom she has refused. Having read "The Sacrifice," we expected better work from Mr. Courlander than is to be found in "Eve's Apple."

Rubina. By JAMES BLYTH. (John Long, 6s.)

MR. BLYTH's reputation for direct and forceful work will probably gain from his new book. It is strong to the verge of brutality, if not beyond it. Mr. Blyth's village heroine, although he tries to enlist our sympathy for her by saying that she is better than most of her kind, remains a distasteful figure, her rampant animalism, united with her cold-blooded calculation, forming a combination which it is impossible to view even with tolerance. The characters of the book are sketched in lightly round the full-length portrait of the heroine. It is a pity that the artist who designed the cover and the frontispiece represented Rubina with the dress and appearance of a Society girl. Although there is usually something fine about primitive and passionate life, Mr. Blyth's picture of East Anglia has much of sordidness in it also. The book is exceedingly unpleasant, and in some portions offensive. Its theme is one which, if dealt with in a scientific work as sincerely and thoroughly as Mr. Blyth has dealt with it, might be useful, and in that form would reach a special public whom it would not harm. As a novel, liable to the chances of circulating libraries and drawing-room tables, it lays Mr. Blyth under some responsibility. Putting Podsnappery on one side, there are large numbers of people of cultivated tastes and educated outlook to whom the reading of this book would be repulsive, just as there are many people who do not believe that the function of the drama is primarily to amuse, who expect and hope for real life to be portrayed on the boards, who do not blink at facts, and yet would not care to be invited to the play and be shown an operation in vivisection.

The Last of Her Race. By J. BLOUNDELLE BURTON. (John Milne, 6s.)

THERE are several varieties of the historical novel. There is the one in which a certain period is chosen more on account of its value as a picturesque setting to a romantic love story, in which plumed hats and ringlets may be used to advantage, than for any real historical interest it may have for the author or his readers; the one which may be said to belong to the political type, written from the point of view of the historian rather than that of the romancist, in which the actual plot is often but a lame excuse for a historical essay; and there is also, alas! the one in which the story is entirely devoid of either historical or sentimental interest, and which usually bears on its title page the words: "A Romance of the Days of Queen Bess" (or some other unfortunate sovereign). We have to thank Mr. Bloundelle Burton for sparing us this last variety, and for giving us such a happy mixture of the two others. There is plenty of good sound history in "The Last of Her Race," and there is certainly no lack of romance.

For King and Love. By W. BOURNE COOKE. (Ouseley, 3s. 6d.)

MR. BOURNE COOKE could hardly have chosen a more banal title for his book, and yet there is charm in its very banality, for it carries us back to the happy days of our youth when heroines were all virtuous and transcendently beautiful, and heroes marvellous beings of superhuman strength, whose deeds of prowess were invariably blessed by an appreciative Providence. This youthful quality is discernible, not only on the title page but in the short stories of which the book consists. Brave cavaliers venture life and fortune for their King; sour-faced, psalm-singing Puritans ride forth to slay them, but the kindly author intervenes at the eleventh hour and saves their lives and our feelings. The Royalists are all the gallant gentlemen of whom we loved to read, while the Roundheads cant and snivel as all good Roundheads should. There are two ghost stories in which hooded monks and fair maidens play their parts; the rest are stirring tales of adventure, full of life and incident. Of these, the best is that of "John Spurr," while in "The Sleepless Guest" we are given a pathetic glimpse of Charles I. on his flight from Oxford. They are good, healthy tales, simply and vigorously written.

D R A M A

"ROSMERSHOLM" AT TERRY'S THEATRE

AFTER the deluge of fairly good, indifferent, and bad plays that we have had lately there is something almost startling in being bidden to witness the performance of a play like Rosmersholm. And having seen it one has a difficulty in taking its measure with any accuracy, coming as it does at the end of a train of second-rate dramas; for no doubt the same laws hold in theatrical matters as in the case of pictures, and all connoisseurs are aware that nothing is so bad for one's critical taste as the constant seeing of inferior works of art. That is why English taste at the present time is so deplorable; most people see nothing but the summer exhibitions at the Academy and the plays that are put up at the more popular West-End theatres.

I do not think that I have ever seen it suggested that Rosmersholm is the most interesting of Ibsen's plays; it certainly is not, except, perhaps to the student of his methods. To one who likes to discover "how it is done," Rosmersholm is probably the best to dissect. It is a commonplace at the present time to point out what a difficult matter it apparently is to playwrights to write a good last act. Rosmersholm might almost be described as nothing else but a last act, and a last act, too, that practically contains no incidents, all the incidents having happened before the curtain rises for the play to commence. And with what marvellous skill are the facts brought out, never once does one feel that they are being forced on the spectator. They flow naturally from the conversation; little by little the previous tragedy is reconstructed, and its effect on the principal characters brought out. It is, on the whole, the best example of one of the most distinctive features of the Ibsen method, for here the play is concerned solely with the catastrophe, and merely explains its causes without acting them.

The interest of the play, of course, centres round Rebecca West and her influence on her immediate circle and its reflex influence on her. As the play goes on we learn the different states of Rebecca's mind in the past; one feeling has but to be born to bear another, and then die a natural death; she starts by simply desiring to be an influence in the Rosmer family, then she endeavours to make it possible for Rosmer to be his true self, then she is seized by passion for him, which gradually melts into a kind of ideal love; and now to prove that it is ideal, she goes out to the same death as that into which she has previously led Rosmer's wife. It is a great study in the psychology of a woman, and all the other characters are there merely to help the study.

It cannot be said that the performance at Terry's Theatre was a first-rate success, though it reached a very high level all round. It struck me that the actors were all acting in different keys, or, at any rate, that they were like members of an orchestra whose instruments were not all quite tuned alike. Two of them, however, were quite admirable and entirely in harmony, and they were Miss Florence Kahn as Rebecca and Mr. Edmund Gwenn as Mortensgore. There is probably no more difficult part in our English repertoire at the moment than that of Rebecca. In the first place, it requires an actress of an appearance and personality, which are as rare as they are distinguished. Miss Kahn possesses both, and I felt that she was the ideal Rebecca the moment I saw her. Secondly, there must be great restraint in the acting, at any rate, for the first half of the play. At the end of the first act, for instance, hardly anything is known about her, and then gradually fact after fact comes out, and we find that the rather languid young lady of the beginning is in reality a perfect demon of energy. Miss Kahn never forced the pace, her emotion waxed as the play proceeded, until in the great scene of the third act when she discovers to Rosmer and Kroll her innermost motives we were raised to the highest pitch of excitement by her mastery of her art. It was a great performance, and I could not help thinking of La Gioconda, or rather of Walter Pater's description of her. There was "the unfathomable smile, always with a touch of something sinister in it," and at the end when she and Rosmer go out together it seemed to me that "the eyelids were a little weary."

Mr. Eille Norwood as Johannes Rosmer was, I thought, too restrained, or, to continue the simile I used before, he seemed to play a little flat. He is, of course, a dreamer, and not a man of action, but when the overwhelming announcement of the third act is made to him he receives it with less emotion than even such a one as Rosmer would display. On the other hand, Mr. Charles Fulton as Rector Kroll was rather too sharp. His method was too robust and his manner of cross-examination—of which there is plenty in the play—was that rather of the Old Bailey than of the shocked friend trying to get at the truth. All the same, both of these were very capable performances. Mr. Edmund Gwenn was simply admirable as Mortensgore; he is a dangerous person in any cast, as he is liable by his superb acting to throw the others into the shade. Miss Kate Bishop gave a sympathetic rendering of the part of Madame Helseth, and Mr. Hignett was very good as the eccentric Ulric Brendel.

These scattered performances of the plays of Ibsen come as oases in the desert of contemporary drama. It is a pity that they are not more extensively patronised. One wonders if, after all, there is the public which Mr. Archer and his friends seem to think for artistic drama. Artists have been known to starve while "small and honourable minorities" applaud.

A. C.

CORRESPONDENCE

"COCKNEY RHYMES"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I do not know what "L. L. A. S." means by saying, with reference to "invite" and "delight," that "I hear, and I believe, pronounce these words differently, giving . . . the consonant sound of 'gh,' etc."

The word "delight" is merely a misspelling of "delite," a word of French origin; and no word of French origin ever had a "gh" in it.

I have shown, long ago, that Chaucer was the latest English author who distinguished between the endings "ite" and "ight." It is one of the tests whereby we can tell whether a poem attributed to him is genuine or not. His successor, Lydgate, rhymes "white" with "bright" in the very first stanza of his "Complaint of the Black Knight," which an uncritical age attributed to Chaucer!

But, of course, Chaucer rhymes "delyt," now falsely spelt "delight," with "appetyt," now spelt "appetite"; see his "Canterbury Tales," ll. 1681 (or 1683). Our present foolish spelling abounds with traps like this.

WALTER W. SKRAT.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am glad to have drawn a letter from "L. L. A. S.," whose competence as a critic is well known to readers of THE ACADEMY. If I cannot agree with all his conclusions, I greatly admire the care and subtlety of his analysis.

The argument from authority should not be pressed too far, nor need we set up one poet against another. Because Tennyson in "The Lady of Shallot," rhymed river with mirror, it does not follow that we should do so. Because Keats wrote:

Could'st thou wish for lineage higher Than twin-sister of Thalia,

it does not follow that we should imitate him. Because Mr. Swinburne in youthful ardour made warning and dawning and morning rhyme, it does not follow that his mature judgment approves such yokings; am I wrong in thinking them conspicuously absent from his later verse? Because Mr. Kipling allowed his Scotch engineer, M'Andrews, of all people, twice to rhyme port and thought, it does not follow that this is not a glaring solecism, strange in one usually so accurate about his mis-en-scène.

Coming to phonetics, I should say that the "b" has long since disappeared from lamb and climb and dumb, as has the "l" from calm and palm and psalm (the last has also dropped its "p"). More's the pity, perhaps, and I respect "L. L. A. S." for trying to sound these lost letters, but imagine he is in a minority of one. My own pronunciation, I fear, makes absolutely no difference between clime and climb, between Dum-dum and dumb. Nor do I recognise any difference between the vowel-sounds of due and crew, foe and low, cloud and plough'd, why and high, as usually pronounced by the most careful speakers; whatever distinction is made between due and dew seems to proceed from a consonantal sound preceding and not following the vowel. In all these cases, therefore, I should expect our poets to disregard the silent letters, as they do. The final vowel of invisible is such a vague one that I should make no difficulty about rhyming it with either still or well. Bliss and is, on the other hand, without doubt rhyme imperfectly, the latter word being pronounced iz; they are no more perfect rhymes than as and was, or plague and ague.

I cannot, therefore, see much parallelism between these and the "r" sound with which we began. As regards it, I am delighted to find "L. L. A. S." recognises a difference between father and farther; many exponents of "standard English" refuse to do so. That it should be a very slight difference, I admit, and began by asserting. Personally, indeed, I would rather hear the "r" trilled or rolled than entirely omitted (in public speaking, I mean); but that is merely a question of taste. With regard to Milton's rhyming quire and higher, two things may be said. First, it is far from certain that he pronounced the latter word so fully as we do. Recent critics argue that he gave little more than monosyllabic value to higher and highest, as in the line ("P. R.," iv. 106):

Aim at the highest, without the highest attained.

Second, if our tendency has been to lengthen the latter word, so has it been to lengthen words like the former. In youth I was taught to regard quire, fire, tire, etc., as monosyllables, but our poets often treat them as dissyllables, saying fi-er, ti-er, etc. Is not this what Tennyson intended when he wrote:

Music that gentlier on the spirit lies
Than tir'd eyelids upon tir'd eyes—

(the "apostrophe" is his own)? We need not argue whether this is desirable or undesirable; enough to note it as a fact. Not all such words are so treated, and the distinction which "L. L. A. S." draws between hair and layer is valid at present; but in view of the marked tendency to dissyllabise such words it may not always subsist. At any rate, there is little likelihood that rhyming quire and higher will give offence to anyone.

Lastly, however, let me assure my critic that I never contemplated our Editor rejecting poems on account merely of such blemishes as have been instanced. No, I would have him remonstrate in a fatherly way with the offending authors, and get peccant rhymes exchanged for prettier ones! Seriously, what I urge is that we should have two separate standards to judge by in these matters. Different habits of speech are required for the drawing-room or smoking-room and for the public platform. The latter demands a more careful, precise, and even ornate style of utterance. In common talk I say "often," but from singer and orator I like to hear "offen." I similarly say "Aposle," but have no objection to the preacher saying "Apostle." I talk of "sychology," but expect a University lecturer to sound the initial letter of "psychology" (and perhaps of "psalm"). There are two standards in speaking, as in other things; one should neither be too pedantic in the social circle nor too slipshod on the platform. And—to sum up in a sentence—my contention is simply this: that the diction of serious poetry should be tried by the loftier standard, while comic verse may suitably and enjoyably make use of colloquial carelessness and laziness. I trust that both you and your critic may be able to accept this view.

February 10.

T. S. O.

P.S.—Can "L. L. A. S.," or any reader, tell me where Tennyson speaks of the nearness of sound between "dawn" and "morn" as his reason for not rhyming them together? I seem to have read this somewhere, but have lost the reference. It is not, I think, in his son's "Memoir," though "Cockneyisms" are denounced in chap. xiii. (one-volume edition, p. 239). The obiter dicta in that book, by-the-by, are often most suggestive.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The mere statement that Milton used "Cockney rhymes" is hardly a conscionable defence of them. If they are to be defended, some artistic policy must be shown underlying their use. A complete investigation of rhyme would include a debating of the different appeal of words through "ear-music" and "eye-music" (bad expressions, which must stand for lack of better), since to us the printed word is nearly as important as the spoken word. But without entering into this grave matter we may yet do something. I think, perhaps, the devil's cause may be successfully pleaded on these lines.

Rhyme is not an affair of intellect. Like every other artifice of verse it is a means of appeal to the emotions and the sense of beauty. It is not a device to make verse more difficult to write, as Browning seemed to think, who gives us the grand instance of rhyme used intellectually, and damnably, in "Through the Metidja." The instinct of man, attempting to express the unexpressive within him, found out the chime of like endings as an instrument helpful to his want. Hence it must proceed, not from intellect or good taste; and the measure of a rhyme's success is the measure of the aid it gives to the verses in achieving beauty and emotional appeal. But these are not necessarily achieved by identical vowel-sounds; a slight dissonance may quite conceivably help the poet more than exactitude. Consider these rhymes:

By shallow rivers to whose falls
Melodious birds sing madrigals.

And again:

A gown made of the finest wool,
Which from our pretty lambs we pull.

The ear knows full well these rhymes are not perfect. But the delicious effect they have on our brains is assuredly in part due to the fact that their vowel-sound is slightly discordant. To take a closer instance: any educated ear can differentiate the sounds of "board" and "lord," or of "for" and "law"—given an educated mouth. But the fact of his using such sounds for rhyme by no means shows that a poet thinks, or wishes his readers to think, that the words are homophonous; it shows that he wishes that sequence of sound to assist his expression. Doubtless he does not say so to himself, for it is an affair of his instinct, and instinctively must it be judged, not intellectually. If Heine rhymes "Höli" with "Schnee," does that betray his defectiveness of ear? No, but the critic who brings such an accusation betrays, possibly, a certain coarseness in his appreciation of poetry.

But I will go further: I will say that in any extended use of rhyme judicious "Cockney rhymes" are almost as necessary as inflection of metre. Unceasing exactitude of rhyme, unflinching just homophony, is not very tolerable for long. By all means let us decide that "delight" and "invite" are allophonous; let us endeavour to sound the "gh" and recapitulate many another spoken subtlety in the English tongue; but when Milton (in whose days possibly the "gh" was sounded slightly) uses as rhyme those two words, or "bore" and "roar," "her" and "paramour," "torn" and "mourn," or when Shakespeare rhymes "fair" with "prayer," let us not talk about defective ears, but be sorry if we cannot delight in these deliberate discords, often more ravishing than a strict homophony. Perhaps the examples I have quoted are not what "T. S. O." precisely means by "Cockney rhymes"; but you cannot stop short at such as I have given; no fast line can be drawn. If you allow any latitude in rhyme at all, you must admit that even "for" and "flaw" might be justifiably rhymed, for the point about a rhyme is not—is it exact? but is it, in its place, beautiful?

I fear this letter will take, if you print it, a deal of your space; but the matter is of first importance, and needs threshing.

February 9.

LASCELLES ABERCROMBIE.

GEORGE STUBBS AND MORLAND

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Randall Davies hardly does George Stubbs, R.A., justice in saying that he is better known as the author of "The Anatomy of the Horse" than as a painter, and by inference placing him on a much lower plane than Morland. As Stubbs never painted an underbred horse and Morland never painted a well-bred one, a comparison between the two is difficult. The difference between the two subjects was greater even in Morland's time than now. Breeds of cart-horses were not specialised, and, moreover, Morland painted aged, worn-out, decrepit animals, the property of the very poor; on the other hand the racehorses, hunters, and hacks Stubbs painted were of the highest type. As a painter of high-bred horses, I think many would agree with me in thinking that Stubbs has never been surpassed.

February 10.

P. W.

HOR. CAM., III. 15

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The version of Hor. C., III. 15, from which I quoted some lines in a review of "The Temple Horace," are to be found on p. 158 of "Verses and Translations," by C. S. C. (Cambridge: Deighton Bell & Co., 1862). I quoted from memory, and, I believe, not absolutely accurately. Your readers may be pleased to have the whole version, which runs as follows:

Spouse of penniless Ibycus,
Thus late bring to a close all thy delinquencies,
All thy studious infamy:
Nearing swiftly the grave—that not an early one—
Cease girls' sport to participate,
Blurring stars which were else cloudlessly brilliant;
What suits her who is beautiful
Suits not equally thee: rightfully devastates
Thy fair daughter the homes of men,
Wild as Thyad, who wakes stirr'd by the kettledrums.
Nothus' beauty constraining her,
Like some kid at his play holds she her revelry:
Thy years stately Luceria's
Wools more fitly become, not din of harpsichords,
Not pink-petall'd rose blossoms,
Not casks drain'd by an old lip to the sediment.
It is not within "measurable distance" of the Latin, but it reproduces the metre very skilfully. "Studious infamy" is perfect for famosis laboribus.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

THE FOUNDATION OF THE HOLY SACRAMENT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Christianity is, fundamentally, a natural or physical religion, and it is this natural element which distinguishes it from all other religions. You have but to rob it of its humanity, which constitutes its natural basis, and you have nothing left by which to maintain it. In all other religions, taking, for example, Brahminism, Buddhism, or Islamism, this scientific or biological element is absent. The religious ground in all these is a supernatural one—namely, God or some supreme element in the abstract. For where in these religions there exists a concrete element, the representation in each case is in the form of some spurious image or idol. It would be absurd to maintain that Brahma possesses any real or scientific value as an inanimate thing of wood or stone. It would, on the other hand, be impossible to prove that Christ was not a physical reality. It is not a question with the true Catholic of God's existence, but of God's humanity—Christ in the flesh. Thus, in mere belief—that is, as a historical faith—the Brahmins, Buddhists, or Mahometans, may be said to be on a level with Christians, since they believe in and worship God or an Absolute Power. But, unlike their Catholic brethren, they have no science, no flesh and blood element, no real human God. And it is important to notice here that, as a mere individual basis of faith, the historical element has been the source of all sectarianism and schism, all disputes and dissent. Christ's humanity, for instance, is universal—perfect—beyond dispute, as it is above sectarianism. Mahomet's humanity (which denied this sacred or absolute element of Christ) is Mahometan. Islamism, in fact, lacks the science or physics of religion. It is nothing if not Mahometan—sectarian. And in speaking thus of Islamism, I am referring at the same time to all other dissenting creeds. Flesh and blood to them is not a reality but a mythology. They repudiate God's Presence when they rob Christianity of its physical perfection. They change the Holy Sacrament into Devil worship (personal idolatry) when the fact of the Lord's Body—the Natural Universe—is discarded. What difference, therefore, in this impersonal or negative sense, is there between Mahometanism and Methodism, or, for all that, any other religious isms? Until the impersonal distinction is made between the God of the one and the God of the other, modern sectarianism is as much fundamentally Christian as ancient sectarianism. Thus we are made aware of the fact that a real separation exists between Nonconformity and Christianity. It is not merely a Wesleyan or Cliffordian difference, but a Mahometan difference, since it refuses to own the physical unity of God. Christianity in the abstract possesses only one element—namely, The Word. Concrete Christianity, however, adds another element—that of Man. Manhood is the only real ground, the only natural basis, as Christ so divinely taught, of worshipping God. Christianity is not a question of religious idealism, since this element has existed from the time of creation, and is to be found in the Patriarchal and Sabæan glorifications. Christianity, fundamentally, is a question of absolute substance. Was Christ God in the Flesh or was He, as Mahomet maintained, like Abraham, Moses, David, merely a prophet? It rests upon our answer to this question, and this question alone, whether our Christianity is entitled to be called Catholic—that is to say, true Christianity, or whether it is merely professional or historical. Either we must believe in this foundation, this Unity of Flesh and Blood, or we must be false to it. If we believe in the physical uniformity of Christianity, then, as true followers of it, as parts and portions of His Flesh and Blood, there can be no absolute distinction, no real separation, between Him and us. There can be no Free or Independent Church—no sectarianism—no Catholic apostasy. Christianity is nothing if not a natural, humanising, scientific, binding faith; for, apart from its flesh and blood reality—its human Godhead—there remains nothing but human finitude, human weakness, no matter how divinely created, to make for righteousness.

And what kind of righteousness is it that we have in our midst?

In opposition to Christ there has arisen a series of abortive, because false, reformations.

Freedom and apathy have taken the places of obedience and reverence. The Holy Sacrament, or High Mass, the Christian's confirmation of the flesh and blood Catholicity of life, of God's Manhood and Christ's Godhead, has been made the ground of free and irreverent strife. In fact, High Mass has been devilishly controverted. It appears that so long as Mr. A., Mrs. B., and Miss C. attend at the Communion rail, their confirmation in Christ is assured. Simply this Holy travesty and nothing more. Their bread and wine, in a sacred sense, has nothing in common with flesh and blood. What should be, fundamentally, the Christ element of the faith, counts, alas, for nothing. The reality of God is made the equivalent of a personal identity. Thus, Mr. A., Mrs. B., and Miss C. may be very sincere Christians in the abstract, but then so are your Brahmins, Buddhists, and Mahometans, and your barbarians, too, who believe in and worship a Supreme Being. The name by which God is worshipped makes no absolute difference, whether He be called Brahma, Buddha, Allah, or the Great Spirit. The true Christian, on the other hand, acknowledges and reveres the Flesh and Blood of the Lord by feeding the hungry and clothing the naked. He realises at the High Mass that God's Bodily existence is the same as his own. He realises that however great, however powerful, however rich his worldly blessings have made him, in flesh and blood there is nothing to distinguish him from his poor and perhaps starving neighbour. He recognises that, physically, there is no personal right to sacrifice. He understands (I am speaking of the true Catholic) that in feeding the hungry and clothing the naked he is not making a vain but a real sacrifice, he is not doing a mortal but an immortal act. He is a confirmed communicant of God.

Without this realisation there can be no true confirmation. The High Sacrament or Mass constitutes the Christ basis, the human physics, of our Catholic faith. It is representative of our flesh and blood oneness with God, a uniformity which neither chemical nor physical science denies. When this element is eliminated, the whole human fabric, and therefore the religious value, of Christianity falls to the ground. It becomes, as history has repeatedly shown, a theological mythology or ground for sectarianism and dissension.

Now I may possess no authority for saying it, but I maintain that there exists amidst your dissenting communities evils quite as bad if not worse than those which arise from Atheism, because there is this historical chaos or personal separation from God in the one which is absent in the other from the need of a belief in God. The Sacrament is bereft of its very holiness, because it lacks the Catholic uniformity, the physical reality, of Confirmation. In a Dissenting or Nonconformist sense it is merely historical. In the true Catholic sense it is a flesh and blood unity—a Christ Brotherhood.

February 8.

H. C. DANIEL.

DANIEL TUVILL AND THE DICTIONARY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In the third edition (London, 1638) of the "Vade Mecum or Essayes Morall, Theo-Logicall, a New Edition with some Additions," by Daniel Tuvill, there are at least two words which have no place in "The Historical English Dictionary," now in course of publication at the Clarendon Press, in Oxford, namely: p. 237. "Buffonary" = buffonish, in the sentence:

Their Ephemerides doe much resemble that of Crates the Theban: to some Buffonary Parasite sixe thousand Crownes, to a Curtesan sixe hundred: Et Philosopho triobolum: And scarce three farthings to a man of merit.

And p. 198:

Shee is like a Curtesan, that for her owne advantage, can entertaine thy appetite with wanton dalliance; but of a settled love will make thee no assurance: when thou thinkest thy selfe most intested in her, then is it likely thou art furthest from her.

Here "intested" means "deeply enamoured of," and is derived from French "entesté."

Other interesting words in the booklet are: p. 19, under-sitter; 62, smell-feast; 78, Christmas-box; 92, jaw-fallen; 104, trunke = trumpe = trumpet; 119, to foreslow; 121, to estate; 129 and 201, noveller = revolutionary; 135, baven; 167, sweet bals; 177, president for precedent, as in other books of the seventeenth century; 179, to byas; 199, catadupe.

February 11.

E. S. DODGSON.

THE "HON." JAMES WINNEGATE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—At the risk of again incurring your displeasure, I venture to submit yet another suggestion with regard to the "Hon." James Winnegate. The name of Lord George Sanger, a large circus owner, is probably familiar to you. This gentleman is not the son—or, at any rate, not the younger son—either of a duke or of a marquis. He is called Lord George for no other reason than that he was christened so. May it not be that the Hon. James is also a baptismal name conferred upon the infant Winnegate by his god-parents? This explanation would not only consist with the other facts of the plot, but also, as I suggest, with the probable intention of the author, since there is nothing in the substance of the play (which I have lately been at the expense of witnessing) incompatible with the hypothesis that it is a first experiment in drama by one accustomed to the management of a circus.

R. A.

"EAST AND WEST"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In reference to the very favourable notice of "Folklore of the Holy Land," in last week's issue of THE ACADEMY, I should like to answer an implied question of your reviewer.

That the fellahin have "forgotten" the incident of Omar's journey, ride and tie, with his black slave, I cannot asseverate. I have not myself heard the story told by illiterate people in Palestine; whereas the other one—about choosing a site for the Dome of the Rock—has been often told in my hearing. In stating that Omar arrived "unattended," I did not mean that he came without one attendant, but without the circumstance of power.

Why your reviewer should be surprised at my using a wrong theological term I cannot conceive, but thank him heartily. "Immaculate Conception" is inaccurate, I now see; though I did not apply the term to the Incarnation, but to Moslem belief regarding the birth of Christ, which denies an incarnation of the Deity.

February 12.

MARMADUKE PICKTHALL.

BOOKS RECEIVED

BOOKS OF REFERENCE

The Catholic Directory, 1908. Burns & Oates, 1s. 6d. net.
Ogilvie, John. An English Dictionary. Blackie, 1s. net.

DRAMA

Dillon, Arthur. The Heir's Comedy. Elkin Mathews, 3s. 6d. net.
Travers, Rosalind. Thyrsis and Fausta. Elkin Mathews, 3s. 6d. net.

EDUCATIONAL

Carter, M. E. The Groundwork of English History. University Tutorial Press, 2s.
The International Geography. Edited by H. R. Mill. Macmillan, 15s.
Roscoe, H. E., and Schorlemmer, C. A Treatise on Chemistry. Vol. II.—The Metals. Macmillan, 30s. net.

MISCELLANEOUS

Shield, A., and Andrew Lang. The King Over the Water. Longmans, 15s. net.
Marshal Turenne. By the author of "The Life of Sir Kenelm Digby." Longmans, 12s. 6d. net.
Dyott's Diary, 1781-1845. Edited by Reginald W. Jeffery. In 2 vols. Constable, 31s. 6d. net.
Holmes, T. Rice. Ancient Britain and the Invasions of Julius Cæsar. The Clarendon Press, 21s. net.
Grove, Lady. The Social Fetich. Smith, Elder, 5s. net.
The Prophetic Works of William Blake: Milton. Edited by E. R. D. MacLagan and A. G. B. Russell. Bullen, 6s. net.
Buckner, E. D. The Immortality of Animals. Alexander Moring, 5s. net.
The Story of Beauty and the Beast. Translated from the French by Ernest Dowson. Lane, 10s. 6d. net.
Street, G. S. The Ghosts of Piccadilly. Constable, 10s. 6d. net.
Murdoch, W. G. Blaikie. The Spirit of Jacobite Loyalty. Edinburgh: Brown, 2s. 6d. net.
Fraser, Edward. Champions of the Fleet. Lane, n.p.
King Edward VI. An appreciation attempted by Sir Clements R. Markham. Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d. net.
Holman, Frederick V. Dr. John McLoughlin. Cleveland: Arthur Clark. $2.50.
Clark, J. W. Cambridge. Seeley, 6s.
Lang, Andrew. Tales of Troy and Greece. Longmans, Green, 4s. 6d. net.
Nicholson, Reynold A. A Literary History of the Arabs. Fisher Unwin, 12s. 6d. net.

POETRY

Bonacina, Conrad. Preludes and Harmonies. Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner, 2s. 6d. net.
The Works of Sir Lewis Morris. Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner, 6s.
Osmaston, F. P. B. Poems and Lyrics. Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner, 5s. net.
Coleridge, Mary E. Poems. Elkin Mathews, 4s. 6d. net.
Simpson, Harold. Lotos. Greening, 5s. net.
The Ways of God. Selected by Adam L. Gowans. Gowans & Gray, 6d. net.
Field, Michael. Wild Honey from Various Thyme. Fisher Unwin, 5s. net.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS

Les Maitres Sonneurs. Par George Sand. Bell, 5s. net.
The Travels and Surprising Adventures of Baron Munchausen. Greening, 1s. 6d. net.
Macnaughtan, S. A Lame Dog's Diary. Nelson, 7d. net.
Ely Talfourd. A Contribution to the History of Roman Britain. Taylor & Francis, 3s. net.

THEOLOGY

Cheetham, S. Church History. Macmillan, 10s. 6d.
Freeth, J. T. The True Theology. Allenson, n.p.
Woodward, Allen B. The Inner Man. Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner, n.p.
Campbell, the Rev. R. J. Christianity and the Social Order. Chapman & Hall, 6s.
Seeley, Sir J. R. Ecce Homo. Macmillan, 1s. net.
Ballard, Frank. Christian Essentials. Culley, 5s. net.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEERED

DRINK THE

WHITEDELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
& AFTER DINNER.& BLUEIn making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.Nervous Disorders

A deficiency of the phosphates causes a lowering of nervous tone, indicated by exhaustion, restlessness, headache or insomnia.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate
(Non-Alcoholic)

supplies the nerve cells with health-giving life force, restores strength and induces restful sleep without the use of dangerous drugs.

An Ideal Tonic in Nervous Diseases

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.
Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.The February BOOK MONTHLY. 6d. net.

CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR

A Town and Country Journal of Book Affairs; the same Embellished with many Pictures.

CONTRABAND!

Books Seized in His Majesty's Customs.

TREASURE FINDERS!

Forged and Faked MSS., and How to Detect Them—By Tighe Hopkins.

SUPPRESSED!

Some Book Pictures that we know no More.

A LONDON LETTER

New Lamps for Old at the "Times" Book Club—By the Editor

ANNALS OF PRINT

Four Centuries of the Cambridge University Press.

A BY-WAYS SERIES

The Bookseller and the Publisher as Topographer—By R. Cochrane.

LIGHT AND LEADING

New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.

THE GENERAL READER

Snap-Shot Reviews of the Best and Best-Selling Books.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY

Particulars of Interesting Volumes likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH

A Classified Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions, and Reprints of January.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

Sir Hubert Von Herkomer
AND
PUBLIC OPINION

Sir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey to the Editor of "Public Opinion," says, on February 11th, 1908:—

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper, PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which would be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged, and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly. From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is, after all, not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you, with all my heart, continuous success with your paper.

Yours very truly,

(Signed) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

PUBLIC OPINION A WEEKLY REVIEW of CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITYEvery Friday Twopence
EDITED BY PERCY L. PARKER

The Purpose of PUBLIC OPINION is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political, and social progress.

PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent Post Free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 3s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to—

PUBLIC OPINION, 30 & 31 Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

SPECIMENS FREE ON APPLICATION

THE ACADEMYA WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART.

PRICE THREEPENCE.

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION:

Inland, 15s. post free, Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free.

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, 95 FETTER LANE, E.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____ months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

One of the Most Remarkably Reviewed Books of Recent Years.

THE BLUE LAGOON

SECOND IMPRESSION.

By H. DE VERE STACPOOLE,
Author of "The Crimson Azaleas." 6s.

SOME PRESS NOTICES.

TIMES.—"Picturesque and original.....full of air and light and motion."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"A hauntingly beautiful story."

GLOBE.—"Weirdly imaginative, remote and fateful."

EVENING STANDARD.—"A masterpiece.....It has the gift of the most vivid description that makes a scene live before your eyes."

SUNDAY TIMES.—"A very lovely and fascinating tale, by the side of which 'Paul and Virginia' seems tame indeed."

MORNING LEADER.—"It is a true romance, with an atmosphere of true romance which few but the greatest writers achieve."

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"Many able authors, an uncountable number, have written about the South Sea Islands, but none that we know has written so charmingly as Mr. de Vere Stacpoole in 'The Blue Lagoon.'"

WORLD.—"It rarely falls to our lot to be able, and indeed under obligation, to give a novel of this day such whole-hearted commendation as 'The Blue Lagoon' deserves from us."

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1 Adelphi Terrace, London.

No. 3. NOW READY. 1s. net.

The International

A Review of the World's Progress.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS.

THE EXTENT OF BRITISH UNEMPLOYMENT.

By L. G. CHIOZZA-MONEY, M.P.

THE BELGIAN PARLIAMENT AND CONGO ANNEXATION.

By EMILE VAN DER VELDE.

THE CONFLICT OF WHITE AND NEGRO RACES.

By L. HADEN GUEST.

CHURCH AND STATE IN FRANCE: the First Year of Separation.

By Abbé PAUL NAUDET.

PROSPECTS OF THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION.

By GEORGE KHROUSTALEFF.

THE FUTURE OF SOCIOLOGY: a Discussion by Leading Sociologists of Europe and America.

THE POSSIBILITIES OF SOCIOLOGY. By the EDITOR.

FRENCH ART OF TO-DAY. By CAMILLE MANCLAIR.

Correspondents' Reports from all parts of the World on important new movements.

NOTE.—A Specimen Copy of No. 1 of "The International" will be sent free to any reader of "The Academy" on receipt of 3d. for postage.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1 Adelphi Terrace, London.

ELLIOT STOCK'S NEW BOOKS

NEW NOVELS.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net; post free, 5s. 4d.

SEAS BETWEEN; or, Called to the East and Claimed by the West. By ANNIE M. WOOD.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

RUPERT BRETT. The Story of a Modern Experiment. By HARRY FORRESTER.

NEW BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

Crown 8vo, cloth, Illustrated, 5s.

SIGN POSTS FOR CHILDREN. By A GRANDMOTHER, with a Preface by the BISHOP OF GLASGOW AND GALLOWAY. Illustrated by Miss E. A. IBBS.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

THE SOLDIERS OF THE QUEEN. By E. MARY DIXON.

A Volume of Sketches, Fairy Stories, and Short Tales, written for boys and girls.

Crown 8vo, paper cover, 6d.

JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE. A Lecture delivered at the Richmond Athenæum, Surrey, on November 18, 1907, by the Rev. ASTLEY COOPER.

NEW VOLUME OF VERSE.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net; post free, 2s. 9d.

THE TAKING OF QUEBEC, and other Poems. By SIDNEY SAMSON.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62 PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

Now Ready 66th Year of Publication

THE CLERGY LIST FOR 1908

THOROUGHLY REVISED AND CORRECTED TO THE LATEST DATE
PRICE 12s. 6d.

The "Times" says—

"Kelly's Clergy List is always entitled to a welcome from those who desire to obtain speedy and accurate information about either parsons or parishes."

The "Standard" says—

"The Clergy List is an admirable and old established directory. It is one of those annuals that have become a necessity."

The "Guardian" says—

"For convenience of arrangement and neatness of display it leaves nothing to be desired. As to the most important quality of all in a book of reference, every effort seems to have been made to ensure the accuracy of the facts, and the Clergy List certainly maintains a high standard in this respect."

The "Manchester Courier" says—

"The Clergy List is the most complete and valuable clerical handbook and directory published. This work is at once comprehensive, accurate, and well penned."

Established over 60 Years

London: KELLY'S DIRECTORIES, Ltd.
182-184 HIGH HOLBORN.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1868

FEBRUARY 22, 1908

PRICE THREEPENCE

SEVEN BOOKS FROM THE GRANT RICHARDS LIST

By ARTHUR MACHEN

Q. "The House of Souls" and "The Hill of Dreams" contain between them all Mr. Machen's contributions to modern fiction that have so far found their way between two covers. Each book has a frontispiece by S. H. Sime. The first contains those classics of the horrible "The Great God Pan," and "The Three Impostors," and the second is a long novel, 6s. ea.

By FILSON YOUNG

Q. An indispensable book to all who attend the Opera is Filson Young's "The Wagner Stories," with Portrait. 5s. net. "The Daily Telegraph" says: "What Charles Lamb did for Shakespeare Mr. Young has achieved for Wagner." Also uniform with this volume is his collections of essays on music, entitled "Masterniggers," bound in yapp Persian, price 5s. net.

By JAMES DOUGLAS

Q. "The Unpardonable Sin," the first novel by James Douglas, the distinguished literary critic, has been called the most original novel published for many years. "I sat down 'astonied,' like the old Jews, when I had finished it," says Dr. Robertson Nicoll in "The British Weekly." "A fine and imaginative romance," says The Daily Telegraph. 6s.

TWO NEW NOVELS

Q. (1) "The Armada Gold," by Edgar Turner and Reginald Hodder, authors of "The Purloined Prince." "Vigorous and entertaining," says "The Morning Leader." (2) "The Individualist," by Philip Gibbs. "A strong, real, vital piece of work." "The Observer," Price 6s. each. Send for complete list of new novels. Grant Richards, 7 Carlton St., S.W.

THE MOSHER BOOKS

THE NEW CATALOGUE FOR 1908 is now ready, and will be sent free on request to booklovers anywhere that can be reached by mail. This Catalogue, like those that preceded it, is not made up of old and hackneyed quotations concerning books. You are not wearied by "a jollie good book" jingle and that sort of thing; but you are treated to some very genuine prose and verse not seen in every cut and decidedly dried anthology.

THOMAS B. MOSHER, PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

Books for Sale

HARMSWORTH'S ENCYCLOPEDIA OF UNIVERSAL KNOWLEDGE, New and Revised Edition, 10 vols., cloth, gilt tops. Published at £2. 16s. net. 21s.—W. E. GOULDEN, Bookseller, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

FRENCH ENGRAVERS AND DRAUGHTSMEN OF THE XVIIIth CENTURY, by Lady Dilke. 9 Photogravure Plates and 38 other Illustrations. Imp. 8vo, cloth. Published by Bell & Son, 1902, at 28s. net, for 12s. 6d. net.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

BOOKS AT ONE-THIRD COST.—

Thousands of the Best Books at from 25 to 80 per cent. below the original prices. Largest and best Stock of Secondhand and New Remainder Books in the World. Write for our January Catalogue.—W. H. SMITH & SON, Library Department, 186 Strand, London, W.C.

BOOKS.—ALL OUT-OF-PRINT and RARE BOOKS on any subject SUPPLIED.

The most expert Bookfinder extant. Please state wants and ask for CATALOGUE. I make a special feature of exchanging any Saleable Books for others selected from my various Lists. Special List of 2,000 Books I particularly want post free.—EDW. BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16 John Bright Street, Birmingham. Oscar Wilde's Poems, 21s., for 10s. 6d.; Ballad of Reading Gaol, 5s. Who's Who, 2 vols. 1907, 11s. net, for 5s.

NOTICE.

All communications to the Editor should be addressed to 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

All business communications must be sent to The Manager of "The Academy," 95 Fetter Lane, E.C.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds of Typewriting carefully done at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

QUEEN SQUARE CLUB.

A social club for men and women interested in politics, literature or art. Lectures, entertainments, chess and bridge. An exquisite Queen Anne club-house, close to the British Museum, and Russell Square Station. Inexpensive lunch and dinner. Subscription two guineas.—Apply Secretary, 9 Queen Square, Bloomsbury.

JUST PUBLISHED. 8vo, boards, 1s. net.

THE SLING.

Remarks in connection with Lectures delivered in the Royal Institution, May, 1905, to June, 1907.

By WM. LEIGHTON JORDAN.

London: Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co., Ltd.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by Instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical Advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley, Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A Furnished House in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

Books, etc., Wanted

THE CAMBRIDGE LITERARY AGENCY, which is placing Novels, Short Stories, Articles, and Poems with over 100 (one hundred) Publishers and Periodicals, sold, on December 31, 12 Short Stories and a Serial by UNKNOWN WRITERS. Hundreds of unique testimonials. All MSS. submitted by GEORGE G. MAGNUS, 115 Strand, London.

WILL PURCHASE AT ANY TIME.

ILLUMINATED MANUSCRIPTS, from the earliest times till the beginning of the XVIth Century; Incunabula and other Early Printed Books; Illustrated Books, Prints, from the XVth and the beginning of the XVIth Century. Rare Old Books and Prints.—JACQUES ROSENTHAL, Munich, Bavaria. 10, Karlstr. 10.

No. 3.

NOW READY.

1s. net.

The • International

A Review of the World's Progress.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS.

THE EXTENT OF BRITISH UNEMPLOYMENT.

By L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY, M.P.

THE BELGIAN PARLIAMENT AND CONGO ANNEXATION.

By EMILE VAN DER VELDE.

THE CONFLICT OF WHITE AND NEGRO RACES.

By L. HADEN GUEST.

CHURCH AND STATE IN FRANCE: the First Year of Separation.

By Abbé PAUL NAUDET.

PROSPECTS OF THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION.

By GEORGE KHROUSTALEFF.

THE FUTURE OF SOCIOLOGY: a Discussion by Leading Sociologists of Europe and America.

THE POSSIBILITIES OF SOCIOLOGY.

By the EDITOR.

FRENCH ART OF TO-DAY.

By CAMILLE MANCLAIR.

Correspondents' Reports from all parts of the World on important new movements.

NOTE.—A Specimen Copy of No. 1 of "The International" will be sent free to any reader of "The Academy" on receipt of 3d. for postage

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1 Adelphi Terrace, London.

The Booklovers Library

delivers books in London and to any part of the United Kingdom. Its books are unlabelled, fresh, clean and inviting. It gives you a carriage-paid service or not, just as you wish. It gives you the books you want when you want them.

FOR LONDON AND COUNTRY.

ORDINARY SERVICE.

	Twelve Months	Six Months	Three Months
One Book ...	£1 1 0	£ 12 0	£ 7 0
Two Books ...	1 11 6	18 0	10 6
Three Books ...	1 17 0	1 1 0	12 0
Four Books ...	2 2 0	1 4 0	14 0
Six Books ...	2 12 6	1 11 6	16 0
Eight Books ...	3 3 0	1 16 0	18 0

Subscribers to the above service may exchange their books personally or by messenger as often as desired at the Library in Harrod's Stores, and at 17 Hanover Street, W. Country Subscribers to the above service may exchange their books by Rail or Parcels Post, as often as desired, paying carriage both ways. All boxes of books are forwarded to subscribers in advance; the finished volumes being returned to the Library upon receipt of fresh supply. The cost of carriage on four books, by rail, is in almost every case the same as on two or three books.

Booklet giving full terms of Subscription, the latest Monthly Book List, etc., will be sent Post Free upon application.

The Booklovers Library

17 Hanover Street, London, W.

And at Harrods Limited, Brompton Road, S.W.

The Autotype Company

74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON

MONOCHROME COPIES

BY THE PERMANENT AUTOTYPE CARBON PROCESS OF PICTURES BY OLD MASTERS From the PRINCIPAL COLLECTIONS OF NOTE.

NUMEROUS EXAMPLES OF WORKS BY MODERN ARTISTS

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY'S Processes of Permanent Photographic Reproduction are extensively employed by the Trustees of the British Museum, the Local Government Board, many of the Learned Societies, and leading Publishers.

COPIES OF COINS, SEALS, MEDALS, MSS., DRAWINGS, ENGRAVINGS, ART OBJECTS, MICROSCOPIC WORKS, &c.

For Limited Editions the Autotype Processes of Book Illustrations are cheaper than any existing methods of Block Reproductions, and yield infinitely superior results.

Inquiries are invited from those requiring Book Illustrations of the very highest quality. SPECIMENS AND ESTIMATES SUBMITTED.

The Autotype Fine Art Gallery

74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Open Free Daily, 10 to 6

BOOKS BY POST

Orders from any part of the Country for the despatch of Books by Post or any inquiries regarding Books receive the most prompt attention at

W · H · SMITH & SON'S

BOOKSHOP

KINGSWAY · LONDON · W · C

Full Discount allowed for Cash

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
Life and Letters	479	"Persimmon"	489
Waste Ground at Aldwych	481	Musical Comedy	490
Literature:		"La Nave" or the Cloac
A Sane Critic	481	Massima?	491
Sir Henry Drummond Wolff's		The Library Table	492
Reminiscences	482	Fiction	493
East and West—II.	483	Drama:
A Happy Traveller	484	"Diana of Dobson's" at the
Venice	486	Kingsway Theatre	495
Education—Political Obstacles	486	Correspondence	495
Burns's Home-spun	488	Books Received	498

Registered, as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to The Wilsford Press, Ltd., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The publishing offices of THE ACADEMY are at 95 Fetter Lane, E.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

IT appears that the "great address" presented to Mr. George Meredith on his eightieth birthday, signed by a large number of very distinguished and important people (and an almost equal number of quite undistinguished and unimportant people) was organised by Mr. Clement Shorter! There is something exceedingly comic in the idea that all these distinguished and important people should have consented to range themselves with sheep-like docility under the banner of Mr. Shorter. That an address should be presented to one who is (with the possible exception of Mr. Hardy) our greatest living novelist on his eightieth birthday is very right and proper, but surely the organisation of such a scheme should have been placed in the hands of someone less remotely connected with literature than Mr. Shorter. We presume that this gentleman is responsible for the text of the "address" itself. If so, we can only say that it is worthy of its author. Anything more undistinguished and uninspired it is hard to imagine. It is to be regretted that what might have been made a graceful and noteworthy compliment to a venerable figure in contemporary literature has been turned into a highly unnecessary advertisement of a second-rate journalist.

Literature has sustained an undoubted loss, chiefly in the department of direction, by the death of Sir James Knowles, which took place unexpectedly on February 13th. He will be remembered as the founder of the Nineteenth Century, of which he remained proprietor and editor until his death, and perhaps equally as the founder of the Metaphysical Society. He rendered service by combining in both unities men of the most divergent views, such as Gladstone, Manning, Huxley, Tyndall, Ward the idealist, Froude, Ruskin, Stanley, and Mark Pattison; and the four survivors, Mr. Frederic Harrison, Professor Seeley, Mr. John Morley, and Mr. Arthur Balfour. If we are not mistaken, he never succeeded in attracting to the society, at least, a writer of perhaps wider personal influence than any of these—Newman.

Though the Nineteenth Century has always been rather over ponderous, its comprehensive liberality cannot be denied. If representation in its pages cannot be taken exactly as a title to fame, most of the well-known writers of the period have contributed something to them. As an earnest of the continuance of its high tradition, Sir James was careful to associate the first number of the twentieth century with the name of Mr. Swinburne. Moreover, Sir James kept his editorship singularly free from those accesses of fury or favour which often deprive earlier reviews of any critical value. The slow course of the Nineteenth Century has not been erratic. Sir James's achievements as a practical architect are not of much importance, and when they go the way of other modern London buildings, their departure will not cause much regret. Indeed, the fact of their present existence will cause some surprise, since Sir James's connection with architecture has been almost forgotten. The knighthood conferred on him in 1903 was, we presume, in recognition of his literary services. He accepted it with a charming complacency, and no one will grudge him the recognition which his kindly, broad-minded and intellectual editorship justly deserved.

Mr. Stead, diverting himself for a moment from the consideration of ghosts and Dreadnoughts, has been holding a symposium in the Review of Reviews on the great question of Food, Drink, and Tobacco. One wonders, by the way, how such a term as "symposium" is tolerated in advanced circles. Surely "a high tea" were more decent, since, in spite of the immense progress that has been made in popular education, there are still many people who know that "symposium" really means a drinking-party. However, passing by this scruple, it is deeply interesting to learn the opinions of our great men on these great questions. Mr. Bernard Shaw says smoking is "a filthy habit"; Mr. Frederic Harrison says it is "a beastly habit"; while the more courtly Sir Theodore Martin merely says that he has always had an "extreme dislike" for tobacco.

But it is a Dr. Fairbairn—a Dissenting teacher, we believe—who speaks the most precious words. Socialism and Positivism are somewhat intolerant in their damnation of a habit for which they have no leanings, but Dissent—if Dr. Fairbairn be a Dissenter—is quite frankly idiotic. Here is the dictum:

As to drink and tobacco, I know neither. He who does his work in the strength of either fails to do it well. Work done by the strength of wine, or the soothing influence of the pipe, is certain to be ill-done.

A pleasing instance, this, of the "simple Bible teaching" that Dr. Fairbairn would like to see universal. It is odd enough that the sects which have been howling their devotion for the Bible—"the dear old Bible," "the grand old Book," "the Bible the religion of Protestants," "the Bible and nothing but the Bible," etc., etc., etc.—for so many years, should be notorious and constant in their opposition both to the letter and spirit of the collection of canonical writings given by the council to the Church.

This is not a question of opinion, it is a matter of fact. Not only does the Psalmist praise wine as one of the greatest of the material blessings bestowed on men, not only is the symbol of the vineyard and the vine of constant recurrence in the Old Testament—the vineyard signifying Israel as God designed it to be—not only was the first miracle that the Christ wrought, the turning of water into the very best wine, not only have we the record that the Christ was blamed because He ate and drank with publicans and sinners; but one of the elements of the great Christian Sacrament—that Sacrament which, according to Coleridge, is Christianity—is wine, and heaven itself is to be a drinking of the juice of the vine. And these Dissenting people are the knights of the Bible, enemies to the death of the Sacerdotalists, who, they say, would take the Good Book and its simple teaching from the poor little children!

And these considerations apart, take Dr. Fairbairn's remarks from the simple point of their truth or falsity, as a statement of a fact, or of what pretends to be a fact. "Work done by the strength of wine . . . is certain to be ill done." Witness, we suppose, those dull and clumsy odes of Horace; witness the Platonic philosophy; witness, in a word, the whole of ancient and ninety-nine hundredths of modern literature—or was that a "temperance" society that used to meet at the Mermaid, the Sun, the Dog, the Triple Tun?

Where we such clusters had
As made us nobly wild, not mad.

Clusters?—of gooseberries, one supposes Dr. Fairbairn would say. And as for tobacco; if Dr. Fairbairn, who knows nothing of tobacco, will be so kind as to excel the works of Hobbes, Carlyle, and Tennyson (to mention three names by chance), who all knew a good deal about tobacco—well, we shall be equally delighted and surprised.

The latest issue of the Reliquary (now edited by Rev. Dr. Cox, in succession to the late Mr. Romilly Allen) maintains a high standard. Mr. Tavenor Perry's drawings, illustrating his article on Abo, the ancient capital of Finland, are excellent. It is perhaps not generally known that the cathedral church of Abo is dedicated to an Englishman, St. Henry, a missionary bishop in the twelfth century. Some Essex brasses are dealt with, both in the above-named magazine and in the latest issue of the Transactions of the Essex Archaeological Society. A historically valuable work is the transcribing and publication of ancient documents. The present volume contains a certain number of such records in the shape of inventories of church goods at Barking, Wakes Colne, Tolleshunt D'Arcy and Rainham, and medieval wills from the parish of Chigwell.

The Home Counties Magazine contains a further instalment of Mr. C. W. Forbes's notes on the Early Churches of South Essex; some records of parish history relating to East Kent, and an illustrated article on the picturesque moated house of Groombridge Place. The parish church, rebuilt in 1625, is dedicated to "the most blessed Prince Charles"—but who is thereby intended remains a mystery.

It is, of course, quite natural that Tariff Reformers should claim the enormous reduction in the Liberal majority at Leeds as an indication that the electorate is coming round to their views. No doubt to a certain extent they are justified; but it is obvious to anyone who looks at the matter impartially that the chief cause of the remarkable change which has taken place in this extreme Radical stronghold is the growing revolt against the educational policy of the Government, and the arbitrary and unconstitutional methods of Mr. McKenna. The Roman Catholics of the constituency voted solidly in favour of the Conservative candidate, and this fact, we are informed, accounts for a turnover of at least 800 votes. It is safe to assume that the vast majority of Anglican Churchmen, a great many of whom "voted Liberal" at the last election, voted on this occasion for the other side. If the Unionist party had the sense to see it they would realise that religious education in the schools, and not Tariff Reform or any other "reform," is the policy which they ought to put in the forefront of their programme. We are not concerned here with the merits or demerits of the Tariff Reform policy, and we wish to express no opinion on that subject which is outside our province; but we are convinced that there are hundreds of thousands of men and women in this country who would cheerfully sacrifice their opinions on that question rather than allow their children to be handed over to "the abomination of desolation" which begins with simple Bible teaching and ends in "the New Theology" and unblushing Atheism.

The Liverpool Courier last week reported at length a very amusing lecture delivered by our contributor, Mr. Ross, on "Decay in Art and Literature," at the Independent Lecture Society, founded by Mr. S. G. Legge. Mr. Ross, in a very characteristic way, maintained that there was no such thing as "decay," a position we should not care to defend. But those who came to resist his contention remained to pay a tribute to the "eloquence, charm, and wit of the speaker," to quote the words of Professor Ramsay Muir.

It seems that we have not quite heard the last of the Tribune. At the present moment there are differences between the staff and the proprietors of London's late "penny Liberal daily paper." These are concerned with the matter of notice of dismissal. On the day of the paper's demise a meeting of the editorial staff was formally convened, and a committee empowered to administrate the furtherance of the staff's claims was duly elected. Last week an effort to resolve these differences in a peaceable settlement made by the London branch of the Institute of Journalists proved abortive, and there is now every reason to believe that the issue will be determined by a legal tribunal. One of the chief businesses of such a trial would be to pronounce on the validity or invalidity of certain documents issued to the members of the staff under remarkable circumstances exactly a month before the Tribune terminated its hazardous career. The public in general and the profession of journalists in particular will watch for the final disposition of events with peculiar interest.

WASTE GROUND AT ALDWYCH

(On finding fifty species of plants growing upon a vacant building site)

At Aldwych in the Strand,
 Hoarded amid the noisy throng of men
 Till they shall build again,
 A little plot of brickstrewn vacant land,
 Where late were marts and inns
 And theatres where pleasures strove to drown
 The restless cares of town,
 Lies open to the the will of wind and sun:
 And of man's purpose none
 Has power within the paling—neither sins
 Nor any good deeds hap there—Nature free
 Once again holds sovereignty.
 Clovers white and crimson grow
 Lusty on the lime below;
 Lady's Fingers loved of Dane
 Many a wound did staunch of old
 Here before St. Clement's fane
 Lift from sea-green leaves their gold;
 Vesper-loving Campions who
 Breathe from petals hung with dew
 Incense while the bindweeds sleep,
 Bid the moths their vigil keep;
 Near's a little Elder sprung
 That same tree that Judas hung,
 King of common herbs or rare
 Not a mole is here to scare;
 Sheepsorrel of barren soil
 And Soldier's Woundwort—harsh Milfoil—
 That which first Achilles used
 Oft for other hurts infused,
 Leaves that lessen in an hour
 Sombre melancholy's power;
 Here's Waybred with bowery leaves
 Elves may hide in safe as thieves
 Till spider-fighting toads get hurt
 And browse the edge for cure alert;
 Jean Cherry, of whose fruit 'tis told
 Our Lord gave Peter one to hold
 With gentle counsel meet and wise
 Nothing to scorn for little size,
 The same that, brought from Asian soil,
 Lucullus prized o'er golden spoil;
 And Groundsel dear to cage-bred birds
 And easy found as kindly words,
 Whose root the Highland women wear
 To guard against a witch's stare;
 The Headache flower's flaunting red
 That brings false rest like leman's bed;
 The Corn sow-thistle rearing high
 Its golden blossoms to the sky
 Whose juicy leaves have here respite
 From pilfering wild hare's appetite;
 Fig, first-named tree in Holy Writ
 Threatened of old but never smit;
 Rose Willow-herbs with blossoms tall
 And Shepherd's Purse that some do call
 Pickpocket, stealing needed ground
 And Coltsfoot fond of rubble mound.
 I watch them from some bracken fern
 Wondering to see how soon return
 These pagan natives of the land
 The moment man witholds his hand.
 The sun gleams bright on far St. Paul's
 And on my ears the traffic falls
 With hoot of car and hurry of feet
 And is it bitter or is it sweet
 To think how soon if we were gone
 Wildflowers would clothe the ground whereon
 We built and lived? Yet might be found
 In these same flowers that star the ground

A promise that we shall not cease
 When all we thought us perished is;
 But even as the thistles there,
 Borne upon some diviner air
 Build nobler lives than man has seen
 With all the best that we have been.

A. HUGH FISHER.

LITERATURE

A SANE CRITIC

Periods of European Literature. Vol. XII.: The Later Nineteenth Century. By GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A. (Blackwood, 5s. net.)

ALL our congratulations are due to Professor Saintsbury for his concluding volume of a very useful series. The period under survey—1850-1900—is, as the author remarks, one of the most interesting in the history of literature; and those who desire the help of a genial, sane, and learned guide to the literary accomplishment of the last fifty years should certainly consult this excellent text-book. Professor Saintsbury writes with an admirable sense of balance; he is always good-humoured, and he preserves an even mind between the excesses of the optimist and the pessimist schools of literary criticism. He does not think that Ibsen has rendered Shakespeare obsolete; he is far from believing that the canon of the sacred writings has been finally closed; and one is sure that he would disagree with Mr. George Moore's dictum—that the English language has become hopelessly vulgarised and useless for all the high purposes of art. Professor Saintsbury believes, and probably with good reason, that in the main that which has been is as that which will be; that so long as man is man his thought will have its interest and its beauties. On the one hand he would never yield an attentive ear to the nonsense which has been talked, which will doubtless be talked again, on the text that "Modern Science" has produced a New Heaven and a New Earth in letters; on the other hand he would refuse to despair of the future of good prose and good poetry because Haeckel can be bought for fourpence-halfpenny. No doubt Professor Saintsbury could produce many historic proofs to show that the most solemn follies pass and are forgotten; the "Higher Criticism," for instance, leaves him neither ecstatic nor angry, but merely amused; and so the book closes with a good hope for good work yet to be accomplished.

Of course there are faults to be found; or rather there are propositions which seem disputable rather than final, to the present writer at all events. One is inclined to doubt, for example, whether Professor Saintsbury is quite just to three very different authors—Dickens, Ibsen, and Zola. The first is dismissed as "fantastic"; the epithet being used so as to convey a slight note of disparagement. Is not such a conclusion founded on such a suppressed premiss of a highly dubious kind? Can we assent to the proposition that a fantasist, qua fantasist, is inferior to a writer who is not fantastic? Surely not; for if this were so how should we judge of Aristophanes, how of Rabelais, how of Hawthorne? "The Scarlet Letter" is a maze of exquisite and wonderful fantasy, but it is fantastic always; if it were not it were a squalid story of commonplace sinners. Professor Saintsbury is clearly of opinion that Dickens loses by his fantasy, and that Thackeray gains by his lack of that quality: may we be permitted to enter the plea that the proposition should be reversed? There is no beauty without strangeness in the proportion; what is this strangeness but fantasy?

We are afraid that with respect to Ibsen Professor Saintsbury has been somewhat prejudiced by the follies of the Ibsenites—a horrid sect, truly. Professor Saintsbury, one fears, was forced to partake of the sour grapes which these people exhibited by the cartload in the early 'nineties, and his teeth are a little on edge in consequence. It is not to be wondered at; still we must not suffer foolish praise and a more foolish propaganda to blind us to the very high merits of a very great man. "Ghosts" would suffer, doubtless, if compared with the greatest masterpieces; but let it be compared with the best work that has been done in England for the last twenty years, and it will seem great indeed. It is not necessary to be specific; everyone will recollect plays which have not only run for hundreds of nights but have been acclaimed as triumphs of admirable and serious art; and beside "Ghosts" these things are discerned to be mere emptiness, compact of false hair, grease-paint, and tinsel; not fantastic, certainly, but altogether phantasmal.

And one doubts whether the treatment of Zola be altogether judicious or judicial. It must be said at once that Professor Saintsbury allows Zola very high merit, and we can agree cordially with his repudiation of the absurd pseudo-scientific theories which Zola thought of as first principles of romance-writing. In fact it is probable that Zola's "scientific" method was to him as the smell of apples was to Schiller, as the mascotte is to the gambler, as the talisman is to a Mahomedan tribesman: a sort of charm which gave confidence and support through a laborious and terrible task. Seriously considered, of course, it was nothing, or worse than nothing; but we cannot agree with Professor Saintsbury that it did very much damage. One can admire and appreciate the Rougon-Macquart romances without bothering one's self about heredity or the exact influence of the great-aunt Dide—or whatever her name was: these "formulas," this "naturalism" business no doubt cheered and amused Zola, and, really, have done little or no damage to the work. Take "L'Œuvre," a book which Professor Saintsbury praises: it stands alone, a wonderful romance, a unique picture of the great and bitter struggle of art; who need care about determining Claude Lantier's place in that dismal genealogical tree of Rougon-Macquart? Claude Lantier is M. Chose, he is a type of the artist martyred, his history is a symbol of the horrible gulf that yawns between the Idea and the Masterpiece. His relationship to Nana, to the engine-driver of "La Bête Humaine" is of no consequence to the reader; it neither helps nor hinders.

Then there is another point. Professor Saintsbury reproaches Ibsen for the subject-matter of "Ghosts"; he reproaches Zola more strongly for the subject-matter of many of his books, of "Nana" and "La Terre" in especial. Now, is this a sound criticism? We doubt it gravely. "Nana," perhaps, is to be condemned on quite other grounds; it is a composite piece, half journalism (but wonderful journalism!), half tract (and what a tract!). It may fairly be said that the matter remains untransmuted; no more awful sermon as to the true nature of "gay" life has been preached, we may be sure, from any pulpit, no more tremendous illustration of the words, "the end of these things is Death," has ever been uttered; but, as Professor Saintsbury would remind us, these are pleas not to be uttered in the High Court of Art, and from the artistic point of view "Nana" must be condemned. It is a wonderfully clever novel, but it is nowhere raised up into the region of Universals. But with "La Terre" it is different. Here, again, we have a tract of terrific power—if Monseigneur of Orleans were wise every priest in his archdiocese should be compelled to pass an examination in the book before receiving a cure of souls—but it is much more than a tract. Here, indeed, we are in the region of Universals. The plot is that of "King Lear," of "Père Goriot," and we must confess that for us the passions are more thoroughly purged by the pity and terror of "La Terre" than by the work of Balzac. There is something in the central idea of the Soil of La Beauce as a hideous and malignant divinity, a Moloch to whom all must pass by fire that seems great and antique and terrible in its dignity: this is surely true romance. In the book there are certainly many disgusting passages; but there are disgusting passages in Shakespeare, there are disgusting passages in Rabelais. It is possible to exalt the gutter to the stars; it is possible to make foulness part of a great scheme. And let it be remembered always that Zola, the Free-thinker, was above all a fair man: there is only one lovable character in "La Terre," and that is the choleric little parish priest, afflicted by the "mania of charity," who walked in a cassock green with age that his horrible poor might have bread. If Professor Saintsbury would but believe it there is more of the prodesse in "La Terre" than in all the library that Miss Yonge left behind her.

It is a pity that the author has not clarified his style. He is over fond of the parenthesis, and sometimes one comes on sentences such as this:

A period which produced Wordsworth, Coleridge, Scott, Byron, Shelley, and Keats; which saw the beginnings at least of the great French Romantic School and of Heine, the mighty autumn of Goethe, the shadowed genius of Leopardi; which had in England more especially, but also elsewhere, "second strings" of poets who in most other periods would have been worthy protagonists; which—in a manner of itself serving as a note of primacy—adopted and mastered as it thought fit, every department of its kind—epic, lyric, satire, even the poetical (if not exactly the theatric-poetical) drama—such a period can have no gainsayers outside the ranks of the incompetent and the crocheteers.

But with all differences and deductions we can cordially recommend this most interesting and sympathetic study of modern European literature.

SIR HENRY DRUMMOND WOLFF'S REMINISCENCES

Rambling Recollections. By the RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR HENRY DRUMMOND WOLFF, G.C.B., G.C.M.G., late British Ambassador in Spain. 2 vols. (Macmillan, 30s. net.)

SIR HENRY WOLFF tells us in his preface that his book is founded on no diary or record, and he might have added that it is built up without much method either. The result is an impression of listening to the casual conversation of a widely-experienced and thoughtful man of the world, now serious, now light; and that is a very good thing to listen to. If we might advise the reader, we should say that the best plan is to read such a book with breaks, not continuously. If one were staying in the same house with such a conversationalist, one would not want to listen to him absolutely without an interval all day; one would like space now and then to wonder in what sort of mood he would be at the next meal—reminiscent, or theoretical, or what not. Read in this way Sir Henry is delightful; read continuously there are moments when he might slightly pall, because writing, not for effect, but just as "the contents of the book—whether narrative or anecdotic—" "come unbidden into my memory," he is apt now and then simply to record the names of friends or acquaintances whom he met at this or that place in his diplomatic career. In this respect Sir Henry's memory, which he modestly says is "not a bad one," is really extraordinary, recording who married whom or what became of So-and-so to an extent amazing to those who live in limited circles. It comes with practice, we suppose; in any case, it is a most valuable social gift. When, however, the people mentioned are not remarkable or interesting, or when nothing remarkable or interesting is told of them, the mention of them does not appeal very strongly to readers who are not acquainted with them. That is absolutely the only criticism we have to make, and it does not go far, for this habit of recording names simply completes the likeness to average good conversation.

The matter of the volumes varies considerably. Sometimes it consists of good stories—and Sir Henry has a multitude to tell—sometimes of careful exposition of complex political situations, sometimes of studies—as of "geomancy," in which Sir Henry is an expert. We need not follow him in detail through his useful career as his country's representative. His best early work was perhaps in the settlement of the Ionian Islands question; his best later work in Persia, where he saw very clearly the issues which have been decided in our recent treaty with Russia. Of his Parliamentary activities at home he does not say much, and of the Fourth Party very little indeed. Probably Mr. Winston Churchill's book on his father and Mr. Harold Gorst's on the Fourth Party seemed to Sir Henry to have covered the ground sufficiently. We cannot but regret, however, that he does not give us more of his personal memories of that epoch, for, after all, he was there, on the scene, and Mr. Churchill and Mr. Harold Gorst were not, however close to the primal authorities.

It is always curious to note, in reading reminiscences written late in life, how the pranks and high spirits of youth peep out (when that part is in question) under the grave manner. Sir Henry Wolff has a story of how he, Sir Arthur Otway, and Colonel Gordon-Cumming saw Louis Napoleon proclaimed President in the guise of members of the National Guard, provided with muskets, and presenting arms when the Prince-President approached. One would suppose that this spree was the most natural way of seeing the show. In the same way he tells us, as the late Mr. Frederick Leveson-Gower told us in his reminiscences, that he frequented Lola Montes' house in Half Moon Street, when that enterprising lady came to London after being driven out of Bavaria, and one might have a kind of idea that her receptions were stately ceremonials; we do not mean to suggest that they were not decorous, but gay and rollicking we may surely hope they were. Sir Henry was one of the brilliant society of the Owls, knew Taglioni, Bulwer Lytton, Kinglake—but he knew everybody, and tells us much that is to the point. Some letters he prints are extremely interesting, notably one from Mr. Arthur Balfour in Fourth Party days, and one from Disraeli after the Berlin Congress; the latter, indeed, is extremely important for a right understanding of Disraeli's aims and achievement, and should not be missed. He is evidently interested in the occult, and, besides the study of "geomancy" referred to above, has tales to tell of clairvoyants, especially a wonderful Egyptian known as the Sheikha, and of curious premonitions.

And as for the good stories—well, they should be read in their places, that the genial flavour which comes of their quietly humorous setting may not be missed. Humour is their chief quality, and humour must have its right context. "If it were my misfortune," says Sir Henry Wolff, "to write any sequel to this book, I should have much to say that space has now forced me to omit." His misfortune would be our exceeding gain, and we appeal to his altruism.

EAST AND WEST.—II.

"Religio Laici" Judaica, the Faith of a Jewish Layman. By LAURIE MAGNUS. (Routledge, 2s. 6d. net.)

The Crescent versus the Cross. By HALIL HALID. (Luzac and Co.)

IN the first part of this article, which appeared on the 8th of February, we were able to notice little more than the bare existence of Mr. Laurie Magnus's and Halil Hâlid Efendi's books, "Religio Laici" Judaica is a collection of essays partly re-written, which were contributed by Mr. Magnus to the Jewish Quarterly Review, the Fortnightly Review and the Jewish World. His primary object is to preserve Judaism from the innovations advocated by Mr. Claude Montefiore. We must remember that Judaism has long lost perforce its sacrificial character, at least in practice. We must also premise that further modifications were made under the influence of the leaders of Jewish Emancipation in 1842. Just as the discontinuance of sacrifices was necessitated by the destruction of the Temple, so these, as Mr. Magnus justly points out, were necessitated by the exodus of the Jews from the Ghetto into full citizenship, which in itself implied a partial renunciation of tribal exclusiveness. Mr. Magnus makes out for such modifications a good title to be the natural developments of time, the leaves shed by the growing tree. Similarly the early Church shed the practice of communism. He maintains, and as far as Gentiles are capable of judging we agree with him, that the essentials of Judaism have not been lost thereby, but rather confirmed; as he quotes from the Rabbi Simon ben Lakish, "sometimes to annul a law is to establish it." It is the Judaism of 1842, Judaism modified in expression only by the necessities of its circumstances, on which Mr. Magnus takes his stand. Mr. Montefiore goes very much further, and we can see little in his "Jewish persuasion" but a vague deism, in which he, Halil Hâlid Efendi and the Rector of St. Jude's, Whitechapel, might before long agree to an interchange of pulpits. The Jew of this type seems to Mr. Magnus and to us to be perpetually apologising for his race and his religion. To Mr. Magnus, Forms, Separation, and Restrictions are of the essence of Judaism, though they may vary according to circumstance and in the course of time become modified or even contradictory; "I deliberately prefer," he says, "to preserve the environment of Solomon, . . . this is not merely true but vital." He opposes Mr. Montefiore with great moderation, but he firmly holds the philosophic view that expression is essential to any enduring faith which is to fill for long the hearts of men. In the first part of his book he not only expresses the traditional in contradistinction to the sceptical spirit in Judaism alone, he represents Religion in contradistinction to mere Morality, Theology in contradistinction to Science, Faith in contradistinction to Intellect. Many of his arguments are admirably expressed, we wish indeed that he had trusted still more to himself than he has, and had relied less on the views of Western writers of little philosophical value. Possibly such quotations are necessary in order to appeal to the ultra-occidentalism of Mr. Montefiore. We prefer quotations from Mr. Magnus himself:

The appeal from faith to reason . . . is more often than not an appeal from light to darkness. Gemeinsinn is the cleverness of das Gemeine, and in affairs of the soul . . . commonsense degrades, not exalts.

Earth is our nurse, not our mother; the secret of our being is not here.

The Evolutionists give God longer names, they do not give Him truer names.

Liturgical language never pretends to scientific exactness . . . but claims . . . a higher truth than the truth of scientific demonstration . . . it is the language of imagination which "fulfils the shortcomings of other modes of expression." My need of the God-idea does not make me a religious man, it makes me a religious minded man, . . . I am conscious that, as a religious-minded man, my need of the God-idea is far more intellectual than moral. . . . I do not—it is a personal experience—I do not expect to become more good by practising religion. Its practices may have that indirect effect, but their primary object is to make men more wise.

Once more:

I am convinced—it is a conviction of immemorial antiquity—that the religious sense is cultivable, and should be cultivated. Its neglect or atrophy is an intellectual loss, comparable to, but surpassing, in the measure of the loss, a deafness to music, or a blindness to colour, or an imperception of scent: "Get wisdom" [Carpe scientiam] cries the author of the Proverbs.

We have desired to allow Mr. Magnus to express himself as far as our space permits. He does so well, and we entirely sympathise with him so far. Again, he seems to us Gentiles to define the essential force of Judaism itself:

The ceremonial of the Jewish religion, as required by the Levitical ordinances, and as elaborated by subsequent and less inspired legislators, was directed throughout to the consecration of the commonplace. Its object was to endow the least elevated of common duties with a sense of responsibility, and to co-ordinate the whole series of physical and moral functions under the same category of cleanliness and holiness.

In "the consecration of the commonplace," Mr. Magnus seems to us to explain the moral force of Judaism throughout its course more truly than we have ever seen it explained before. It is that which has endowed the Jew with his "immense talent and power of idealisation." The present reviewer is no more philo-Semitic than he is anti-Semitic in the present acceptance of the term, and if he had space he would be obliged to show himself in frequent disagreement with Mr. Magnus in the more distinctly Jewish portions of his book, though, in opposition to Mr. Montefiore, he sympathises with him throughout. It is impossible to follow their interesting controversy further than to point out how completely right Mr. Magnus is, in the interests of his race, in his opposition to "mixed marriages." His moderation has prevented his arguments against them being much more conclusive than they are. We cannot doubt that it is the inter-breeding of the Jew which, in defiance of the "natural laws" applicable to every other people, has endowed him with the intellect and physique of which he has so much reason to be proud; which, together with that "consecration of the commonplace" on which his isolation is founded, has given him his "sobriety," his "moral patience," his "long-suffering," and "a positive distaste for such excesses as have ruined other races"; which, in fact, maintains his race a corporate unity after many centuries of dispersion. So certain does this seem to us that we would alter a sentence of Mr. Magnus's thus: "No thoughtful Jew regards himself as other than a stranger in the land." Though Mr. Montefiore—and Mr. Magnus too—may turn with sympathy to the Gentile, from the School of Safed, the Jews of Safed represented qualities as essential to their race and religion as those nobler ones on which we have dwelt; while the European "of the Jewish persuasion" has no existence outside the imagination of Mr. Montefiore.

We turn with regret to "The Crescent versus the Cross," for we have been forced to invert the intentions of Balaam. If Halil Hálid Efendi had compared elevated doctrines in the Koran with those of the Gospels, or the verbal contradictions to be found in both, we should have followed him with interest. If he had maintained that Jews and Christians enjoyed more opportunities for mental and spiritual development under the Abbassides than under Charlemagne, or that Constantinople was now more civilised than New York, we should not have been eager to contradict him. If he had compared the innumerable sects and bloody wars among Mohammedans and Christians alike, we should have been interested. But he confuses Cause and Effect, Essential and Accidental, as completely as the least instructed Christian controversialist. He treats the Gospels, nationality, custom, trade, politics, the Vatican, the Free Church Council, and "The City of God" as synonyms. His ideas of Christianity are as clear and authentic as those of "a clergyman" concerning the position of women under Mohammedanism, expounded to "a lady" on a Nile tour, which he relates so indignantly, and, we regret to say, have no more importance. He strikes us as the exponent of "a vague deism," because his objections to the expression of Christianity are equally applicable to Mohammedanism or any other revealed religion. It would be an injustice to Mr. Montefiore to suggest any other comparison between him and Halil Hálid Efendi, and this only to a very limited extent, because the Efendi seems to be devoid of any philosophic sense. He is annoyed because the friends of the dead in the West, as in Turkey, care more for the manner of sepulture than the fact. He thinks it foolish to prefer the superfluous to the necessary. That is what is meant by civilisation—namely, a state in which the individual cares no more for necessities which are provided for him, but only for superfluities, which is all there is left for him to provide for himself. To find the appreciation of Mahommed which we had hoped for, we have to turn from the Efendi back to Richard Burton, or to some of those instructed officials and clergy whom the Efendi quotes in support of his statements, although they are embraced in his condemnations. For the power and beauty which Mohammedanism yields we seek in the charming stories of Mr. Pickthall and Mr. Hanauer. We return whence we started. It is in stories such as these, with their human humour, their touching affection, their high-souled devotion, their wisdom, their justice, their sincerity, all the varied fruits of life, that we seek the real unity between the three living faiths, and not in the colourless waste of a vague resemblance, to which we are led when reason has eliminated all their essentials. Thus we see in their dissimilitude, the unity between great artists—Fra Angelico and Rembrandt—and none in their works reduced to a common denominator by the same photographer. It is the philosophic value of differences in expression, their contradictions and their unity, that Mr. Magnus understands so well.

A HAPPY TRAVELLER

Before and after Waterloo. Letters from Edward Stanley (sometime Bishop of Norwich). Edited by JANE H. ADEANE and MAUD GRENFELL. (Fisher Unwin, 14s. net.)

THESE letters of Dean Stanley's father (there are a few by other hands) were well worth printing, and many of the sketches that accompany them (also from the pen of the future Bishop) have both craftsmanship and spirit. Together they form an interesting and vivacious memorial of Continental life and travel in the generation before railways and steamships, whilst they also reveal a strong and attractive personality. Moreover, by those interested in the history of the times, the scraps of gossip and personal observation recorded will be by no means despised.

The editors have prefixed a biographical memoir of the happy traveller (we will not call him tourist), who, when he wrote the letters, was rector of Alderley, in Cheshire. Both from this and from the internal evidence of the epistles, we gather that, worthy pastor as he was, Stanley's natural bent was by no means clerical, far less theological. He had strong scientific tastes, and took a great interest in matters naval and military; but probably his physique was better suited to the Church than to the Army or Navy, though his love of humanity and great powers of observation were by no means thrown away in his chosen profession.

The first batch of letters record a tour in France, Northern Italy, and Spain, undertaken in 1802-3, between the Treaty of Amiens and the resumption of the war. The young Cambridge graduate saw Talma act, and thought him very like Kemble; was "most highly entertained in viewing the Great Gallery of the Louvre," but missed the much desired sight of Bonaparte. At Lyons, however, he witnessed the guillotining of five men who had robbed farmhouses, and made a sketch of a machine he saw at Chalon-sur-Saône. Afterwards he visited the battlefield of Marengo and other scenes of the fighting between Turin and Genoa. From Leghorn he sailed for Spain, where he experienced the utmost discomfort in travelling, and formed a far from flattering estimate of the inhabitants. "In Malaga," he notes, "few nights pass without some murders. Those who have any regard for their safety must, after dark, carry a sword and a lantern. You may form some idea of the people when (sic) there was one fellow at Granada who had with his own hand committed no less than twenty-two murders." On the other hand, "Nothing could be more gratifying to an Englishman than finding wherever he goes the manufactures of his own country. This in Spain is particularly the case; there is scarcely a single article of any description which this people can make for themselves" In another letter he says that he has been told on undoubted authority "that a nobleman unable to write his own name, or even read his own pedigree, is by no means a difficult thing to meet with," and describes the King as "considered little better than a tool of Buonaparte's." The traveller had to forego Rome and Naples, but returned home with some knowledge of Spanish as a set-off.

Before Stanley's letters descriptive of his experiences in France and the Netherlands in 1814 we get a glimpse of the state of things in England during that eventful year. A letter from Catherine Fanshawe, a novelist then in vogue, gives a piquant account of a meeting between Byron and Madame de Staël at Sir Humphry Davy's; and Mrs. Edward Stanley describes to her sister London's furor over the foreign potentates who were then its guests. Both Stanley and his wife entered with avidity into the pastime of Emperor-hunting, and had some, though not much, luck—of which they made the most. So did others; an individual at the opera netted forty guineas "by opening his box door and allowing those in the lobbies to take a peep for a guinea apiece" at the Imperial celebrities; whilst the incorrigible Lady Caroline Lamb successfully personated Blücher at Lady Cork's reception one night. It was remarked that at the time "Have you seen the Emperor?" had entirely superseded the use of "How do you do?" The Emperor was, of course, the Tsar Alexander I. Before another of the allied Sovereigns—the King of Prussia—Stanley had the honour of preaching, though he did not know it. Mrs. Stanley thought Alexander's head "very like R. Heber's."

The cream of the book is in the 1814 letters, "before Waterloo." Stanley's enthusiasm is inexhaustible, his observation comprehensive; and he is determined "not to be too prolix on any one particular subject."

On his way to Paris he "heard abundance of curious remarks on the subject of the war, the peace, and the changes; they will have it they were not conquered." "Oh, no." Paris ne fut jamais vaincue—elle s'est soumise seulement! In the capital he waited on Madame de Staël in the Rue de Grenelle St. Germain. He describes her complexion as that of "a white mulatto," her hair "quite sable, dry and crisp, like a negro's." He knew his woman, and treated her accordingly. "I hurried her as much as decency would permit from one subject to another," and "ventured to throw in a little flattery as to her political influence in Europe. She admitted that those who shared her views were "not enough to make a dinner party"; and Stanley soon discovered that in Paris, at least, "Corinne's" day was over.

The clerical traveller's account of Sir Charles Stuart, the British Minister in France, is by no means flattering; he could get little out of him but "Upon my soul, I don't know," and found his hotel-keeper, who had been in the Imperial Army, much more helpful. He managed to see most of the Marshals at the "Thuileries" and "had the satisfaction of being almost knocked over" by Jourdan. Bessières, Duc d'Istrie, commander of the Old Guard, was reckoned by an English companion like Stanley himself—"that is, he had dark, arched eyebrows, a fox-like sort of countenance, very dark, almost swarthy," and gave indications of being subject to bilious headaches. Berthiet, Masséna and Victor seem to have impressed him favourably, but of Davout he remarks: "If ever an evil spirit peeped through the visage of a human being," it was in him; and Murat is dismissed as "an effeminate coxcomb, with no characteristic but that of self-satisfaction." Both of these latter judgments were probably unjust. On the other hand the parson's reflections upon "the interesting Josephine," induced by his visit to Malmaison, do more credit to his heart than to his head. We gather from his narrative that the fallen Emperor was still popular in the army, and that the Bourbons aroused no enthusiasm.

Stanley passes very unfavourable criticisms upon French dress; but his remark on the comparative state of morals—that there is "less organised vice" in France than in England, shows a surprising degree of detachment for a man of his cloth in those days.

During a visit to Fontainebleau he gave two instances of his savoir-faire. He refused to pay sixteen shillings for "a plate of eight little, wretched mutton chops," despite the appearance of several officers of the Imperial Guard friendly to the extortionate hostess; and, entering into conversation with the latter managed dexterously to steer between sacrificing his own opinions and giving offence to them. On retiring he shook hands with these Bonapartists, saying "with as low a bow as the little King of Rome, Messieurs les Gardes d'Honneurs, je vous salue."

After leaving Paris this military-minded cleric followed, starting from the end, in the footsteps of Napoleon in that last wonderful campaign of his before his abdication. Everywhere he heard unfavourable comparisons between the conduct towards the inhabitants of the French and that of the much-feared Cossacks, who seem to have been much calumniated. A Russian officer whom he met at St. Avold, was not, however, very complimentary to them. He divided his own army into three classes: "The first we can trust for discipline and ability; the second consists of Cossacks and other irregulars, whose business is reconnoitring, plundering, and running away when they see the enemy; the men before you compose the third—fellows who know nothing and do nothing, but can stand quietly in the place assigned to them, and get killed one after another without ever thinking of turning their backs." Every Prussian uniform Stanley's party saw was of British manufacture; an officer said, "We had furnished sufficient for 70,000 infantry and 20,000 cavalry." "Poor England," the traveller noted, "is certainly not much beloved; we are admired, feared, respected, and courted," but thought to look after our own interests too exclusively. On the other hand, British soldiers were respected because they paid for things, and did not live on the country like the French, the Prussians, and the rest, friends or foes.

Whilst driving in a cabriolet between Verdun and Metz, Stanley allowed "a poor fellow toiling away with his bivouacking cloak tied round him" to get up behind. He turned out to be a monk of La Trappe, who had been compelled to serve in Napoleon's army, had lost an eye at Leipsic, and had been captured by the Swedes. The English clergyman tested his protégé's abilities as a controversialist, attacking him upon the subject of the "salvability" of Protestants, and the celibacy of the clergy. The conversation redounded to the credit of both; Stanley assisted his Catholic brother with much-needed money, and parted with him much against his will—"for had he been going to Pekin I should have accommodated him with a seat," he says in dismissing the incident.

As typical of the French character he notices the conduct of the inhabitants of Lille, who, having "suffered every species of misery" from General Maison, he having needlessly destroyed all their suburbs, retaliated only by nicknaming him General Brise-Maison, "and then the foolish people laugh and cry, 'Que c'est bon cela,' think they have done a great feat, and submit like lambs."

We fear we must not follow our traveller into Holland and Belgium, where his humour and eye for oddities found full scope. Commenting on Dutch cleanliness he declares that his own dusty shoes were "the most impure thing" in the village of Brock, whose inhabitants boasted jocosely that they washed and scrubbed their wood before they put it on the fire. Peter the Great's house at Saardam he thought "remarkable for nothing but having been his"; adding caustically: "Alexander (the Tsar) had put up two little marble tablets over the fireplace, commemorating his visit, on which something good might have been inscribed; as they are, it is merely stated that Alexander placed them on, and that Mrs. Von Tets Von Groudum stood by, delighted to see him so employed."

The "After Waterloo" chapter relates the visit of Stanley and his wife to Paris and the field of Waterloo in 1816, and has, doubtless, been extensively "gutted" in the daily papers. Amongst other things the party visited in the prison of La Force the English officers who had helped Lavalette to escape, and had tried to save Ney. The English were everywhere, but were not popular, though, luckily, the French populace failed to grasp the meaning of the soldiers' songs:—

Louis Dix-huit,
We have licked all your armies
And sunk all your fleet.

The editors have, on the whole, done their work well. We may remark, however, that some of the notes are too exiguous to be of any use, and one or two are erroneous. Madame de Staël was not banished so much for her writings as for her intriguing capabilities; and Dousterswive is not a character in "Guy Mannering." The quite inadequate note upon Platoff omits to state that he was Hetman of the Cossacks; it might with advantage have been expanded by a reference to the incident of the old warrior's strange outburst of affection for Sir Walter Scott.

Amongst the sketches, those of the conveyances in use in the various countries at this period may prove to be of permanent value.

VENICE

Venice, its Individual Growth from the Earliest Beginnings to the Fall of the Republic. By POMPEO MOLMENTI. Translated by HORATIO F. BROWN. Part II.—The Golden Age. (John Murray, 21s. net.)

WHEN complete Mr. Horatio Brown's translation of Signor Molmenti's work will make the most detailed and scholarly presentation of Venetian life that has yet been offered to English readers. The two volumes just issued are devoted to an account of the Republic during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Venice had already established her position as the mart of the world, and, on the basis of an unparalleled commercial prosperity, she had built up a proud and affluent civilisation. With the increase of trade the arts flourished, and the progress of free enquiry suffered no check. The marvellous and sustained outburst of artistic activity, the development of a native drama, the magnificent public buildings, which elicited the admiration of so fastidious a connoisseur as Henry III. of France, the reckless and extravagant display of luxury, manifested alike in private life and in public ceremonial, the absorption of a whole population in the pleasure of the moment:

Balls and masks begun at midnight, burning ever to mid-day,
When they made up fresh adventures for the morrow—

these things speak of a vigorous and full-blooded life. Life, indeed, ran at fever-heat during these two glorious centuries. It was an age of adventurous gallants and of charming women. One encounters the most daring scepticism side by side with the most degrading superstition. While the geographers and map makers were adding to our knowledge of the world, a Marcantonio Bragadin was deceiving thousands of sober citizens by his pretended discovery of the anima d'oro. The current conceptions of life are admirably reflected in the literature of the period. In the poetry of Aretino a traditional reverence for religion gives way, too often, to an unveiled licentiousness. The picture, indeed, had its darker side, and the general diffusion of comfort was accompanied by a corresponding decline in morals. The Queen of the Adriatic boasted her eleven thousand courtesans, and the State was powerless to intervene. This outbreak of vice infected even the Church, and even as early as the fourteenth century the Great Council had found it necessary to pass a law contra illos qui committunt fornicationes in monasterio monialium. There can be little doubt that the foundations of the Republic were being slowly undermined, and there are hints, clear and unmistakable, of the approaching decadence:

The artistic temperament of the Italians [writes Signor Molmenti] threw a glamour of refinement and grace over vice itself; the æsthetic supplanted the moral judgment; the search for pleasure passed all limits, and voluptuous living surely and steadily, day by day, sapped the energy of the brain and the vigour of the arm.

Mr. Brown is to be congratulated on the excellence of his translation, but, seeing that the work is intended for English readers, it is a reasonable matter of complaint that the numerous extracts from Italian authorities in these volumes have been given in their original form.

EDUCATION.—POLITICAL OBSTACLES

LORD ROBERT CECIL's attack on Mr. McKenna on the 6th, and his reply, causes this article to be mainly political. "Educationally I am absolutely with you, but politically I am dead against you . . . Have not the Liberal party and the Nonconformist bodies been trying for forty years to get the whole of the endowments like yourselves, and do you think now the Government has given us a chance we are not going to take it." We quote from the report of the Times and Morning Post of a speech delivered by the Rev. J. R. Wynne Edwards, headmaster of Leeds Grammar School, at the Headmasters' Conference at Oxford, just before Christmas. The remarks were quoted by Mr. Edwards as having been made by a member of the Leeds Education Committee. We will not comment on the fitness of this individual to represent the ratepayers in the control of education. Mr. Edwards is apparently a lively speaker, and we do not pin him, any more than he perhaps intended to pin the committeeman, to these sentiments verbatim. Much less do we quote them as representing the sentiments of broad-minded persons who are Liberals in politics or Nonconformists in religion, or both. We quote them as accurately representing the determination of the political-Nonconformist party and Mr. McKenna to cast education to the winds, so long as they can secure the endowment of their party.

Mr. Lloyd-George and Mr. McKenna have already had great trouble in pacifying their Welsh supporters, on account of the postponement of the Bill for disestablishing and disendowing the Church in Wales. There are persistent rumours of the Labour Party contesting Liberal seats in Wales. The continued dominance of the political-Nonconformists in the present Government must be secured at all costs.

With Mr. McKenna's breadth of view or his motives we have no concern. In matters of this kind we have only to consider actions and policy. There is no reason to suppose, and no one has suggested, that Mr. McKenna is not sincerely convinced that the dominance of political Nonconformity is the sole salvation of the State. His conviction is the more to be regretted since it makes him more likely to succeed. We wish he were sincere or open to bribes. We cannot find, in company with the Times, any merit in his attempt to vindicate his partisan administration by the plea that it has been in strict accordance with official precedent, since, as the Times points out, he entirely failed, in his very lame apology, to show that he has observed in practice "the traditional principles of administration in this country." Such excuses may show a becoming deference to tradition in the face of the House of Commons, but that is all. So responsible a leader of a conspiracy can scarcely be expected to reveal its secrets more than he can help. The public expression of sentiments such as we have quoted, which are being made by Mr. McKenna's irresponsible henchmen all over the country, are much more useful than his more diffident excuses. The result is the same in either case. Education is neither more nor less hampered at Leeds, where the local education authority persecutes the Roman Catholic schools or aims at ruining Mr. Edwards's Grammar School, and where such sentiments are frankly expressed—than at Garforth, Swansea, Brymbo and elsewhere, where the Board of Education conspires with the local authority to persecute the Church of England schools, and the President veils the same sentiments under an appeal to tradition. The veil is thin enough, the veil of political-Nonconformity has always been thin enough; but it has been thick enough to conceal its aims from many of those who ought to have known its spirit better. It has always been the same, always wriggling back obliquely to its brief period of self-endowment and domination.

It is amazing that Liberals did not realise—until realisation was forced upon them in Lancashire—the price that they would have to pay for having been galvanised into political life by political-Nonconformists. It is still more amazing to us that the aims of that truculent faction were not already understood before the Education Bill of 1899 became law. The consent of the Church of England and Roman Catholic episcopates to the exposure of their schools to the control of local authorities, so amenable as they are to the influence of political-Nonconformity, showed an extraordinary political blindness and a complete misapprehension of its spirit. We should hope the bishop's eyes are now opened. Their deplorable mistake does not preclude them from struggling against its consequences, as Mr. Dillon seems to argue, but rather forces them to extra activity, that they may not have to repent a second time of misplaced confidence. We fully recognise that Mr. Dillon chose not only the nobler but the more statesmanlike part in 1899, when he advocated more consideration for the susceptibilities of Nonconformists. We cannot consider, as Mr. Dillon does, that substantial injustice was done to them even in single-school areas. We do not defend the Act as regards the interests of education, in which we agree with Mr. Dillon in believing, religion is an integral part; but if we are not much mistaken, broad-minded Radicals or Socialists, unprejudiced in favour of any of the religions concerned—such as Mr. Haldane and Mr. Graham Wallas—did not object to the Act as a makeshift, and incurred considerable odium from their respective parties by refusing to show any excitement on the subject. It is true that parents were obliged in single-school areas to send their children to schools with a religious atmosphere of which they did not approve; but so they had been ever since compulsory education came into force. The Act gave their "conscientious objections" more protection than they had had before. What these conscientious objections are worth in the case of political-Nonconformists, is shown by their present efforts to force their way into Church of England and Roman Catholic training colleges. Further, such injustice as there was, was purely incidental; it depended on the numbers of the various religious bodies resident in a given district and on their comparative zeal for education. If the Protestant Nonconformists generally had shown as much zeal for providing education for the children of the indigent who had no votes to be won, as had been shown by the Church of England, by Catholic Nonconformists, and at one time by Wesleyans—and provided their own repeated contention that they very largely outnumber Churchmen be true—they would have been in as good a position as Churchmen. They might, indeed, have been in a better position, for since they constantly proclaim the advantages of the interchange of pulpits, it may fairly be assumed that they had no objection to combination among themselves in the matter of schools. Indeed, they did so combine in what are called British Schools. Actually, regarded as a combination, they thought it so important to multiply chapels representing every shade of difference among themselves, that they only cared for education when they could get it at someone else's expense.

It is only fair to the framers of the Bill to observe, that they used in single-school areas the only material there was, and that the political party which passed it has not been accused of factious conduct in administering it when it became law. Neither was Mr. Birrell so accused. Further, such experienced politicians as the Duke of Devonshire, Sir Robert Finlay, and a staunch Radical, Mr. Bryce, indignantly repudiated the idea that any Minister of Education could ever be supposed for a moment to be capable of using the quasi-judicial powers given him, for partisan ends. They did not know their political-Nonconformist. The bishops had much excuse for their shortsightedness. Mr. McKenna has now lent them eyes.

Mr. McKenna pleaded in defence of his action in the Garforth case, that technical legal questions were very difficult to laymen, that all the Board of Education could do was to get the best legal advice, and that if the advice was wrong no blame could be imputed to the motives of the Government. What Mr. McKenna said was no doubt Parliamentarily true, but his general partisan conduct justifies the inquiry whether the legality which he sought was a permanent legality, or such a temporary appearance of legality as would make a show for party purposes until its illegality had been demonstrated by a higher authority.

As regards the refusal of Welsh local education authorities to obey the law, the question is not what Mr. McKenna did in expectation of the meeting of Parliament, and since the persistent "badgering" to which he was subjected in August by Lord Robert Cecil, but what he did on his own initiative, before the unavailing complaints addressed to him by managers and teachers were forced upon him in Parliament. Even Mr. McKenna's expedients to avoid unpleasant duties have an end. If he considers in the light of a compliment the congratulations of the Western Daily Post to a Minister of State in a quasi-judicial position for having been forced into a judicial attitude, he has come very near the sentiments expressed at Leeds.

Mr. McKenna and his adherents seldom speak on the subject without asserting the legality of the training college regulations. This is a variety of the "red-herring" argument, a favourite one with controversialists of their type. It diverts attention from flaws. These assertions refute no one, for no one has asserted the contrary. We draw attention to an effect of the regulations upon education. The report of the Board deplores the dearth of qualified teachers.—By the way, it is likely that the dearth of teachers will continue as long as the receipt of their salaries ultimately depends on their conforming to the religious views of Mr. McKenna.—There are fifty-one residential training colleges, of which thirty-three belong to the Church of England and nine others to the Roman Catholics and Protestant Nonconformists. Mr. McKenna issues regulations, which he knows cannot be accepted by a large number, if not all these, without alteration of the trusts. His predecessor had already approved of a scheme by which these colleges could have met the pressing need for teachers by receiving more students. Mr. McKenna now congratulates himself on having played a pretty political trick, by which he estimates that these colleges will now only be able to provide for one-fifth of the students for whom they provided before; so the dearth of teachers will be greater than ever. The only escape offered to the trustees of the colleges is to hand over to him their trust deeds, ostensibly so that they may be modified to enable them to accept the regulations, but in reality subject to be entirely revised according to his views. The object of Mr. McKenna's trick is therefore alternative—either to obtain complete control over the trust deeds through the submission of the trustees, or to starve out the colleges if they resist. In either case his insistence that the regulations leave untouched the peculiar religious nature of the colleges, is the merest blind, by which their trustees are not such fools as to be deceived.

Mr. McKenna does not even pretend that the denominational schools in Wales have been dealt with on an equality with the council schools, but he justifies the inequality by a remarkable admission. He maintains that the denominational schools, so far from suffering in efficiency by this injustice, are, if anything, rather more efficient than before. That is to say, the Churchmen and Roman Catholics of Wales are so zealous for education that they maintain their schools efficiently although severely handicapped by the Board of Education, and it is not efficiency of education that Mr. McKenna seeks but the continued favour of his political supporters.

By many admirable suggestions, to which we alluded before, Mr. McKenna has shown that "educationally" he is "with" the educators whom we mentioned with admiration in a former article; "politically he is dead against" any education which does not enable political-Nonconformists to tyrannise over their neighbours. As a political agitator he advocated one Welsh revolt, and now that he is in the judgment seat, he has to hold the scales uneven, to prevent two others, which would remove him from it, by wrecking the Government of which he is a member. If he had not been a political-Nonconformist of the most violent type, he might have advanced the interests of education, but with his antecedents his appointment was as "grossly improper" as that of another violent agitator, Mr. Davies, and he has done his best to live up to the impropriety.

BURNS'S HOME-SPUN

DIALECT is a local peculiarity of pronunciation, due it may be to climate and only to be eliminated by education and travel. But we use words so loosely now that the word connotes also a degraded or neglected form of speech. The broad Scots of Burns is purer than what we are accustomed to regard as standard English, yet we find it inelegant or unsuited to modern requirements, and abandon its use to the vulgar or illiterate. After many strange vicissitudes the ancient speech of Alfred lingers in scraps of patois among the orchards of Somerset, the fens of Lincoln, on the downs of Wessex, in the dales of Cumberland, on the moors of Yorkshire, and in the solitary glens of Scotland. Exactly the same thing has taken place in France, where the peasant of the South employs the ancient language of the Troubadours, the true Langue d'Oc, from which modern French has diverged so much that they are now practically different tongues. The tendency of education is to uproot these old forms, but like the weeds of the fields they have a wonderful tenacity. The so-called movements for the preservation of ancient dialects, which galvanise into life for a moment, are but clearer evidences of the hastening decay.

In Burns's day Lowland Scots was the language of the peasant and the peer. The schoolmaster taught, the minister preached, and the judge summed up in this common medium of intercourse. Lord Braxfield, the prototype of Weir of Hermiston, was one of the last judges on the Scottish Bench who spoke the language of the people. To a Scotch ear no language is more tuneful than pure English spoken by a beautiful voice, and so it became a mark of culture and refinement. Gentlemen and ladies took lessons from English elocution masters and Scots was banished from the drawing-room to the servants' hall, where it has remained ever since. What to-day passes for Scots in the Canongate of Edinburgh or the Trongate of Glasgow is a strange mixture whose component parts it is hard to analyse. Yet in spite of educational reform the old tongue still lingers in many a moorland cottage and solitary upland farm where the old people speak a dialect of which their sons and daughters are partly ashamed. To speak candidly, "braid Lallans" is the language of the poor and needy, of the old and unlettered, of the beggar and the outcast, and though there is wonderful vitality in it, yet it is doomed "no distant date." Yesterday I was delighted to hear a rustic call the hoar frost "Cranreuch," but my companion, a man of letters, knew it not. In the polished circles of suburbia and among cultured people it is quoted with a sneer on the lips, and avoided by their children, in whose ears it is low and vulgar and not to be imitated. These are facts, not complaints. The sentimental wayfaring man who quotes Theocritus, delights to find nooks and corners of Arcadia inhabited by rural swains and neat-handed maidens who in their old-world costumes pose as lay figures to his travelling muse. But there are very few who observe the quaint expressions with which these humble folk clothe their thoughts.

"I cannot regard it," says the late Canon Ainger, as merely a foolish literary ambition that now and again leads Burns to abandon one dialect in which he was strong for another in which he was weak. It was rather that his local vocabulary was limited for the purpose he needed it for, and that he naturally and rightly resorted to English wherewith to strengthen and supplement it.

This is a misunderstanding; to dissipate which two explanations may be given. In the first place, Burns was an artist, and as such bound by the same laws of literary art which obliged Shakespeare to put sublime thoughts in blank verse and express in prose the communications of menials or the quips and cranks of jesters—bound by the same law which makes Scott put stilted Johnsonese in the mouths of his aristocratic heroes and heroines and leave uncouth dialect to domestics and dependents. But there is another and, we venture to think, truer reason. A workman speaks in dialect to his "mates," but should a well-educated man address him in literary English the workman uses the same medium or speaks dialect in an affected tone, perhaps to show that he, too, has some slight tincture of letters, but certainly to show respect to the superior who has addressed him. Again, the children of the people speak and read pure English in school under the master, but, when free from restraint, they revert to dialect in the playground and at home lest they be ridiculed for aping the manners and language of the "gentry." This is precisely the case with Burns. He employs the rugged, virile speech of his fellows when treating of homely themes, when scorning the noble "coof," or laughing at Holy Willie. But he employs the poetic diction of Pope and Gray "to build the lofty rhyme" on solemn occasions, to make some profound comment on life, or to address some friend whom he esteems and honours. For example, he stops in full career to remark "Pleasures are like poppies spread," or again, his dedication of the Cotter's Saturday Night to his friend Aiken is in the florid, flamboyant style, but immediately afterwards he speaks of the humble cotter in pithy, natural Scots. When Burns talks of biting Boreas, of winged Pegasus, of Helicon, and of all the rest of the euphuistic flummery of the poetic craft, we see the yokel dressed in his Sunday best, purple-faced and very uneasy in the unaccustomed garb, and we heave a sigh of relief when he lays aside his "braw claes" and dons the sunburnt coat and homely bonnet. True, it is affected and unnatural, but remember he dressed up in college "lear" to show respect to his audience, and we cannot scorn the motive though we may find amusement in the appearance. This language I now write and you read is not the medium of daily intercourse, but an inflated form very different from the mixture of music-hall catchwords and sporting argot that is "human nature's daily food." To write thus is correct, but to speak like a book is to excite the ridicule of our fellows. The present-day speech is rather to be looked for in the humour columns than in the stately periods of quarterlies and reviews.

"An honest man of no special literary bent," says Stevenson, would tell you he thought much of Shakespeare bombastic and most absurd, and all of him written in very obscure English, and wearisome to read.

Change the poet's name to Burns and the fact holds true. Much of Burns is a dead letter to the present generation of Scotsmen, to whom "a daimen-icker in a thrave" is as unknown as "I rede ye tent it." Words like "wale," "fremit," "shachlt," "lear" present difficulties of sound and sense which repel the outsider who longs to know something of Burns. Not many are on speaking terms with Anglo-Saxon, but those who know modern German will find a pleasure in recognising cognate words which will greatly assist in surmounting difficulties. In a popular article one may not write as if for specialists, but we may be allowed a few quotations to illustrate our point. "My mammie coft (kaufte, bought) me a new goon"; "As o'er the moor they lightly foor (fuhren, went); "It kindles wit, it waukens lear (lehre, instruction)"; "He wales (wählen, to select) a portion"; "Whar did ye get that hauer (hafer, oats) meal bannock?" But there is another element that may be explained by modern French. We quote a few examples. "Let me fair Nature's face describe" (décrire); "His hair has a natural buckle" (boucle, curl); "Wi' bitter dearthfu' wines to mell" (se mêler, to meddle). "Merle" is the pure French for blackbird, envy, with accent on the last syllable is envier, and remeid is but remède. Dool is a portion of the word douleur, and "chamer" imitates the vowel sound of chambre. These few examples will not only show the true meaning of the word but give the sound that Burns used, and thus explain many an uncouth rhyme. Burns seems also to have spelt phonetically, for he has often two or even three forms of the same word—e.g., eneugh is guttural like loch, but enow has an open sound. Daurk gives the old pronunciation of darg, a day's work. Words like wrought, brought, fought, may at times be required to be sounded wrocht, brocht, focht, to meet the exigencies of the rhyme. Generally speaking, the English vowel sound as in hate becomes Scots as in hard, and the vowel "o" is very broad and open in the Scots dialect. It would be easy to multiply examples, but we fear to exhaust the reader's patience, and rest satisfied with the aforementioned.

Old modes of life pass away, and with them naturally the terms and expressions; this introduces an element which we leave to the antiquary and the historian. Even the works of Dickens, who wrote fifty years ago, would require a glossary to explain old usages and old words. Who that reads this has ever seen a pounce-box except in a museum or in some wayside tavern of France or Germany? The flail may still be seen in a few remote islands "among the farthest Hebrides," but the busy hum of the travelling threshing mill has banished the weary "flingin' trees" to old garrets and lumber-rooms, whence they are routed out and sold to collectors of such "auld nicknackets." It would be as absurd as useless to regret this. There are doubtless many words in Burns that are now obsolete and would prove useful acquisitions to our modern tongue, but if these be ever revived we may look for them to come from the colonies, where the study of Burns is less of a cult and more of a reality than in our own tight little island.

J. P. PARK.

"PERSIMMON"

THE word persimmon is fully treated in the New English Dictionary, which only just fails to give the complete etymology. The statement there made is as follows:

Corruption of the native name in the Powhatan dialect (Algonkin of Virginia). The exact form of the first element is uncertain; the second is the suffix -min, common to many names of grains or small fruits in Algonkin dialects; cf. mondamin, shahbomin in Longfellow's "Hiawatha." The stress was originally not on the second syllable, persimin or pérsimin being earlier than persimmon.

In fact, Cuq's Dictionary of the Algonkin language, written in French, explains the suffix -min as "fruit or grain," and explains wabi-min, literally "white fruit," as meaning "apple." He explains wab as "white."

There are two early quotations that deserve consideration, both given in the said dictionary. The latter, dated 1612, is from W. Strachey, "Travels in Virginia," x. (Hakluyt Society), p. 119:

They have a plomb which they call pessemmins, like to a medler in England, but of a deeper tawnie coulour.

I take the spelling pessemmins, here given, to be the best of all that are enumerated, and I believe it to be capable of explanation. Eleven forms are duly given.

The older quotation gives a less correct form (less correct because most widely differing from the rest), but it is of great importance. The New English Dictionary only cites two lines of it, but it is absolutely necessary, in my belief, to give nearly the whole of it, without much abridgement.

In Captain Smith's works, ed. Arber, p. 57, the fruits of Virginia are discussed, as follows:

Plumbs there are of three sorts. The red and white are like our hedge-plumbs; but the other, which they call pulchamins [persimmons], grow as high as a palmata. The fruit is like a medlar: it is first greene, then yellow, and red when it is ripe: if it be not ripe it will drawe a man's mouth awrie with much torment; but when it is ripe, it is as delicious as an apricock.

There is another sort of grape neere as great as a cherry, this they call messaminnes. [Observe here the suffix -minnes—i.e., fruits.]

They have a small fruit . . . they call chechinquamins. [Again, we have the suffix -mins.]

Of these naturall fruits they live a great part of the yeare, which they use in this manner. The walnuts, chesnuts, acornes, and chechinquamins (sic) are dried to keepe. When they need them, they breake them betweene two stones, yet some part of the walnut-shells will cleave to the fruit. Then do they dry them againe upon a mat over a hurdle.

The fruit like medlers, they call pulchamins [persimmons], they cast upon hurdles on a mat, and preserve them as prunes.

I think we have now the solution of the whole mystery. We read of four sorts of fruits which are "dried to keep," of which one sort was "dried again upon a mat over a hurdle." In the same way the persimmons were dried for keeping; they were "cast upon hurdles on a mat and preserved."

I submit that Captain Smith did not quite catch the sound of the word, nor perceive its etymology; for surely persimmon means nothing more than simply "dried fruit"?

This may fairly be gathered from Cuoq. He gives no such prefix as per-, or par-, or pers-, or pes-. The only word at all resembling persimin (for the mm in Strachey only means that the preceding i is short) is the root pas, to be dry. From this root he gives two derivatives, which are wholly to the point. These are: pasimine, "to cause grain or fruit to become dry"; and pasiminau, "dried raisins." But we already know that min can be used in a general sense, from which it follows that "dried raisins" is only a special use of a word that once meant "dried fruits" in general.

I conclude that persimmon is only a modern form of a word which might better have been spelt persimin; and that it is (as said) a word of Algonkin origin, due to the verb pasimine, to dry fruits, from pas, to dry, and min, fruit. It may have had its name from being the commonest of the preserved fruits.

WALTER W. SKEAT.

MUSICAL COMEDY

MR. MAX BEERBOHM, writing the other day about pantomimes, pointed out what extraordinary opportunities this business of the telling of some well-known fairy story, with every assistance of scenery, music, and pretty chorus-girls, offers to the artist. He appeared to be surprised that the pantomimes as we have them are so poor, but to my mind the marvel is that they are so good. The difficulty that faces the producer—I think that is the term—of pantomime is that he knows he is expected to provide some measure of entertainment for children, while at the same time his audiences consist largely of grown-up people. Now, anyone who has endeavoured to amuse children knows that their sense of humour is in no way fixed. The spontaneous follies that are acclaimed as masterpieces of wit to-day, may possibly excite nothing but a compassionate weariness to-morrow. Moreover, the presence of grown-ups complicates the problem enormously, for the fear of criticism that troubles most children renders them only imitatively emotional when they are under the eyes of the Olympians.

What is the producer to do? He knows that the things children like are the things their parents, who pay for their tickets, consider silly, and to be a success his pantomime must please both generations. So he turns to the variety artists, who are silly enough for anything, but who have a reputation for humour and cleverness which nothing they do can destroy, and provides with their assistance a patchwork entertainment which includes something to amuse and something to bore everybody. The result is unsatisfactory because it is a compromise, but we must not blame the author if his work of art is imperfect. The eyes of a child see everything in detail, and, consequently, to be successful in its appeal, a child's book or picture or play must be constructed rather with a view to detail than to an artistic whole. Thus the lagoon scene in Peter Pan, which strikes the adult mind as a stagey and confusing excrescence, is the one scene which all the children I have asked have preferred; and it would seem that, as long as pantomime is intended primarily for the amusement of children, it cannot be a suitable form of expression for the conscientious artist.

But when we eliminate the child from the audience and approach the question of musical comedy, we find that, while it shares with the pantomime such adornments as tuneful music, bright settings, and shapely legs, it suffers in an even greater degree from limitations—limitations, however, which are in this case absolutely artificial.

Musical comedy is popular because it supplies the great world of unimaginative people with a ready-made fairyland, where life is played to cheerful music, where true lovers marry, and where jokes come off. They like watching this life because it is utterly opposed to common-sense, which is their own strong point; and they therefore feel that their very presence in the theatre is wildly rebellious and a sign that they are not as other men. And, provided the picture is bright and does not show too much obvious effort on the part of the actors, they are disposed to welcome rather than to quarrel with the lack of that coherence which is the outstanding feature of their own very sensible lives. They certainly would not wish to live in a land where people really behaved in that irresponsible fashion, but it is pleasant to sit for an hour or two and pretend.

Obviously, with an audience of this character, the author of a musical comedy would have almost complete freedom of expression if there were not a number of quite unnecessary limitations imposed on him by the folly and timidity of the managers of musical-comedy houses. These gentlemen are, as a rule, surrounded by a crowd of more or less competent "star" actors and actresses, composers, writers of lyrics, and purveyors of smart dialogue; and before a new musical play can be produced it is necessary that each of these satellites should be given an opportunity of displaying his or her talent in the new production. As the actors and actresses of this class can usually only play one sort of part, the composers can only produce one tone, and the writers of lyrics one song, the new play usually proves to be little more than a thing of shreds and patches, a rehash of some previous success. Recently, it must be owned, since the provinces surprised the London managements by refusing to support plays of this character that were bad, there have not been wanting signs of a change for the better in this direction. But some time must elapse before the writer and composer of a musical comedy will be allowed the liberty in choosing their cast that is permitted to Mr. Pinero and Mr. Barrie; and even farther ahead lies the day when it will no longer be considered necessary to dot irrelevant "extra numbers" about their work.

The artistic conventions that affect musical comedies are neither very numerous nor very strict. They are usually limited to two acts, which renders it a matter of some difficulty to make them dramatic; but as we have seen, their audiences do not want drama. They concern themselves very properly with the lovings of young men and young women and the pleasant follies of humanity, and they avoid any problem more serious than a dropped nosegay or a tripping in the sports of love. They touch the problems that haunt the minds of men with the happy laughter of ignorance, and preach cheerful nonsense to the shrinkers who think they are too wise. After the songs of the principals there follows Echo, with a hundred fat calves and a sea of smiling faces wonderfully adorned. The chorus is certainly the finest feature of musical comedy. It has overcome the laws of space and time, and appears, like a child's pet fairy, exactly wherever and whenever it is wanted. Even the limelight is not more responsive than this band of arch-companions, who will sigh with the heroine and shriek with the low comedian in one period of five minutes. But it is chiefly their comradeship that appeals to me, the unwearying spirit of friendship that causes them to wander, like mediæval travellers, in groups of fifty. And not less to be admired is their fidelity to the principal actors and actresses. Had The Gay Lord Quex been written as a musical comedy, I have no doubt the chorus would have appeared in the third act and echoed Sophy's horror at being locked up alone with Quex. And few of us would wish to lead more amiable lives than those of these friendly folk, bubbling over with merriment at jokes which they have heard three hundred nights in succession, dancing in the sunshine of a West End theatre to please the grey people who live real lives.

Surely here is the chance for Mr. Beerbohm's artist. With the aid of these happy men and women and this charming chorus he can make us a play on the model of a child's game, wherein things happen because they are pleasant and desirable, and for no other reason upon the earth. If he likes to make of this inconsequence a cunning weapon to help him achieve his purpose, he can do so. But his principal task will be to appeal to the emotions which his audiences do possess, rather than to the intellect which they probably do not; and this, I suppose, is why men of culture have hitherto left musical comedy alone, for nowadays all our great men would rather be minor prophets than great artists. Yet what a splendid musical comedy Mr. G. K. Chesterton could write if he were not so busy defending his position! With what fine insurgent lyrics it would be adorned, with what flourishes of that paradox which can make roses sprout like mushrooms through the paving-stones of Battersea. I rather wonder that no one has laid violent dramatic hands on "the Napoleon of Notting Hill" before this. I mention Mr. Chesterton specially, because he is an expert at that game of make-believe which is the secret of all successful appeals to the emotions of the great half-educated. The game can be played well and it can be played badly, and hitherto, in terms of the footlights, it has usually been played ludicrously badly. It remains for our great men to descend from their futile pulpits and see that it is played well.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

"LA NAVE"? OR THE CLOAC MASSIMA?

"TRUTH will out"—and the leading characteristic, be it vicious or virtuous, of the poet or playwright, however he may strive to veil his personality in his writings, will make its way to the surface. But, be it said of the subject of this article, he is above (or below?) any attempts to disguise his besetting sin—as far as he can be judged by his literary productions!

It is popularly supposed that the Cloaca Massima of Rome, the mighty sewer through which hourly passes all the impurities of the Eternal City, committing them to the long-suffering Tiber, is "well worth visiting," as the familiar Baedeker would say; also it is probable that in its way the Romans of to-day are proud of it. In somewhat the same way Italians are proud of their literary Cloaca Massima, and Gabriele D'Annunzio will certainly find no reason to quarrel with us as to the application of the title to him and his works.

The equally popular idea, however, that all the educated classes of Italians delight in or entirely "revel in" the mud, etc., which he spreads before them openly and unashamedly, is utterly incorrect. Some of the most scathing criticisms and disapproval of D'Annunzio's continuous appeals to the sensual side of his countrymen have been uttered by the talented contributors to the greater Italian papers. And, as a case in point, we can refer to a long—well, not appreciation, rather a disappreciation of his last play (the tragedy called La Nave—The Ship), which appeared in a recent number of the Avvenire d'Italia, and a shorter review in the Corriere della Sera—the first a Bolognese, the second the well-known Milanese paper. From beginning to end the critics lament that the undoubted genius of D'Annunzio should be so invariably employed in bringing out the sensual side, only too latent, always in all that he works upon. He has, according to the writer-critic in the Avvenire, in this last play managed in the most extraordinarily skilful manner, "con una arte che è sua, e sua peculiare specialité"—"in a way of his own, and which is his particular specialité" (a compliment indeed), succeeded in impregnating one scene in particular and the whole work in general with a powerful undertone, a destructive, demoralising, current of sensuality, of unnerving, unmanning "decadence," and the play in its entirety is fully of suggestion in its worst sense, "la nota soggettiva che è uno dei tarli roditori," as the strong Italian phrase puts it—"one of the worms eating away" the heart of the ship; and, the critic adds, it is entirely unnecessary even as accessory to the play, and the play is not only unaided, but is spoilt by this suggestiveness. The creation of Basiliola, into which D'Annunzio has put all the power he possesses, and which alone stands out in the play as an original conception of the destructive power of a perfidious, cruel, fierce, and lascivious woman, is at the same time the one figure which has no real place in the scheme of the play entitled La Nave. As a matter of fact, the name has hardly anything to do with the play, or the play with it. The Ship is conspicuous by its absence, and D'Annunzio should have placed his plot anywhere else than in Venice in a period when its people were about to assert themselves and begin their career as rulers of the Adriatic, and he should have called it by the name of its leading protagonist—"Basiliola, or the days of Constantinople the Corrupt." Then he would have been still more free to let loose the steed Licentiousness, which stands ready ever in his stables for his master to mount, and he could have been spared the effort of having to evoke the name of "Christ and His Saints," as he does at the finish of the most un-Christlike performances of the Venetian populace. It is said that the poet, in referring to his own latest production, spoke of it as a "Christian tragedy." Possibly D'Annunzio based this idea on the fact that his tragedy is rather blasphemously dedicated "to God"! for the play has much of D'Annunzio, but remarkably little of Christ in it. It is true that priests figure in a temple in one scene, and polemical battles are very badly fought in public and during an orgy, which it is a disgrace to produce on the stage; but except for that, and for the confused shouts of the multitude at the finish of the play of the name of "Cristo" coupled with those of some popular saints, we cannot see anything whatever even dimly shadowing a "Christian tragedy" anywhere. The Ship is reported as being under weigh for other countries; and doubtless, once "up anchor" she will visit our shores. We heartily wish she would remain where she is in her own port—viz., in the Tiber, and take up her permanent anchorage, if exist she must, near by her true sister ship—"The Cloacā Massima." R. E.

THE LIBRARY TABLE

The Complete Poetical Works of George Darley.
Edited, with an introduction, by RAMSAY COLLES.
(Routledge, 1s. net.)

GEORGE DARLEY died more than sixty years ago, yet Mr. Ramsay Colles's book is the first complete edition of the poet ever published. This fact is significant, and at the same time a challenge. Was Darley a great poet?—was he even a good minor one? A poet must be very poorly equipped indeed if he is never great in fragments, but Darley's numerous bursts of genuine inspiration failed to impress the public of his day, and his reputation, throughout his lifetime, was confined to his own small circle of fellow workers. Mr. Colles has succeeded, however, in unearthing Darley's poetical writings, and the volume may be accepted, therefore, as the final appeal of the poet for general recognition. Few admirers of good poetry will disagree with the verdicts of such widely differing personalities as Thomas Carlyle and Charles Lamb. The first-named referred appreciatively to Darley's "real lyrical genius"—the second singled him out for praise from amongst the numerous company that contributed to the London Magazine. Darley's life was comparatively uneventful. He was born in Dublin in 1795, educated at the local university, taking his degree in 1820, and two years later came to London and published his first volume of verse. "The Errors of Ecstasie and Other Pieces" was as undistinguished as it was ambitious, and it is not surprising that it was a failure. But it served to introduce him to the London Magazine, for by 1823 he was a regular contributor with Charles Lamb and others. In the circumstances it was easy to enlarge his circle of acquaintances, and soon Darley knew such men as Hood, Procter, Hazlitt, De Quincey, Allan Cunningham, and Talfourd. Later he became a constant writer for the Athenæum, and, if he failed as a poet, at any rate achieved success as a journalist. All the time, however, he made no secret of his ambition to become a recognised poet, and it is evident that his imagination was fired by the doings of his great contemporaries. Perhaps it was his especial misfortune to live in an age when great poets were plentiful and recognition was very difficult to obtain. But he never lost faith in himself, and continued to publish until he had several volumes to his credit. "Seven long years," he wrote to Miss Mitford, "I lived on a charitable saying of Coleridge's that he sometimes liked to take up 'Sylvia.'" This pathetic phrase expresses the nature of the man whose pen seemed too weak for his brain. His chance seemed to be near when Wordsworth and Coleridge were no longer to be counted upon for new work, but when these two poetical stars were fading another arose in the person of Alfred Tennyson, and the result was further obscurity for Darley. It cannot be said that the age erred. Darley was, undoubtedly, a poet, though not a great one. All his principal pieces contain many memorable lines. "Nepenthe" opens well and weakens towards the close; "Thomas a'Becket" is a good historical play of more than average merit; and "Sylvia" is chiefly distinguished for its lyrics. But on the whole it is difficult to award conscientiously more than ordinary praise to his longer works. They never suggest continuity of inspiration. In his shorter pieces, however, there are some gems, and such fine lyrics as "I've Been Roaming," "It is not Beauty I demand," "The Enchanted Lyre," and the six syren songs justify Mr. Colles in his endeavour to gain a reputation for their author. The editor's introduction is a most interesting and important contribution to the history of poetry in the early part of the nineteenth century, and might be taken as a model by more pretentious preface writers. Darley is never likely to live, unless it be in anthologies, and that is tantamount to being buried alive. Mr. Ramsay Colles, however, is to be congratulated, and so are the publishers, for the book is remarkable, alike in text and make-up, while the price is astonishing even in this era of cheapness.

The Garden That I Love. Second Series. By ALFRED AUSTIN. (Macmillan, 5s. net.)

SCORN it as we will, we cannot resist the suspicion that Mr. Austin is satirising himself with an admirable and acute candour. We have indeed scorned the notion, for our Laureates have seldom been men of humour, and we have argued that to suspect Mr. Alfred Austin of satirical purpose is to yield to an almost incredible extravagance of fancy. In vain we argue: surely he is satirising himself when he writes in this new series of papers: "The old that is really good and great is always new, and the new that is bad or mediocre is old the day after it is born." And, again, in this book of infinite complacency: "There is no inevitable connection between the goodness or badness of work, and the pains or pleasure a man takes in doing it." What purpose save a satirical one can the book serve? There are passages of conversation as deadly as the worst of Mr. Pinero's; witness this on the subject of the relative appreciation of Byron and Tennyson, the former of whom he terms the supreme modern master of words, and asks if the "Isles of Greece" is not the finest lyric in the language:

Would it not be interesting to enquire what these recurring oscillations of taste and preference depend on? In respect of what Lamia has been suggesting, I am disposed to suspect that the explanation is to be sought in the circumstance whether the age happens to be mainly masculine or predominantly feminine in character, etc., etc.

We will gladly concede that the passages concerned simply with gardens are frequently interesting, and reveal the pleasant familiarity with garden delights which the Poet Laureate's earlier books have made us acquainted with; but we do grow heartily tired of the constant transition, transition often most violent, abrupt, and astonishing, from flowers to books and from books to flowers. Nor can we honestly say that the volume is improved by the verses scattered through it. We will quote one sonnet, as clearly and fairly representative of the shoddy verse as the previous extracts of the shabby prose:

GREAT NUPTIALS.

Now for great nuptials let the bells be rung,
And immemorial symphonies resound,
From high-groined roof time-tattered bannerets hung,
And flowers round porch and pillar wreathed and wound,
For Soul with Mind is coming to be wed,
Feeling with Intellect to seal its troth,
Inseparable bond 'twixt heart and head,
With hierarch Wisdom dominating both.
A splendid offspring shall from them be born,
Poetry, first and noblest of the breed,
Sculpture, and Song, and Painting, to adorn
Cathedrals open unto every Creed:
Race that shall never older grow than now,
But wear eternal youth upon their brow.

Surely, surely, we conclude, in desperate perplexity, the whole book is an exquisite parody, and Mr. Austin is shaking at our dulness of apprehension!

Old English Sports. By F. W. HACKWOOD. (Fisher Unwin, 10s.)

It is not easy to read an account of some of the sports of our forefathers without falling into a mood which is more Pharasaic than Christian, and thanking Providence, in the first place, that the English world has gone past the phase in which it could take delight in the fighting of cocks and dogs, the baiting of bears and bulls, and the like pastimes; and, in the second place, that our own little span of life on the earth did not fall in those times, when we too, no doubt, would have delighted in these cruelties. A good deal of this book is occupied with such sports which have grown distasteful to us. It was, no doubt, necessary that they should occupy some space in a volume purporting to give anything like a true report of the sports of our ancestors; but we do not think it was necessary that they should occupy so much space as we find allotted to them here, and cannot believe that many will take delight in reading of them at such length. However, the author very properly expresses his reprobation of them, so it is to be supposed that he did not assign the different chapters and pages without due reflection. A great deal of the book makes far more pleasant reading. We do not imagine that Mr. Hackwood even supposes himself to have found anything very new to say on a subject which necessarily must be treated by way of compilation from the works of former writers, but on the whole he seems to have made his compilation judiciously enough, and is to be congratulated on his selection of illustrations, chiefly from old prints. Of course, he has laid hands on such authors as Strutt and Walker, and taken from them what suited his purpose, which is, shortly told, to give a brief and connected sketch of the amusements with which the English people have amused themselves since the days in which they began to be amused. He puts this period somewhere in or after the Norman era, saying that it is impossible the Saxons can have found amusement in life, and debating the very vexed question when, if ever, England really had a claim to be described as "Merrie"! He concludes, on evidence which does not appear very conclusive, that this golden date is to be placed in the days of "Good Queen Bess." Hunting, hawking, jousting (which includes a sketch of the conditions of chivalry in England), tilting at the quintain, archery, shooting with the gun, horse-racing, ball-play, single-stick, wrestling, prize-fighting, and so on, are all passed in review, so that the book is really very comprehensive so far as its scope extends. It is a useful work of reference for the mere superficial aspects and the outlines of the history of these sports. We could well have done with a little more of the hunting and a little less of the "baiting" and fighting to which we alluded at the beginning of this notice, but on the whole the compilation achieves its purpose well. There is one admirable point about the insertion of the plates, some of which are coloured in the crude hues of the originals, that a reference is given below each to the page of the text in which some account of its subject appears. Oh, would that all illustrations in all books were thus dealt with! We should do much less of vain seeking and turning of pages if it were so.

FICTION

Sheaves. By E. F. BENSON. (Heinemann, 6s.)

A NEW novel by the author of "Dodo" must always awaken in us a certain speculative interest, and if we have found "Sheaves" a little disappointing, we are ready to acknowledge that Mr. Benson's latest book shows no falling away from his high standards of careful writing and subtle characterisation. But something more than these admirable qualities is required to make a good novel, and, after carefully perusing "Sheaves," we should hesitate to absolve Mr. Benson of the charge of having written splendidly about nothing at all. Can a widow of forty-two, who has had experiences with a drunken husband, and a boyish man of twenty-four achieve the perfect love? This is the problem, if it be a problem, that supplies Mr. Benson with his story, and it appears to us that, for all the intensity and polish of Mr. Benson's style, there are moments when the accomplished novel-reader will find the self-questionings of his heroine a little tedious. We fancy the average reader will share the mental attitude of Hugh and wonder what on earth is the matter, and certainly the touching death of the heroine in Switzerland leaves that rather important question unanswered. The minor characters are admirable, and every page in the book bears tribute to Mr. Benson's cleverness; but we question, as Mr. Swinburne questioned of "Atalanta in Calydon," whether the whole is greater than any part of it, and we own to quitting the volume at the three-hundredth page with a lively sense of dissatisfaction.

The Individualist. By PHILIP GIBBS. (Grant Richards, 6s.)

ALTHOUGH Mr. Philip Gibbs has earned for himself an enviable distinction in several fields of literature, we believe this to be his first essay in fiction. As such the book is certain to appeal to a large and influential circle of readers. "The Individualist" is the kind of story that publishers like to describe as "a tale of love and politics." Really it is a study in personality, and as such is to be praised for a piece of earnest and, at times, brilliant workmanship. There are two outstanding portraits in the book—the portrait of a woman, Alicia Frensham, and the portrait of a man, Stretton Wingfield. Both these studies are finely executed, bold in colour and design and scrupulous in detail. Stretton sounds the keynote of the book. He is a young man with a very fervent temperament, and there is in him a perpetual unrest of latent yet constantly stirring energies. He is a mental adventurer. Alicia is a country schoolmistress, charming by nature and quite beautiful. As a child she has been nurtured on the pleasant doctrines of Agnosticism, "free thought," and extreme Radicalism—in a word, she is a child of "progress." By some curious mischance, however, "progress," as this subtle word is understood by the economists of Manchester and the orators of Hyde Park, has not stifled all the natural cravings of her womanhood and spirit. She longs to express herself, and Stretton Wingfield offers her the opportunity for such expression in the satisfaction of his own appetite. Afterwards, when Stretton is moulding and strengthening the political party of "Individualists," Alicia resides openly under his protection and is the companion and favourite of those who have entered into a political alliance with her lover. As might be foreseen, the dénouement is tragic for Alicia, though the book ends on a promise of after happiness. So much for the plot. We will not dilate upon the political portraits in the story. Some may regard them as purely artificial, whilst others may well think that they are too faithful to certain originals. One may have many minor points of difference from Mr. Gibbs, but it is impossible to deny that he has written a strong, sincere, and living piece of work. As a first novel, "The Individualist" is an achievement of which he should be justly proud. It would be interesting to know how a certain young politician, very popular with the illustrated papers and very unpopular with his colleagues, regards the book, but it is unlikely that we shall ever possess this knowledge.

Sally Bishop. A Romance. By E. TEMPLE THURSTON. (Chapman and Hall, 6s.)

MR. TEMPLE THURSTON has in his dedicatory letter explained his misuse of the word "romance," which he applies with foolish defiance to his commonplace tale; and he has also kindly pointed out the two chapters which are most likely in his opinion to shock the reader. They do not, however, seem more shocking than many other chapters, which offend, not from their dreadful daring or frankness, but from the carelessness of the writing and the clumsy arrogance of the attitude that they express towards life. The story tells how an agreeable girl, Sally Bishop, who is the daughter of a country clergyman, is seduced by a callous barrister; how she lives with him for three years, is deserted, and eventually commits suicide. It is written with an aggressive peevishness, and its course is continually being stopped by the preaching of an unhealthy doctrine of discontent. When Mr. Thurston tries to be powerful he succeeds only in being brutal; when he tries to be gentle he immediately becomes sentimental. The result is as dreary a book as can well be imagined. It is an unpleasant story, unpleasantly and badly told.

Mothers in Israel. By J. S. FLETCHER. (Murray, 6s.)

MR. FLETCHER is always good when he writes about Yorkshire, and at his best when he writes about the people in a Yorkshire village, and that is his theme in the present novel. He knows their dialect as he knows their habits and country, and the result is a valuable and interesting book. He calls it a study in rustic amenities. The minister of Applemarney has been forced to take a year's holiday, and a rising young preacher, named Warwick, comes to the village to take his place. You meet him first in the neighbouring town, and drive with him in the carrier Joseph's cart (Joseph is also the village chapel-keeper) to Applemarney, and with him become acquainted with the members of the small community. The two chief deacons, Mr. Hancock and Mr. Gill, who own the biggest farms in the neighbourhood, immediately pay him a state call, and bring invitations from their wives to high tea for the two following afternoons. The gist of the tale lies in the rivalry of these two women; each desires to be first in importance at the chapel. When Mrs. Gill announces at a church meeting that she is anxious to give money to have the inside of the chapel redecorated and repainted, at the next meeting Mrs. Hancock, not to be outdone, steps forward with the proposal to give an American organ and a new pulpit. But there is a rival faction; and when the Hancocks' bailiff proposes that at the opening ceremonies the new organ shall be played, not by the little schoolmistress, as usual, but by the respective daughters of Mrs. Gill and Mrs. Hancock the proposal is vetoed by a large majority, and the trouble begins in earnest. For with the little schoolmistress Mr. Warwick, the earnest young minister, is deeply in love. The rivals conspire together, and how these Mothers in Israel, as they like to call themselves, are caught in their own snare, is very deftly told by Mr. Fletcher, who does not fail to bring out the humour of the whole situation, while he treats his subject with perfect seriousness. It is a good piece of work and will increase Mr. Fletcher's reputation.

The Pest. By W. TEIGNMOUTH SHORE. (John Long, 6s.)

"THE PEST" is the tale of a beautiful but scarcely edifying young woman, who runs away from the very earnest curate to whom she is married, and secures the position of mistress to a young and talented artist. In course of time her wiles cause him to fall desperately in love with her, but she suffers from an unquenchable desire to go to the bad, and her subsequent adventures, as faithfully related by Mr. Teignmouth Shore, may fairly be described as lurid. The volume ends with the suicide of the artist, on his discovery of his mistress's falseness, and we are left to conclude that that lady fulfils the destiny that attends persons of her unhappy temperament. The work is rather crudely written, though it improves as it goes on, and the character of its heroine makes it decidedly unpleasant reading. But the pictures of seamy life in London are both vivid and convincing.

Love and the Minor. By RATHMELL WILSON. (Greening & Co., 3s. 6d.)

THIS is the story of Ralph Verton, the wild young novelist, who loves, and subsequently marries, the country vicar's beautiful daughter, cutting out the curate who loves the same lady. We confess ourselves at a loss to understand the author's purpose in writing this book. In places his style and the characters of whom he writes suggest that he is a conscious parodist of the affected love-story, but, on the whole, he appears to desire that his book should be taken seriously as a genuine expression of life. If it be parody, he has made the mistake of being too subtle; if it be romance, he would have aided his readers in the comprehension of his theme by writing about real men and women and employing a less elated style. It is a mysterious little book.

The Imbeciles. By L. LOCKHART LANG. (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.)

AFTER a debauch of serious reading it is pleasant to come upon a book possessing the amiable if unthinking flippancy of "The Imbeciles." A wealthy valetudinarian, weary of doctors, massage, and electric baths, decides to live the natural life on a small island off the west of Scotland, a scheme which involves the wearing of skins and the pursuit of wild animals with spears and bows and arrows. His sister and wife accompany him, and the former light-heartedly invites a company of queer guests, who accept the scheme with varying enthusiasm. We should hesitate to say that, given this opening, Mr. Lockhart Lang has made the most of his opportunities, for many of the adventures of the islanders are mere clowning, and the seriousness of the love passages emphasises this defect. But the fooling, even when it is touched with satire, is always good-natured, and the book may be recommended to those who preserve a taste for frivolous and unimproving reading. For our part, we enjoyed it.

Demos Awakes. By DAVID CHRISTIE MURRAY. (John Long, 6s.)

ALAN MACDONALD, junior partner of a large firm of art porcelain manufacturers in Snaresborough, is engaged to be married to Helen Roberson, the daughter of the head of the business. A strike is imminent among the factory hands, and a paid agitator, one Ezekiel Odgers, is on his way from London to stir them to revolt. This is the condition of affairs when the story opens. Odgers turns out to be a rogue, and is in the pay of a greater scoundrel than himself. Together they plot the ruin of Macdonald, and are only frustrated by a fortunate accident. The characters are handled well, and the best is made of a not very original plot. It is doubtful whether a man, with a fairly promising career before him, would, however rascally by nature, undertake such a dangerous and criminal piece of villainy as he attributes to Odgers, even for the sake of a heavy bribe.

D R A M A

"DIANA OF DOBSON'S" AT THE KINGSWAY THEATRE

MISS LENA ASHWELL is not only a distinguished actress but she is also a most adventurous lady. To start in management with a play by an unknown dramatist shows immense nerve, to follow it by another play also by an unknown dramatist is in the highest spirit of adventure; and I wish that I could think that the new play was worthy of its sponsor. Not that it is by any means a bad play; each of the acts is interesting in itself, but as a whole it is wanting in homogeneity. There are three distinct episodes in the play, spread over four acts—the second and third acts dealing with the same episode—but the fusion of the three parts hardly strikes one as being as inevitable as it should. Diana is an assistant in a low-class draper's store, who in the midst of her drudgery becomes the possessor of £300. She makes up her mind to "live" by the aid of it for one month. The month is spent at Pontresina at a fashionable hotel, where a young Guardsman with £600 a year, whose income is largely augmented by a worldly aunt, falls in love with her. She explains as she is returning to her drudgery who and what she is, and in the shock they part with mutual recriminations. In the last act they meet at night on the Embankment almost starving; she because she cannot get work, and he because he is unsuccessfully trying to prove to himself, what she has denied is the case, that he has a money value in the world. The end is obvious.

The play is likely to be a success for three reasons: one is the novelty of the first act, which shows us the dormitory at Dobson's stores, with the young ladies getting to bed. It is sufficiently realistic to please even Peeping Tom. Two, is the melodramatic scene of the last act, with its policeman and the derelicts on a seat. Three, is the admirable acting of everyone in the play.

Miss Ashwell is, of course, Diana. There is a simplicity about her acting, especially in the quieter scenes, that produces a feeling of reality which has more effect on an audience than many tracts on the unemployed could have, and which would, I believe, even touch the heart of a member of the Charity Organisation Society. In the more impassioned scene with her lover she rises to those heights of indignation that we know so well in Miss Ashwell. Mr. C. M. Hallard, as Captain the Hon. Victor Bretherton, was excellent. The folly of the affluent young man about town was splendidly depicted, and when that yielded to a fierce desire to prove himself a man, Mr. Hallard was equally good. Mr. Dennis Eadie gave us a study of the prosperous, newly Baroneted, "h"-less business organiser, that was almost startling in its truth, and the same may be said of Miss Beryl Mercer's old woman of the Embankment. Mr. Norman McKinnel did all there was to do with the part of the sympathetic policeman, and Miss Frances Ivor gave an admirable caricature of the worldly aunt, Mrs. Cantelupe. The assistants at Dobson's were wonderfully portrayed by Misses Nannie Bennett, Christine Silver, Muriel Vox, and Doris Lytton. I have said thus much about the acting and thus little about the play itself because I am sure that in this case Miss Cicely Hamilton, its author, much as she is to be congratulated on such a first play, is still more to be congratulated on having it presented with such an excellent cast.

A. C.

CORRESPONDENCE

COCKNEY RHYMES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I acknowledge great carelessness in having quoted "delight" as a word in which I hear and pronounce the consonant sound of "gh," or at any rate in which I ought to hear and pronounce it, for I can scarcely remember how long ago Professor Skeat taught me the proper spelling, and I thank him for having reminded me of it. However, I hope that the success of my letter may atone for my carelessness, since it produced three such interesting replies. As I fancy "T. S. O." may have divined, my main object was to offer him some opposition. I am not bigotedly assured of the truth of the thesis I was defending, though I think there is a good deal of truth in it. I am afraid that pressure of time will make my reply rather disjointed. I do pronounce "Lo!" differently from "low"—when I remember it, giving to the latter the consonant sound of "w" by completely closing the lips. I also make a difference in the final sound of "I," "eye," and "high," giving the second the sound of consonant "y," and to the last that of "gh." I repudiate in advance the charge of subserviency to spelling; your printer can corroborate my non-conformity. In the particular words that I quote I have justified myself for the occasion out of an obsolete dictionary, which is at hand. It shows corresponding differences in the words from which it pretends to derive them. I thoroughly distrust it and appeal to Professor Skeat. My care in pronunciation was originally a physical necessity similar to Demosthenes's, and is now also the expression of a wish to preserve and fix the subtly varying sounds of English. In these I think very much of the beauty of English poetry resides. I do not wish to "set up one poet against another"; some named by "T. S. O." I would not set up on any ground. But there are some, among whom I would certainly reckon Tennyson, so perfected by nature and training, that for me their practice is right, whatever etymology or prosody or grammar may have to say against it. There are others abundantly inspired, speaking to me out of the Burning Bush, whose practice I cannot accept as a law, notably Keats. Returning to "T. S. O.'s" letter more particularly, I must affirm that I do pronounce the "l" in "calm," the "p" in "psychology," and the "t" in "often." It is difficult to hear oneself, but I hope when I pronounce them that I do not emit the sounds produced by singers, actors, orators, and preachers on such occasions. I cannot admit that either of these classes offers a criterion for the pronunciation of English, nor do I think that "T. S. O." maintains that they do. Has not he heard well-trained singers sing "Arrum! Arrum, ye brave!"? Did he never hear the versicle in The Corsican Brothers: "You seem melancholly, Fabby-ang!" and Irving's pointed response: "I am mell'nk'ly"? The theory which I wish to advance is that "T. S. O." does himself pronounce the extra consonants, and that they are audible to foreigners, but not generally to us, because we are most of us phonetically deaf, not inarticulate. I cite as an example the deafness of the populace to certain consonants always pronounced by educated persons, and the deafness of educated persons to their own provincialisms in pronunciation which they deride in others, especially Cockneyism. I, of course, exaggerated "T. S. O.'s" original protest in order to make him answer the more technical parts of my letter. I fully agree with him that serious verse demands a beautiful pedantry in sounds. I would say, rather, that it is the natural pedant only who becomes the consummate poet. I repeat that I dislike "Cockney rhymes," but I still suggest that their use by such poets as Tennyson and Swinburne, in the full tide of their youthful inspiration, may indicate a natural change in the language such as those I quoted, which Professor Skeat has put back for us to the time of Lydgate. To Mr. Lascelles Abercrombie I must point out that I followed "T. S. O.'s" use of the term "Cockney rhymes," confining it to those which practically obliterate the consonant "r." These never occur in Milton; if they did I should accept them on the following principle: that rules of English spelling are not to be considered at all. If the sound represented by "r" on the Continent of Europe had to the ear of Milton so far faded out of such syllables that they rhymed to him pleasantly with syllables which never had the sound of "r," I should accept his taste as final. As regards "wool" and "pull," these are perfect rhymes, in spite of English prosodists; it is the spelling which is imperfect. I believe that "T. S. O." will agree. I submit that "falls" and "madrigals" were perfect also, if, as I believe, the last syllable of "madrigals" was formerly pronounced as if written "—alls," though not perhaps actually so written. Perhaps someone will corroborate or refute this. At any rate, I fully agree with Mr. Abercrombie that "the ear" (of a great poet) "knows full well" "what rhymes are perfect." I beg him to excuse me for wresting his sentence; it still accords with the trend of his main argument, with which again I agree. You, sir, "T. S. O.," and I have not disagreed about allophonus vowel rhymes; we all accept them with pleasure. As regards allophonus consonant rhymes, I would with Mr. Abercrombie admit them when they are, "in their place, beautiful." Here, too, the poet takes the risk. I do contend that allophony should not be called "homophony," nor perfect rhymes "imperfect," because their spelling marks derivation, or caprice, or error, or chance, or nothing. I much regret that I cannot at the moment answer either of "T. S. O.'s" enquiries.

February 18.

L. L. A. S.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—If Mr. Abercrombie had read my "protest," he would have seen that I made no objection to imperfect rhymes in general; on the contrary, I said they were sanctioned by practice and defensible in theory. I tried to draw a distinction, which may be summed up as follows. Rhymes like over and cover are unobjectionable in themselves, because the difference in pronunciation is clear; rhymes like spirit and inherit are doubtful, because readers may imagine that they are asked to say sperrit; rhymes like dawn and morn, court and thought, etc., are bad, because the speaker of Southern English will infallibly take them for perfect rhymes, which they are not. These last four words I am glad to find controverted by no one.

Prof. Skeat, to whom we all listen with deference, will probably tell us that words like over and cover were once perfect rhymes. Few people realise the changes that have occurred in English vocalisation since Shakespeare's day. Granting this, we have still to explain the continued use of such rhymes by our poets. When Tennyson closes the music of "In Memoriam" on the cadence:

That God, which ever lives and loves,
One God, one law, one element,
And one far-off divine event,
To which the whole creation moves—

I cannot believe that the italicised rhyme was chosen by him carelessly, or for want of a better, or in deference to some imaginary rule. I believe his ear liked the effect, as mine certainly does. But if he had supposed that any reader would wish to say looves or muvs, I believe he would not have used the rhyme.

Mrs. Browning is a beacon as to misuse of imperfect rhymes. Having perceived, I believe rightly, that their use is sometimes desirable, she deliberately adopted them wholesale, and defended herself for doing so. The result has been universal reprobation. I cannot agree with the total condemnation of her husband's rhyme-scheme in "Through the Metidja." It is a tour de force, by no means to be repeated, but we are the richer for having it. Browning's characteristic use of rhymes in general, and grotesque rhymes in particular, is a subject on which much might be said.

February 15.

T. S. O.

Allow me to disclaim responsibility for the spelling of "Shalott" in my last letter. Your printer seems to have thought the lady presided over an onion!

"INFAMOUS TREATMENT"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Will you and your readers kindly give me your opinions on this?

I recently sent several poems to an illustrated London daily, which does insert verses in every issue. They were declined, quite irrespective of their merit, on the ground of my name not being well enough known! They only used, they said, poems by well-known writers. Do the following facts warrant my claim to be among those?

(1) I was called by Mr. Quiller-Couch "one of the sweetest of Devon singers now alive," and this in a review in the Speaker.

(2) The late H. D. Traill included me in his list of Minor Poets in the Nineteenth Century (March, 1892). Before doing this he read one of my volumes of verse.

(3) I was included in the last list published of living poets and in many anthologies.

(4) Mr. Churton Collins highly praised my Hexameters and a lyric I sent him.

To crown all, the paper in question constantly inserts poems with unknown names attached, including "Anon."! Is he a well-known poet?

F. B. DOVETON.

P.S.—If I am wrong in my protest I apologise all round, but if right I think I am infamously treated by the journal in question.

ROYAL AMATEUR ART SOCIETY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The Annual Exhibition of the Royal Amateur Society will be held this year, by kind permission of the Speaker and Mrs. Lowther, at the Speaker's House, Palace of Westminster, from 2nd to the 6th of April. Interesting prints of old Westminster, and a number of works of art by distinguished French amateurs, will be included in the Exhibition. The profits will be divided between London Nursing Charities and the Westminster Hospital Fund. Intending exhibitors are invited to communicate with the Hon. Mrs. Mallet, 38 Rutland Gate, S.W.

F. L. M. LYTE.

AN ENQUIRY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Can (and, if so, will) your contributor on Chinese and Japanese Fiction give me any information about a book which I have, entitled:

HAU KIOU CHOAN:

or

The Pleasing History.

A

Translation from the Chinese Language, to which are added, etc., etc.

In Four Vols.

London: Printed for R. and J. Dodsley in Pall Mall.

MDCCLXI.

Is it a real translation or is it a hoax? Whose work is it supposed to be, and is it particularly rare or precious?

I should be very grateful for any information, which I have sought in vain from other quarters.

H. PERRY ROBINSON.

"GENIUS LOCI"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The pretty article entitled "Genius Loci," published in your issue of January 25th, an appreciative review of Vernon Lee's "Sentimental Traveller," much amuses and surprises Vernon Lee's friends and admirers by assuming that the "Sentimental Traveller" is written by an old lady of the conventional pretty-old-age type that some of us have been fortunate enough to meet with in real life, gentle, delicate, white-haired, reminiscent, etc. A greater contrast to the real Vernon Lee could hardly be imagined. To begin with, the distinguished writer who shelters under the well-known pseudonym is not old. Her hair is still dark, she is active and vigorous physically as mentally, an appearance that belongs rather to the Mid-Victorian emancipated woman of the best intellectual type, clinging even now to a certain severity of costume and some masculine touches in the same, adopted by many leaders in thought amongst the women of the nineteenth century.

The depth and range of power in her conversation is rather masculine than feminine in its knowledge and general outlook; the true womanly in her finds expression in benevolent action; and the feminine grace that is within shows in the charm and grace of her writing, the pure literary art of a refined and subtle mind.

Your reviewer refers to "Irene's great-great-grandmother," and declares that in the book under review "all is sweet and gentle and touched with that indefinite grace which age alone can lend"; and again, "you cannot but feel in the presence of a very distinguished and beautiful old lady"; closing with "Age has lent her added grace and dignity, and has taken away none of the hopefulness and vitality which are supposed to belong to youth."

One feels in reading this in the presence of a very, very young person, to whom people of thirty are middle-aged and those of forty are quite old! But even this young person would, on seeing her, scarcely dub Vernon Lee "an old lady."

Surely this error should be corrected lest a myth form around a distinguished name to the confusion of future biographers!

February 8.

A CONTEMPORARY OF VERNON LEE.

[Our reviewer writes: "I endeavoured to express the impression which the volume of essays gave me. I much regret that any friend of the distinguished writer should find offence in my remarks, but venture to think that only those who measure age by the unreal standard of actual years could misunderstand the spirit in which those remarks were written."]

FREE PUBLIC LIBRARIES AND THEIR ASSISTANTS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In December last you published some severe remarks on free libraries and their staffs, and pointed out that library assistants are greatly underpaid. The statement, being general, may be doubted by many readers. May I therefore draw attention to two recent advertisements, which show not only the wages offered, but what some library committees expect?

In September last the Leeds Public Library Committee invited:

Applications for the joint position of assistant librarian at the Central Library and librarian of a Branch Library. Previous experience in a Public Library and a knowledge of cataloguing necessary. Commencing salary £80 per annum, rising by annual increments of £5 to £100 per annum.

The Corporation of the County Borough of Sunderland are now going one better—or worse. They announce that they are about to appoint two assistant librarians to assist in the organisation of three branch libraries:

Applicants must produce proof of good education and a thorough training of at least five years in Public Library work, which is to include a practical knowledge of the Dewey System of Classification, and of cataloguing in English, Latin, and French. Commencing salary £65 per annum.

A rush for these appointments is evidently expected, as canvassing the committee is strictly prohibited.

It is, I think, clear that if the Corporation of the County Borough of Sunderland are justified in their action, then the Leeds Library Committee are open to the charge of recklessly squandering the ratepayers' money. But perhaps the Corporation of the County Borough of Sunderland think that there should be a reduction for taking a quantity!

When a Corporation offers twenty-five shillings a week to a man of good education, who has had five years' training in a public library, is able to catalogue books in three languages, and to classify works in the whole of human knowledge according to a special system, we are surely getting near enough to a sweating system to justify a strong protest.

The Corporation of the County Borough of Sunderland, however, are not satisfied with the above, for they stipulate that the successful candidates shall (presumably within their own time and at their own cost) take the Library Association Correspondence Classes.

In your article above referred to you stated that "the intellectual equipment of free library assistants is not greatly above that of a booking clerk at a railway station." The Corporation of the County Borough of Sunderland are determined that their library assistants shall have a much higher intellectual equipment, but they evidently do not mind the weekly wages being the same as those of the booking-office clerks.

We librarians may not all agree with your criticisms, but we certainly owe you a debt of gratitude for drawing attention to what is really becoming a public scandal.

February 15.

G. T. S.

"THE NOBLE ARMY OF MARTYRS"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In reply to those who argue that it has recently been discovered that the awful persecution of the early Protestants, if not an entire myth, was, at any rate, an exaggeration, I should like to ask by what recent discovery or curious manipulation of history has it been made out that all our ancient history is mistaken except by those whose interest it is to keep back such dreadful facts in history during the dark ages of Popery, when even kings trembled at the thunders which proceeded from the seven hills of Rome (Rev. x. 4) during more than the twelve centuries of the predicted reign of Antichrist (2 Thess. ii. 4) which should "wear out the saints of the Most High" (Dan. vii. 25). Have they ever read the sad "History of the Pious Waldensian Church," by Dr. Wylie (published by Messrs. Cassell & Co., price 1s. 6d.), or Motley's "Dutch Republic, and the French inraids instigated by the various Popes of Rome"? As the Waldensian persecution was not stopped until the brave Oliver Cromwell threatened the Pope that the British guns should be heard in the streets of Rome if his cruel edict for their extinction were not rescinded (Macaulay), which soon brought him to his senses, so the Popish persecution did not cease in the Netherlands until Marlborough crushed the terrible power of Louis XIV., from which he never recovered, and thereby secured the Protestant succession of the English Crown, which was in danger of a Jacobite influence both in England and France. What shall we say of the human bonfires in our own country during the five years of "bloody" Queen Mary's reign? To show that the thirst for blood of that ten-horned dragon is as keen as ever it was, if only it had a chance to show it, the Papal Episcopal oath is as follows: "Heretics, schismatics (i.e., Protestants), and rebels to my said lord (i.e., the Pope) and his successors, I will to the utmost of my power persecute and wage war with." The mystical Babylon is so drunken with blood (Rev. xvii. 6) that she does not know she has been drinking. That system "builds up her Zion with blood, and her Jerusalem with iniquity" (Micah iii., 10).

History records the massacre of St. Bartholomew, in 1572, which seemed good unto that "first-born of Satan" Gregory XIII., so much so that he walked in procession from the Church of St. Peter's to the Church of St. Lewis, to return thanks to God for so happy a result, and caused several medals to be struck to perpetuate the memory of the event ("Fleury's Eccles. Hist.," vol. xxiii., book 170, p. 557). It seemed good unto the Popes of Rome, or Antichrist, to persecute unto death the poor, pious Waldenses, concerning whom the poet Milton exclaimed, "Avenge, O Lord, Thy slaughtered saints!"—and to slay with all the refined horrors which men and devils could devise, in the dungeons of the Inquisition, many millions of the poor Protestants who preferred to obey God rather than man with his blasphemous pretensions. They realised Christ's prediction in John xvi. 2, "That whosoever killeth you will think that he doeth God service." What that day will reveal "when the earth shall disclose her blood, and no more cover her slain!" (Isaiah xxvi. 21).

M.A.(CANTAB.).

[When Arthur Clennam was a little boy, he had to spend a great part of each Sunday with "a horrible tract," which "commenced business" by asking him "why he was going to Perdition . . . and which, for the further attraction of his infant mind, had a parenthesis in every other line with some such hiccupping reference as 2 Ep. Thess., c. iii., v. 6 and 7." It would seem that "M.A.(Cantab.)" must have passed his infancy under somewhat similar conditions. His apocalyptic references and interpretations recall a certain prophetic journal, which used to be—perhaps still is—full of the Ten-horned Dragon; though, so far as we can remember, the Horns pierced the Napoleonic Dynasty as frequently as the Papacy. "M.A. (Cantab.)" also recalls a delightful personage, one Andrew Fairservice, who spoke of the "muckle hure that sitteth upon the Seven Hills, as if ane were not enough for her auld hinder end." Seriously, we are not aware that anybody has denied the existence of the Marian Burnings, though we have heard the Elizabethan Disembowellings dismissed as purely political punishments. Perhaps Cromwell and the Puritans generally are not the most happy instances of toleration that could be chosen. The former, amidst many similar pieties, sold seven thousand of his countrymen into slavery in the West Indies: the régime of the saints of New England is too well known to need more than a reference.—ED.]

A CORRECTION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your reviewer is very much in error when he says that there is nothing to indicate that the thirty-eight sketches of which Mr. G. W. E. Russell's "Pocketful of Sixpences" consists are reprinted from the daily papers. Not all, but many, are reprinted from a daily paper—the Manchester Guardian—the rest appeared in the Cornhill, Putnam's Monthly, the Albany Review, and the Optimist. These facts are duly stated in a postscript at the end of the book.

February 18.

GRANT RICHARDS.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART

- Dobson, Austin. William Hogarth. Heinemann, 6s. net.
Essays on Art. By John Hoppner, R.A. Edited and with an Introduction by Frank Rutter. Griffiths, 2s. 6d. net.
 Konody, P. G. The Brothers Van Eyck. Bell, 1s. 6d.
 Cust, R. H. Hobart. Botticelli. Bell, 1s. net.

BIOGRAPHY

- Liebich, Mrs. Franz. Claude-Achille Debussy. Lane, 2s. 6d. net.
 Gosse, Edmund. Ibsen. Hodder and Stoughton, 3s. 6d.

BOOKS OF REFERENCE

- Debrett's House of Commons and the Judicial Bench*, 1908. Dean.
Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels. Edited by J. Hastings. Vol. II. Clark, 21s. net.
London Diocese Book for 1908. Edited by the Rev. Prebendary Glendinning Nash. S.P.C.K., 1s. 6d. net.

DRAMA

- Synge, J. M. The Tinker's Wedding. Maunsel, 2s. net.
Deirdre. By A. E. Maunsel, 1s.
 Hardy, Thomas. The Dynasts. Macmillan, 4s. 6d. net.
 Fogerty, Elsie. The Queen's Jest. Swan Sonnenschein, 6d. net.
The Collected Works of Henrik Ibsen. Vol. I. Heinemann, 4s.

EDUCATIONAL

- Perry, W. J. History of England. Vol. II. Relfe, 3s.
The Ideal Senior Poetry Book. Relfe, 9d.
 Perry, W. J. The Junior Physical Geography. Relfe, 1s.
 Carter, George. Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther. Relfe, 1s. 6d.
 Brooksbank, F. H. Essay and Letter Writing. Macmillan, 2s. 6d.
Blackie's English Texts. Plutarch's Life of Julius Cæsar.
The Coming of Arthur. The Knights of the Round Table.
Cowley's Essays. The Siege of Syracuse. Blackie, 6d. each.
 Endecott, F. C. A School Course in Physics. Blackie, 2s. 6d.
Vocabulary to Cæsar's Gallic War. Vocabulary to Virgil. Blackie, 1s. each.
 Rouse, W. H. D. A Greek Reader. Blackie, 2s. 6d. net.
 Bridgett, R. C. Experimental Trigonometry. Blackie, 1s.
 Weaver, Franklin J. English History Illustrated, from Original Sources, 1603-1660. Black, n.p.
 Stirling, Amelia Hutchison. A Sketch of Scottish Industrial and Social History. Blackie, 1s. 6d.
Lessons on Cures. Blackie, 6d.
Poésies Choiesies. Le Coup de Pistolet. Blackie, 4d. and 6d.
Le Cid et Horace. Blackie, 6d.
A Dream of Fair Women and Tithonus. The Palace of Art and Ulysses. Blackie, 2d. each.

FICTION

- Sillery, Major C. A Curtain of Cloud. Blackwood, 6s.
 Lowndes, Mrs. Belloc. The Pulse of Life. Heinemann, 6s.
 Moffett, Cleveland. A King in Rags. Appleton, 6s.
 Harris, Miriam Coles. The Tents of Wickedness. Appleton, 6s.
 Kernahan, Coulson. The Red Peril. Hurst and Blackett, 6s.
 Hurst, Edward H. Mystery Island. Hurst and Blackett, 6s.
 Burgess, Gelett. The White Cat. Chapman and Hall, 6s.
 Swift, Benjamin. The Death Man. Chapman and Hall, 6s.
 Meadows, Alice Maud. The Odd Trick. Long, 6s.
 Appleton, G. W. The Willoughby Affair. Long, 6s.
 Gould, Nat. The Top Weight. Long, 2s.
 Castle, Agnes and Egerton. Flower o' the Orange. Methuen, 6s.
 Stevenson, J. G. A Lifted Veil. Clarke, 6s.
 Drew, Sara. The Girl Behind. Ouseley, 1s. net.
 Nowell, Edith. Which? Ouseley, 3s. 6d.
 Eyre, John. Condemned to Death. Ouseley, 6s.

- Gobb, Thomas. The Chichester Intrigue. Lane, 6s.
 Hunt, Violet. White Rose of Weary Leaf. Heinemann, 6s.
 Sykes, J. A. C. Mark Alston. Eveleigh Nash, 6s.
 Chesney, Weatherley. The Romance of a Queen. Chatto and Windus, 6s.
 Scott, John Reed. Beatrice of Clare. Grant Richards, 6s.
 Turner, Reginald. Imperial Brown of Brixton. Chapman and Hall, 6s.
 Armour, Frances J. The Brotherhood of Wisdom. Brown Langham, 6s.
 Hill, Headon. Radford Shone. Ward Lock, 6s.
 Jacob, Violet. The History of Aythan Waring. Heinemann, 6s.
 Courlander, Alphonse. Eve's Apple. Fisher Unwin, 6s.
 Murray, David Christie. Demos Awakes. Long, 6s.
 Shore, W. Teignmouth. The Pest. Long, 6s.
 De Morgan, William. Somehow Good. Heinemann, 6s.
For My Name's Sake. Translated by L. M. Leggatt. Burns and Oates, 3s. 6d.
Canon Sheehan's Short Stories. Burns and Oates, 1s. net.
 Fletcher, J. S. Mothers in Israel. Murray, 6s.
 Warden, Gertrude. The Dancing Leaves. Ward Lock, 6s.
 Reynolds, Mrs. Fred. St. David of the Dust. Hurst and Blackett, 6s.
 Middlemass, Jean. An Evil Angel. Digby Long, 6s.
 Dawson, Warrington. The Scourge. Methuen, 6s.
 Noble, Edward. The Grain Carriers. Blackwood, 6s.
 Orczy, Baroness. Beau Brocade. Greening, 6s.
 McEnery, John. The Vision of the Foam. Greening, 6s.
 Whitelaw, David. The Gang. Greening, 3s. 6d.
Clementina's Highwayman. By Robert Neilson Stephens and George Hembert Westley. Hurst and Blackett, 6s.
 Gibbs, Philip. The Individualist. Grant Richards, 6s.
 Gull, C. Ranger. The Patron Saint. White, 6s.
 Phillpotts, Eden. The Mother. Ward Lock, 6s.
 Ellesmere, The Earl of. The Standertons. Heinemann, 6s.
 Wood, H. V. Wiber. Under Masks. Sisley's, 6s.
 Yardley, Maud H. Nor All Your Tears. Sisley's, 6s.
 Black, Clementina. Caroline. Murray, 6s.
 Wyndham, Horace. Irene of the Ringlets. Milne, 6s.
 Becke, Louis. The Call of the South. Milne, 6s.
 Playne, C. E. The Terror of the Macdurgotts. Fisher Unwin, 6s.
 Gleig, Charles. Julian Winterson. Werner Laurie, 6s.
 Drake, Maurice. Lethbridge of the Moor. Werner Laurie, 6s.
 Yorke, Curtis. Their Marriage. Long, 6s.
 Darche, Muriel. The Porters of Woodthorpe. Long, 6s.
 Randall, F. J. Love and the Ironmonger. Lane, 6s.

MISCELLANEOUS

- Sherman, Ellen Burns. Words to the Wise and Others. Bell, 6s. net.
A Treasury of English Literature. Arranged by Kate M. Warren. Old English, 700-1200; 1200 to Age of Elizabeth. Constable, 1s. net.
 Green, E. Tyrrell. Towers and Spires. Wells Gardner, Darton, 10s. 6d.
Are we a Stupid People? By One of Them. Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner, 5s. net.
 Belloc, Hilaire. On Nothing, and Kindred Subjects. Methuen, 5s.
 Steuart, Katharine. Richard Kennoway and his Friends. Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.
Confessio Medici. By the writer of "The Young People." Macmillan, 3s. 6d. net.
 Bower, F. O. The Origin of a Land Flora. Macmillan, 18s. net.
 O'Donnell, F. Hugh. Paraguay on Shannon. King, 6s.
 Warren, W. P. Thoughts on Business. Nash, 1s. net.
 Watson, Aaron. A Great Labour Leader. Masters, 15s. net.
 Jannaway, Frank G. A Godless Socialism. Walter Scott Publishing Co., 3d.
 Pycraft, W. P. A Book of Birds. Appleton, 6s. net.
 Calvert, A. F. Geya. John Lane, 3s. 6d. net.
 Watson, E. H. Lacon. Benedictine. Brown Langham, 1s. net.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEERED

DRINK THE

WHITEDELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
& AFTER DINNER.& BLUEIn making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

The Best Tonic

For the restoration of energy and vitality; the relief of mental and nervous exhaustion, impaired digestion or appetite, there is no remedy so beneficial as

Horsford's Acid Phosphate

(Non-Alcoholic.)

It is a scientific and carefully prepared preparation of the phosphates that provides the tonic and nerve food needed to improve general health.

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with. Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE GEORGE MEREDITH BIRTHDAY CELEBRATION

All admirers of the great Novelist should read the Monograph,

GEORGE MEREDITH

An Essay towards appreciation, by WALTER JERROLD in the English Writers of To-Day Series.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d., with a Portrait of George Meredith.

London: GREENING & CO., LTD., and all Booksellers.

Sir Hubert Von Herkomer AND PUBLIC OPINION

Sir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey to the Editor of "Public Opinion," says, on February 11th, 1908:—

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper, PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which would be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged, and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly. From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is, after all, not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you, with all my heart, continuous success with your paper.

Yours very truly,

(Signed) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

PUBLIC OPINION A WEEKLY REVIEW of CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY

Every Friday Twopence
EDITED BY PERCY L. PARKER

The Purpose of PUBLIC OPINION is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political, and social progress.

PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent Post Free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 3s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to—

PUBLIC OPINION, 50 & 51 Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

SPECIMENS FREE ON APPLICATION

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART.

PRICE THREEPENCE.

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION:

Inland, 15s. post free, Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free.

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, 95 FETTER LANE, E.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

MESSRS. METHUEN'S NEW BOOKS

Please write at once to Messrs. METHUEN for their List of New Books. It is well illustrated and very interesting. Send also for their List of New Novels.

THE WORKS OF OSCAR WILDE

Messrs. METHUEN have much pleasure in announcing that they began, on February 13, the publication, in Twelve Volumes, of a Uniform Edition of the Works of Oscar Wilde. The books are reprinted from the latest editions issued under the superintendence of the Author, and in many cases they contain his last corrections. They are published by authority of his Literary Executor. THE DUCHESS OF PADUA is a New Play, and the other Books have been out of print for some years, and are now practically unobtainable. The Edition is limited to 1,000 copies for Great Britain and America, and is printed on hand-made paper, demy 8vo. The price of each volume is 12s. 6d. net. There is also an Edition, limited to 80 copies, for Great Britain and America, on Japanese vellum, 42s. net each Volume. The whole Edition will be soon sold. THE FIRST SIX VOLUMES ARE:—

THE DUCHESS OF PADUA.

A long play hitherto unpublished.

SALOME, AND OTHER PLAYS.

This volume includes a lately discovered play, "A Florentine Tragedy," and "Vera," an early work. "Salome" is in the original French.

LADY WINDERMERE'S FAN.

A WOMAN OF NO IMPORTANCE.

AN IDEAL HUSBAND.

THE IMPORTANCE OF BEING EARNEST.

ON NOTHING AND KINDRED SUBJECTS.

By HILAIRE BELLOC, M.P. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. The Essays in this book are concerned with Nothing, and though it is impossible that they should exhaust such a subject, they consider many of its aspects, especially as they are to be discovered in travel and in the observation of men. They deal with the Loss of Youth, of Manuscripts, with Death, with the Sufferings of the Rich, the Love of Dogs, Winged Horses, Fools, Politicians, and the Art of Coming to an End.

THE FIRST DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM, AND SOME MEN AND WOMEN OF THE STUART COURT.

By PHILIP GIBBS. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

THE THIRTEEN COLONIES OF NORTH AMERICA.

By REGINALD W. JEFFERY, M.A. With 8 Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

FUNCTIONAL NERVE DISEASES.

By A. T. SCHOFIELD, M.D., Hon. Phys. Freidenheim Hospital. With 3 Diagrams. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [The New Library of Medicine.]

RICHARD KENNOWAY AND HIS FRIENDS.

By KATHERINE STEUART. A Sequel to 'By Allan Water.' Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

MY MEMOIRS.

By ALEXANDRE DUMAS. Translated by E. M. WALLER. With Frontispieces in Photogravure. In 6 volumes. Crown 8vo, 6s. each. Volume III.

FLOWER O' THE ORANGE, and other Tales.

By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE, Authors of 'Incomparable Bellairs,' 'Rose of the World,' &c. With a Frontispiece in Colour by A. H. BUCKLAND. Crown 8vo, 6s.

The demand for this book has been so great that the First and Second Editions were exhausted before publication and a Third Edition is now in the Press.

THE BAD TIMES.

A Novel. By GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM. Crown 8vo, 6s.

EARLY WOODCUT INITIALS.

Containing over 13,000 Reproductions of Pictorial Letters of the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries. By OSCAR JENNINGS, M.D., Member of the Bibliographical Society. Demy 4to, 21s. net.

The first serious attempt that has been made to reproduce the ornamental initial letters with which the best printers of Germany, Italy, Switzerland, France, and Spain beautified their books.

A WOMAN'S TREK FROM THE CAPE TO CAIRO.

By MARY HALL. With 64 Illustrations and 2 Maps. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.

"A model of what travellers' tales should be."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

THE COMPLETE MOUNTAINEER.

By G. D. ABRAHAM. With over 70 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

"The title of this book is no exaggeration. To climbers of all kinds and conditions it will be all but indispensable."—MORNING LEADER.

"Mountaineers have looked out for this book, the work of a most excellent rock-climber, a competent man on ice and snow, and one of the most successful of mountain photographers."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

A PRINCESS OF THE OLD WORLD.

By ELEANOR C. PRICE. With 21 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

This volume deals with the life and surroundings of Anne Marie Louise d'Orléans, known as La Grande Mademoiselle.

"Altogether a brilliant volume, which must not be missed by students of French history."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

THE LIFE OF NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.

By S. BARING-GOULD. With over 150 Illustrations and a Photogravure Frontispiece. Royal 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

This is an Abridged and Cheaper Edition of the magnificent 'Life of Napoleon' issued several years ago.

"Taken as a whole, we do not hesitate to say that this combined product of narrative writing and art will give the English reader a clearer and more complete idea of the complicated and colossal personality of Napoleon than it is possible to gather from any other work of equal extent."—ST. JAMES'S BUDGET.

FLORENCE AND NORTHERN TUSCANY.

By EDWARD HUTTON, Author of 'The Cities of Umbria.' With 32 Illustrations, of which 16 are in Colour by WILLIAM PARKINSON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The pictures—some of them charming sketches—heighten the appeal of an attractive and well-written book."—STANDARD.

"The artistic criticism is its most valuable, as it is certainly not its least charming, characteristic."—DAILY NEWS.

"Every page bears witness to Mr. Hutton's knowledge and love of Italy."—MORNING LEADER.

GEORGE MEREDITH: NOVELIST, POET, REFORMER.

By M. STURGE HENDERSON. With a portrait. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A careful study of Meredith's work as novelist, poet, critic, and essayist.

"A fine and stimulating book for those who love the great man."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

"Of all Mr. Meredith's expositors, none has been more admirably dispassionate and earnest and large-minded than Mrs. Sturge Henderson."—DAILY MAIL.

THE GENTLEST ART.

An Anthology of Entertaining Letters. By E. V. LUCAS. Fourth Edition. Fcap. 8vo, 5s.

"The Gentlest Art" is, of course, the art of letter writing. Mr. Lucas is himself an expert in this branch of letters, and he has the true spirit of the anthologist, a good eye for colour, a delicate palate for taste, a good nose for perfume, and, above all, a keen sense of quiet humour. A charming, graceful book."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

THE CRIMES OF BRINVILLIERS AND OTHERS.

By ALEXANDRE DUMAS. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s.

INSTRUCTION IN COOKERY.

By Miss A. P. THOMPSON, Instructress to the London County Council. With 10 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. [Text-Books of Technology.]

FIGTION.

THE LADY OF THE BARGE.

By W. W. JACOBS. A New Edition. Crown, 8vo 3s. 6d.

This volume, uniform with Mr. Jacobs' other famous books, has been transferred to Messrs. Methuen.

THE SCOURGE.

By WARRINGTON DAWSON, Author of the 'The Scar.' Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The story is largely and finely conceived."—TIMES.

"Mr. Dawson shows us a picture of Virginian life which for breadth of composition, finished detail, and firm, delicate workmanship, could hardly be bettered. The handling is fresh and masterly. This is a well-written, uncommon, and even distinguished novel."—MORNING LEADER.

A SHEAF OF CORN.

By MARY E. MANN, Author of 'The Sheep and the Goats.' Crown 8vo, 6s.

Stories of town and country, of grave and gay, of rich and poor, of natural and supernatural.

"The art of them is well-nigh flawless. Each one secures its full effect; they begin with sufficient clearness and interest, they end with the most finished suggestiveness."—MORNING LEADER.

"They are dramas in miniature."—SCOTSMAN.

Mrs. Mann has the art intimately and sincerely to write the life of the very poor without alienating sympathy."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

THE MAGISTRATE'S OWN CASE.

By BARON ROSENKRANTZ. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A study in criminal investigation of considerable originality and constructive skill."—TIMES.

"The plot is full of ingenious surprises, and the book is altogether likely to be popular."—DAILY NEWS.

MAN AND THE CASSOCK.

By Mrs. DAVID G. RITCHIE, Author of 'The Truthful Liar.' Crown 8vo, 6s.

"This novel is a striking achievement.....impossible to skip a single page of a singularly engrossing book. It is not long, yet there is more wit than is to be found in twenty. Mrs. Ritchie is extraordinarily sensitive to the lighter side of the human comedy."—SPECTATOR.

"The author shows that she can paint with a sombre brush as well as touch off the comedy of things."—NATION.

"This is a novel of curious brilliance and distinction. It stands head and shoulders over the ordinary fiction of our time, and is the product of genuine thought and inspiration."—STANDARD.

THE YOUNG COLUMBINE.

By DOROTHEA DEAKIN. With a Frontispiece by LEWIS BAUMER. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A POPPY SHOW.

A Volume of Stories. By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

COLONEL KATE.

By K. L. MONTGOMERY, Author of 'The Cardinal's Pawn.' Crown 8vo, 6s.

METHUEN & CO., 36 Essex Street, London, W.C.

Printed for the Proprietors, THE WILSFORD PRESS, LTD., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C., by W. H. SMITH & SON, 55 Fetter Lane, London, and Published by H. E. MORGAN, at 95 Fetter Lane, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1869

FEBRUARY 29, 1908

PRICE THREEPENCE

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN,
ALBEMARLE STREET, PICCADILLY, W.

Thursday next, March 5, at Three o'clock,
Professor Sir JOHN RHYS, M.A., D.Litt., First of Two Lectures on "EARLY BRITISH HISTORY
AND EPIGRAPHY." Half-a-Guinea the course.

Saturday, March 7, at Three o'clock,
Professor J. J. THOMSON, LL.D., F.R.S., First of Six Lectures on "ELECTRIC DISCHARGES THROUGH GASES." One Guinea.

Subscription to all the courses in the season,
Two Guineas.

Tickets may be obtained at the Office of the Institution.

BRITISH MUSEUM.

The READING ROOMS will be CLOSED from MONDAY, MARCH 2ND, to THURSDAY,
MARCH 5TH, inclusive.

E. MAUNDE THOMPSON,
Director and Principal Librarian.

British Museum, 24th February, 1908.

ABERDEEN ART GALLERY.

The ART GALLERY COMMITTEE are prepared to receive applications for the APPOINTMENT
OF DIRECTOR AND CURATOR of the Art Gallery and Industrial Museum. Salary, £300 per annum. The Curator will have to devote the whole of his time to the duties of the office and must be a competent organiser of Picture and Arts Exhibitions, and capable of lecturing upon Art subjects.

Applications, stating age, qualifications and previous experience, and accompanied by testimonials, to be lodged with the Town Clerk on or before the 14th proximo.

W. GORDON, Town Clerk.
Town House, Aberdeen,
22nd February, 1908.

THE MOSHER BOOKS

THE NEW CATALOGUE FOR 1908 is now ready, and will be sent free on request
to booklovers anywhere that can be reached by mail. This Catalogue, like those that preceded it, is not made up of old and hackneyed quotations
concerning books. You are not wearied by "a jollie good book" jingle and that sort of thing,
but you are treated to some very genuine prose
and verse not seen in every cut and decidedly
dried anthology.

THOMAS B. MOSHER, PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

JUST PUBLISHED. 8vo, boards, 1s. net.

THE SLING.

Remarks in connection with Lectures delivered
in the Royal Institution,
May, 1905, to June, 1907.

By WM. LEIGHTON JORDAN.

London: Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co., Ltd.

NOTICE.

All communications to the Editor should be addressed
to 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields,
W.C.

All business communications must be sent to The
Manager of "The Academy,"
95 Fetter Lane, E.C.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately
done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens
and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The
Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds of Typewriting carefully done at home (Remington). Good paper.
Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from
3s. 6d. per 100.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road,
Clapham, S.W.

TYPEWRITING, 8d. per Thousand, including paper and postage. MSS. neatly and clearly typed. Satisfaction guaranteed.—Miss DREW, 84 Park Row, Bristol.

Books for Sale

HARMSWORTH'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA
OF UNIVERSAL KNOWLEDGE, New
and Revised Edition, 10 vols., cloth, gilt tops.
Published at £2. 16s. net. 21s.—W. E. GOULDEN, Bookseller, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

FRENCH ENGRAVERS AND
DRAUGHTSMEN OF THE XVIIITH
CENTURY, by Lady Dilke. 9 Photogravure
Plates and 38 other Illustrations. Imp. 8vo, cloth.
Published by Bell & Son, 1902, at 28s. net, for 12s. 6d. net.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

BOOKS AT ONE-THIRD COST.—
Thousands of the Best Books at from 25 to 80 per cent. below the original prices. Largest and best Stock of Secondhand and New Remainder
Books in the World. Write for our January
Catalogue.—W. H. SMITH & SON, Library
Department, 186 Strand, London, W.C.

BOOKS.—ALL OUT-OF-PRINT and
RARE BOOKS on any subject SUPPLIED.
The most expert Bookfinder extant. Please state wants and ask for CATALOGUE. I make a special feature of exchanging any Saleable Books for others selected from my various Lists. Special List of 2,000 Books I particularly want post free.—
EDW. BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16 John
Bright Street, Birmingham. Oscar Wilde's
Poems, 21s., for 10s. 6d.; Ballad of Reading Gaol, 5s. Who's Who, 2 vols. 1907, 11s. net, for 5s.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest
the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by Instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity
as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical Advice by eminent Physicians
and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley, Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A Furnished House in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense
when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary,
Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

Books, etc., Wanted

THE CAMBRIDGE LITERARY AGENCY,
which is placing Novels, Short Stories,
Articles, and Poems with over 100 (one hundred)
Publishers and Periodicals, sold, on December 31,
12 Short Stories and a Serial by UNKNOWN
WRITERS. Hundreds of unique testimonials.
All MSS. submitted by GEORGE G. MAGNUS,
115 Strand, London.

WILL PURCHASE AT ANY TIME.
ILLUMINATED MANUSCRIPTS, from
the earliest times till the beginning of the XVth
Century; Incunabula and other Early Printed
Books; Illustrated Books, Prints, from the XVth
and the beginning of the XVIth Century. Rare
Old Books and Prints.—JACQUES ROSENTHAL,
Munich, Bavaria. 10, Karlstr. 10.

QUEEN SQUARE CLUB.

A social club for men and women interested in politics, literature or art. Lectures, entertainments, chess and bridge. An exquisite Queen
Anne club-house, close to the British Museum,
and Russell Square Station. Inexpensive lunch
and dinner. Subscription two guineas.—Apply
Secretary, 9 Queen Square, Bloomsbury.

The Booklovers Library

delivers books in London and to any part of the United Kingdom. Its books are unlabelled, fresh, clean and inviting. It gives you a carriage-paid service or not, just as you wish. It gives you the books you want when you want them.

FOR LONDON AND COUNTRY.

ORDINARY SERVICE.

	Twelve Months	Six Months	Three Months
One Book ...	£1 1 0	£ 12 0	£ 7 0
Two Books ...	1 11 6	18 0	10 6
Three Books ...	1 17 0	1 1 0	12 0
Four Books ...	2 2 0	1 4 0	14 0
Six Books ...	2 12 6	1 11 6	16 0
Eight Books ...	3 3 0	1 16 0	18 0

Subscribers to the above service may exchange their books personally or by messenger as often as desired at the Library in Harrod's Stores, and at 17 Hanover Street, W. Country Subscribers to the above service may exchange their books by Rail or Parcels Post, as often as desired, paying carriage both ways. All boxes of books are forwarded to subscribers in advance; the finished volumes being returned to the Library upon receipt of fresh supply. The cost of carriage on four books, by rail, is in almost every case the same as on two or three books.

Booklet giving full terms of Subscription, the latest Monthly Book List, etc., will be sent Post Free upon application.

The Booklovers Library

17 Hanover Street, London, W.
And at Harrods Limited, Brompton Road, S.W.

BOOKS BY POST

Orders from any part of the Country for the despatch of Books by Post or any inquiries regarding Books receive the most prompt attention at

W·H·SMITH & SON'S

BOOKSHOP

KINGSWAY · LONDON · W·C

Full Discount allowed for Cash

THE SOCIALIST MOVEMENT IN ENGLAND.

BY BROUGHAM VILLIERS. 10s. 6d. net.

It is no longer possible for serious students of English politics to ignore Socialism. This is the first adequate attempt to explain the evolution and growth of the Socialist movement in this country.

T. FISHER UNWIN.

THE PROGRAMME OF MODERNISM

A reply to the Encyclical Pascendi of Pius X. Translated from the Italian by Father Tyrrell. 5s. net.

"Amidst the quickly growing mass of literature dealing with the modernist movement in the Roman Catholic Church, this little volume may, without hesitation, be singled out as the best source of information for those who want to know the facts in brief."—Manchester Guardian.

T. FISHER UNWIN.

"Unlike any other story that ever was written."

THE BLUE LAGOON.

BY H. DE VERE STACPOOLE. Second Impression. 6s.

PUNCH says: "It is a long time since I read a book more fascinating, more delicately conceived, more healthily nurtured on the fruits of an observation which knows when not to observe."

"An original charming simple romance by a novelist of courage and imagination."—Review of Reviews.

SPECIAL EDITION.

THE MERMAID SERIES.

THE BEST PLAYS OF THE OLD DRAMATISTS.

Literal Reproductions of the Old Text.

With Photogravure Frontispieces.

The volumes may now be obtained bound in the following styles:—

- I. Crown 8vo, uncut. Brown paper boards, with label, 3s. 6d.
- II. Crown 8vo, uncut. Green Cloth, with gilt lettering on ink panel, 3s. 6d.
- III. Crown 8vo, uncut top. Brown cloth, with gilt lettering and decorative design in brown, 3s. 6d.
- IV. Crown 8vo. Full vellum, with gilt lettering and gilt top, 6s. net.

THE THIN PAPER EDITION, in cloth at 2s. 6d. net, and in leather at 3s. 6d. net, is also obtainable.

List of Volumes sent Post Free on application.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1 ADELPHI TERRACE, LONDON.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
Life and Letters	503	Old Paris	511
Beauty and the Hunter	505	The Sincerity of Plural Person- ality	512
Singing	505	A Cataloguer Incomplete	513
Literature :		The Censorship of Plays	514
A Study in Shyness	505	The Library Table	515
The Victim of a Genius	506	Fiction	516
Somehow Good	507	Drama :
The History of Freedom	508	The Sicilian Players	519
The Amazing Canon	509	Correspondence	520

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-Class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to The Wilsford Press, Ltd., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The publishing offices of THE ACADEMY are at 95 Fetter Lane, E.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

It is a bootless task at present to comment in detail on Mr. McKenna's Education Bill. In the first place, it will be thoroughly shredded in and out of Parliament during some weeks, and we shall have further opportunities of dealing with it. In the second place, it strikes us, as it must strike the most superficial observer, that Mr. McKenna has very little desire, and no expectation, that it will ever become law. We are glad to find this impression confirmed by so observant a politician as Mr. C. A. Cripps, who is reported to have remarked immediately, "It is not intended to become law." It appears to us to be merely one of those feints which Mr. McKenna makes, in order to divert his supporters' attention from the designs dangerous to the Government, to which we alluded last week. The Bill has one incidental advantage, which has already been and will be further emphasised by the utterances of Mr. McKenna's partisans outside Parliament. It has acted as a searchlight on the designs of political-Nonconformity. Last week we asserted the determination of that party and of Mr. McKenna to cast education to the winds, so long as they can secure endowment for themselves. We contended that it is not efficiency in education that Mr. McKenna seeks, but the continued confidence of his political supporters. We are glad that our contention has been so notably corroborated. On Tuesday Mr. Balfour expressed our charge still more strongly: "Education you have sacrificed to the violence of your own religious prejudices."

The Bill has swelled the heads of the rank and file of the political-Nonconformists more than ever. They betray in every second utterance the designs which their leaders have so long attempted to conceal behind phrases. When they describe the Bill as "generous" they betray that they have always meant by "religious liberty" the power to abolish it. But it is only when they are flushed by the hope of victory that they dare to own their meaning, in the tortuous fashion permitted by their peculiar "conscience." Mr. McKenna shows that he knows well the agglomeration of turbulent sects with which he is connected in a sort of mutual leadership. Nothing is more likely to give him the whip hand over them than a prospect of exercising religious coercion. But the Bill holds out to them a further bait. Mr. McKenna, at least, knows well that their "conscientious" objections to the State-endowment of religion means a belief that Providence has designed them to enjoy a monopoly of it. We trust that the Bill will teach those mild persons who cry "Peace! peace!" the meaning of their phraseology. By entering the Bill and its favourable commentators they have an opportunity of learning that in the political-Nonconformist language, "conscience" means party tactics, "persecution" means being restrained from persecuting others, and "sacrifices for education" means obstruction to any which is not paid for by some one else.

Let us consider more particularly one cry of the party, which the Bill satisfies: the abolition of religious tests for teachers. This has a liberal and broad-minded sound in the ears of Liberal voters. The Bill provides that: "An elementary school shall not be recognised as a public elementary school unless it is . . . a school in which no teacher employed is required, as a condition of his employment, to subscribe to any religious creed, or to belong or not to belong to any specified religious denomination, or to attend or abstain from attending any Sunday-school or place of religious worship, etc." The italics are ours. This would certainly enable a teacher to sue a Local Education Authority for dismissing him on the ground that he had changed his religion, if he were lucky enough to have sufficient means to pay his legal expenses, and were fool enough to waste his money on such an object. It would also prevent a Local Authority from stating that an applicant's religion was a bar to his appointment. But is there any teacher so stupid as to suppose that in the happy county of Merioneth, for instance, the apple of the Board of Education's eye, his scholastic qualifications would satisfy the Local Education Authority unless that body had first privately satisfied themselves in circuitous fashion that his religious opinions were consonant with those of Mr. McKenna and Mr. Davies? It is a truism that not only the Merioneth Authorities, but the vast majority of Local Authorities throughout England, and still more certainly throughout Wales, will privately enquire into the religious views of the candidates for teacherships, and will appoint them or not accordingly. Nor is there any more doubt that if a teacher, after appointment, took any prominent part in a religious body unpopular with the Local Authority—if, for instance, he taught in Merionethshire in a Church of England or Roman Catholic Sunday-school—that the Local Authority would contrive to get rid of him without contravening the law. This provision in the Bill is the merest blind. If it were not very difficult to a political-Nonconformist to think or speak straight, it would have been much simpler to have inserted a clause in the Bill frankly excluding Anglicans and Roman Catholics from teaching in public elementary schools in Wales, for if it ever became law, they would only be able to do so in practice until it had succeeded in starving out the Anglican and Roman Catholic schools, of whose efficiency Mr. McKenna reports highly. To kill by inanition many hundreds of schools such as these is the object which leaps to the eye in every clause of the Bill.

As to "persecution," it is the most valuable piece of stage property that political-Nonconformity possesses; it acts as a link between its internal religious animosities. Therein lies also an interesting psychological phenomenon. The political-Nonconformists use the word to conceal their unbounded religious licence, which they recognise with bitter disgust is largely due to the profound indifference of the rest of the world concerning their religious opinions. Like morbid schoolgirls, they crave the flattery of punishment. Those who might be attracted to study their minute internal differences as historical curiosities are deterred from doing so by the lightning changes to which they are subject. The student has scarcely succeeded in wriggling himself into the protean opinions of one sect, when he finds that it has already dissided into several others. Starting from a monstrous bibliolatry, they are ceasing more and more to believe in the Bible at all. In one use of it alone are they constantly consistent. They always use it as a means of persecution, a weapon to break each other's and others peoples' heads. They now no more know nor care what they mean by "Simple Bible Teaching" than the writer of these notes. He personally has no objection to the endowment of purely secular education by a secular State; he would much prefer it to the endowment of "Simple Bible Teaching," provided facilities were given for the supply of all forms of denominational teaching, "Simple Bible Teaching" included, by those who desire them. Such facilities could be arranged without the least difficulty. The arrangement made between the clergy and ministers for use in the Church of England schools at Eastbourne, and in very many other places where Nonconformist teachers are especially engaged by Church managers to teach Nonconformist children, is evidence that no difficulties exist but those invented by political-Nonconformists. If the Bible is entirely excluded from the curriculum of public instruction, it will be because they only value it for use by themselves for their peculiar purposes. We do not believe for a moment that they would ever consent to the facilities which we suggest.

A correspondent writes: "With regard to the dedication of Groombridge Church in Kent, there is no mystery whatever. The patron saint is St. John, Evangelist. But, as the inscription surmounted by the Prince of Wales's feathers on the porch records, the edifice was rebuilt in 1625 as a thank-offering for the safe return from Spain of Prince Charles—none other, that is, than James I.'s son and successor, Charles I. Evelyn's (the diarist's) speculations as to whether or not the 'blessed Charles' of the inscription could possibly mean Cardinal Borromeo, Archbishop of Milan, are entirely beside the mark."

It would seem that we have by no means heard the last of the "Casket letters" controversy. The last number of the Scottish Historical Review proves with what unabated vehemence writers like Mr. Andrew Lang, Mr. Henderson, and Mr. Duncan are still able, from their various standpoints, to wrangle over the question. But, after all, facts are better than arguments, and therefore Bishop Dowden's continuation of the annotated list of the Bishops of Glasgow is to be regarded as a solid, if less piquant, contribution to historic research. The period embraced by the present issue extends from the year 1316 to 1446.

Among the attractions of the Architectural Review for January is a hitherto unpublished letter of Augustus Welby Pugin's on the subject of spires and towers, illustrated, after the writer's custom, with pen-and-ink sketches. This communication, which is dated 1843, contains Pugin's renunciation of perpendicular: "I have fully made up my mind," he writes, "never again to build a church with four-centred arches and flattened roof. A tabulated list of spires is subjoined, valuable inasmuch as the writer's private fads are not too aggressively obtruded in it.

We trust that a good many people, more or less eminent (or notorious), whose names we will not mention, remember every night in saying their prayers to add the petition: "And please, God, bless little Dorothy Downing." The child may have been guilty of errors of judgment, but she has certainly shown herself a most admirable "posting station," and the people to whom we have alluded have advertised themselves with unusual taste and skill over the question as to whether little Dorothy is to go to the reformatory, or to be allowed to stay quietly at home—beating her mother. One of the good gentlemen who have taken an interest in the case writes that Dorothy has lately included in her reading a book called "The Future of Submarines." He puts a mark of exclamation after the title, as if he would say: "Shall we be guilty of reforming a child who takes an interest in submarines?" But we are inclined to think that this interest of Dorothy's is about the blackest feature in her case; it is evident that in her reading, at all events, she requires much supervision and correction.

If we remember rightly, Carlyle, in estimating Dr. Johnson's character, lays stress above all things on the lexiographer's sincerity, or the success with which he cleared his mind of cant. If he heard a man telling lies, he said the fellow was a liar; and when he received Lord Chesterfield's famous letters of advice to his son, Johnson's criticism of the manners and morals therein inculcated was neither hesitating nor doubtful. It is a pity that the Doctor has had so few imitators; that the art of telling the plain truth about anything or anybody seems to be so difficult to mortals. For instance, the Rev. G. Bayfield Roberts has been delivering a lecture on "The Privy Council Judgments." It seems to be an admirable lecture; one trusts that no Bishop of the English Church will ever again have the insufferable impertinence to bid his clergy conform to Privy Council Ecclesiastical Law. Mr. Roberts leaves not so much as the bones of these famous Councillors; he analyses in detail the astounding mass of incompetency, ignorance, dishonesty, contradiction, and blundering which the Bishops used to refer to piously and grandly as "the Law of the Land," which is, perhaps, without parallel in the history of judicial proceedings. In the numerous cases which might be comprehended under the general title, Nero v. the Christians, there was no dispute as to the facts at all events; and many of the persons responsible for the sentence on Dreyfus were honestly convinced of that unfortunate officer's guilt.

Mr. Roberts's list of "contradictions, misquotations and false statements" is really quite surprising. To take a few of the choicer examples: in 1857 the Court said that "ornaments" meant (amongst other things) chasuble, cope, albe, and tunic; in 1871 the Court said that "ornaments" meant a "surplice only." In the same year, the Court, feeling humorous, we imagine, assigned certain Visitation Articles of Bishop Cosin's to the year 1687; Bishop Cosin having died in the year 1672, and the Articles having been really issued in 1627. In 1857 the Court "decided" that there had been no Prayer of Consecration in the English Rite from 1552 to 1662! It might with equal accuracy have "decided" that Queen Anne was not dead, and that the Moon is made of Green Cheese; the astonishing thing is that anybody dared to defend these wretched people, that anybody furnished with brains of the most elementary sort could speak of "judgments" which are a farrago of the most impudent falsehoods, and the most absurd blunders as constituting the "Law of the Land." And yet the lecturer hesitates over the late Bishop Stubbs's phrase as to the Judicial Committeemen's proceeding—"deliberate falsehood."

I do not for one moment suppose [he says] that Dr. Stubbs intended to imply any moral delinquency. That were incredible. Probably what he had in his mind was this . . . that the Judicial Committee allowed the question of public policy to enter into its deliberations, and considered that it was justified in so doing.

If it be not "moral delinquency" in a Judge of a High Court of Appeal, bound by the most solemn obligation to administer true justice, to corrupt that justice, and to prostitute it, and to do this knowingly and wilfully—then there is no such thing as moral delinquency on earth. Let us be sincere, let us be Johnsonian for once: these Judges were liars and scoundrels, and there's an end on't.

BEAUTY AND THE HUNTER

WHERE lurks the shining quarry, swift and shy,
 Immune, elusive, unsubstantial?
 In what dim forests of the soul, where call
 No birds, and no beasts creep? (the hunter's cry
 Wounds the deep darkness, and the low winds sigh
 Through avenues of trees whose faint leaves fall
 Down to the velvet ground, and like a pall
 The violet shadows cover all the sky.)

With what gold nets, what silver-pointed spears
 May we surprise her, what slim flutes inspire
 With breath of what serene enchanted air?—
 Wash we our star-ward gazing eyes with tears,
 Till on their pools (drawn by our white desire)
 She bend and look, and leave her image there.

A. D.

SINGING

NOR gold is mine nor prospering state
 Nor the gay soul that laughs at fate;
 Yet oft I deem it good to sing
 Until my humble rafters ring;
 And joy to feel each vigorous note
 Leaping from my supple throat.

Many delightful airs I know,
 Of major joy, of minor woe;
 Many a glad or mournful phrase
 Is woven through my chequered days:
 Melodies creeping like faint scents
 From ghosts of perished instruments;
 Songs of whose tenderness and fire
 The living soul can never tire.

But while great joy from these I gain,
 The unpremeditated strain
 Sometimes delighteth me the most—
 Singing that almost is a boast,
 Free and capricious as a bird's.
 Unclogged by any useless words,
 Arpeggio, run, cadenza, trill,
 I sing till I have sung my fill.

And thus I'll troll forth many a note
 Ere age hath seized my supple throat.

A. STEVENSON NICOL.

LITERATURE

A STUDY IN SHYNESS

Apologia Diffidentis. By W. COMPTON LEITH. (Lane, 7s. 6d. net.)

THIS book is so good that it is a tragedy that it is not better. Mr. Compton Leith has a fine feeling for literature, genuine distinction of style—all the virtues most to be admired in an age of slipshod writing. He has winnowed his vocabulary in his rigorous search for the right word—the one word that shall so exactly express the idea in his mind without arousing any distracting “brain waves.” He has winnowed so carefully—sometimes so successfully. He has a passion for the pains of art. Evidence of it is on every page. But with so much to admire the result is not wholly admirable. The truth is, although it seems almost cruel to write it, Mr. Leith's book is dull. It is heavy, oppressive, tedious, benumbing to the faculties by reason of its obvious constant striving after perfection. After reading a few pages of Mr. Leith's “precious” prose one is possessed by a passionate longing for something less fine, less exquisite; just as the youth in Disraeli's novel, who confessed to like drinking bad wine sometimes, “Good wine is such a bore, you know.” There are several reasons why Mr. Compton Leith's overlaid sentences have this tedious effect. One is that he has not the art to conceal his artifice. Ars est celare artem is a maxim often quoted by those who have little or no art to conceal; Mr. Leith has art, but he does not conceal it. He is guilty of indecent exposure of the labour of authorship. Again, he seems to lack even the faintest glimmering of a sense of humour.

The subject of his book—an elaborate analysis of shyness in its pathological, physiological, and psychological aspects—can hardly be said to be an exhilarating subject, particularly when, as in this book, it is self-confessedly a record of actual experience. But it is possible to be shy and yet have a very strong sense of humour. In fact, it is the possession of humour that frequently makes people shy, since to see things humorously is generally to see things broadly and in their true proportions, and to see them in their true proportions frequently means that things that look to others immensely big appear to the humorous ridiculously small. And as shyness is often largely due to a sense of non-correspondence with environment, the man in whom a sense of humour preponderates, generally feels out of touch with the majority of people with whom he comes into contact.

There is no reason, then, that Mr. Compton Leith, suffering though he may the last torments of the ultra-shy, should not still have betrayed some evidence of humour which would have given light and shade to his book. As it is we must be satisfied to take his book in pieces and rest content with the “purple passages” scattered here and there, and with a really admirable analysis of the sensations and emotions of the shy man. The author is probably right in tracing to a physical cause the most acute form of shyness:

To me [he writes] this malady seems to arise from an antinomy between the physical and intellectual elements of the personality, from an unhappy marriage of mind and body, suffering the lower of the two partners to ruin the life of the higher by the continual friction of a hateful but indissoluble union. When the physical and mental natures in a man are happily attuned, there is a fair concord in his life, and the outward expression of his being is an unimpeded process to which, as to the functions of a healthy organism, no heedful thought is given. If both natures are of the finest temper, they find utterance in a noble amiability and ease of manner; if both are coarse in the grain, they blend in a naïve freedom of Sancho spreading himself in the duchess's boudoir.

In sober fact, indeed, it means that a man's shyness can often be traced to functional derangement of the liver or stomach. But this is not the whole story. Most people, most Englishmen, at any rate, are shy—constitutionally shy. It is a part of the national character, and a part that is most readily misunderstood and misinterpreted. This shyness, as M. Taine (whom the author quotes) observes, is due to climatic conditions acting hardly upon a vigorous race, and partly to historical causes. In individuals it shows itself in various forms, sometimes assuming the aspect of overbearing aggressiveness, petulant rebellion, or brazen impudence. Sometimes it takes the form of absurd touchiness and sensitiveness, or excessive timidity and bashfulness in the presence of others. Sometimes, as in the case of the author, it takes the form of a terrible disease, blighting life, banishing every hope of intimacy with one's fellows, and causing the sufferer to move like a man possessed of a dark secret in a world of solitary fancies:

It has made my best years rich in misery; it has cut me off from marriage; it has compelled me, one hating vain complaint, to live querulously in the optative mood. Neither poverty nor sickness could chastise more heavily; for poverty is strong in numbers and sickness rich in sympathy, but diffidence reaps laughter and is alone. When such thoughts win dominion over the mind I could envy what sufferer you will his most awful punishment. For in his agony be sure there is movement and action; his limbs are torn, yet he is dragged onward; by his very writhing in the bonds he confesses his life. But I lie in some deadly limbus where nothing moves and all is mist without horizon, lost in an abhorred blankness of despair to which no positive suffering may be likened.

There will be many, no doubt, who will find some sort of morbid delight in thus having their painful sensations exposed. Mr. Compton Leith has thoroughly exploited the horrible side of the malady, but he has not succeeded in making shyness interesting. Nor has he dwelt on the many consolations of the shy. Literature and Art owe much to shy men, who, as creators in various branches, have chosen thus to express themselves to a world from rougher contact with which they frequently shrank. And in actual social intercourse a certain touch of diffidence has its charms. Shy people have often very engaging qualities, and they provide that element of surprise which adds zest to the meeting of one's fellows. Others may, perhaps, be read too easily. Their motives, their desires, may be too obvious. One may exploit them too soon. But with the shy man you are never quite sure. There may, of course, be nothing behind that diffident manner, but there is always the chance that there is, and that some day you may happen upon the secret. The shy man is the dark horse of life. He is the doer of the great unexpected things, and life would be poorer without him.

THE VICTIM OF A GENIUS

The King over the Water. By A. SHIELD AND ANDREW LANG. (Longmans, Green and Co., 15s. net.)

THE history of the later Stuart kings, being written by their enemies, has done them gross injustice, but in the case of him who by right of his birth was James the Third of England and Eighth of Scotland the family ill-luck took a novel and deeper plunge. Macaulay was bad enough, but Macaulay was a partisan who could be, and has been, exposed as such, and, effective writer though he was, he did not leave work with any stamp of immortality on it. But Thackeray was a great imaginative genius, and a master of language worth fifty Macaulays, and while there are any English left who care for these qualities his work must live. Thackeray, too, though bred in the Whig traditions and himself a Liberal candidate (fortunately defeated) for Parliament, was not really a retrospective partisan; and in his "Esmond" his sympathies as a creator are, on the whole, with the Tories. Moreover, there is much evidence of historical reading and knowledge in the book, and long passages in it are sheer history. No reader, in fine, who was not previously warned, would refuse to accept the portrait of James, "convincing" as it is in its vividness and consistency, as reasonably fair and faithful—and yet that portrait is as cruel and wanton a libel as was ever made. Briefly, in "Esmond" James appears as an ungrateful, flippant, and irresponsible trifle, given to drink and gambling, for ever running after a woman; and, briefly, the real James was a slave to duty, an unwearied worker, a melancholy, temperate man, an upright and scrupulous gentleman in every particular. If he had had mistresses and bastards like his father and uncle, the standard of his time would not have condemned him, and it would be superficial in us to condemn him very strongly either; but the truth is he had none. The one charge of the kind brought against him was in his quarrel with his wife, where the evidence is all in his favour. It is a most astonishing perversion to be made by a great writer. How did Thackeray come to make it? Mr. Lang confesses in his preface that he does not know, and it must be useless for anyone else to enquire. It is clear, as he says, that the incidents in "Esmond" of James's levity with the Castlewoods, of his making love to Beatrix, crossing swords with Henry Esmond, and so on, are an unconscious reproduction of "Woodstock"; but the libel on James's character remains inexplicable. The sole explanation for it to be found here is that in extreme youth, when, with his sister, he delighted the Court of France with his grace and beauty, James had the high spirits natural to his age—which, poor gentleman, in the sorrows of his life, were not to keep him company for long—but nothing like levity in his purpose or viciousness in his life is recorded. One is driven to suppose that Thackeray imagined the Stuarts to be bad in a lump, all given to sensuality and ingratitude, and so to be safely depicted without enquiry. It is sad that such a wrong should have been done; it is lamentable it should have been done by Thackeray.

A book about a Stuart with Mr. Andrew Lang's authority for it cannot be other than fully informed and delicately inspired. He gives the credit for "most of the research, and almost all the writing," to Miss Shield, and the credit is great. It is an extremely interesting book; must be so, one would think, even to those who have not carried on (as this writer has) a sort of romantic interest in the Stuarts since they first read "Waverley." It is also extremely sad. From the wretchedly mismanaged '15 onwards the gloom thickens and thickens. Certainly at the beginning James and his adherents were justified in hoping. If he had not been a Roman Catholic, beyond doubt the tide in his favour would have been irresistible. It is merely ignorant to believe that the movements against the Stuarts were great popular movements. The English people loathed Oliver Cromwell, loathed Dutch William, above all, loathed the "wee German lairdie." But the fear of "Popery" did exist, strongly and widely, and on that James was fatally firm, even refusing to conciliate the Anglican clergy by allowing that his grandfather was a martyr. Even so, however, his cause might have won had it been better ordered: "the riding did it." His half-brother, the Duke of Berwick, whom Thackeray quite wrongly calls "the sword and buckler of the Stuart cause," might possibly have saved it, had he served it in the field instead of muddling it in council. But the Duke of Berwick was a French subject, the greatest soldier who had led French armies since Condé and Turenne, and he preferred that certain glory to a knight-errant gamble in Scotland. There is even worse to be said of him, for he associated with Lord Stair, and is said to have betrayed Jacobites to him. Bolingbroke might have saved it, perhaps, had his character matched his intellect. But James looked in vain for a servant both capable and loyal.

Probably to most readers—we are so romantic—the most captivating part of the book will be the story of James's marriage with Clementina Sobieski, and of her rescue from Innsbruck by the gallant Captain Wogan. Mr. A. E. W. Mason has written a novel about it, and he too, by the way, if I remember rightly—and he will forgive me if I do not remember him quite so well as Thackeray—saddles poor James with a baseless intrigue. A miniature of Clementina is reproduced here—a pretty, rather appealing face—and her sons, too, who are very like her—Charles Edward and Henry—have their pictures in the book. James himself was said to be like his uncle, Charles the Second, but the frontispiece shows him, as a young man, far handsomer than Charles could ever have been. Clementina wearied of her melancholy husband, for ever writing useless letters to his adherents, and they quarrelled bitterly. Poor luckless couple!

G. S. S.

SOMEHOW GOOD

Somehow Good. By WILLIAM DE MORGAN. (Heinemann, 6s.)

THIS third work of Mr. de Morgan's has given us a standard by which we may judge him. "Joseph Vance" staggered us. We found in it certain rare qualities, not possessed in so marked a degree by any other modern writer of fiction. The style had a fluent carelessness, a disregard for the precisions dear to those who cultivate the art of writing English, a disregard that fascinated us and made us wonder whether those precisions were, after all, so much to be desired. The characterisation was inimitable. Old Vance, Dr. Thorp, Lossie, Joey Thorp—to mention only four out of many—were drawn with the certainty of Dickens, but without Dickens's exaggeration. Again, the writer evinced such an intimate knowledge of the life he described; his dialogue showed us (perhaps for the first time) how nearly a conversation may be set down in the words that would actually be spoken; the author's own observations were so witty and displayed such wonderful insight into the human mind, such rare powers of conveying a picture to the reader. Then came "Alice-for-Short," and we were just a shade disappointed. We found there, it is true, all those qualities which had delighted us before, but they seemed to lose occasionally something of their crispness and freshness. There was no character which appealed to us quite as old Vance appealed. Alice, herself, was very lovable and sweet, but not quite so lovable as Lossie. Nevertheless, though we placed "Alice-for-Short" second to "Joseph Vance," we placed it before other books of the year, and waited hopefully for its successor. This successor is "Somehow Good," and, as we have said, has given us a standard by which we may now fairly judge Mr. de Morgan's work.

The story begins with a nameless man in London, nameless only in so far as we are concerned, for his name is known, at the period, to the man himself. He is waiting for cabled credit on a London bank, and we are given a detailed account of his manner of spending his spare time. At the end of it he strikes up rather a curious friendship with a young lady of nineteen—twenty-five years his junior—in the Twopenny Tube, drops a half-crown, feels for it with his hand under the seat, receives a severe electric shock, and—loses his memory. The young lady, whom we come to know later as Sally, is instrumental in having the "half-electrocuted" man conveyed in a cab to the door of her own home (a few minutes' walk from Shepherd's Bush station), and he is there seen by Sally's mother. This is the crowning coincidence of what was really a very remarkable series, since the nameless man is the husband of Sally's mother—which does not mean the same thing as saying that he was Sally's father. Twenty years before, Sally's mother had gone out to India to marry the man of her heart, "Gerry" Palliser. She had stayed with an infamous married couple before the ceremony, and had suffered the penalty of innocence. Twelve months after her marriage and four after the birth of her daughter, the young wife confided to her husband the whole horrible story. Palliser took it badly, left her and the child, tried to obtain a divorce, failed, finally disappeared to the uttermost ends of the earth, and stayed there until he reappears twenty years later in a state of partial electrocution and complete amnesia at his wife's villa in Shepherd's Bush.

If we are willing to take for granted all coincidences plus the electrocuted memory theory, we have a very interesting situation here, and the title allays any doubt as to the final settlement of affairs. But the story does not develop on sensational lines. Sally's mother marries the man without a memory, and when at last his memory is "electrocuted" back again by a galvanic battery on a pier at a small watering-place, she holds him without effort, and the final goal of her ill-doing is clearly demonstrated as somehow good. There are many other characters, but they do not affect the story to any appreciable extent. There is, for example, "Tishy" Sales-Wilson and all her family, to say nothing of the young man whom she ultimately marries. There is old Jack Roper, Colonel Lund, and that boy. The latter we know by the fact that "his nose twists, and gives him a presumptuous expression, and he has a front tooth out and puts his tongue through. Also his trousers are tied on with string." In the words of Major Roper, an "everlastin' young beggar, if ever there was one." Then there is Sally, otherwise known as the "Merpuddy" (Anglicé, a "seacat"), and the pale-haired Dr. Prosy, also known as Dr. Vereker, who marries her. Dr. Vereker also has an obtrusively self-sacrificing mother. These characters are one and all drawn to the life, perfectly realised, consistent, and human, but they are not very interesting, and are always getting in the way and stopping the story. Moreover, many of them remind us strongly of other characters in "Alice-for-Short."

It may be noticed that we have spoken of the two chief characters as "Sally's mother" and the "man without a memory." There is a reason for this, and it will be well for those who propose to read "Somehow Good," as we certainly advise everyone to do, to commit to memory the following brief résumé of the aliases of these two protagonists. Sally's mother began life as Miss Graythorpe; after her marriage she naturally became Mrs. Palliser; but when her husband left her she reassumed her maiden name under the style of Mrs. Graythorpe. On her return to England she took the name of Mrs. Nightingale, as a condition of a legacy left by an uncle. A complication arises here from the fact that Sally, her daughter, has been led to believe that Nightingale was her mother's maiden name and Graythorpe her rightful married name. However, when Sally's mother remarries her former husband she becomes Mrs. Fenwick, this being the name which has been wrongfully assigned to him on the evidence of a tattoo mark upon his arm, the name by which he has been generally known for the past twenty years being Harrison. It may be noted that the only name by which we never hear her spoken of throughout the book is the only one to which she has any proper right—viz., Mrs. Palliser. Mr. de Morgan appears to be developing a certain faculty for obscuring the plot of his story, a faculty which we deprecate; and this confusion of names, which has to be patiently worked out in the course of the narrative, is an instance of this.

There are some finely graphic descriptions in "Somehow Good," and, before we make a note of that standard we have mentioned, we feel bound to give one quotation which shows our novelist at his best. It describes a thunderstorm, used in this instance as a metaphor for love, because it is "more intelligible in its beginnings . . . than it becomes when it is, so to speak, overhead." Here is the description:

We all know the clear-cut magnificence of the great thunder-cloud against the sky, its tremendous deliberation, its hills and valleys of curdling mist, fraught with, God knows what, potential of destruction in volts and ohms; the ceaseless muttering of its wrath as it speaks to its own heart, and its sullen secrets reverberate from cavern to cavern in the very core of its innermost blackness.

We know the last prismatic benediction of the sun it means to hide from us—the strange gleams of despairing light on other clouds—clouds that are not in it, mere outsiders or spectators. We can remember them after we have got home in time to avoid a wetting, and can get our moist water-colours out and do a recollection of them before they go out of our heads—or think we can.

But we know, too, that there comes a time of sudden wind and agitated panic of the trees, and then big, warm, preliminary drops, and then the first clap of thunder, clear in its own mind and full of purpose. Then the first downpour of rain, that isn't quite so clear, and wavers from a breathing space, till the tart reminder of the first swift, decisive lightning-flash recalls it to its duty, and it becomes a steady, intolerable torrent that empties roads and streets of passers-by and makes the gutters rivulets. And then the storm itself—flash upon flash, peal upon peal, up to the blinding and deafening climax, glare and thunderbolt in a breath. And then it's overhead, and we are sure something has been struck that time.

Now, what of our standard? It would seem to have shown us these things, firstly, that our original estimate of Mr. de Morgan as a brilliant psychologist is a correct one—but his range is limited. When we consider his three books together we begin to doubt whether he has any big surprise for us in the future. Secondly, we are confirmed in our original feeling that our author lacks something in constructive power. He does not tell a story quite so well as he might tell it, even on the assumption that his manner of treating the detail is the best possible. Thirdly, we find a strong tendency in the last book to exaggerate those peculiarities of style which charmed us in "Joseph Vance." The habit of ending a sentence with a preposition is one that we take no exception to, where any clearness is gained by so doing, but when we run up a lovely preposition at the end of a paragraph that has been cut off by a parenthetical sentence or two from the verb to which it rightly belongs, we think the habit in danger of becoming a vice.

Nevertheless, in spite of all these things—which we have, perhaps, insisted upon at too great length—Mr. de Morgan charms us in no ordinary degree. He has shown us his limitations in "Somehow Good," he has drawn particular attention to his own faults; but the book has much of the fascination of his two earlier works, and it is never dull in the sense in which other novels are dull, although we may sometimes wish that he would cut a little of the "cackle and come to the 'osses."

THE HISTORY OF FREEDOM

Historical Essays and Studies. By the first LORD ACTON. Edited by J. N. FIGGIS and R. V. LAURENCE. Two vols. (Macmillan, 10s. net each.)

THE custodian of a certain public library, on being asked for a book of religious philosophy, once gave the startling reply, "We keep no books here that are written with a bias."

The obvious retort was simply to point to that section where the shelves were laden with volumes of history. But it may safely be asserted that few, if any, historical critics have been more free than Lord Acton from bias and prejudice. He was a passionate seeker after truth. He was the herald of a new spirit of inquiry and historical criticism. It is significant that whatever opposition his methods aroused came from those who, from motives of political and ecclesiastical expediency, deemed it wise that the whole truth should not always be laid bare. To a mind constituted like Acton's, it appeared that any given generation has nothing to fear, everything to gain, from the revelation of absolute facts, even in dealing with the worst actions, motives and passions of the men of former generations in their struggles for power, whether on the side of tyranny and oppression, or in the cause of freedom.

"I am sick of the men who are afraid of a scandal," he once wrote to Simpson.

Thus his attitude towards history was that of an incorruptible, impartial judge, sitting in a supreme court, determined that every tittle of evidence should be sifted to the uttermost. Writers of history were to him very much like witnesses at the bar, who should be subjected to the most severe cross-examination on oath. The like relentless scrutiny he applied to every form of historical document, manuscripts, letters, State-papers, pamphlets. Hence the uncompromising, and in many cases even severe, nature of his judgments. As the editors of these volumes point out in their able introduction, his notion of the sifting of evidence was of the remorseless, scientific school of Germany, which sometimes perhaps expects more in the way of testimony than human life affords.

But when in possession of evidence he was very far removed from following the "scientific" historian, "whose ideal is to state facts and observe causes, but never to pronounce a sentence." He was equally opposed to the "sympathetic writer, who excuses everything by a facile reference to the moral atmosphere of the age he is representing."

As he wrote to Bishop Creighton:

You would hang a man of no position like Ravallac; but if what one hears is true, then Elizabeth asked the gaoler to murder Mary, and William III. ordered his Scots Minister to extirpate a clan. Here are the greatest names coupled with the greatest crimes. You would spare those criminals, for some mysterious reason. I would hang them higher than Hayman, for reasons of obvious justice, still higher for the sake of historical science.

A series of canons on historical criticism formed a postscript to this letter, with the unexpected headline:

ADVICE TO PERSONS ABOUT TO WRITE HISTORY—
DON'T.

There is something eminently humorous in this as written to Creighton. But the serious side is the strange fact—a great disappointment to many—that Lord Acton himself produced no magnum opus, seeing that his greatest contemporaries believed in him, and rightly, as a veritable giant of profound learning, and a past-master of criticism.

The editors of these volumes, in their introduction, give a sort of apologetic estimate of the causes which led to this limitation.

But, as Abbot Gasquet wrote in the Conclusion to his "Lord Acton and his Circle," the familiar praise of Acton as "the most erudite man of his generation," if unattested by any volume of his own, receives abundant illustration in these letters.

The same may be said, in greater degree, of these Essays, many of which may be considered a permanent contribution to historical criticism.

The Essay on Freedom in Antiquity has some observations very pertinent to present-day politics:

The most certain test, by which we judge whether a country is really free, is the amount of security enjoyed by minorities. Liberty by this definition is the essential condition and guardian of religion.

This aspect of liberty, the relation of the State to religion, ever formed part of Acton's perspective of history, and probably influenced his other and more circumscribed definition:

By liberty I mean the assurance that every man shall be protected in doing what he believes to be his duty against the influence of authority and majorities, custom and opinion.

This may be an ideal for the individual, but a complete extension of the principle might lead to confusion, and place even the rejoicing individualist in the not altogether enviable position in which Acton found himself in his earlier days when he said:

I agree with nobody, and nobody agrees with me.

This extreme was a transitional phase, though Lord Acton retained to the end an "intense individuality" in his perpetual struggle for that measure of justice which is beyond the limits of human expectation.

In the Essay on Goldwin Smith's Irish History we find laid down principles of freedom which have a prophetic significance, when the trend of executive government is in the direction of a reactionary and dangerous absolutism.

The same may be said of the keen foresight with which, thirty years ago, Acton estimated the rising force of Socialism and its "baneful alliance" with democracy. He could hardly be said to have shared the optimism of Sir Erskine May, when he spoke of the promises of Socialism supplying the best energy of democracy:

Liberty has lost its spell: and democracy maintains itself by the promise of substantial gifts to the masses of the people.

Democracy claims . . . to be its own master, not a trustee. The old sovereigns of the world are exchanged for a new one, who may be flattered and deceived, but whom it is impossible to corrupt or to resist, and to whom must be rendered the things that are Caesar's and also the things that are God's.

The one pervading evil of democracy is the tyranny of the majority, or rather of that party, not always the majority, that succeeds by force or fraud, in carrying elections.

A second chamber has been found the essential security for freedom in every genuine democracy.

In view of the present struggle between Rome and "Modernism," the Essay on Conflicts with Rome, and its first estimate of the positions of Lamennais and Frohschammer will be read with deep interest. The story of Acton's own struggle with Rome is too well known to need more than a passing reference—how through all the controversy he remained staunch to the faith, refusing to be driven from communion, and how Abbot Gasquet recently wrote of him in words first said of Newman:

The highest authority in the Church now set the seal of approbation upon him—the clouds of past years had past away.

Lord Acton must have realised this when he was asked to give an address at the laying of the foundation stone of the Roman Cathedral in Westminster. Certainly impartial judgment could not pronounce that man to be a partisan who wrote the Essays on the Inquisition, the Borgias, and the Vatican Council.

Those who would compare Acton with his old master and life-long friend, Dr. Dollinger, will find much to interest them in the two essays on the work of that profound scholar. There is a remarkable coincidence between present criticism of Acton, and his own judgment of Dollinger:

Everybody has felt that his power was out of proportion to his work, and that he knew too much to write.

The Essays on the Rise and Fall of the Mexican Empire, and on the Franco-Prussian War are more than passing reviews of contemporary events. They form a learned contribution to permanent history. It is probable that some of the essays may not appeal to the historical expert, while two or three at least of the reviews are out of date. But we can imagine no better mental training for any reader of history than a study of Lord Acton's methods of inquiry and criticisms as exemplified in these learned treatises. The teacher of history will find that these two volumes have a value as books of reference, which will aid his judgment on many constantly recurring historical problems—a reference made easy by the admirable indexes, which in themselves are a testimony to the immense range of Lord Acton's erudition.

THE AMAZING CANON

It is easy enough to sneer at the laudator temporis acti. Ours, we are told again and again, is a practical age, a busy age, which looks forward to the great achievements of the future, to the time when all the woes and hurts of man will be healed by a really efficient service of flying machines between London and Manchester. Sorrow and sighing, according to the Daily Mail, will not long abide the day of the turbine steamer, and machinery with reciprocating action will soon wipe away the tears from all our eyes. It may be so; and yet I think we should still keep a soft place in our hearts for the idealist. An old half-timbered house lacks many of the conveniences of a good West-end flat; and yet it has a grace that charms us in spite of ourselves, and of our cold, considered judgment. I should be very sorry if, passing along Holborn, I missed the sixteenth century frontage of Staple Inn; and I should be sorry, too, if anything happened to H. Hensley Henson, B.D., Hon. D.D. of Glasgow, Canon of Westminster. There are many things in his book "The National Church" (Macmillan) which remind me of tales about old gabled houses, and snow on the ground, and the carol singers chanting in very ancient modes on starry nights. Here, at all events, is a man who has not turned his back on the past, who is not ashamed to express his devotion for a bygone time, for ideals once honoured, now despised. Canon Henson makes no secret of his views as to the Golden Age of the English Church. Things certainly went very well in the time of Queen Elizabeth when, in the words of the Psalmist, they hewed down the carven work with axes and hammers, when the altars were replaced by the meanest tables procurable, when dust and dirt lay thick on the church floors, when the great mass of the clergy were ignoramuses chosen from the lowest of the people. But Laud and his fellow fanatics broke in on this fair design, and all was ruined; the churches were made at least decent, and scholarship was encouraged; in some cases the broken church windows were mended. The English people rose against such outrages as these; but then came the reaction under Charles II. It was not till William of Orange came to save us from "wooden-shoes and warming-pans and a foist" that the English Church entered into her Rest and her Reward, and found salvation in what Canon Henson calls "the tolerant wisdom" of Latitudinarianism. The eighteenth century, then, is the dear world of this ecclesiastic's desire, and all, he says, went well till the Tractarians, "feeble copyists of the Caroline Divines," began their evil work. I like the phrase "feeble copyists," especially as applied to such men as Keble, Pusey, Church, and above all to Newman. It is really "very soothing," as Mr. Pecksniff might say, to be assured that H. Hensley Henson, B.D. and D.D. (Glasgow), and Canon of Westminster, regards one of the greatest intellects of any age as a "feeble copyist." Canon Henson is more fortunate than Canon Kingsley. The lion is dead.

Well; the eighteenth century, then, is to be the model of the English Church: we are to look back on it as the Jews looked back on the glorious reign of David, as the Britons looked back, sighing, on the days when King Arthur held his Court at Caerleon on Usk. Then, it seems, was the Church held in high honour and regard, in esteem from which it has sadly fallen:

Copes, mitres, and pastoral staves have a fine effect in processions, photographs, and pageants, but they are a poor substitute for the deference and regard which once invested the episcopal office in the Reformed Church of England.

Indeed this is a sorry change—we have ecclesiastics in their proper vestments instead of those glorious Georgian prelates who enjoyed vast incomes, who never thought of travelling save in a coach and four, who provided for their nephews so handsomely. In this golden age there was a certain Welsh diocese, the total income of which (all benefices included) was £29,000. The bishop, his relatives and friends, absorbed £20,000 between them, leaving £9,000 for the rest of the clergy. Those were great days truly; when there was no nonsense about the Holy Catholic Church (a “figment of devout fancy,” according to Mr. Henson), no stuff about the gift of the Holy Ghost through the laying on of hands, no claim on the part of the episcopate to exercise “an authority derived from sources unknown to the Constitution”—is it possible, by the way, that there are miscreants now in episcopal form who deny that the House of Commons is the source of all grace?—only a perfect reliance on the Whig Minister of the day, a perfect confidence that if you stuck to Whiggery, Whiggery would stick to you.

One must remember that in the eighteenth century the Industrial System was fast growing up. The foundations of the great dreary region of the slums were being laid, the population was increasing, England was beginning to turn black. And the bishops were regarded with “deference and regard,” as Canon Henson says—and did nothing whatever. From week end to week end, with rare exceptions, the churches were shut tight, from year to year the poor were neglected, the gallows reaped its abominable harvest, the English folk became more and more brutal (see Hogarth and Smollett on this point, if you are doubtful), the clergy became divided into two classes—the rich, idle pluralist and the hungry curate—but still the bishops were held in “deference and regard.” Of course, the poor people, patient for a long time, fled at last by thousands into the camp of Methodism; dissent, which the later Caroline divines had almost extinguished, gained new life, Englishmen were estranged from the church of their fathers: still, the bishops were invested with “deference and regard.” It is right to record in these pages the existence of an ecclesiastic of the English Church who looks back with longing on a period which most Churchmen, high and low alike, regard with shame and penitence. One understands the Tory enthusiast, the Radical enthusiast, and the Socialist enthusiast: but this gentleman, who burns for the days of Whiggery—this is really a curiosity. But he is, without doubt, a genuine specimen. He was once in charge of a church where there was a daily service, and he observed with equal contempt the smallness of the congregation, and the fact that, such as it was, it was composed of women, who, he says, would have been more Christianly employed in their domestic duties. He does not give us any reasons for his supposition that these women were neglecting their domestic duties; this is taken for granted. There was once an Apostle who objected to the horrible waste of a box of ointment that might have been sold for the benefit of the poor; there was once a woman named Martha, who scolded her sister Mary for this very neglect of domestic duties. Again I must say that this person in Holy Orders of the Catholic Church is a genuine curiosity.

I must examine some of his statements in detail. He says that the authors of the Reformation staked everything “on a forward movement away from the authoritative past.” Here is the witness of the Book of Common Prayer:

Alterations . . . secretly striking at some established doctrine or laudable practice of the Church of England, or indeed of the whole Catholick Church of Christ.—The Preface.

This godly and decent order of the ancient Fathers.

An Order for Prayer . . . much agreeable to the mind and purpose of the old Fathers.—Concerning the Service of the Church.

They ought to have reverence of them [Ceremonies] for their antiquity, if they will declare themselves to be more studious of unity and concord, than of innovations and new-fangleness, which . . . is always to be eschewed.—Of Ceremonies.

Dost thou believe in . . . the Holy Catholick Church?—Publick Baptism of Infants.

Brethren, in the Primitive Church there was a godly discipline . . . until the said discipline may be restored again, which is much to be wished.—A Communion.

The ancient Canons command.—The Consecration of Bishops.

As the school-authors say.—Art. XIII.

As Saint Augustine saith.—Art. XXIX.

It is a thing plainly repugnant to . . . the custom of the Primitive Church.—Art. XXIV.

It is evident unto all men diligently reading the . . . ancient authors. . . . Which Offices were evermore held in such reverend estimation. . . . And therefore to the intent that these Orders may be continued.—Preface to Ordinal.

Such is the evidence for the proposition that the Reformation implied a “forward movement away from the authoritative past”; these constantly recurring appeals to ancient authority, custom, and tradition.

Again, Canon Henson is interesting when he deals with the sacraments of the Church, with the whole sacramental idea. Quoting “a thoughtful American Divine” he speaks of the mischiefs of the “Latin Theory,” of grace as “a subtle quality conveyed to man from without through material agencies”; in another place he speaks of the ancient ritual of Confirmation as “solemn trifling.” One would be pleased to hear how the Canon reconciles these opinions with the official teaching of the Church of England as to Baptism and the Eucharist; it would be even more satisfactory to hear him on the contrast between his doctrines and the whole teaching and atmosphere of the New Testament. If grace is not given through “material agencies,” why were the two chief sacraments instituted, why did the Christ anoint the blind man’s eyes with clay, why were the disciples to anoint the sick with oil, why were the Christians to bathe in pure water before the Eucharist, why were persons healed by objects that St. Paul had touched, why did the Apostles “lay hands” on St. Stephen and the rest, why is it written that Peter and John laid their hands on certain of the baptised, who then “received the Holy Ghost,” it being expressly stated that “through the laying on of the Apostles’ hands the Holy Ghost was given,” what is the meaning of the passage “and when Paul had laid his hand upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them”? Were all these statements inserted by some unscrupulous, crafty martyr of the second century?

There are many gems scattered through the book. One reads of the “gloom of mediæval asceticism,” for example; and one wonders whether Canon Henson has heard of St. Francis of Assisi and his followers, who were perhaps the most cheerful men who have ever lived. In another place there is a contemptuous comparison between the intelligence of the Middle Ages and of the present time; there is an "abyss," the Canon says, between the two worlds. There is, indeed; there is a vast abyss between the "Morte d'Arthur" and the Penny Novelette, between Everyman and The Second Mrs. Tanqueray, between Westminster Abbey and the Tabernacle in the Tottenham Court Road, between the "Divine Comedy" and Martin Tupper's "Proverbial Philosophy," between Missa Rex Splendens and Barnby in B flat—between the "Imitatio" and "The National Church." There is, indeed, magnum chaos, a great gulf fixed between the thirteenth century and the twentieth, an abyss well-nigh as deep as hell itself. Poor silly men of old days, how must we pity you whose only picture gallery was the glowing wall about the altar, the saints in the painted windows; we can buy every morning a paper, quite full of photographic reproductions, all for a halfpenny. As the Canon says, there is an abyss between the old times and the new.

And here is another pleasing point. The average country parson will be glad to hear on the authority of Canon Henson that he is "a man of the most meagre abilities" who thinks that the word "schism" in the Litany means dissent. Our author does not directly inform us what "schism" does mean; but on another page we learn that the Church of England, guided by the "principles of our constitution," has returned "to the Apostolic view of schism as a disloyal and self-asserting temper . . . not specifically tied to any expression." In other words, then, a "schismatic" is simply a cross fellow; and St. Ignatius, who was martyred c. 107 A.D., who was the disciple of St. John the Divine, was a mere driveller, no better than a Ritualist, when he wrote to St. Polycarp:

Hearken ye all unto the Bishops that God also may hearken to you. My life be security for those who submit to their Bishop, Presbyters, and Deacons. And may my portion be together with theirs in God.

Which, then, is the better authority on the Apostolic view of schism; "Ignatius, the disciple of the Apostle John, a man in all things like unto the Apostles," Governor of the Church of Antioch, delivered to the wild beasts on the day before the Calends of January, Sura and Senecius being the second time Consuls of the Romans—or, H. Hensley Henson, B.D., D.D. (Glasgow), Canon of Westminster? But I forget: Ignatius, the disciple of the Apostle John, had not the inestimable privilege of living under the rule of the House of Commons; he professed to exercise "an authority derived from sources unknown to the constitution." And, horrible to relate—for H. Hensley Henson, B.D., has but a poor opinion of relics—the remains of his body "were carried to Antioch, and wrapped in linen, as an inestimable treasure left to the Holy Church, by the grace which was in the martyr." Still, as H. Hensley Henson, B.D., points out, there are now dissenting preachers holding office as chaplains in the British Army; and this, of course, proves, as he says, that there is no such sin as schism. And one presumes that, since the British Army salutes, or did recently salute, the Host in Malta, and the Holy Carpet at Cairo, that Roman Catholics and Mahometans are really very good Anglicans. And one may conclude that if Mumbo Jumbo ever became of importance to British interests the British Army would furnish a guard of honour to the ceremonies of the Fetish Grove; and so the King of Borrioboolah Gah and his subjects would thereby receive admission into the great tolerant fold of our dear National Church—without prejudice, of course, to the religious views of the monarch of the Cannibal Islands. And one must not forget that Canon Henson is seriously perturbed by the case of the Shoreditch Sisterhood. It fell out last summer that a number of utterly false accusations were levelled against these vowed sisters; the accusations were disproved in open court, judge and jury agreed that in none of them was there the shadow of the truth. But the "Protestant" scum rose, as it rose in the days of the Gordon Riots, and the Canon sees in the foul ingratitude of these beasts in human form the great Puritan heart of England still beating! Let us leave him with all the advantage of this fair argument; let us congratulate him and his cause on the worthiness of their allies. They have not altered in the course of time: they murdered Laud, they martyred King Charles, they committed every hideous atrocity in the days of George III., they obeyed the call of that Apostolic man, Jackson, Bishop of London, in the last century, they were still stout Protestants a year ago at Shoreditch. Protestants, one understands, do not approve of saints; if this were not so they should certainly set up (at Westminster) the images of Jezebel, and of the Impenitent Thief, who, with the House of Commons, appear to be the final arbiters of the "National Church."

Fair, indeed, are the prospects of any institution which looks to the House of Commons for grace and direction; and yet it is from this body that Canon Henson seems to think that our Church derives what shadow of authority he is willing to leave it. Let it be remembered that it is the House of Commons which is directly responsible for the horrors of the last three hundred years. The savage statutes of King Henry VIII., the spoliations of Edward VI., the burnings of the wretched Hot Gospellers in Queen Mary's reign, the disembowelling of Roman Catholic priests under Elizabeth, the witch persecutions of the seventeenth century (checked, by the way, by Laud), the quite abominable and devilish penal code of the Georgian era, the toleration of the infamous factory system of slavery—all the hideous crimes that have oppressed England for the last three centuries are directly due to this body of accursed hypocrites, to these precious representatives of the "Popular Will," who have grown fat on the stench of fraud and murder and cruelty. And Jonadab, M.P. for Stinkville, is to be the apostolic source from which our bishops, priests, and deacons are to derive their order; and our altars are to be decked so as to satisfy the taste of William Sikes, Esquire, the popular representative of the murderers of the Jago. And one presumes that the members for the Sunday Closing Burghs will shortly bring in a brief Bill to amend the Psalm, so that we may read, "wine that maketh bad the heart of man"; and—well, we have no right to disenfranchise Soho, and one must confess that the world has moved since the days of the Ten Commandments.

Canon Hensley Henson was once present at the "Ordinance" according to the ritual of the Presbyterian Kirk. He says that the effect, the elements being received sitting, was "rather congregational and social than anything else." Which is also very soothing.

ARTHUR MACHEN.

OLD PARIS

THERE is very little left of Old Paris. Save the churches and a few public buildings, nearly everything has been swept away. Fournier, one of the few historians of Old Paris, who combined genuine erudition with a sense of style, wrote wittily, "Pour rajeunir Paris, on le rase!" Even Old France is a ruin.

But Paris has for so many years inspired such deep affection, not only among its native inhabitants, but in the hearts of nearly all who know her at all well, that any part of her which is not absolutely modern and of yesterday's date is lovingly termed old, just as one says "old boy" or "old girl" to relatively young persons, with whom pleasant, if quite recent, remembrances are associated.

Monsieur Drumont, in "Mon Vieux Paris," Monsieur Sardou, in numberless articles and prefaces, Monsieur Georges Cain, in the volume before us, "Nooks and Corners of Old Paris," become dithyrambic and lyrical in describing and recalling a Paris which is not older than some people living to-day, or others whom we have known in the flesh. It may be questioned whether the story they tell has really the interest that they imagine it to have. One might, perhaps, be justified in accusing them of exaggerating the attractions to which they have constituted themselves the guides. Paris has ever been a show place with the multiple charms of which the eager and unsophisticated foreigner was expected to be dazzled, and this has given birth to a large and ever increasing body of professional expositors of the beauties and artistic treasures of Paris, some of whom are distinguished by a gold band round their caps and a number on their arms, while others wear the green-braided uniform and Court sword of Academicians. But they are all equally in the business. It is a corporation. Certain tricks of phraseology and style seem to indicate the existence of an esprit de corps, an unwritten but rigid etiquette prevailing amongst them. Monsieur Georges Cain dedicates his work to A. G. Lenôtre, another active member of the clan, "in token of most sincere affection." Monsieur Sardou, in the preface which he contributes, tells us that his excellent friend Georges Cain is "the worthy inheritor of the talent of his father and grandfather," "the most enlightened guide possible in matters of Parisian lore," that he has written a "bewitching book," and, of course, the author of this bewitching book cannot do less than refer to Sardou as his "master," to Funck Brentano as the "exquisite historian of the Bastille," to Le Vayer as the "erudite and obliging" Curator of the City of Paris Library (quite true, by the way); Monsieur Périer, the Director of the Muséum, is "eminent"; Mdlle. Madeleine Lemaire is a "noble artist," even Renan is an "eminent philosopher"; only Dante, who in 1304 "attended one of the numerous schools of the Rue du Fouarre," gets no kind of compliment. Now and then a rift appears in the lute; this happy family is not wholly exempt from jars, witness the dispute which arose a week ago between the "illustrious" Sardou and the "exquisite" Funck Brentano as to whether or not Louis XIV. would have kept his hat on in the presence of ladies at his own Court. This was à propos of the "Affaire des Poisons," upon which Sardou has written a play, and M. Funck Brentano a book. The excessive irritation displayed by M. Sardou at M. Funck Brentano's very courteously worded criticism—he contended that, contrary to what happened in the play, Louis XIV. would have removed his hat even in the presence of his own chambermaids—suggested that over and above the merits of the question, the log-rolling etiquette of the corporation of writers upon Old Paris had received a rude shock.

Old Paris hardly predates the Revolution. With the exceptions already referred to, to which the Place des Vosges may be added, what remains of Old Paris which is more than a century old is slight and proportionately uninteresting. The late Baron Haussmann destroyed vast tracts of the picturesque Old Paris—much of which was mediæval—which was known to our grandfathers, and though he set up a monstrous sort of Frankenstein city in its stead, the carting away and burial of the dead Paris was a hygienic and in many respects an æsthetic necessity, which had long made itself imperiously felt. What he spared was not more than sixty or seventy years old, and, of course, in many cases, was traditionally associated with the tragic scenes of the Revolution. Unfortunately, the Chamber of Horrors interest which appeals so strongly to the melodramatic instinct of that illustrious old "pipelet" of genius, Monsieur Victorien Sardou, is not an admirable thing in itself, and it cannot take the place of the beauty interest which would have been felt had a real Old Paris been still in existence. To be shown an ugly and time-stained door, and to be told that out of it came Danton after his arrest, a few hours before his execution, must, of course, rouse a certain curiosity in the antiquarian breast, but the spectacle of a hangman's rope, or gruesome relic of a similar kind will do as little and as much. A walk with Monsieur Georges Cain to the several nooks and corners of Old Paris, which he describes and belauds, would no doubt prove amusing to schoolboys on a holiday, and would help to teach them history, but to the average traveller athirst for the splendid vestiges of the past it would probably prove rather dull. Perhaps it is a dim consciousness of the limitations of the task that the author has set himself which makes him adopt a gushing and exaggerated style like that of a showman at a fair. To those, however, who are interested in gaining at least a superficial knowledge of what Paris has to boast of in the way of old and historic buildings, his book, which Mr. Frederick Lawton has translated with exceptional skill, may be heartily recommended, and the illustrations are excellent.

ROWLAND STRONG.

THE SINCERITY OF PLURAL PERSONALITY

IN studying literature the question often arises "Is this sincere?" followed by the other question "Is sincerity necessary to great art?"; and fine verse and prose tantalize us when we would answer.

At first it seems quite clear that the greatest poetry must be written with a pen dipped in the heart's blood, and, to take the chiefest instance, that the joy and tragedy of love must have been personally experienced before they can be sung in real music. We feel, at any rate, on this of all themes, that to treat it as an "outsider" is synonymous with inevitable failure. Yet the matter is not quite so obvious, and cannot be dismissed as simply as that.

Many human beings who enjoy, and suffer, and love with utmost intensity are dumb, and others whose actual experience may have been stunted and limited are endowed with so powerful an imagination as to possess the mystery of effectual expression. (An almost classic instance of "imagined experience" would, of course, be found in the impassioned utterance of Emily Brontë.)

That is why it is probably impertinent and idle from the point of view of art to go on wondering what persons are referred to, and whether such an event was a fact or not—be we considering the Sonnets of Shakespeare or the very minor poetry of one of our contemporaries.

Sincerity need not imply autobiography, and to many a true artist the symbol is a stronger force than the incidental facts. This is specially true of religion. To imaginative thinkers the great symbols of Incarnation, Crucifixion, Resurrection have far more powerful sway over mind and life than any amount of exegetic "evidences" of dated local history.

À propos of religion, how often do readers of modern French poetry ask: "Is Verlaine's 'Sagesse' sincere? Was he really converted? Did he, then, so infinitely prefer the love of God to the love of women?" And the answer: "Oh! yes, it was true while it lasted, but he relapsed again," does not satisfy.

For science is beginning to confirm, what seemed for a time but a vagary of "Psychical Research," the doctrine of multiple personality. Long ago, philosophy, and even religion, had discarded the childish division of human beings into good and bad, white and black, sheep and goats. Then we got on a little further, and concluded that we each of us were good and bad, white and black, Jekyll and Hyde! But there are more than two people in one, for each combines (in what seemed an individuality) many characters, which cannot be sorted into two simple ethical divisions.

It is thus that contradictory contrasts are simultaneously—not alternately—combined in the same life and character.

Take spirituality and sensuality. Though neither of them is wholly "good" nor "bad," these two attributes were supposed to be in such conflict, and so mutually exclusive, as to be irreconcilable in the same temperament. Now, with a rather deeper knowledge of psychology, we find that they constantly go together, a vivid imagination understanding and necessitating the experience of both these tendencies.

Again, egoism and altruism were always opposed, till we began to see that self-sacrifice and a deeper self-realisation may coincide, just as in sociology collectivism and a truer individuality go together. These are but crude instances, and the mystery is more intangible and elusive than that. Yet, even in quoting these rough illustrations, we must remember that the point we insist on is the presence of simultaneous, not alternate, contrasts, so that one character is Pagan and Christian, proud and humble, selfish and unselfish, rapturous and despairing, in the same hour—nay, in the same minute of time.

It has been said that herein lay the wisdom of polytheism, and now we need a yet wider pantheon than that of Olympus; a ritual so wide as to combine the worship of the Virgin Mary and of her former enemy, Aphrodite; a religion embracing the ecstasies of Himalayan mystics and the voracious materialism of severest physical science.

I fear we shall hardly be able to take the advice of Epictetus that "a man should be one man," unless we carry the idea to its logical (and mystical) conclusion, and say that unity is multiplicity, as God is man.

This thought helps us to understand so much both in life and art which otherwise would seem incomprehensible, and to find the impertinent inquiry: "Did he really mean what he wrote?" "Was she consistent in the way she acted?" sadly ineffectual in coping with the awe-filled problems of emotional life, the myriad intricacies of art in literature.

One has barely suggested an idea before a host of exceptions spring up in one's own remembrance; yet they are not only inevitable, but welcome. Let us select an instance, almost at random. The "decadent's" deliberate concoction of emotion, of Satanic pleasures by means of drugs, of Catholic devotion through the scent of incense, is too degenerate to count either as truth of experience or truth of imagination. For surely, health is a part of truth, though disease may be a factor of realism, and therefore the devils of disease must be ejected from the polytheist temple of multiple personality, in which house, however, no empty "mansions," no neglected shrines must be left. The fuller, the more varied in colour, is the vivific experience of worship, the stronger will be the presence of health-giving Truth, the greater the beloved benediction of Beauty.

ALBERTA V. MONTGOMERY.

A CATALOGUER INCOMPLETE

LAST week, with greater benevolence than knowledge, I offered to catalogue for a friend the contents of nine large packing cases of most miscellaneous literature.

"Do you know anything of cataloguing?" he asked doubtfully.

"No," said I, happily, "but I think I can manage."

I cannot say that I have "managed" as well as I anticipated, but I have certainly enjoyed myself, and have acquired an amount of unusual and curious information. And, after all, the nine plethoric and bewildering packing cases have been resolved into neat bookshelves of roughly classified books. An aching back, dust-begotten fits of sneezing, and a pervading taste of mouldiness—to say nothing of a first view of a living family of bookworms—have been, I consider, cheaply purchased.

To begin with, there was a keen excitement in opening each case, each book sometimes, since at any moment one felt one might chance upon a treasure. Picture the possibilities dormant in those nine big cases; the joy of dipping into strange old books of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, from the heavy Latin Bible of 1529 to the no less ponderous works of "God's silly Vassal" of 1616; the fascination of idling away an hour with worthy Canon Derham's speculations on Astro-Theology, and Physico-Theology, of having the mighty problem of "The Origin of Evil" lucidly solved by a pompous eighteenth century bishop, and, most profitable of all, of learning from an anonymous benefactor of 1752 what should be "A Gentleman's Religion." But why did he not reveal his name? Was it from a true humility? Or, alas for human nature, because it was so much easier, even in the good old days, to preach than to practise?

I lay aside volume after volume of forgotten theologians, clad in decent russet brown; worthless though they be from a commercial point of view, there is pathos and sentiment in these relics of misapplied industry, of scholarship lavished on acrimonious confutations of long-dead heretics and heresies. Vanitas vanitatum! the words come so glibly into the mind, yet are they true after all? These old divines did but fulfil their duty as they knew it; they thought no pains too great, no labour for naught that could further their cause, the cause of Truth herself to them. So I look respectfully, and even tenderly, at these dull books, whose wide margins are copiously annotated in faded ink, and sigh to think there is no place any more for them in this full and impatient world. Ave, atque Vale, I murmur regretfully, for doomed are they to swift and painless destruction. The flames which their pages so often threaten await them, their hour is come.

But other writers than theological are here. See these ancient works on Gardening, written when the purest of human pleasures was not also one of the most unattainable for the citizen, when London had green gardens within her very walls, famous for their cunning devices of trees and flowers and fountains. Would you learn how best to manage your Melonrie, your Potagerie, your Herb-garden? Then "Master Switzer," of 1727, will help you, and for your better understanding has provided "Plans of Careful Draughtsmanship." Or you may study the "New Improvements of Gardening" of Bradley several years earlier. Or you may rejoice in the trees of the wood in a noble copy of Evelyn's "Sylva." But in any case your knowledge can be no more recent than 1837, with its Treatise on the Grape Vine, though within these limits you may range from forestry to specialising in cucumbers.

But, unfashionable though it sound, I know little of gardening, and care less, so my fickle fancy turns to another case. This is filled, as is its portly neighbour, with classics. Like a certain great man I have "little Latin and less Greek," but that little is enough to make me fasten with eagerness on these mellow antiquities. Alas, neglect and the busy worm have wrought a havoc that would grieve the dead and gone scholars who once cherished them so fondly. I feel a pang of genuine regret when some noble volume almost crumbles to dust in the handling. Though my Greek is a misty memory, a vague reminiscence of deep harmonious sounds on drowsy afternoons of long ago, yet the sight of these old pages, with their beautiful type and lordly margins, makes me wish that the rush of life had but left me that "less Greek," that at least I might bring to them more than a glance of uncomprehending affectionate recollection. Well, I must be content to arrange the venerable tomes in their places on the mean modern shelves—sad contrast to the oaken dignity of their Jacobean home—and, since I shun mournful reflections as useless and often unwholesome, turn to the Moderns.

Oh, the miscellaneous collection! Novels, that range from the original editions of Fielding and Smollett to the early works of Lytton. No later, for these books are the relics of a library collected by the pious care of several generations of learned clerks in a distant Fenland parsonage, and many a year has rolled by since the last treasure was placed with loving pride and appreciation on its carved shelf beside brethren of equal worth and dignity. There must have been an unusual width of culture among those reverend bibliophiles, for, in turning out the contents of the last case, I come upon a collection of rare and ancient Italian literature. And I do not know a word of Italian! And here are pictures demanding an explanation, and here is the explanation in a language that baffles the more from its tantalising resemblance to both Latin and French, either of which I could use well enough to satisfy my curiosity. Here is a work in sumptuous white vellum, with delicate (in one sense only!) illustrations, the "Decameron," truly a strange possession for a parson, but a delight to the lover of beautiful books. Perhaps it was but for that reason the good man bought it. De mortuis. At any rate, it lacks, what most of his Italian treasures possess, the august permission of the Church of their day.

But it is dusty and back-breaking work, this, and sad, if not heartbreaking, so 'tis with a certain relief after all that I see the ninth case is empty, and rise to stretch my cramped limbs and tell my trusting friend that his books have been, incompetently enough, catalogued and put in some sort of order on their shelves.

And, as I turn away, methinks the ancient fathers of the past look with mild benignity on my unworthy yet well-meant attempts.

E. D. FARRAR.

THE CENSORSHIP OF PLAYS

THE oft-postponed deputation of dramatists duly made its protest against the English censorship of plays last Tuesday. True, the continued indisposition of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman made it impossible for them to address themselves to the Prime Minister in Downing Street, but Mr. Herbert Gladstone received them at the Home Office instead, and listened to the eloquence of Mr. Barrie and Mr. Pinero, of Sir William Gilbert and Professor Gilbert Murray, with all possible courtesy and quite a respectable appearance of interest. Probably he found the proceedings an agreeable contrast to those of some recent deputations who have attempted to address him. No one shouted "Votes for Dramatists," or attempted to chain him or herself to the railings in Whitehall. Compared with the adventurous tactics which are in fashion to-day, everything was very decorous, very null and dull. Yet I think some good was done by the protest, and what it lost in excitement owing to the exemplary demeanour of the protestants it gained in dignity.

Mr. Gladstone's reply was what, I suppose, was to be expected. It referred in flattering terms to the drama as an art, and to the representatives of that art there assembled; acknowledged the temperate and eloquent way in which the claims of that art had been put forward; promised that those claims should have the most respectful consideration of the Prime Minister—and there an end. Nothing else perhaps was to be expected, as I have said. Even if Mr. Gladstone sympathised strongly with the dramatists' protest, he could hardly have said so on this occasion or promised definite official action in the matter, since the censorship is not in his Department—or, indeed, in any Department—and he was only speaking for the Prime Minister and not in his own person. But though I recognise the difficulty of Mr. Gladstone's position from this point of view, yet I confess I thought his eloquence, viewed as the expression of modern Liberal statesmanship, slightly chilling. The Liberal Party may be unwilling or afraid to abolish the Censorship of Plays. It is a thorny problem, into which all kinds of questions, including that of party tactics, may conceivably enter. Still, a touch of enthusiasm, a spark of generous heat in the cause of free speech in all departments of life, would not, I think, have been amiss. If Liberalism stands for anything nowadays—and I am sometimes tempted to believe that it does not—it stands for human freedom, for the breaking down of the old bondages, the obsolete restraints on thought and action which the past has bequeathed to us. Broadly speaking, there are two theories of Government. One is that mankind is perverse and desperately wicked, and that only the pressure of laws and plenty of them can keep it within bounds. The other is, that repression is at best an evil, that to give mankind the utmost measure of liberty is both the wiser and the better course, and that to trust people is the only way to make them worthy of trust. The latter is, or should be, the Liberal attitude. The fact that it is so no longer, or is so only in a very modified degree, perhaps explains why Liberalism as a vital force is at such a low ebb in this country at the moment and almost threatens to be crushed out altogether between the upper and nether millstones of Conservatism and Socialism. Be this as it may, the position of a Liberal statesman who supports the present censorship of plays—or indeed, any censorship of plays—seems to me hopelessly indefensible. Broadly speaking, it may be said that all censorships are illiberal, whether of Press or pulpit or stage. The arguments, such as they are, which are advanced against freeing the theatre from the control of the Censor apply with equal validity to the newspaper, the sermon, or the printed book. If the theatre had no Censor, say that gentleman's defenders, you might have all kinds of undesirable entertainments given on the stage which would now be prohibited. Well, the newspapers of to-day contain a good deal of undesirable matter which a judicious Press censor would prohibit. A great deal of pernicious nonsense is talked in the public parks—and in private houses for that matter—which a judicious censorship of free speech would prohibit. But the Liberal statesman who arose in his place in the House and proposed to revive the censorship of the Press in this country, or argued against the Englishman's right to talk nonsense if he chooses, would have small chance of retaining his place in an administration. The time, I think, will come when a Liberal statesman who maintains that a censorship of the theatre is either a desirable or an essential institution in a free community will seem equally intolerable. We in this country realise that though newspapers often print what had better have been unprinted and preachers often preach balderdash or worse, yet the harm that is done by such cases is far outweighed by the harm that would result from keeping the Press and religion perpetually in leading strings. It is better on the whole for a nation to take the risks of freedom than to seek safety in fetters. I know there are many people, perhaps the majority of people, in this country who do not feel like this on the subject of the censorship of plays. They admit the argument with regard to all other censorships, but in the case of the theatre they are convinced that an exception must be made, and that there liberty would at once degenerate into license. Why they think so I do not know. Ireland has no censorship, yet no one can pretend that the Irish stage is any more licentious than the English. The British Empire consists of a great aggregation of free peoples; I forget how many, but Mr. Pinero mentioned it in his admirable speech. Not one of them finds it necessary to have a censor of plays except the Mother Country! The United States of America has no censor, and seems to get on very well without one. Its plays are, for the most part, bad plays, it is true, but they are not much worse than ours, and they are not in the least more immoral. The fact is, the fear of a free stage in this country is a bogey. It rests on a false conception of the causes which determine the character of a nation's drama. A country's plays, like its newspapers, like its books, depend on its general moral standard—on public opinion, in fact. So long as public opinion is against immoral plays, those plays will not be produced; or if they are produced, the police will at once suppress them without any prompting from a censor. If public opinion, on the contrary, were not against the presentation of immoral plays, no censorship and no police would be able to prevent their presentation. The law, in the last resort, represents the will of the people, and any law which has not public opinion behind it must ultimately cease to be enforced. When this rather obvious fact is realised in this country, the censorship of plays will go the way of other antiquated political lumber. Till then, I suppose, we shall have to put up with it.

ST. J. H.

THE LIBRARY TABLE

The Charm of London. An Anthology. Compiled by ALFRED H. HYATT. (Chatto and Windus, 2s. net.)

THE magnetism of London is a perennial theme with our English poets and romancists. It is, indeed, impossible to escape from the influence of the world's greatest city. Whatever attitude you may adopt towards London—whether she prove the "stony-hearted stepmother" to you that De Quincey found her, or whether, with old Dunbar, you regard her as "the flower of cities all"—you cannot at least adopt a neutral attitude, you cannot view her with mere indifference.

Those who have been reared amid urban surroundings are sometimes slow to realise the poetry of the town, and the discovery of London has been left for the most part, to the provincial.

Go where we may—rest where we will—
Eternal London haunts us still, wrote Tom Moore—and Moore was an Irishman. Dr. Johnson, who may be said to have created the immortal tradition of Fleet Street, was a native of Lichfield. In our own time, no one has written with such grace and insight of the life of London as that cultured American cosmopolite, Mr. Henry James. One memorable exception there is. Charles Lamb, greatest of London's lovers—save only Dickens—was a Londoner by birth, and he died, poor man, in exile at Edmonton.

Mr. Hyatt's anthology is a valuable addition to the literature of London. Its compiler has ransacked ancient and modern literature for quotations from those poets and prose writers who have testified to the witchery and glamour of the great city. The extracts included in this volume range from Dunbar to Mr. St. John Adcock. They include such names as Dickens, Tom Hood, Boswell, George Meredith, Mrs. Meynell, Richard Jefferies, W. E. Henley, Mrs. Browning, Lord Alfred Douglas (who is represented by one of the finest and most characteristic sonnets in "The City of the Soul"), Sir Walter Besant, John Davidson, and Robert Buchanan—to name but a few. Of course, Dickens is here—is it possible, indeed, to imagine a London anthology in which the name of Dickens should find no place? Charles Lamb's famous panegyric is not forgotten:

The man must have a rare recipe for melancholy who can be dull in Fleet Street. I am naturally inclined to hypochondria, but in London it vanishes, like all other ills. Often, when I have felt a weariness or distaste at home, have I rushed out into her crowded Strand, and fed my humour, till tears have wetted my cheek for unutterable sympathies with the multitudinous moving picture, which she never fails to present at all hours, like the scenes of a shifting pantomime.

The temptation to reproduce Carlyle's wonderful night-scene from "Sartor Resartus" we can imagine to have proved well-nigh irresistible, but it has no legitimate place in a book about London, since it was in a German city that the immortal Teufelsdröckh worked and dreamed. We can forgive Mr. Hyatt, however, for this one deviation from his subject. He has provided his readers with a plenitude of good fare. There are some excellent poems by Henry T. Leigh, Cockney and Bohemian, and we are glad to recognise once more the tender and mellow cynicism of Frederick Locke's lines on Piccadilly:

Life is chequer'd, a patchwork of smiles and of frowns;
We valued its ups, let us muse on its downs.
There's a side that is bright, it will then turn the other,
One turn, if a good one, deserves such another.
These downs are delightful, these ups are not hilly—
Let us turn one more turn ere we quit Piccadilly.

Mr. Hyatt has earned the thanks of all London lovers.

Scopas et Praxitèle. MAXIME COLLIGNON. (Les Maîtres de l'Art.) Plon, n.p.

ANY writing on Greek art by M. Collignon is sure to be an addition to the sources for clear and sympathetic criticism; and the present little book is no exception to the rule which we have learnt to recognise. Strictly speaking, the title is somewhat misleading, for the sub-title gives the actual content of the brief survey, "La sculpture grecque au IV^e. siècle jusqu'au temps d'Alexandre." M. Collignon rightly analyses the constituents of the style of Pheidias, which so clearly separate his genius from that of the succeeding generation of artists, though it is doubtful whether he is right in his definition of their source. He speaks frequently of l'union du génie attique et du génie dorien, but while we can appreciate the presence in Pheidian sculpture of the quality which he ascribes to "Dorian" influence, we are inclined to read into it a larger Panhellenism than could be attributed to a people essentially selfish, and not essentially artistic.

Scopas is, as ever, M. Collignon's hero:

L'homme qui a possédé toutes les connaissances techniques de son art, qui a mené de front la construction d'un Temple et sa décoration sculpturale, qui excelle à composer un vaste ensemble de figures, comme la groupe d'Achille et des divinités marines, qui travaille avec la même aisance, dans les statues isolées, le bronze et le marbre, l'artiste aux aptitudes multiples, qui ne se confine pas dans une étroite spécialité, est bien de la race des grands artistes maîtres tels qu'en possèdent, aux époques privilégiées, la Grèce antique et l'Italie de la Renaissance.

None the less, we could wish that, in dealing with the Mausoleum sculptures, he had not plunged into a sea of guess-work anent the figures of Mausolus and Artemisia. Scopas gains nothing thereby, nor does the reader. More cautious, and therefore more satisfactory, is M. Collignon's note upon the sculptured drum from the fourth century Artemision of Ephesus. But so strong is the resemblance of the Hermes in this work to the Tegean heads on the one hand and the charioteer of the Mausoleum frieze on the other, that it would be well-nigh impossible to deny the influence of the Parian artist in both the Asiatic instances.

M. Collignon approaches all uncertain Praxitelean identifications in an extremely critical spirit. But we certainly agree with him in rejecting Fustwängler's suggestion that the Townley Venus is a "Phryne," though his ground for so doing seems to us less certain than that of the lack of individuality in the features.

A masterly bit of reconstructive criticism is that which discusses the use of colour on the Hermes of Olympia. It is too long to quote, but we would recommend it to the notice of all those for whom sculpture, as we know it to-day, lacks life and tenderness.

Concerning the Venus de Milo, M. Collignon waxes eloquent—as well he may. But we fear that he will find few to support his view that the work is of a date within the great period of the fourth century. We wish we could believe it to be so. But we differ from the author not only on grounds of style, but of sentiment as well, when he seeks to affiliate the Demeter of Cuidos to the Halicarnassian group in its Scopasian aspect. Far rather would we give this glorious work to Praxiteles, or to a pupil endued with a touch of an older Atticism.

A comparative chronological table of historic and artistic events, and an excellent index complete a volume which, within its own limits, is worthy of M. Collignon's great reputation.

Devonshire Characters and Strange Events. By (Rev.) S. BARING-GOULD. (London: John Lane, 21s. net.)

THERE are, perhaps, few writers who know the history and topography of Devonshire better than does Mr. Baring-Gould; but it must be confessed that one lays down this, his latest, volume with a sense akin to disappointment. Of the vast amount of material contained in its sixty-two chapters, and filling nearly 800 pages, there is not much beyond what might have been put together by any diligent scribe having access to the British Museum Library or the bookshelves of any considerable collection of Devonshire literature. The author, moreover, has an inveterate habit of providing copy out of nothing, as when, for instance, he retails such trifles as the fatuous gossip of dotard sextons or the equally pointless conversations of commercial travellers overheard in a railway journey.

One of the best pieces of work in the whole book is the article on the Princetown Massacre (1814), concerning which Mr. Baring-Gould marshals the facts and weighs and sifts the evidence of either side with masterly impartiality. The stories of "Caraboo" and of Joanna Southcott are astounding records of human credulity. In reference to the last-named impostor, the writer does not produce one iota of authority for his statement that Joanna Southcott's following is identical with the quite recent sect of New Jezreelites at Chatham, or, rather, New Brompton. But that is another story, the scene of which is laid in another county, and so Mr. Baring-Gould must be excused from being sufficiently acquainted with the circumstances.

The book is well got up, with ample margins, and is abundantly illustrated by reproductions from old engravings, broadsides, and other documents.

Memorials of Old Derbyshire. Edited by Rev. J. CHARLES COX, LL.D., F.S.A. (London: Bemrose, 15s. net.)

It is, of course, a foregone conclusion that any book dealing with Derbyshire must be entrusted to Rev. Dr. Cox, whose monumental work on the Derbyshire churches, completed thirty years ago, has never yet been paralleled in the case of any other county. The latest work appearing under his editorship is so full of excellent and interesting matter that the fact that it surpasses in bulk the most ponderous of its predecessors in the same series of old county memorials is readily overlooked. In his summary of the history of the county, Dr. Cox, by some unaccountable oversight (p. 22), credits Queen Elizabeth with phenomenal longevity. For her to have been alive at all, even though at the point of death, "in March, 1682-3," she must have attained the age of nearly 150 years! Another contributor, not usually inaccurate, has fallen (p. 250) into the blunder of ascribing the late Sir John Millais' early picture of "Christ in the Carpenter's Shop" to Mr. Holman Hunt; a blunder which, regrettable though it be, does not, as it happens, invalidate the force of the writer's argument. Although, to adopt the words of the editor, it "would be invidious to particularise" among the several writers who have contributed to the volume, an idea of its varied contents may be gained by enumerating, among others, the articles on Prehistoric Burials and Stone Circles, the Peak Forest, on Repton and Wingfield Manor, on the old homes and the rood-screens of the county, Old Country Life in the Seventeenth Century, and the Folklore of Derbyshire. The book is enhanced by a number of capital illustrations from photographs and other sources, and by a very fair index, without which, indeed, half its value for purposes of reference would have been lost.

FICTION

Rodwell. By VALENTINA HAWTREY. (Murray, 6s.)

MISS HAWTREY has followed up her historical romance "Suzanne," which attracted much attention, as its merit undoubtedly deserved, by "Rodwell," a story of modern life, which is in many ways a remarkable achievement. Though in places the workmanship is a little laboured, and the theme is handled at times too diffusely to keep the interest unimpaired in the story at its full length, yet many characters stand out memorably from the background in spite of this over-elaboration of detail. The story deals with the rise of one family in a village, that of a small farmer, and the fall of another, that of the squire, which for generations has inhabited Rodwell, the manor house. The cause lies in their handling of money, and the power of money sounds, as in a novel of Balzac, a perpetual undertone throughout the book. The Rodwells of Rodwell Park have been well known to be gamblers by all the country-side, and the last Rodwell has already married two wives when the book opens, in order that their money may help to reinstate the fortunes of his house into some semblance of prosperity. But the instinct of the gambler is too strong in him; their money slips through his fingers in absurd speculations. His dishonesty is hidden under a charming manner, which is all the inheritance his eldest son is likely to get. Tim, the small farmer's grandson, is taken by chance into the business of a financier, who is the village doctor's brother, and who holds mortgages over Rodwell. Tim slowly develops a genius for finance. He is a good fellow, perfectly upright and kind (not at all the stock financier of romance), but common. Gradually he prospers, marries, and has a son, Reggie. Now, in the village is a girl, Anne, an heiress and a friend of the Rodwells during the second Mrs. Rodwell's lifetime. But the second wife dies, and dying begs the eldest son, her stepson, not to fulfil his father's wish and marry Anne, the heiress, for her money. She knows to her cost the gambling taint is too deeply in his blood. The charming father discovers his son's scruples, and marries her himself, having no scruples, and taking full advantage of the romance which the girl has woven round his name and person. Anne, with all the enthusiasm of youth, sets about restoring the house and estate, which have fallen into bad neglect. But she is deceived on every side, and most effectively by her husband, who mortgages the estate again without her knowledge to the financier, whose partner Tim has at length become. Tim's son Reggie is now grown up; he is, in fact, just leaving Eton for Oxford, and he is a poet. Great affection and little understanding exist between Tim and his son. And at this point comes the most brilliant work in the book. For Tim comes into possession of the Rodwell mortgages, and in order that Reggie may have a beautiful home, forecloses, and comes to live at Rodwell himself, thereby incurring Anne's unreasoning hatred. Reggie, happening on the Rodwells, who are living in a small house which is Anne's property, comes under the spell of their charm, which Anne encourages at first. She finds that Reggie has been losing large sums of money, and full of remorse goes to see Tim in her old house and warns him. But the mischief has been too fully done, for she knows Tim is quite unaware of his son's visits and conduct. There is a terrible scene between Tim and his son; and Reggie courts death in consequence, and too recklessly, so that death, against his will, takes him. Tim and Reggie and Anne are portrayed with amazing clearness and skill, and the strange charm of the reprobate Rodwells is made a very real thing, and the various catastrophes they cause become comprehensible and dramatic. If Miss Hawtreys had been able to manage the first quarter of the book with as much skill as she has shown in the last half, she would have written a great book. But the opening is not concentrated sufficiently, and many details are introduced, which, though they are in themselves interesting, yet do not help the issue enough to warrant their introduction at such length.

Father Alphonsus. By H. A. HINKSON. (Fisher Unwin, 6s.)

THE name upon the title page of this book is one that is already honourably associated with another aspect of Irish literature. There is, however, about Mr. H. A. Hinkson's work nothing of the poetry and romance with which writers of what we call the Celtic school have claimed our admiration; on the contrary, he gives us a picture of modern Ireland drawn according to the methods of pure realism, and the result, however hard and unsympathetic in treatment, is at least interesting.

Two young men, Alphonsus Daly and Reginald Blake, are, at the opening of the book, fellow candidates for priesthood at the College of St. Mary. In different ways both are shown conscious of a secret misgiving, a doubt as to their strength to bear the ordeal of the super-human life. Blake, the son of a rich Dublin solicitor, gives way under the strain, abandons his career, and on the eve of taking the major vows returns home as a "spoilt priest." The other remains, and becomes Father Alphonsus, and the protagonist of a story, which is in reality less a novel than a study of the life of one man lived under conditions of unusual difficulty and trial. Of those conditions Mr. Hinkson writes with the authority of evident understanding. The reasons that induce the peasant-born Daly to stifle his conscience rather than expose his family to the stigma of harbouring a "spoilt priest"; the reverential delight of the mother at her son's ordination (evidenced by the silver chalice, "Presented to the Reverend Alphonsus Daly as a mark of respect and esteem by his parents"), all these are details that fill in what must be to those unfamiliar with it an extraordinary picture. Mr. Hinkson is perhaps better as a historian than an analyst of motive; his treatment of the psychological side of his problem appears at times a little too heavy for so delicate a task, and in consequence the book misses something of the power of subtlety. The subordinate characters are for the most part cleverly and clearly drawn, though the woman, through whose agency Father Alphonsus meets with his foredoomed disaster, is something of a lay figure. Of the others, Larry, the young brother of the priest, is by far the best; the grief of Alphonsus at the boy's death in the hunting field is as true as anything in the book, and it is well observed, too, that the passing with him of all that satisfied the man's craving for youth and activity and love should be made the immediate cause of his catastrophe. "While my darling Larry lived," he writes to Blake afterwards, "the human, worldly part of me—call it what you will—was satisfied. I did my duty as a priest, but the forbidden part of my nature was embodied in him. He followed the hounds, and I exulted in the hot pursuit; he gambled and played at cards, and I shared his feverish excitement; he was in trouble and I sorrowed with him; he was in debt and we paid the debt together. There was nothing that he did that I did not have a part in. Then he died, and that part of me that should have died with him lived still when the flowers bloomed over his grave." This, however artificially expressed, is genuine feeling, and has the ring of sincerity. It will be gathered that there is little humour in Mr. Hinkson's story, though there are scenes here and there, notably that of Micky Finn's absolution, that are told with an almost grim appreciation of their grotesque aspect; but even so the fun is mingled with suffering, it is—to quote from another writer about Ireland—the fun of the pig and the motor-car. Admirers of Mr. Bernard Shaw will agree that we could give the author of "Father Alphonsus" no greater praise for the observation that has produced an interesting and, in many respects, remarkable book.

The Grain Carriers. By EDWARD NOBLE. (Blackwood, 6s.)

THIS story is a vigorous indictment of the prevailing conditions under which grain is carried from South America for the English market. It is dedicated without permission to the past and present presidents of the Board of Trade, "in recognition of the desire underlying the words spoken by one of them some weeks before he made still more dangerous the 'conditions' he at the moment deplored," and underneath the dedication is printed a short extract from a speech made by Mr. Lloyd-George in the spring of the year 1906. The attack is spirited and sincere, and in all probability quite justified by certain facts. The danger of raising "the load-line" must, in many instances, be considerable. But Mr. Noble has done more than compiled a vigorous pamphlet, illustrated by flaming incidents of cruelty and corruption; he has written a well-constructed story of the sea, which loses nothing from being based on fact, and he has never allowed his purpose to get out of his control. It remains in proper subservience to the essential. As a writer on the sea and ships Mr. Noble already must take a high place among his contemporaries, and the present book makes his position more secure. He catches the spirit of the sea in its many moods, and something of the sea's freshness and size is to be found in the generosity of his sentiments. In outline the story is simple. Two ships, belonging to the same Liverpool firm, start from the neighbourhood of San Francisco for England. The Magician is old and unseaworthy, known as the "bathing machine," and is under the command of an infamous Dutchman, who cares for nothing so long as he can put money into his pockets by way of the pockets of his employers. A sober crew prefer six weeks' prison to the risk of sailing in the Magician, under the new conditions, round Cape Horn. So she is eventually manned by a "Shanghaied" crew of ruffians. The Padrone is a new and unseaworthy vessel, iron and jerry-built, under a good commander, Collins, who resents the new regulations, but is forced to submit on pain of dismissal. His wife and daughter are on board. The two ships start. Philip Devine is on the Magician, and is in love with Captain Collins's daughter. Unable to tolerate the Dutchman's cruelty to the crew, he puts him and the mate in irons. Of the subsequent adventures of the two vessels Mr. Noble writes with vigour and grip that is unusual. The happenings are very terrible, but they are convincing. The book is certainly one that should on no account be missed.

A Jacobite Admiral. By R. H. FORSTER. (John Long, 6s.)

IN "A Jacobite Admiral," Mr. Forster has written yet another of those stirring romances of the Northumbrian border-land, which have already brought him so many grateful admirers. He knows thoroughly that fascinating and wonderful stretch of country between Tynemouth and Berwick, and has, moreover, the happy gift of translating this knowledge into words that are instinct with the very atmosphere of the scenes described. The plot of "A Jacobite Admiral" is of the familiar pattern of such stories, but so vigorous is Mr. Forster's telling of it that the well-worn incidents have all the freshness and charm of novelty. It is laid at the date of the first Jacobite invasion, a tumultuous time that provides plenty of bustling adventures by land and sea, though it is to the credit of the author's self-denial that he has resisted the temptation to introduce a single historical personage amongst his characters. The Jacobite Admiral himself is a certain Lancelot Errington, a fascinating vagabond, who earns his title by the escapade in which, with the help of his cousin Mark, the hero of the tale, he attempts to capture Holy Island for the rebels. Quite as sympathetically drawn, too, is his chief opponent, Robert Marley, the Whig, who is finally instrumental in saving Mark from execution; indeed, it is this quality of the time, by which the most industrious enemies were equally neighbourly to aid each other in distress, that gives to stories of it their singular charm. For the rest there is plenty of hard-riding, a sufficiency of wholesome bloodshed, and a little, not too insistent, courtship to end all happily. The escapes in the book are many, and of the most excellently hair-breadth quality, and the flight and wanderings of the two outlaws are as well done as anything of the kind that we have read since the days of David Balfour. The whole tale, in short, is such stuff as our adventurous dreams are made of, and, to boys and all young people up to the age of threescore and ten, its appeal will be both instant and irresistible.

One Fair Enemy. By CARLTON DAWE. (John Long, 6s.)

THE only point in which this story differs from any other Cavalier and Roundhead romance is the distinct bias in favour of the Puritans throughout its incidents. The haughty Cavalier heroine, left in charge of her historic castle, the Roundhead captain who takes and occupies that castle, the unbounded dislike, scorn, and hatred with which these two regard each other, and the promising love affair which springs up in a remarkably short time between them are all familiar to us. They are pleasant, they do not annoy us, and we have read worse romances. The book would have been all the better if written in straightforward English, instead of an irritating mixture of old-world phraseology and our own. The former is almost entirely dependent on inverted phrases and a very doubtful use of the subjunctive, together with a quite uninspired stringing together of almost meaningless words to fill out sentences.

The Blue Lagoon. By H. DE VERE STACPOOLE. (T. Fisher Unwin, 6s.)

REMEMBERING Mr. Stacpoole's previous work, with its agreeable note of freshness and invention, we prepared to read "The Blue Lagoon" with pleasure; nor were we disappointed, for it certainly marks an advance on anything he has done before. "The Blue Lagoon" is the story of two American children, a boy and a girl, who, through a series of misfortunes, are stranded on an uninhabited island in the Pacific in the company of an old Irish seaman. The latter dies in tragic fashion when the children, who are cousins, are ten years old; but by then the children have learnt sufficient of the simple conditions of life in the South Seas to enable them to grow up without hardships. When their childhood has passed, the situation becomes delicate to the civilised mind, but we have nothing but admiration for the courageous simplicity with which Mr. Stacpoole has told the story of their love and of the coming of their child. It would have been so easy to have passed over this natural and beautiful problem in the conventionally artificial manner, that Mr. Stacpoole's artistic honesty must be warmly commended. We do not propose to tell the story further here, but will content ourselves with saying that we hardly find the termination satisfactory, though we realise the difficulty of ending the book in any other way. The description of the scenery of the island, which supply the novel with a gorgeous background, are admirable, and the character of Paddy Rutton, the old Irish merchant seaman, is sympathetically drawn. But the chief interest of the book lies with the two American children, and it is Mr. Stacpoole's unqualified success in their delineation that renders this book a notable addition to modern fiction.

Their Marriage. By CURTIS YORKE. (John Long, 6s.)

THIS is one of those stories in which the personality of the author is strongly felt throughout. It is a pleasant, simple tale, clearly and brightly written; the dialogue, without being remarkable for any great brilliance, is natural and to the point, while the characters are ably and consistently drawn; but, with all this, the real charm of the novel lies in a certain personal touch which Curtis Yorke never fails to introduce into her work. She has been particularly happy in her delineation of Miss De Tergens, a domineering and uncompromising old lady, the rich aunt of an independent young couple who marry against her wish and prefer love in a cottage to a substantial allowance.

D R A M A

THE SICILIAN PLAYERS

WHAT we call Realism is, of course, merely a mode, in which especial emphasis is given to the element of realisation in Art. It is obvious that the season of the Sicilian Players is of great importance to those London amateurs of the theatre, who like Realism in any form, for their admirers are as numerous at every performance, as the Shaftesbury Theatre can well hold. But its importance is no less to those interested in the intellectual elements of the drama itself, which include much more than intellectual plays such as those by Ibsen or Mr. Bernard Shaw, and the intellectual production which we associate notably with Mr. Granville Barker. The intellect of the audience has, of course, nothing to do with the matter, nor is there any reason to suppose that the audiences now gathering at the Shaftesbury are more composed of the devotees of Realism than of those who do not care much for it, but recognise its importance at the present time in the intellectual consideration of the drama. I am not so much concerned with the audience as with the absentees. My object is, to urge those who have been deterred from seeing the Sicilians by their reputation for Realism, to take their courage in their hands and go at once, which Signora Mimi Aguglia is here to interpret it. Following the example of Ibsen in his emphasis of the element of suggestion in the art itself, I would suggest a question, in criticising the Sicilians, which, like him, I am not so ready to answer. It will, I think, be allowed that their reputation for extreme Realism has been justly earned. I note, for an instant, minute details, some of them quite intime—the standing of the overgrown girl on the side of one heel (Morte Civile); the squirting expectoration of the sulphur workmen; the use of the head-kerchief literally as a mouchoir (Cavalleria Rusticana); the continual scratching of the head (passim), with other tricks unnecessary to notice. These are totally unimportant of themselves, and are merely indicative of a Realism such as has never been seen before in a London theatre. The main interest, of course, lies in the point to which the realisation of sexual expression is carried, especially by Signora Aguglia and Signor Lo Turco, both of whom carry it much further than does Signor Grasso. In the general Realism of the whole troupe, the gestures, the habits, the nature of Sicilian peasants undoubtedly appear before us alive upon the Shaftesbury stage. I say the nature, for between nature and practice, religion has set a great gulf. The question I would suggest is, whether these are the expressions of consummate realistic art or excessively clever mimicry; for under the last head fall even natural habits and tricks retained for artistic purposes. Is what we see, Sicilianism in dramatic art, or Nature preserved for export—Loulou stuffed, holding in his claw the nut gilded par amour du grandiose? The grandiose in the Sicilians' realism is plain enough. Independent of their realistic expression, the immense dramatic faculties of Signor Grasso and Signora Aguglia are plain enough too; but are they—or rather, are those of Signora Aguglia, as typifying the troupe—dependent on the Sicilian element, or something wider? Concerning Signor Grasso there is no doubt. The value of all criticism depends on the application of many standards. When the critic compares the latest dramatist or poet with Shakespeare and Dante, he does the living term of comparison a grave injustice; he makes him appear as ridiculous as he is himself in making the comparison. We, who welcome everything that is new and strange, and judge it as affectionately as we can for that very reason (for its novelty and strangeness are the signs of the vitality essential to all true art), are continually driven to an appearance of captiousness, by such hopeless confusion of standards. Those among the Players' audiences who desire to judge of them more expertly, at once applied a different standard to the acting of Signor Grasso and that of Signora Aguglia. But an impression was abroad, that Signora Aguglia was an actress who had already obtained in her own country a position similar to that of Madame Réjane or Madame Sara Bernhardt in France near their zenith. Reticence was naturally felt in applying such an exacting standard of criticism to so charming a stranger. It is now generally known that her choice by Signor Grasso for the parts which she plays, was an experiment necessitated by accident. How fully she has justified his expectations is proved by her triumphs in Paris and London. It is now possible to judge of her frankly as a tyro of the most extraordinarily flattering promise, a mime of immense natural power, and an artist of very attractive and powerful personality. We are, alas! dispensed from speculating as to what heights of Art she may eventually reach, by the report that she will soon cease to delight us on the stage, in order to devote herself to her family. I hope that the timorous amateurs of the drama, who have as yet avoided seeing her, will hasten to do so, since they are not likely to have that opportunity again. If they are prepared to steel ourselves to Realism in its extremest form, they should, of course, go to see La Figlia di Jorio. But if they do, they must be prepared to consider with a philosophic mind what is the artistic difference between Signora Aguglia's and Signor Lo Turco's rendering of the scene in the cave and an attentat aux mœurs in actual life. And they should leave their adolescentes at home, remembering that Measure for Measure, and, indeed, the whole body of Shakespeare, whom they consider instructive and national, are not submitted to their reading, much less to their seeing, unexpurgated. Or they can witness her pathologically exact reproductions of epilepsy, under the influence of passion, in Malia, if, indeed, the stimulus of attraction does not seem to them even less becoming than that of repulsion, when so realistically expressed. After all, they are accustomed to the thesis, from its being the favourite one of Mr. Bernard Shaw. If they are not prepared for such sacrifices, they can see Cavalleria Rusticana and Zolfara at much less risk. In whichever play Signora Aguglia appears, they will never forget her marvellously varying voice, her unvarying vivacity, and her pervading personality. Zolfara particularly gives her the opportunity of showing the lighter and more widely attractive side of her personality; also Santuzza, in Cavalleria, is generally recognised as one of her most successful parts. Signor Grasso is, of course, admirable always, and this play gives perhaps the best opportunity of seeing at once the two other actors also, who most ably support him—Signor Lo Turco and Signora M. Balestrieri. Signor Lo Turco is as purely accomplished an actor as it is possible to find on any stage, most striking, of course, as Signor d'Annunzio's Lazzaro, emphasised as Cola (Malia), frank and affectionate as Turridu (Cavalleria), cynical and sensuous as Japicu (Zolfara), priggishly respectable as Dr. Palmieri (Morte Civile), holding always every gesture and every tone of his voice and expression of his face in absolute control. But his personality is not very marked. Signora M. Balestrieri is similarly accomplished in the rôles of old women; more successful as Za Pina (Malia) and Gna Brigida (Zolfara) than in the first act of La Figlia di Jorio. But in the third act she attains a tragic dignity not reached even by Signor Grasso himself. The play should be seen if only to see her. She passes far beyond the Sicilian Peasant Stage. Her command of facial expression throughout the act, as she gazes full at the audience, is marvellous. The unconscious murmuring of her lips, the movements of her hands, express the intensity of her sorrows. From the commonplace, pretty old peasant of the first act, she has become an exceedingly beautiful Mater dolorosa, the central figure of a pietà, by Francia. The acting of Signor A. Viscuso as Monsignore Ruvo, the "gay" ecclesiastic in Morte Civile, has the accomplishment of Signor Lo Turco in a different manner; neither belong essentially to the Sicilian stage. Of Signor Grasso I do not know whether it is more difficult to write first or last. He is a born mime and a consummate artist, a master both of the Sicilian Peasant Stage and of the European. He strikes me as capable of adapting himself to any rôle, and playing it with the first distinction, as possessing a personality which can repel and attract equally absorbingly, and is more capable of varied expression than any equally pronounced that I have ever seen. He is never finer than as Currado, in the otherwise contemptible play, Morte Civile, especially in his recitation of the facts of a murder which he had previously committed. In his death struggles he indulges his Sicilianism too much; however, it is for this, in the first place, that we flock to the Shaftesbury Theatre, and we are really relieved when he comes before the curtain alive again. His weakness and his tears have been criticised as maudlin and melodramatic. I do not agree; they are no more maudlin than are the tears and howls of Achilles; both are men of other race than ours. Moreover, Currado has been reduced to a primitive condition by the isolation and to an hysterical condition by the moral tortures of imprisonment. As the Compare Alfio (Cavalleria), Signor Grasso shows his extraordinary powers of naturalism in comedy. The "make-up," the rider's gait, the thick voice, are to life, and are not in the least exaggerated. He is most charming perhaps as Vanni, the devoted and reasonably jealous husband (Zolfara). Whether he is speaking or not, he is acting continually; his movements, the expression of his face, are almost sufficient of themselves to tell the course of the drama. Now it must be remembered that more than half the audiences attracted in such large numbers to the Sicilian plays, do not understand more than a few words here and there; many do not understand a syllable. Moreover, with the exception of La Figlia di Jorio and perhaps Cavalleria Rusticana, the plays are exceedingly poor. It is noticeable that in La Figlia di Jorio, a play of very great beauty, the troupe is generally at its worst; their lack of interest affects Signor Grasso himself. Signor d'Annunzio has developed the pictorial and poetic elements so fully that they seem to obscure the dramatic element—at any rate, in actual representation. But beyond this, the troupe does not seem to me to render the drama as Signor d'Annunzio intended, and Signora Mimi Aguglia does not do full justice to the idea of Mila. The whole drama is too elaborate and too learned for the troupe, though, of course, Signor Grasso is perfectly capable of dealing with Aligio, as indeed Signor Lo Turco proves himself to be with Lazzaro; the general atmosphere seems to affect the greater personality more than it does the lesser. But I must repeat, I could not desire to see Candia more beautifully played than she is by Signora M. Balestrieri in the last act. These remarks are obviously not those of a professed Dramatic Critic. They are founded on the plays that I have seen. I have not seen Juan José, Russida, La Lupa, nor, of course, Feudalismo, which is produced on Friday the 28th. A study of these might modify my opinion.

M. A.

CORRESPONDENCE

LORD HALIFAX ON THE BLOW TO CHURCH SCHOOLS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The Education Bill introduced last night destroys all Church schools in all single-school districts—that is, in the vast majority of all the rural parishes in England. In those schools teaching under the Cowper-Temple clause will be substituted for the religious teaching those schools were built to provide. The teachers are to be prohibited from giving the religious teaching they have been accustomed to give. Profession is made to respect the wishes of parents, but it is only those parents who wish for undenominational teaching. Those who desire denominational teaching for their children are to be deprived of it, while they are made to pay for the religious teaching to which they object.

In all single-school districts the Bill inflicts upon the members of the Church of England and upon the Roman Catholics the precise grievance which it alleges to exist at present in the case of the Nonconformists, and from which it desires to relieve them. It endows and establishes undenominational religious teaching at the public expense, on the ground that the religious teaching prescribed by the Cowper-Temple clause has been found to work well, and is generally acceptable—an assertion which, if disproof is necessary, is shown to be false by the £400,000 raised in London alone within the last twelve months in order to preserve the schools in which denominational teaching is given. It provides no facilities for denominational teaching, for such parents who desire it, in the present Council schools. It tramples on the trusts in reliance on which millions have been subscribed for the building and maintenance of schools in which definite religious teaching should be given, and as a boon to the founders and managers of such schools it allows them to provide on non-school days—i.e., on Saturday and Sunday—for the teaching of the Catechism and to bargain with the local authority for the substitution of teaching under the Cowper-Temple clause on all other days for the definite religious teaching hitherto given in those schools. Was there ever such a case of seething the kid in its mother's milk?

By the contracting out clauses it leaves the schools which may avail themselves of those clauses at the mercy of the local authority, to be, as in many cases and in many localities will certainly be the case, gradually starved out of existence. These clauses may help some Church schools, in particular localities they may save, as I hope they may, the Roman Catholic schools in towns, but they do nothing for the Church of England, which is obviously and directly attacked by the Bill. It is a Bill which is good neither for Religion nor Education, and it is one which, if carried, must provoke strife and unpromising resistance in nearly every parish in England.

HALIFAX.

February 25.

RESISTANCE TO MR. McKENNA'S BILL

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. McKenna's speech this afternoon has made it abundantly clear that his Bill will include the most reactionary educational proposals ever put forward in this country, involving far worse conditions than those which prevailed in the days of "intolerable strain" prior to 1902.

(1) Cowper-Templeism is to be established and endowed as the new national religion, at the cost of those who have the strongest conscientious objections. Before 1902 the Cowper-Temple rate was levied only in localities which had chosen to place themselves under that liability. In many areas the friends of voluntary schools were able to prevent the formation of school boards, and to avoid this unjust imposition. Under Mr. McKenna's Bill the Education Rate will continue to be universal in accordance with the 1902 Act, but Undenominationalism is the only religion which for the future is to be paid for out of that rate. This is a monstrous injustice to which Churchmen should steadfastly refuse to submit.

(2) Denominational education is to be placed in an inferior position, and starved and fined out of existence as speedily as possible. Those who desire to have their children brought up in their own faith must not only provide and maintain school premises at their own charges in addition to paying the education rate, but must also forego their share of that rate in their own schools, and make up the deficiency out of their own pockets. The cost of education has gone up by leaps and bounds since 1902, and for the vast majority of Church schools this provision is nothing less than a sentence of immediate extinction. Those bodies of managers who can afford the luxury of "contracting out" should feel bound in honour to stand by their brethren in less fortunate circumstances who would be unable to carry on their schools for a single day without their share of the rate to which all contribute.

(3) Confiscation of the most bare-faced character is to be a leading feature of this atrocious Bill. In all single-school areas, where the Church school is the only school, it is to be transferred to the local authority. Where Church schools are held by an educational trust they will without doubt be confiscated under the powers transferred from the Charity Commissioners to the Board of Education.

For these and other reasons it is necessary that uncompromising resistance in every shape and form should be organised without delay. As in the past, the Church Schools' Emergency League is ready to undertake a share in this work so far as its finances permit. This will be a soldiers' battle, and there is no lack of ardent forces ready to take the field. The "sinews of war" are the one crying need, and I beg your kind permission to appeal to your readers for help in the earliest issue of your valuable paper. Contributions to the "Campaign Fund" may be sent to Mr. G. Lawder-Eaton, Church House, Westminster, for work in London and the South, and for the North and our general funds to myself. Managers of all schools, especially of those in single-school areas, are urgently invited to join the League.

T. E. CLEWORTH,
Hon. General Secretary,
Church Schools' Emergency League.

February 24.

FRANKLY IDIOTIC?

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In the current number of THE ACADEMY the following lines of Dr. Fairbairn's are quoted as being "quite frankly idiotic":

As to drink and tobacco, I know neither. He who does his work in the strength of either fails to do it well. Work done by the strength of wine, or the soothing influence of the pipe, is certain to be ill-done.

Why are these lines "quite frankly idiotic"? If read with a charitable toleration for their method of expression they appear to me, in spirit and in main contention, quite frankly true, and to embody the gist of the teaching of the wisest men of all time. Dr. Fairbairn obviously means alcoholic liquor when he says "wine." It is not so obvious that the Psalmist—when he praises wine as making glad the heart of man—means anything more than the juice of the vine—the "hanging wine"—which, indeed, in his day, was often bought and sold in an inspissated form (as we buy and sell honey), and, in conjunction with corn and oil, represented the larger part of the material blessings of the land.

Your reviewer mentions the wine of Cana and the wine of the Sacrament; there is no proof that in either case the wine used was alcoholic.

The wine that was to be drunk with Christ in Heaven was to be "new"—the freshly-expressed juice of the True Vine. One of the dying acts of Christ was the refusal of strong wine in order that the crucial part of His great work might be gone through, not with the aid of drugs, but with faculties thoroughly purged by prayer and fasting according to His own previously delivered prescription for the work of genius.

Does your reviewer seriously contend that "the whole of ancient literature" was the product of men stimulated by alcohol, and likewise "ninety-nine hundredths of modern literature"? I think it would not be difficult to make up a great deal more than that hundredth from the work of men who relied not at all upon alcohol as a source of literary strength; and as for the matter of Hobbes, Carlyle, and Tennyson, and tobacco, is there not a liability towards mistaking post for propter hoc?

I wonder how much better the lives and work of these would have been without the drug?

February 24.

CALEB PORTER.

[Dr. Fairbairn's dicta, quoted by us in "Life and Letters," not in a review, are "frankly idiotic" because they are frankly at variance with the truth. To take one proposition—that work of any kind done by a man who smokes is certain to be ill-done—we have (to use logical language) proved it is contradictory by the instances of Hobbes, Tennyson, and Carlyle, who were smokers and did admirable work. Therefore, "some work done under the soothing influence of the pipe is not ill-done." Further, it is certain that practically the whole of ancient literature, of ancient art of all sorts, was done by men who drank alcohol. Certain ascetic systems apart, teetotalism is a modern product: we cannot, for the moment, recall any of its recent triumphs in fine literature or fine art. Hence, we repeat, Dr. Fairbairn's propositions are frankly untruthful and frankly idiotic. Mr. Porter's speculation as to how much better the "Morte d'Arthur" would have been if Tennyson had not been a smoker is not relevant to the question. Dr. Fairbairn did not say that, though a smoker might do good work, he would do better work if he were a non-smoker; he said that the work of a smoker was certain to be ill-done. Mr. Porter, therefore, is guilty, certainly of ignoratio elenchi, and probably of futile speculation.

We were not aware that—excepting possibly in teetotal "literature"—it had ever been held that when wine is mentioned in the Bible, the unfermented juice of the grape is to be understood. The product in question may be charming, but one fails to see how it could "gladden" the human heart. It was certainly not this non-alcoholic beverage that was in the mind of the Psalmist who wrote of calix meus inebrians; and the Christ would hardly have been reproached by the Puritans of the time as a wine-bibber if the wine in question were the grape-soup of Mr. Porter's fancy. As for the Eucharist: the Church in East and West has always used true wine—that is, alcoholic wine. A marriage is an occasion of gaiety; the "hanging wine" that Mr. Porter mentions would be as unsuitable to the Feast at Cana as a jar of currant jelly. As for the Crucifixion: one can hardly imagine even one of the martyrs using alcohol as an anæsthetic before or during the act of martyrdom.—Ed.]

"THE NOBLE ARMY OF MARTYRS"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your comment on "M.A. (Cantab's)" letter dealt very faithfully with him (to use a suitably Protestant phrase), and leaves little unsaid which deserves saying. May I, however, plead for a little space in which to advance one or two observations of which his letter is the real author?

And my first is that the tendency to quote the reference for each quotation from Scripture is an evidence of the peculiar banality of the Protestant mind. It cannot apparently leave to the words themselves the task of achieving their own end and purpose. There must be a reference so that one's own accuracy or precision of statement may be verified by those foolish enough to notice the chapter and verse which follow almost automatically.

I suppose it springs from the suspicion with which they regard Catholics. Catholics, it is well known, have an hereditary right to all lying, deceit, and dishonesty. And the only way to demonstrate the essential difference between the scrupulous Protestants and the turpitude of their opponents is to labour through the Bible—moistening one's fingers in elegant fashion the while—chasing a train of thought from Genesis to Malachi, if need be, and backwards again, if it be necessary, until the wretched listeners wonder whether it may not be really a game of hide and seek, or finger exercise.

But to revert to this delightful explosion of "M.A. (Cantab's)"—so reminiscent of a school of thought dying, if not dead—I wonder whether the writer has ever heard of Newman's Lectures on the position of Catholics? If he is acquainted with them (and that were a paradox too great to be borne) doubtless he will remember the Lecture on the Logical inconsistency of Protestants and its ghastly tale of dismemberment and torture. And with that before him, if he again appeals to the equally lamentable Marian persecution—well, he is beyond hope. As I understand the matter, it is a question rather of degree than of kind. The principle operated with unwelcome equality as each contending party attained means to express their convictions by physical force. And if the charming Protestants, whose tone and temper of mind is so sweetly set forth in Milton's line "Avenge, Oh! Lord, Thy slaughtered Saints" (and I can imagine "M.A. (Cantab's)" declaiming it before a bench and pulpit gathering, laying stress and accent quite naturally on the first word), if, I say, they ill-used so many as one Catholic their contentions may be dismissed lightly and easily as the effervescence of fanatical brains.

Before I close, may I ask whether "M.A. (Cantab)" has ever considered that persecution is not restricted to the infliction of bodily suffering and injury. Has he ever thought of the lot of Roman Catholics prior to the Act of Emancipation, or their treatment in Ireland during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries? And, again, does he know anything of the Roman Church's efforts to abolish slavery in Europe? Surely if he desires to draw up a Persecution Balance Sheet it would be just as well to include the liabilities of these ill-used Protestants, as well as their seemingly interminable assets. At any rate, it would be good book-keeping, despite its probable modification of his present opinions in this year of Grace and New Theology, 1908.

February 22.

FRANK V. WEST.

P.S.—Is there not a computation that the number of witches who found death at the hands of the Protestants and in Non-Inquisition countries is about 30,000?

"ALSO SPRACH CAMPBELL"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Machen, in his article, "Also Sprach Campbell," in THE ACADEMY for February 15th, has the words, "If the painting and the poem are but approximations—grey roses for scarlet roses, as Henry Harland said so well."

"Approximations," not to each other, as Mr. Machen's slightly hurried sentence might lead the reader to think, but to the perfect architectural plan flung out by the artist in one clear moment; a plan that fades or dissolves before he can build it into one of our realities. But the words are not Henry Harland's. They are quoted, by way of motto, upon the title-page of Harland's beautiful book of stories, "Grey Roses"—his graceful way of apologising for that which needed no apology:

Yes, the conception was a rose, but the achievement is a rose grown grey.—PARASCHKINE.

If you please, who was Paraschkine? What was his nationality, his language, his epoch? If there is anything of his to be had in English one would be glad to know, for much trouble would be well expended upon the finding of one other phrase so perfect.

S. H.

[We have always been under the impression that "Paraschkine" was a myth, and that the phrase in question was invented by Harland.—ED.]

COCKNEY RHYMES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I suggest that it is quite impossible to discuss pronunciations accurately without the use of phonetic symbols? The use of these is undesirable for general readers, and I am therefore of opinion that this discussion will lead to few definite results, and is practically valueless. All that we shall gain will be a proof that opinions differ, which we knew before.

I write once more solely because I read that "Professor Skeat will probably tell us that over and cover were once perfect rhymes." I have already explained that they never were so, and in all probability never will be.

Our spelling is due to Anglo-French scribes, who tried to find symbols for both Old English and Norman sounds. But they had to use the (originally) short "o" for two sounds; as I have shown.

At p. 504 of my "Principles of English Etymology," First Series, I explain that the Anglo-Saxon short "o" has been lengthened in many cases, and now represents the sound of "o" in boat. I give as examples the Anglo-Saxon bodian, brocen, smocian, stolen, open, ofer, etc., now pronounced as bode, broken, smoke, stolen, open, over, etc.

At p. 101 of "Principles of English Etymology," Second Series, I observe that "it is very seldom that the Anglo-French 'o,' denoting short 'u' (as in full), has accurately preserved its sounds." And I add that it now generally has the sound of "u" in cut, as cut is sounded in London. Amongst the examples are coverer, to cover; covert, covert; governer, to govern, etc.

No one ought to speculate as to what the old sounds were like; for we have Dr. Ellis and Dr. Sweet to tell us, who have reduced speculations to certainties. As far as I am myself concerned, it seems a little hard that I should be supposed to say what I have never said. It would be merely courteous to refer to my books beforehand. I have made mistakes, no doubt; but I will gladly recant them when they are pointed out.

WALTER W. SKEAT.

CHARLES I.—HIS NAME

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The answer to the question which I venture to propound to your readers may be a matter of common knowledge, but I could not obtain either reliable information or reasonable conjecture from a party of intelligent and well-informed people to whom I referred the point a few days ago.

The question is—How did King Charles I. get the name of Charles? What reason was there, or what reason can be suggested, for its selection by James I.? I should be very glad to discover what associations there were with the name in this case. I do not imagine that before that date it was at all a common name in England or Scotland.

February 21.

B.

"HAO CH'UI CHUAN"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have no knowledge of the book Mr. Robinson names, but it seems to me superficially very possible that he has a translation of the "Hao Ch'ui Chuan," which is variously translated as "The Pleasing Union," or "The Fortunate History." Anyway, I think he may assume the final words of the Chinese title should be Chuan not Chooan.

Wylie's "Notes on Chinese Literature" might afford authoritative information; unfortunately I have no copy near me.

The "Hao Ch'ui Chuan" has been many times translated.

J. R. C.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—With reference to Mr. Perry Robinson's enquiry, in your issue of February 22nd, as to a book entitled "Hau Kiou Chooan, or the Pleasing History," it will interest him to know that this is the first published work of that Thomas Percy to whom we owe "The Reliques of Ancient English Poetry." The book was a translation by Percy from a Portuguese MS. found among the papers of a Cantonese merchant named Wilkinson. Percy appears to have translated only the fourth volume, and the whole thing, which is a genuine Chinese story, must have been of considerable length. The book appeared in 1761, and Percy followed it up with "Miscellaneous Pieces relating to the Chinese" in 1762. The first of Goldsmith's Chinese letters appeared early in 1760, and there was evidently some interest in things Chinese about that time. It is recorded that Percy received £50 for the "Hau Kiou Chooan."

T. H. LANGFORD.

"REBECCA; OR, THE VICTIM OF DUPLICITY: A NOVEL"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—On p. 3 of the Times of February 24th, 1908, there is an extract "From the Times of 1808." It ends thus:—

"In a few days will be published, in 3 vols., price 12s., sewed,

'REBECCA; or, the Victim of Duplicity: A Novel.'

Printing for Lackington, Allen and Co., Finsbury Square; who have now for sale a Circulating Library, comprising 600 vols., of novels and romances, price only 35s."

In the Bibliothèque de la Sorbonne, at Paris, there are the first two volumes of this interesting book, published at Uttoxeter. It is believed to have been the work of Ann Catherine (or Catharine) Holbrook, who, according to The Dictionary of National Biography, died in the London district, in 1837. It was reviewed by Mr. Joseph Moser in The European Magazine and London Review, 1808. During the last three years enquiries have been made by two well-known authors, Mr. Hubert Smith Stainer, of Leamington Spa, and Mr. Cecil Clarke, of Hampstead, and by myself, with the hope of finding also the third volume, and other copies of the others. Moser gives us an outline of the plot of the third volume. Will some readers of THE ACADEMY be kind enough to say where a copy of it is to be seen?

EDWARD S. DODGSON.

February 24.

"A POCKETFUL OF SIXPENCES"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I must confess that my interest in the reprints of Mr. Russell's articles in the Manchester Guardian did not carry me as far as the "Postscript." Announcements of this sort are, I fancy, more usually found at the beginning of a volume, and all I found there was a dedication and a couple of quotations. The former of these, as your readers will remember (on the title-page, midway between the names of author and publisher), I particularly noted—"He was not an intellectual Cæsus, but his pockets were full of sixpences."

YOUR REVIEWER.

(Our list of Books Received has been unavoidably held over.)

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

REDDRINK THEWHITEBLUE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST & AFTER DINNER.

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

Nervous Disorders

A deficiency of the phosphates causes a lowering of nervous tone, indicated by exhaustion, restlessness, headache or insomnia.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate
(Non-Alcoholic)

supplies the nerve cells with health-giving life force, restores strength and induces restful sleep without the use of dangerous drugs.

An Ideal Tonic in Nervous Diseases

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 154 Old Street, London, E. C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA

THE SPHERE.
6d. Weekly.
A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received.
SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.
Office: Great New Street, E.C.
The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.
POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—
The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.
Fullest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

Ready, Monday, March 2nd,
"THE BOOK MONTHLY" for March, 6d. net.
CONTENTS.
PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR
The Pen and the Book; fresh, crisp paragraphs about both; also a variety of Illustrations.
AN UNLISTED LEGION
Books that have Never Been Written—and Others.
WHO BUY REPRINTS?
Not the Middle Classes, but the Working Man—By John Cawker.
"AS WE WERE SAYING"—I"
Sir Henry Drummond Wolff's Stories of Literary Men.
A LONDON LETTER
Mr. Meredith at Home on his Eightieth Birthday—By the Editor.
LIGHT AND LEADING
New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.
THE GENERAL READER
Snap-Shot Reviews of the Best and Best-Selling Books.
NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY
Particulars of Interesting Volumes likely to be Published this Month.
BOOKS OF THE MONTH
A Classified Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions, and Reprints of February
OUR EXCHANGE AND MART of Books Wanted and For Sale.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

Sir Hubert Von Herkomer
AND
PUBLIC OPINION

Sir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey to the Editor of "Public Opinion," says, on February 11th, 1908:—
Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper, PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which would be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged, and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly. From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.
Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is, after all, not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.
I wish you, with all my heart, continuous success with your paper.
Yours very truly,
(Signed) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

PUBLIC OPINION A WEEKLY REVIEW of CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY ::
Every Friday Twopence
EDITED BY PERCY L. PARKER
The Purpose of PUBLIC OPINION is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political, and social progress.
PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent Post Free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to—
PUBLIC OPINION, 30 & 31 Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.
SPECIMENS FREE ON APPLICATION

THE ACADEMY
A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART.
PRICE THREEPENCE.
ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION:
Inland, 15s. post free, Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free.

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, 95 FETTER LANE, E.C.
To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____ months. I enclose remittance value _____
Name _____
Description _____
Address _____

THE EVERSLEY SERIES.

Globe 8vo, cloth 4s. net per Volume.

- Matthew Arnold's Works. 8 vols.
Poems. 3 vols.
Essays in Criticism. First Series.
Essays in Criticism. Second Series.
American Discourses.
Letters, 1848-1888. Collected and Arranged by G. W. E. RUSSELL. 2 vols.
- A Memoir of Jane Austen. By her Nephew, J. E. AUSTEN LEIGH. To which is added "Lady Susan," and Fragments of two other Unfinished Tales by Miss AUSTEN.
- The Eversley Bible. Arranged in paragraphs, with an Introduction by J. W. MACKAIL, M.A.
Vol. II. Deuteronomy—2 Samuel.
Vol. III. 1 Kings—Esther.
Vol. V. Isaiah—Lamentations.
Vol. VII. Matthew John.
Vol. IV. Job—Song of Solomon.
Vol. VI. Ezekiel—Malachi.
Vol. VIII. Acts—Revelation.
. The Text is that of the Authorized Version.
- Essays by George Brimley. Third Edition.
- Calderon. Eight Dramas of Calderon freely translated. By EDWARD FITZGERALD
- Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. Edited by A. W. POLLARD. 2 vols.
- Dean Church's Miscellaneous Writings. Collected Edition. 9 vols.
Miscellaneous Essays. | Dante, and other Essays.
St. Anselm. | Bacon. | Spencer.
The Oxford Movement. Twelve Years, 1833-1845.
The Beginning of the Middle Ages. (Included in this series by permission of Messrs. Longmans and Co.)
Occasional Papers. Selected from The Guardian, The Times and The Saturday Review, 1846-1890. 2 vols.
- Life and Letters of Dean Church. Edited by his Daughter, MARY C. CHURCH.
- Lectures and Essays by the late W. K. Clifford, F.R.S. Edited by the late Sir LESLIE STEPHEN and Sir FREDERICK POLLOCK. Third Edition. In 2 vols.
- Emerson's Collected Works. 6 vols. With introduction by JOHN MORLEY, M.P.
Miscellanies. | Essays. | Poems.
English Traits and Representative Men.
The Conduct of Life, and Society and Solitude.
Letters and Social Aims.
- Letters of Edward FitzGerald. Edited by W. ALDIS WRIGHT. 2 vols. New Edition.
- Letters of Edward FitzGerald to Fanny Kemble, 1871-1883. Edited by W. A. WRIGHT.
- More Letters of Edward FitzGerald. Edited by W. ALDIS WRIGHT.
- Pausanias and other Greek Sketches. By J. G. FRAZER, D.C.L.
- Goethe's Maxims and Reflections. Translated, with Introductions, by T. BAILEY SAUNDERS.
. The Scientific and Artistic Maxims were Selected by Professor Huxley and Lord Leighton respectively.
- Thomas Gray's Collected Works in Prose and Verse. Edited by EDMUND GOSSE. 4 vols.
Poems, Journals and Essays.
Letters. 2 vols.
Notes on Aristophanes and Plato.
- J. R. Green's Works. 16 vols.
History of the English People. 8 vols.
The Making of England. 2 vols.
The Conquest of England. 2 vols.
Stray Studies from England and Italy: Oxford Studies.
Historical Studies.
Stray Studies. Second Series.
- Guesses at Truth. By TWO BROTHERS.
- Earthwork Out of Tuscany. Being Impressions and Translations of MAURICE HEWLETT, Author of "The Forest Lovers." Third Edition. Revised.
- R. H. Hutten's Collected Essays. 7 vols.
Literary Essays.
Theological Essays.
Essays on Some of the Modern Guides of English Thought in Matters of Faith.
Criticism on Contemporary Thought and Thinkers. 2 vols.
Aspects of Religious and Scientific Thought. Edited by his Niece, ELIZABETH M. ROSCOE.
Brief Literary Criticism. Edited by his Niece, ELIZABETH M. ROSCOE.
- The Choice of Books, and other Literary Pieces. By FREDERIC HARRISON.
- The Meaning of History, and other Historical Pieces. By FREDERIC HARRISON.
- Poems of Thomas Hood. Edited, with Prefatory Memoir, by the late Canon AINGER. In 2 vols.
Vol. I. Serious Poems.
Vol. II. Poems of Wit and Humour.
With Vignettes and Portraits.
- Thomas Henry Huxley's Collected Works. 12 vols.
Method and Results. | Darwiniana.
Science and Education.
Science and Hebrew Tradition.
Science and Christian Tradition.
Hume. With Helps to the Study of Berkeley.
Man's Place in Nature, and other Anthropological Essays.
Discourses: Biological and Geological.
Evolution and Ethics, and other Essays.
Life and Letters. 3 vols.
- French Poets and Novelists. By HENRY JAMES.
- Partial Portraits. By HENRY JAMES.
- Modern Greece. Two Lectures delivered before the Philosophical Institution of Edinburgh, with Papers on "The Progress of Greece" and "Byron in Greece." By Sir RICHARD C. JEBB, Litt.D., D.C.L., LL.D. Second Edition.
- Letters of John Keats to his Family and Friends. Edited by SIDNEY COLVIN.
- Epic and Romance. By Prof. W. P. KER.
- Charles Kingsley's Novels and Poems. 13 vols.
Westward Ho! 2 vols. | Yeast. 1 vol.
Aton Locke. 2 vols. | Hypatia. 2 vols.
Two Years Ago. 2 vols. | Poems. 2 vols.
Hereward the Wake. 2 vols.
- Charles Lamb's Collected Works. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by the late Rev. Canon AINGER, M.A. 6 vols.
The Essays of Elia.
Poems, Plays, and Miscellaneous Essays.
Mrs. Leicester's School, and other Writings.
Tales from Shakespeare. By CHARLES and MARY LAMB.
The Letters of Charles Lamb. Newly arranged, with additions, 1904. 2 vol.
- Life of Charles Lamb. By the late Canon AINGER, M.A.
- Historical Essays. By the late J. B. LIGHTFOOT, D.D., D.C.L., LL.D.
- The Poetical Works of John Milton. Edited, with Memoir, Introduction, and Notes by DAVID MASSON, M.A., LL.D. 3 vols.
- John Morley's Collected Works. 14 vols.
Voltaire. 1 vol.
Diderot and the Encyclopédistes. 2 vols.
On Compromise. 1 vol.
Burke. 1 vol.
Oliver Cromwell. 1 vol.
Rousseau. 2 vols.
Miscellanies. 3 vols.
Studies in Literature. 1 vol.
The Life of Richard Cobden. 2 vols.
- Science and a Future Life, and other Essays. By F. W. H. MYERS, M.A.
- Classical Essays. By F. W. H. MYERS.
- Modern Essays. By F. W. H. MYERS.
- Records of Tennyson, Ruskin and Browning. By ANNE THACKERAY RITCHIE.
- Works by Sir John R. Seeley, Litt.D. 5 vols.
The Expansion of England. Two Courses of Lectures.
Lectures and Essays.
Ecce Homo. | Natural Religion.
Introduction to Political Science. Two Series of Lectures.
- The Works of Shakespeare. With short Introduction and Footnotes by Professor C. H. HERFORD. In 10 vols.
. The Plays may also be had in separate volumes, cloth, 1s. each; roan, gilt tops, 2s. each.
- Works by James Smetham. 2 vols.
Letters. With an Introductory Memoir. Edited by SARAH SMETHAM and WILLIAM DAVIES. With a Portrait.
Literary Works. Edited by WILLIAM DAVIES.
- The Works of Alfred, Lord Tennyson. Annotated by the Author. Edited by HALLAM LORD TENNYSON. 9 vols.
Vol. I. Poems. | Vol. II. Poems.
Vol. III. Enoch Arden: In Memoriam.
Vol. IV. The Princess: Maud.
Others to follow.
- Selections from the Writings of Thoreau.
- Essays in the History of Religious Thought in the West. By BROOKE FOSS WESTCOTT, D.D., D.C.L., Lord Bishop of Durham.
- The Works of Wordsworth. Edited by Professor KNIGHT. In 12 vols. Each volume contains a Portrait and Vignette etched by H. MANESSÉ.
Poetical Works. 8 vols.
Prose Works. 2 vols.
Journals of Dorothy Wordsworth. 2 vols.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Printed for the Proprietors, THE WILSFORD PRESS, LTD., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C., by W. H. SMITH & SON, 55 Fetter Lane, London, and Published by H. E. MORGAN, at 95 Fetter Lane, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1870

MARCH 7, 1908

PRICE THREEPENCE

ABERDEEN ART GALLERY.

The ART GALLERY COMMITTEE are prepared to receive applications for the APPOINTMENT OF DIRECTOR AND CURATOR of the Art Gallery and Industrial Museum. Salary, £300 per annum. The Curator will have to devote the whole of his time to the duties of the office and must be a competent organiser of Picture and Arts Exhibitions, and capable of lecturing upon Art subjects.

Applications, stating age, qualifications and previous experience, and accompanied by testimonials, to be lodged with the Town Clerk on or before the 14th proximo.

W. GORDON, Town Clerk.

Town House, Aberdeen,
22nd February, 1908.

THE MOSHER BOOKS

THE NEW CATALOGUE FOR 1908 is now ready, and will be sent free on request to booklovers anywhere that can be reached by mail. This Catalogue, like those that preceded it, is not made up of old and hackneyed quotations concerning books. You are not wearied by "a jollie good book" jingle and that sort of thing, but you are treated to some very genuine prose and verse not seen in every cut and decidedly dried anthology.

THOMAS B. MOSHER, PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

JUST PUBLISHED. 8vo, boards, 1s. net.

THE SLING.

Remarks in connection with Lectures delivered in the Royal Institution, May, 1905, to June, 1907.

By WM. LEIGHTON JORDAN.

London: Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co., Ltd.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds of Typewriting carefully done at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

TYPEWRITING, 8d. per Thousand, including paper and postage. MSS. neatly and clearly typed. Satisfaction guaranteed.—Miss DREW, 84 Park Row, Bristol.

NOTICE.

All communications to the Editor should be addressed to 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

All business communications must be sent to The Manager of "The Academy," 95 Fetter Lane, E.C.

Books for Sale

HARMSWORTH'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF UNIVERSAL KNOWLEDGE, New and Revised Edition, 10 vols., cloth, gilt tops. Published at £2. 16s. net. 21s.—W. E. GOULDEN, Bookseller, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

5 WORKS BY CANON RAWNSLEY:—Ruskin and the Lakes; A Rambler's Notebook at the Lakes; Life and Nature at the Lakes; Lake Country Sketches; Memories of the Tennysons. Published at 3s. 6d. net, for 1s. 6d.; new.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

BOOKS AT ONE-THIRD COST.—Thousands of the Best Books at from 25 to 80 per cent. below the original prices. Largest and best Stock of Secondhand and New Remainder Books in the World. Write for our January Catalogue.—W. H. SMITH & SON, Library Department, 186 Strand, London, W.C.

BOOKS.—ALL OUT-OF-PRINT and RARE BOOKS on any subject SUPPLIED. The most expert Bookfinder extant. Please state wants and ask for CATALOGUE. I make a special feature of exchanging any Saleable Books for others selected from my various Lists. Special List of 2,000 Books I particularly want post free.—EDW. BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16 John Bright Street, Birmingham. Oscar Wilde's Poems, 21s., for 10s. 6d.; Ballad of Reading Gaol, 5s. Who's Who, 2 vols. 1907, 11s. net, for 5s.

THE FAUNA OF BRITISH INDIA, including Ceylon and Burma. Published under the authority of the Secretary of State for India in Council. Medium 8vo, with two coloured plates and numerous illustrations. COLEOPTERA (CHRYSOSELIDÆ), Vol. I., price £1.

London: Taylor & Francis, Red Lion Court, Fleet Street. Calcutta and Simla: Thacker, Spink & Co. Bombay: Thacker & Co., Ltd. Burma: Myles Standish & Co., Rangoon. Berlin: Friedlander & Sohn, Carlstrasse, 11.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by Instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical Advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley, Hertfordshire) for aged Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

FIFTH. A Furnished House in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

Books, etc., Wanted

THE CAMBRIDGE LITERARY AGENCY, which is placing Novels, Short Stories, Articles, and Poems with over 100 (one hundred) Publishers and Periodicals, sold, on December 31, 12 Short Stories and a Serial by UNKNOWN WRITERS. Hundreds of unique testimonials. All MSS. submitted by GEORGE G. MAGNUS, 115 Strand, London.

WILL PURCHASE AT ANY TIME. ILLUMINATED MANUSCRIPTS, from the earliest times till the beginning of the XVth Century; Incunabula and other Early Printed Books; Illustrated Books, Prints, from the XVth and the beginning of the XVIIth Century. Rare Old Books and Prints.—JACQUES ROSENTHAL, Munich, Bavaria. 10, Karlstr. 10.

QUEEN SQUARE CLUB.

A social club for men and women interested in politics, literature or art. Lectures, entertainments, chess and bridge. An exquisite Queen Anne club-house, close to the British Museum, and Russell Square Station. Inexpensive lunch and dinner. Subscription two guineas.—Apply Secretary, 9 Queen Square, Bloomsbury.

Cosmopolitanism

as illustrated in

The Historians' History of the World

Mr. George Meredith was quoted by a writer to the "Daily Mail" a few days ago as voicing the following very wholesome sentiments :—

"Let us try to find what good we can in our neighbour nations. Let us remember the splendid literature of France, the scientific temper of the Germans, the inventive genius of the United States. The way to draw all nations together in unity is to dwell upon the services that each has rendered to mankind."

We quote these words of "the greatest living writer of English prose," because they give a very clear exposition of one of the points of view from which the editors of The Historians' History of the World regarded the task of producing a narrative that should adequately present the story of the progress of all Nations. Such impartiality of outlook as Mr. Meredith suggests, they all along attempted to maintain. It is this spirit that we have more than once characterized as cosmopolitanism of editorial view.

One or two critics have seemed to be puzzled as to the exact sense in which this word "cosmopolitanism" was used in connection with the editorship of The Historians' History. What one or two have expressed, a good many others may have felt. Therefore perhaps it may be worth while to offer a few words of precise explication, both as to the meaning of the term in its application to The Historians' History and as to the method by which so-called cosmopolitanism of editorial view was attained.

In the first instance it must be recalled that there are two quite different points of view from which the history of any particular nation may be approached. One of these may be called the sympathetic, the other the antipathetic view. The editors of The Historians' History laid it down as an axiom that it is impossible to write a truly great history of a great people from the antipathetic standpoint—a pronouncement obviously in harmony with Mr. Meredith's views as above quoted.

Acting on this theory, the editors of The Historians' History have sought always to treat the history of every nation with the utmost sympathy consistent with a critical analysis of that history.

In their view, this was to be accomplished to the fullest practicable extent only by drawing largely upon the narratives of writers who were themselves of the nation to be described, or of such aliens as had demonstrated the most sympathetic and penetrating appreciation of the true spirit of that nation.

Interpreted in set terms, this means that for the history of France, as presented in The Historians' History of the World, narratives written by Frenchmen were translated and incorporated; for the history of Germany, German sources were constantly sought out; for the history of Russia, Russian sources, and so on. Translations were made from the works of more than one hundred French writers for the volumes on French history; of many scores of German writers for the volumes on German history; of more than a score of Russian writers for the volume on Russian history.

It must be clearly understood, however, that this implies something very different indeed from the translation of any single French or German or Russian history and its incorporation unmodified in The Historians' History. Such a course as that would have produced a result radically different from the one actually achieved. It would imply the retention of defects that would more than counterbalance the excellencies. We should have history not merely sympathetic but over-sympathetic, expressing national egoism in a way utterly destructive of that impartiality which it was a chief object of the editors of The Historians' History to maintain. There is no work in French on the history of France, no work in German on the history of Germany, no work in Russian on the history of Russia that could be commended unreservedly to the English reader. The selective work of the impartial critic must be brought to bear upon each national history before a proper perspective, from the international standpoint, can be secured.

INQUIRY FORM. Date.....

The Times (Book Club),

380 Oxford Street, London, W.

Please send me, gratis and post free, the Descriptive Booklet of The Historians' History of the World, with specimen pages, particulars of prices in various bindings, and the convenient terms of payment.

Name.....

(Please write clearly.)

A 2

Address

THE FREE BOOKLET

We have no space, even were it desirable, to extend the argument here. But a full account of The History is given, together with sample pages and illustrations, in a Descriptive Booklet, which will be sent gratis and post free on application. This Booklet explains the scope and plan of The Historians' History of the World—25 volumes covering the entire history of the world, from the earliest times to the present, in a continuous and fascinating narrative. It explains also the low price at which The History is now offered, and the easy terms of payment—amounting to only 4d. per day—on which it may be secured. The coupon enables you to obtain the Booklet gratis and post free.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
Life and Letters	527	The Booklovers' Mecca	536
The Vision	529	First Aid to Listeners	537
The Poet	529	Tantane Animis Coelestibus Iræ	538
Literature :		The Library Table	539
Crime, Great and Little	529	Fiction	540
New Mediaeval Library	531	Drama :
Arabia's Desert Ranger	531	"A Midsummer Night's Dream"	542
Mémor of Lord Wantage, V.C., K.B.C.	533	"The Gates of the Morning" at the Stage Society	542
Lord Cromer's Book: Its Personal Aspect	534	Correspondence	543

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-Class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to The Wilsford Press, Ltd., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The publishing offices of THE ACADEMY are at 95 Fetter Lane, E.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

MR. ARTHUR SYMONS is no doubt a gentleman of great ability; some of his literary criticism reaches a high level, and in his last published volume of poems there is some really fine poetry, the first, in our opinion, that he has so far produced. But Mr. Symons has his limitations, and we confess that his dissertations on music are apt to be somewhat irritating. A few weeks ago he was referring, in the Saturday Review, to the influence of Handel on English music. He described it as "heavy," and though we are unable to recall his exact words, we remember that he expressed the opinion that Handel's influence had a fatal effect on English music, and that he (Mr. Arthur Symons) had a rather poor opinion of Handel. The real truth is, surely, that what little good music has been written in England since Handel's day owes most of the excellence it possesses to Handel's influence. It is characteristic of this sort of criticism to call Handel "heavy." Why heavy? We suppose because Mr. Symons associates him with the singing of choruses by massed choirs. But a chorus does not become "heavy" because it is sung by a great number of voices. We fail to see anything "heavy" in, say, the overture to "Samson," or the superb soprano solo, "Let the bright Seraphim," from the same noble work, and if Mr. Symons finds "Acis and Galatea" and the organ concertos heavy, we are sorry for him.

It is instructive to compare the utterances of Mr. Symons and other gifted modern critics with the recorded saying of Beethoven on the same subject. Seigfried, in his "Beethoven Studies," gives the following opinion, as expressed to him by the great composer:

Handel is the unequalled master of all masters. Go to him and learn how with small means to produce great effects. In a letter from an English visitor in Vienna to a friend in London, given in the appendix to Moscheles' translation of Schindler's "Life of Beethoven," we read:

In the whole course of the table talk there was nothing so interesting as what he (Beethoven) said about Handel. I sat close by him, and heard him assert very distinctly in German, "Handel is the greatest composer that ever lived." I cannot describe to you with what pathos—I am inclined to say with what sublimity of language he spoke of the "Messiah" of this great composer. Every one of us was moved when he said, "I would uncover my head and kneel down on his tomb."

In Weegler and Ries's "Notizen" it is recorded that "Beethoven esteemed Mozart and Handel most of all composers, and next to them Sebastian Bach." To anyone in search of an antidote to the musical criticism of Mr. Arthur Symons and other critics of his school we can heartily recommend "My Thoughts on Music and Musicians," by Mr. H. Heathcote Statham. It is an admirable and most unjustly neglected book. It was published as long ago as 1892 by Messrs. Chapman and Hall.

There is a very amusing passage in Mrs. Gaskell's "Life of Charlotte Brontë." Charlotte, learning French under M. Héger, had to imitate well-known classics, and amongst others her master put before her a French rendering of the Epistle of St. Ignatius to the Romans, which Charlotte seems to have admired. But:

She claimed equal self-devotion and from as high a motive, for some of the missionaries of the English Church sent out to toil and to perish on the poisonous African coast, and wrote as an "imitative" "Lettre d'un Missionnaire, Sierra Leone, Afrique."

The fact is that Charlotte Brontë thought of St. Ignatius, who was a disciple of St. John, and was consecrated a bishop, probably by St. Paul, c. 70, as a Papist. The case is an extreme one, but it illustrates, vividly enough, the old-fashioned Protestant theory that Christianity suffered instant corruption on the completion of the New Testament Canon. Up to the writing of the last line of the Apocalypse the Christian Church was "Protestant"; five minutes afterwards, we are to presume, it had become a hot-bed of Popery and Idolatry. Of course, St. Ignatius should prove rather a difficult case, since he was made a bishop long before the Canon was completed; but one presumes that for Charlotte Brontë and for many other simple souls his error is clear because "he is not in the Bible."

One excuses Charlotte very readily; the Reverend Patrick Brontë did not shine as a theologian, and probably took a great deal more interest in the Duke of Wellington than in the noble army of martyrs. But it is difficult to excuse a person who has placed himself, or has suffered himself to be placed, in the chair of the teacher, when he talks nonsense which is as absurd and unhistorical as Charlotte Brontë's view of St. Ignatius. We have not the pleasure of being acquainted with the name or the fame of Dr. Rendel Harris, the outgoing President of the Free Church Council, but we are instructed by a daily paper that his addresses are "unique," and that his farewell discourse to the assembly combined "scholarship, mysticism, and humour." One presumes that all three qualities are present in the president's remarks with reference to the discoveries at Oxyrhynchus:

We may find some more of this very Gospel or of another of equal date, and then we shall be on our way to write a life of Christ without subtleties. Experience suggests that we are not going to discover an ecclesiastical Christ, but we may be very near to fresh traces of the real Christ.

And one wonders what Dr. Harris means. Does he intend his hearers to understand that the Christ who appears in the Four Gospels cannot be presented without subtleties, but that somewhere in the sands there lies hid a fifth Gospel, entirely opposed to the spirit of the present Canon, and so corrective of their teaching that an entirely new Christ, unknown before to Christendom, will be disclosed to the world? In that case this friend of "simple Bible Teaching" holds that the Bible as it is is not sufficient for instruction, nor, presumably, for salvation. It was only a week or two ago that we noted the strange fatality by which the effusive Bibliolater is made to play the Biblioclast; it is odd enough that the men who are ready to endure anything, as they say, for the Bible and the Bible only are the most open assailants of the authority of Holy Writ. Let us meditate on Dr. Rendel Harris, scholar, mystic, humorist, ex-president of the Free Church Council, who is ready to die (presumably) for simple Bible Teaching, who is quite unable to get a true conception of the Christ by the light of the Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, the Epistles, and the Revelation of St. John the Divine.

And when the missing fifth Gospel has been discovered the real life will be written, without "subtleties." Why, there are subtleties in the Axioms of Euclid, there are subtleties in a chemical reaction, there are subtleties in the simplest old ballad, there are subtleties in the lives of Tom Smith and Jack Robinson. But there are to be no subtleties (or mysteries) in the consideration of the Great Mystery of the World! And after this we are told that the New Gospel will not show us the ecclesiastical Christ, but the real Christ. It is the ecclesiastical Christ, then, that is shown to us by the Apostles and Evangelists, that appears in the works of St. John, St. Mark, and St. Paul? And the real Christ, hidden from the Disciple that Jesus loved, hidden from St. Ignatius and St. Polycarp, from the army of the martyrs from Origen, from St. Augustine, from St. Chrysostom, from St. Clement of Alexandria, from all the host of the saints, from all the Holy Catholic Church, is about to be revealed to Dr. Harris, Dr. Clifford, and Mr. Silas Hocking by means of a gospel which may be discovered at Oxyrhynchus. On the one side the whole Church: St. John the Divine, St. Paul, St. Francis of Assisi, St. Thomas à Kempis; on the other Dr. Harris, Dr. Clifford, and Mr. Silas Hocking. There are occasions on which logic is an impertinence, and the syllogism is otiose.

If we describe Sieneſe tavolette as the decorated upper-covers of thin wood belonging to the account books of the Biccherna (Treasury) and Gabella (Customs) of Siena, from about 1250 to about 1450, we hope that we shall be offering to our readers information which they do not all possess already. Mr. W. A. Pollard writes in The Library, the well-printed quarterly review of which he is co-editor, an interesting and useful note on these tavolette, derived, as he frankly states, from an exhaustive monograph by the Cavaliere Alessandro Lisini, director of the Archivio Civile of Siena, published in 1901, and copiously illustrated. Mr. Pollard's main object is to point out that a large number of spurious tavolette are in the market, and seem to deceive English buyers. From a rather vague recollection of some of these spurious examples, we should have thought they were too pretty and elaborate to be classed as forgeries, of such early work, but were rather innocent imitations, attractive only to tourists as souvenirs of Siena. However, Mr. Pollard's experience is that they are regarded seriously as antiques, and his note gives owners, actual or prospective, broad indications how to distinguish between the true and the false. Full certainty can be attained by comparing the Catalogue of the Palazzo Piccolomini, which possesses a large collection, with the remaining examples enumerated in the Italian monograph. The monograph should be found in all good art libraries, and identification should not be difficult even to those who do not know Italian, since it mainly rests on the dates and proper names, which generally appear as part of the actual decoration.

We are surprised at Mr. Maurice Hewlett's letter to the Times repudiating responsibility concerning the price of a story by him, "The Spanish Jade," recently published by Messrs. Cassell and Co. Since, as Mr. Hewlett states, Messrs. Cassell purchased the copyright, they have a right to charge what they like for copies of the book. We do not approve of a vendor depreciating his wares after he has sold them. A publisher has as much right to consideration in this respect as any other purchaser. A deservedly popular writer such as Mr. Hewlett can be no ingénu in dealing with publishers, and there is no reason to suppose that he accepted from Messrs. Cassell less for his book than he could get elsewhere. Apart from this strong probability, Mr. Hewlett's unfortunate letter would suggest that he repented him of his bargain, and was annoyed that Messrs. Cassell were about to profit by their own perspicacity. The fact that copies of longer works by Mr. Hewlett can be purchased at the same price is surely no criterion. Mr. Hewlett would scarcely wish the excellence of his work tested by a yard measure.

"Dr." Clifford distinguished himself last Tuesday at the meeting of the Free Church Council, by saying that "in his judgment, the Bill (Mr. McKenna's Education Bill) was lavish in its generosity to Romanists and Anglicans," a statement which, according to the Westminster Gazette, was received by the audience with "loud cheers." The idea of a vast body of Non-conformists "loudly cheering" because the Government had been "lavishly generous" to Roman Catholics and Anglicans would be amusing enough were it not a manifestation of a peculiarly cynical and sinister hypocrisy. We do not, however, grudge the political Nonconformists their temporary triumph. It will not be of long duration. It seems pretty safe to say that any chance that Mr. McKenna's outrageous Bill ever had of passing into law has now been effectually knocked on the head, thanks to Mr. Asquith and his Licensing Bill. Generations of children yet unborn will bless the name of Mr. Asquith, and any movement which might be set on foot to present him with a testimonial from Churchmen would have our sincere support and approval, the more so as, by introducing a Bill which has so effectually damaged the Government in the eyes of the country as to render innocuous its attack on the Church, he has, if our judgment is worth anything, committed political suicide.

We do not, as a rule, encourage "Limerick" competitions, but the witty remark made by a certain reverend gentleman in one of the Houses of Convocation at York the other day has almost induced us to offer a prize for one of these rhymes. The gentleman in question (our impression is that it was Dr. Cox) is reported by the Daily Telegraph to have observed, during the course of a discussion on Mr. McKenna's Education Bill, that, after reading its provisions, he had come to the conclusion that it proceeded from the place which rhymes with McKenna. The first line of the Limerick would, of course, be: "There was a young man called McKenna." We invite suggestions for the other lines from some of our more frivolously minded readers.

THE VISION

I COME from lonely downs and silent woods,
 With winter in my heart, a withered world,
 A heavy weight of dark and sorrowful things,
 And all my dreams spread out their rainbow wings,
 And turn again to those bright solitudes
 Where Beauty met me in a thousand moods,
 And all her shining banners were unfurled. . .
 And where I snatched from the sweet hands of Spring
 A crystal cup and drank a mystic wine,
 And walked alone a secret perfumed way,
 And saw the glittering Angels at their play,
 And heard the golden birds of Heaven sing,
 And woke . . . to find white lilies clustering
 And all the emerald wood an empty shrine,
 Fragrant with myrrh and frankincense and spice,
 And echoing yet the flutes of Paradise. . .

OLIVE DOUGLAS.

THE POET

All the winds of the wide air
 Through me blow;
 All the waters of the earth
 Through me flow;
 And the earthbound flowers and trees
 Through me grow;
 From me sprang the winds to birth,
 And the rivers and the seas,
 And the trees and blossoms fair.

 All the star-fires of the night
 In me burn;
 And the caverns of the dark
 In me yearn;
 And the wheels of night and day
 In me turn;
 For of old I lit the spark,
 Cast the shadow from the ray,
 Winged the wheels of time for flight.

 All the sorrows of man's breath
 In me sigh;
 All his passions and his fears
 In me cry;
 And the springs of his last rest
 In me lie;
 I have brought him forth in tears;
 I have borne him at my breast—
 I his life, and I his death!

WILFRID WILSON GIBSON.

LITERATURE

CRIME. GREAT AND LITTLE

Memoirs of M. Claude, Chief of Police under the Second Empire. (London: Archibald Constable and Co., Ltd., 12s. 6d. net.)

The Story of Crime from the Cradle to the Grave.
 By H. L. ADAM. (London: T. Werner Laurie, 10s. 6d. net.)

CRIME is a fascinating subject to the majority of us; "heaven for climate, but hell for company," said John P. Allen, and the records of vice have a habit, so degenerate is the taste of man, of being vastly more interesting than that of virtue; Mr. Jonathan Wild would have been for most of us a more desirable companion at a dinner-party than Captain Hedley Vicars. The title of these two books convey, then, a promise which ensures them at once a measure of popularity, while their subjects make it inevitable that some of the contents must be readable. But this last fact puts considerable responsibility upon the authors, for the most difficult part of their task is done before they begin. They are writing for an audience ready to find the subject-matter acceptable—they occupy the position of a player into whose mouth the dramatist has put such telling words that only thoroughly incompetent rendering can prevent a success for the piece. Is it possible that the memoirs of the Chief of Police during the lurid reign of Napoleon III. can make other than absorbing reading? Can a story of crime, ranging from the cradle to the grave, fail to grip our attention closely? Well, M. Claude's carnet, though stuffed with piquant revelations, and though a decidedly valuable record of important work, seems to lack, somehow, the quality of vividness which an eye-witness's account should always possess. We feel that he has in places, perhaps, exercised an economy in his confidences and a discretion in his judgments with which we could have dispensed gladly, while at other times his natural desire to exhibit intuition and insight has led him to talk more of what he thought than of what he saw. As for Mr. Adam, he does not possess much literary faculty, and having but little to say, with scant power of saying it, he writes much, but it does not mean much.

Mr. Adam, we learn from his naïve preface, set himself some years ago the task of studying crime and prison life in all its phases—"wherever anything was to be learned concerning crime I there prosecuted my enquiries and observed for myself what transpired." The transpirations are disappointing. Mr. Adam has been present in court at the hearing of a certain number of notorious cases, but he has nothing new to tell us about any of them. He has visited certain prisons, but his accounts do not help us to realise in any intimate manner what a convict's plight is like. The accounts of the candid persons, now becoming a large group, who have related their experiences upon release from prison, make Mr. Adam's revelations flat reading; he has penetrated the buildings, he has been able to appreciate their cleanliness and the value of their geographical positions, he has presented Home Office credentials which have enabled him to secure some good photographs; but he says hardly an illuminating word upon the efficiency of our systems of imprisonment. A large number of thoughtful persons believe with Mr. William Tallack, the secretary of the Howard Association, that British prisons are more calculated to exercise a deterrent influence over their inmates than the penal establishments of most other nations, while no one any longer doubts that a totally disproportionate punishment falls upon many luckless prisoners owing to the grave moral wrong that is inflicted upon them under existing conditions. If we reproach Mr. Adam for the dearth of penological principles set out in his book, for his briefest of references to such a subject as the social crime against the vicious that is equally implied in over-severity or over-laxity, he may reply that he should not be blamed for leaving undone what he has made no attempt to do, or he may point in refutation of the stricture to his remarks upon the abolition of capital punishment, or to the reflections in his last chapter, when he "ventures to make a few critical comments on the subject of crime from a general stand-point." But Mr. Adam must remember the title of the book, and words in his preface which pledge him deeply. Why, for example, is it venturesome of him to "make a few critical comments, etc." when he has stated on the title-page that he will tell us the story of crime from the cradle to the grave? Not only should "a few critical comments, etc.," be given us, but we have the right to demand them, and demand them in bulk, and not just a few of them. The truth is, Mr. Adam cannot supply them, and perhaps he began to feel at this late point in his work that he is not properly equipped for his task. That is the whole trouble. The sole fault we have to find with him is that he did not see this from the first, call his book "Round the Prisons with a Camera," and spare us his psychology and sociology. What the late Robert Buchanan, what Mr. Wheatley, the police-court missionary, and what Mr. Frank Barrett, the novelist, remarked to him at different times, together with some conversations held with warders and magistrates, appear to be his authorities, and they prove untrustworthy support for the task he has essayed. Insufficient knowledge of the world betrays him into sweeping statements of this sort:—

There is no type of criminal, but there is a criminal class; A barrister is always a gentleman and a man of honour; Why should solicitors be such a questionable lot? It is only now and again, by the merest accident, that the secret poisoner is brought to justice; Indiscreet courting couples form a fruitful field for police blackmailing . . . a similar kind of extortion goes on in connection with the women of the pavement . . . disreputable members of the force rob helpless drunken men.

These things are always being said by uneducated and ignorant people, but they would not be endorsed by a responsible writer. As a matter of fact, everyone of Mr. Adams's dogmatic statements is arguable, and well-informed opinion would contradict him flatly in most cases. A history of crime is not written in this way, and we recommend Mr. Adam, if a second edition of his book is called for—a perfectly possible occurrence, because of the wide appeal of this subject—to tell more stories of actual crimes, and tell them more fully, to cut out all his deductions from these stories, to correct his proofs much more carefully, and to verify the spelling of all the proper names.

M. Claude, Chief of the Police under the Second Empire, writes of crime from a totally different standpoint, but his book has this in common with that of Mr. Adam, it owes its interest entirely to the sensational stories it contains, and not a whit to the author's reflections on life or morals or politics. M. Claude had not to rely on other people for his material—he knew all the great folk whom he mentions, the accounts of crimes are told as often as not from the standpoint of the man who arrested the criminals, and his outside information came from people like the Emperor Napoleon III., M. Thiers, M. Delessert, M. Lagrange, Madame de Montijo, and various princesses and Government agents, whose names are not always given, but whose high social or diplomatic position can be guessed at from the context. The memoirs, which have been translated by Miss K. P. Wormeley, are a condensation of the first half of M. Claude's diary, which was published some twenty-seven years ago, and their range is from 1830, when the citizen king displaced his Legitimist relative, through the reigns of Louis Philippe and Napoleon III., to the overthrow of the Napoleonic régime after Sedan. What a time! Forty years of plotting and counterplotting; three revolutions, and the prisoners of yesterday the judges of to-day, with all the shocks and transformations in fortune that are thus implied. No wonder that the political and social crimes of such an epoch were lurid in character, and no wonder that M. Claude, Chief of the Police during a large part of the period, has been able to write an interesting book. We have the Napoleonic intrigues described and the preliminaries of the coup d'état, the stories of the Choiseul-Praslin, Troppmann and Jud murders, the stories of the bombs of Orsini and of the Duke of Brunswick's diamonds, and notes upon many other extraordinary or infamous incidents; and we have at the same time some frank exposures of the life led by some of the leading spirits in the conduct of the Second Empire. Here M. Claude is sometimes a little boring. His half-confidences may be diplomatic, and his allusions may—they probably do—mean a great deal more to those who are familiar with the underside of well-known events and persons during the reign of Louis Philippe and Napoleon III., than they can mean to the casual reader, but when the most appalling insinuations and even sinister accusations are directed against anyone, even a usurping Emperor, we ought to have more substantiation of the author's views than sentences beginning, "It is said." M. Claude is proud of his possession of flair, and his own account of his talent does not err on the side of modesty, despite his words of disclaimer:

I have a flair (he says) which, in spite of my temperament, excites my energy, and has rarely deceived me in my hunts for men. A thief or a murderer, whom the Prefecture points out to me, becomes a prey of which I sometimes instantly divine the trail; the faintest indication of his passage endows me often with a species of second-sight. I do not wish to make a parade of my merits; but if, from the faintest indication, the most insignificant fact, I have often established a whole world of proofs and revelations, I owe such merits to a natural gift, a wholly special organisation. I was born a policeman as a greyhound is born to course.

That may be all quite true, and we think that M. Claude's employers must have regarded him in an identical light, or he would not have remained so many years in the same employment, when all around him was being turned upside down and inside out. But flair and second-sight will not enable a man to read the hearts of kings or the ciphers of Cabinets with any certainty, while the man who is born a policeman is exactly the man to put an evil interpretation upon any guesses he may make. We must own to regarding M. Claude as a prejudiced witness in respect of Napoleon III., even if we cannot quite accept the estimate of the last French Emperor which is contained in Mr. W. Blanchard Jerrold's official biography.

The records of crime always have their attraction, and both these books should command, and probably will obtain, a large sale, though of neither can it be said that it is an important human document or a successful piece of art. Both of them should be read because of the stories contained in them, while the reflections of the authors may in both instances be neglected considerably. M. Claude has an exaggerated idea of the penetration of the policeman's glance; while Mr. Adam's credence in popular report leads him to generalise rashly and tritely, while it deprives his opinions of the individual weight which they might have enjoyed otherwise as those of an industrious observer.

NEW MEDIÆVAL LIBRARY—III.

The Chatelaine of Vergi: A Romance of the Thirteenth Century. Translated by ALICE KEMPE-WELCH; with the French text; with six illustrations from a contemporary ivory. Introduction by L. BRANDIN, Ph.D. Title page, repeated on cover, designed by Miss B. C. HUNTER. New Mediæval Library. Vol. 3. (Chatto and Windus, 5s. net and 7s. 6d. net.)

"THE CHATELAINE OF VERGI" is a simple and pathetic tragedy, told in ballad form by an unknown poet, between about 1280 and 1288, if we are to accept the extreme dates fixed by Gaston Paris and M. Gaston Raynaud. It made an immense sensation all over France, Flanders and Holland, and is referred to or adapted by Froissart, Marguerite de Navarre, and Banello, among many other authors known to the year 1766, when it practically expired in an anonymous work of pure fiction, "La Comtesse de Vergi et Raoul de Couci." M. L. Brandin tells us in his introduction, that it still exists in eight MSS. of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, and five of the fifteenth and sixteenth. The translation is made from the text edited by M. Gaston Raynaud, who used the eight earlier texts only. Happily M. Raynaud's text is printed after the translation, an addition which makes this volume by far the most interesting of the three, although we miss Mrs. Kempe-Welch's really admirable notes. A knight, greatly loved by the Duke of Burgundy, secretly enjoys the love of the Duke's niece, "la Chastelaine de Vergi." They have sworn to each other never to betray their secret. The Knight is regarded with some curiosity by the courtiers, because he cannot force himself to pay open court to any lady. The Duchess has become violently enamoured of the Knight, and without committing herself beyond recall, skilfully leads him up to a declaration, which to her chagrin, proves to be a blunt refusal to entertain any love in his breast, which would do dishonour to his master the Duke. The same night, the mendacious Duchess tells the Duke that the Knight whom he loves best, has persistently besieged her virtue. The Duke sends for the Knight, accuses him of his treachery, and banishes him from his territories. However, since it is evident that the Knight cannot say much in self defence without making matters worse than they already are, the Duke offers the Knight, as an alternative to banishment, the choice of answering upon oath any question which he may ask him. The simple Knight, unable to face separation from his beloved, falls into the trap set for him by inexorable fate, and takes the oath. The Duke, anxious to keep the skeleton in his own cupboard locked up, if he can, replies, that since no one has ever heard of the Knight paying court to any known lady, and he must naturally be cherishing some lady somewhere, he will be sufficiently assured that an error has arisen in the matter of the Duchess, if the Knight will confide to him who that lady of his love really is. After terrible searchings of heart, and assured by an oath of secrecy from the Duke, the Knight reveals his secret. The Duke, en bonhomme, is delighted with the story, and insists on accompanying the Knight on his next visit to the lady, and on staying to witness their happiness from a hiding place, without the lady's knowledge. The expedition takes place, and the Duke is let into the secret of the lovers' means of communication, which is the lady's little dog, trained to give her silent notice of her lover's approach. Shortly afterwards, the wicked Duchess, who, we fear, alone among the candid actors of this sad drama has any sense, observes that the Duke is more devoted to his Knight than ever. By dint of connubial persecution she succeeds in extracting the secret from the Duke under another oath of secrecy, confirmed in this case by a vow on his part that, if she ever does divulge it, he will immediately cut off her head. When Pentecost comes, the Duchess holds a Court, to which all the ladies are invited, and first among them the Duke's niece, the Chastelaine de Vergi. The Duchess has no fixed plot, but the poet being a shrewd observer, and desiring to portray une méchante femme, writes thus:

Lors ne pot garder ses paroles
La duchoise qui vit son leu,
Ainz dist ausi comme par geu :
"Chastelaine, soiez bien cointe,
Quar bel et preu avez acointe."
Et cele respont simplement :
"Je ne sai quel acointement
Vous pensez, ma dame, por voir,
Que talent n'ai d'ami avoir
Qui ne soit del tout a l'onor
Et de moi et de mon seignor.
—Je l'otroi bien" dit la duchesse,
"Mais vous estes bone mestresse,
Qui avez apris le mestier
Du petit chienet afetier."

Though no one present but herself understands the Duchess's malice, the poor Châtelaine is cut to the heart. She retires to a small chamber, and in a scene of real poignancy, bemoans the supposed faithlessness of her lover, and prays for death. Her prayer is heard, and she dies of a broken heart. Meanwhile, her lover has missed her from the dance, and on finding her dead, slays himself upon her corpse. The Duke, finding the two corpses, and hearing what has passed, from a serving maid who had witnessed the tragedy, draws the Knight's sword from his body and with it slays the Duchess in the midst of the dance. Overcome with remorse he renounces the duchy, sets out on a pilgrimage, and enrolling himself among the Templars, never returns. M. Renaud is sure that the poet here relates a Court scandal which occurred between 1267 and 1272, in which Hugo IV., Duc de Bourgogne, Beatrice de Champagne (as Duchess), and Laure de Lorraine (as Châtelaine) played their parts. But M. Brandin shows in his introduction, that either the poet has taken great liberties with the facts, or the ballad must be dated much later, for Beatrice de Champagne's death did not occur until 1295, many years after that of Duke Hugo IV. It rather seems, that the poet chose a plot fairly familiar in its broad outlines, and located it at Vergi, in reference to a contemporary scandal connected with that place, without closer reference to its details. At any rate, he has localised it at Vergi for all time, wherever it took place.

ARABIA'S DESERT RANGER

Wanderings in Arabia. By CHARLES M. DOUGHTY (abridged). Arranged by EDWARD GARNETT. (Duckworth, 2 vols., 16s. net.)

So-so, Mr. Pessimist, have these twenty years not taught you a little modest discretion, the twenty years since this strange, strong book was first issued? Still do we hear that this is the generation, almost the second generation, of pigmies. You tell us, from ha'penny paper, tedious platform and doleful pulpit, that we have no longer the genius to write great books nor the sense to read them. In an excess of condescension you bid us "despise not the day of small things." A small thing is a harvest, a quiet thing is a hill, and while you have stood with a new lamentation in your hand, painfully conning your elaborate analogies of decadence (not sparing us the familiar one of declining Rome), a harvest has sprung from the old earth, a hill has slowly cleared, the landscape is not as you saw it and declared it. Here, surely, dolorous friend, is an enduring book.

Our dolorous friend may indeed have heard of those books of far lands, strange lands, morning or sunset lands as we fondly deem them, which writers such as Mr. W. H. Hudson and Mr. Cunninghame Graham have given us. Rumour of the bright delight of Mr. Hudson, of the bitter whimsicality of the author of "A Vanished Arcadia," may have reached him, and mayhap he has dismissed them as brief trifles, immoment tales of travellers unaccountably disgusted with streets and sewers. But he will find nothing trifling about this book; in length it is some six hundred pages—wherefore, surely, it should appeal to him. Its matter—hear the author's first paragraph:

A new voice hailed me of an old friend when, first returned from the Peninsula, I passed again in that long street of Damascus which is called Straight; and suddenly taking me wonderingly by the hand, "Tell me (said he) since thou art here again in the peace and assurance of Ullah, and whilst we walk, as in the former years, through the new blossoming orchards full of the sweet spring as the garden of God, what moved thee, or how couldst thou take such journeys into the fanatic Arabia?"

Mr. Doughty lived for some eighteen months among the Arab tribesmen, wandering lonely as a cloud over the harsh Peninsula, a Nasrāny amid wild and fanatic Beduins. By what strange and immeasurable compulsion was it that these tameless ones of the desert, poor, treacherous, uncertain, but never quite caittiff, endured that their life should be made manifest and familiar to a stranger whom it were a privileged piety to kill! In the pages of this book, of which it is difficult to speak in moderate words, the story of this sojourn in the wonderful sealed land is told with a candour the farthest removed from egotism, with a vivid simplicity, a powerful directness, as rare as enchanting. Well does Mr. Edward Garnett (to whom we owe what must have been a painful business of abridgement, and a brief but admirable introduction) say: "It is a great human picture Doughty has drawn for us in 'Arabia Deserta,' and not the least testimony to the great art of the writer is that we see him in the Arabians' minds." There is something noble in the absence of self-consciousness, in the patient fidelity and fulness of recital, in the spaciousness and sympathy of the book; and there is something massy and memorable in the grave English, a style as individual as Carlyle's, but serene, powerful, meditative—owing something, as Mr. Garnett notes, to the Bible, but owing chiefly to the author's own intense mind. There is, too, the delicacy of strength in this prose, and the felicitous strangeness of an accomplished master; strange words are used, pious revivals and happy discoveries; it is prose of a singular dignity of rhythm, conveying a continuous sense of distant music to which the pilgrim-words are marching. Here is a passage that will fitly illustrate some of the qualities both of style and matter, the subject of the portrait being a certain Mohammed Aly, surveyor of the Kellas (fortified water-stations) between Tebûk and el-Medina, "an amiable bloody ruffian":

A diseased senile body he was, full of ulcers, and past the middle age, so that he looked not to live long, his visage much like a fiend, dim with the leprosy of the soul and half fond; he shouted when he spoke with a startling voice, as it might have been of the ghrôl: of his dark heart ruled by so weak a head, we had hourly alarms in the lonely kella. Well could he speak (with a certain erudite utterance) to his purpose, in many or in few words. . . . His tales seasoned with saws, which are the wisdom of the unlearned, we heard for more than two months, they were never ending. He told them so lively to the eye that they could not be bettered, and part were of his own motley experience. Of a licentious military tongue, and now in the shipwreck of a good understanding, with the bestial insane instincts and the like compunctions of a spent humanity, it seemed the jade might have been (if great had been his chance) another Tiberius senex. With all this he was very devout as only they can be, and in his religion scrupulous.

Fulness of life is in this book. The record of nomad existence has a singular fascination: of the nomads' hospitality in their poor "fitting-houses of hair," freely yielded in honourable, unquestioning silence, and in amazing contrast to the "sordid inhospitality of the towns"; of their coffee-hearth in the desert with its opportunities of astute courtesy; of their cupidity and cunning thefts, their mild, expeditious justice; of their eager faith in vaccination, safe-guarding them against the small-pox that issues forth with the returning pilgrims from pestilential Mecca; of their oaths and subtlety; of their brotherliness, born of common endurance of almost incessant privation; of their austere indolence, their miseries, strife and irrevocably wild hearts; of their wives and camels. Well does Mr. Doughty write of the camels, faithful allies of the nomads in their idle wrestle with an unkindly lean earth:

If, after some shower, the great drinkless cattle find rain-water lodged in any hollow rocks, I have seen them slow to put down their heavy long necks; so they snuff to it, and bathing but the borders of their flaggy lips, blow them out and shake the head again as it were with loathing. . . . Driven home full-bellied at sunset, they come hugely bouncing in before their herdsman: the householders, going forth from the booths, lure to them as they run lurching by, with loud Wolloo-wolloo-wolloo, and to stay them Woh-ho, woh-ho, woh-ho! they chide any that strikes a tent-cord with hutch! The camels are couched every troop beside, about, and the more of them before the booth of their household; there all night they lie ruckling and chawing their huge cuds till the light of the morrow.

The raiding of certain of the Fukara Beduins' camels by a distant tribe affords an illustration of the fatalistic apathy with which even the greatest calamities are regarded; and it is curious to note that something, at least, of this fatalism, though clearly none of the apathy, seems to have passed into the adventurous author's mind. Judicially he pays tribute to the nomad eloquence, fantasy, and "natural musing conscience of good and evil"; the "loose Arabian tales of the great border-cities are but profane ninnery to their stern natural judgments"; but he does not seek to fling a false glamour over the Semitic nature of his companions, from which the "herdsmen's grossness" is never absent. Heartily plain is his summing-up:

To speak of the Arabs at the worst, in one word, the mouth of the Arab is full of cursing and lies and prayers; their heart is a deceitful labyrinth. We have seen their urbanity; gall and venom is in their least ill-humour; disdainful, cruel, outrageous is their malediction.

Withal there is a kindly feeling towards these inheritors of the desert; and on their part, perhaps, some now remember the strange Nasrāny, intruder on the Faithful's wide home, journeying with uncomprehended intent; or already, maybe, Khalil is no more than a tradition, and his wonders, his singularity, his deplored heresy, are matter for some Epic relation in the ears of the next Beduin generation. So, grave and unfathomable, he goes freely with the homeless Arabs, sharing their privations, conceding nought to their religion, never abjuring his own, wandering with them through the nameless habitation of the desert wind, more secure with the untrammelled tribesmen in the native wildness of sand and sun than in the builded Teyma, "tall island of palms, enclosed with long clay orchard-walls, fortified with high towers." Kinglake has written, in Eothen, of the Beduins after a journey from Gaza to Cairo, writing (in his own phrase) like a boy in the fourth form, with school-boy pity. But Mr. Doughty writes with the calm understanding, the patient acceptance, the profound and passionate humanity of one who makes nothing of geographical limitations. Here, surely, is part of the secret of his serene security in frequent jeopardy. There is no idle pity for the wild Beduins, defrauded of the blessings of industrial citizenship; no contempt for their ignorance; no elegy for their yet unmanifested destiny. It is, in the broad sense, a cultured mind that beholds this alien life, judging without narrow censure, praising without impertinent regret; a cultured humanity which regards nothing human as of itself mean and contemptible, and into which something of the largeness of the Desert has passed, but nothing of the keen and illiberal harshness of the inhabitants thereof.

There is much we should like to mention, much we should like to quote, especially from the closing chapters of Mr. Doughty's final prolonged peril in the threatening neighbourhood of Mecca, when the narrative moves with the throbbing alarm of drums. But for this we must urge the reader to get the book. There is, we fancy, a reflection of the "spacious days" in the manner of this traveller, returning, after his sojourn of nigh two years among the all but nameless ones of the Arabian Desert, to write such a book as this, and following it in the fulness of time (to Mr. Pessimist's dismay) with a six-volume Epic of early Britain. So an adventurous Englishman of Elizabeth's days, returned from wanderings over desert seas and strife in tropic forests, would come home with a tale which yet holdeth children from play and old men from the chimney-corner—come home to write, perhaps, from prison, with the grave rhythm of eloquent life, the solemn praise of "eloquent, just and mighty death."

MEMOIR OF LORD WANTAGE. V.C., K.C.B.

Lord Wantage. A Memoir by his Wife. (Smith Elder, 10s. 6d. net.)

THIS is the record of the life of a gallant high-minded gentleman—written by a no less high-minded lady, his wife—"who shared equally his toils and his triumphs."

Robert Lindsay was born in 1832 and was the son of a Guardsman, a retired Peninsular general, of the noble home of Crawford and Balcarres. His family history is rather amply sketched in the first chapter.

He joined the Scots Fusilier Guards at the age of eighteen, and in their ranks saw through the whole Crimean campaign. Five chapters are devoted to this grim experience of war, and very really are brought home to us the terrible hardships which were endured by our gallant soldiers, the result of criminal incapacity at home. At the Alma, at Inkerman, Lindsay performed a heroic part, and then took his share in the toilsome siege of Sebastopol. His letters from the Crimea, those of a subaltern of the Guards, are very graphic, very interesting, and show throughout the strong personality of the writer. While still young, Lindsay developed a decided character; a little critical, perhaps, and while beloved by his comrades, he was somewhat feared for a certain aloofness. Above all, these letters are marked by a deep religious bent of mind which influenced his whole life. He was a man of singular personal beauty.

Lindsay returned to England with his regiment, and was one of the first recipients of the Victoria Cross—the only one to be gazetted to that most desired of decorations for two acts of gallantry; one at the Alma, one at Inkerman. He received the Cross from Queen Victoria on June 27th, 1856. The Crimean letters are supplemented by an interesting review of past events, written in 1888, when Lord and Lady Wantage visited the Crimea again.

He became Equerry to the Prince of Wales (our King) soon after his return from the Crimea, and so came into the close contact with the Royal Family which lasted till his death. On November 17th, 1858, Robert Lindsay married the Honourable Harriet Jones Lloyd (the authoress), daughter of Lord Overstone, and he took the name of Lloyd-Lindsay. This marriage endowed him with a life's comrade, and with great possessions. He left the Guards at the age of twenty-seven as a Captain and Lieut.-Colonel, but he soon began soldiering again. Less than two years later he was found heart and soul committed to the Volunteer movement, and he became Colonel of the Berkshire Volunteers, which he raised. The sketch which Lady Wantage gives us of the awakening of the nation to voluntary arms is very vivid. She describes how the year after the movement began, 20,000 volunteers marched past the Queen in Hyde Park (Lloyd-Lindsay bringing 400 Berkshire men), and how the year afterwards the force had absolutely reached the number of 160,000 men. And the expression of the national feeling which prompted the Volunteer movement is best given in the words of that eminent financier and statesman, Lord Overstone:

As to the occupation of London I cannot contemplate or trace to its conclusion such a supposition. My only answer is, it must never be.

It is well that we should keep those four words dinned in our ears, in days when the efficiency of the Services are liable to be endangered from desire of retrenchment.

The hero of these memoirs raised the first corps of mounted infantry in the early 'sixties from among the farmers and followers of the Pytcheley Hunt. He commanded the Honourable Artillery Company in 1866, and for some subsequent years achieving many beneficial reforms, and thus, when the force came of age in 1881, he was made a K.C.B., and later became the Brigadier commanding the Volunteers of the Home Counties. But musketry became early the object of his closest attention, and Lloyd-Lindsay's name is connected with one of the most popular competitions at Wimbledon. Lord Wantage was president of the last three meetings at Wimbledon, and of the first at Bisley.

Parliament was entered in 1865, and Lloyd-Lindsay sat as one of the members for Berkshire almost continually from then till he took his seat in the House of Lords as Baron Wantage of Lockinge in 1885. His peerage came as a goodly heritage, for no more truly noble-minded man has earned it. In 1877 he was Financial Secretary at the War Office, which office he held for the remainder of Lord Beaconsfield's Ministry, and though he never took office again, his long Parliamentary career was full of work, and he did not limit his labours to the side which he supported. He served more than once on commissions assembled by Liberal Governments.

To the service of the Red Cross Society he gave great devotion, and himself bore relief to many thousands in 1870, at the Siege of Paris, to the Germans, outside, and to the French under Trochu defending the town, and a most interesting account is given of the adventures that he passed through. Lloyd-Lindsay earned on this occasion the lasting friendship of the Prussian Royal family. Again he took active steps for the relief of the sick and wounded in the fighting in Servia in 1877, and in the Russo-Turkish War that followed.

But with all these public interests outside, his home life at Lockinge, the life of the country had the greatest charm for Lord Wantage. He farmed at one time 13,000 acres himself, and his stock—first Herefords, then Shorthorns, then Shire horses—gained great renown, his Shire horse, Prince William, winning the gold medal of the Royal Agricultural Society in 1894, which Lord Wantage received from Queen Victoria's hand. Lady Wantage is very happy in her pictures of Berkshire country life. These memoirs were written for private circulation only. We congratulate ourselves and the reading world that the authoress has given them to publication, so that we may have a clear insight into the character and life of one "who is a great loss, but who has been a great gain," to quote from a letter of Miss Florence Nightingale, which ends the memoirs.

LORD CROMER'S BOOK: ITS PERSONAL ASPECT

IN deference to the purely literary tradition of THE ACADEMY I will endeavour to treat this book less as the political manifesto it primarily is, than as a revelation of the writer's character, almost perhaps what it is the fashion to call a "human document."

The book is a composite work, written not all of a piece, but at various dates and in varying moods of the writer's personality—self-confident, optimistic, disappointed; petulant with opposition, angry with defeat. The predominant note is egotism, the egotism of a superior mind too intelligent for common vanity, ingenious in self-concealment, yet all-absorbing; at times passionate, even fierce. It is the work of a man who, during a long lifetime has been building up for himself a structure of enduring fame, and who finds it crumbling at the base when almost achieved. If Lord Cromer could have left Cairo two years ago, his name would have had a secure place in the rolls of honour, not only of his own country, where he is still unsuspected of failure, but of the world at large and of those Egyptians whose love he imagined he had secured. A few mistakes, the result of his own pride, have ruined that chance; and it is in the secret bitterness of a soul disappointed, so to say, of its eternity that the final touches of his self-praise have been penned.

Egotism, as a leading feature of Lord Cromer's character, all who have watched him closely and have studied his yearly Reports from Egypt with knowledge of the situation have been long aware of. Year after year they have read these monumental treatises presented to both Houses of Parliament, and have seemed to be perusing some new first chapters of the Book of Genesis, where a new earth and a new terrestrial paradise were described as being created step by step out of nothing. It was always "the Lord" describing his own work, "the Lord" seeing all that he had done, and finding "it was very good." Not that this was recorded too ostentatiously. The angels and ministers of the Lord were also praised; but they were ministers and angels only, creatures without volition and winged but to obey. Meanwhile, the exultant earth—so it seemed, as one read—leaped up in joy at its own happiness, its new life, its riches, its extreme good fortune in being the creature of so beneficent a creator. The toiling millions of the Nile Valley, one felt, were blessing Lord Cromer daily in their well-watered fields and naming him in their prayers. Egypt, whatever failures there might be found elsewhere in the British Empire—Egypt, at least, was an assured success. The Times spoke of it as an "Imperial asset." Lord Cromer was beyond all question the Empire's most successful son. If any doubted, were there not these, his own Reports, printed in official Blue Books, to prove it? And no one doubted. Honours were heaped on him, hereditary titles, ribbons, the Order of Merit. He was on the pinnacle of his fame. Death at that moment would have made Lord Cromer in all history immortal; even the apotheosis of that quasi-death, a self-sought official retirement, amid the united lamentations of the land that bred him and the land that he had saved. But it was not to be. At the last moment he blundered badly, and he fell. I am too generous to name once more the name that was his ruin. He fell, not visibly in the eye of his countrymen, who only yet half understand his discomfiture, but in that of the larger world, and notably of Egypt. When he returned for the last time to Cairo, in the autumn of 1906, he found a change for which he was unprepared. The inhabitants of Paradise, if they still feared him, loved him, alas! no more. It was a fact which at Cairo could not be concealed, though it was concealed from the English public. In a few months it became clear, even to official eyes at home, loath to admit it, that Lord Cromer was a lost force for any further good he could effect upon the Nile. He had even become an encumbrance to the Empire, a spoke in the diplomatic wheel. And he retired, twelve months too late for his fame, a disappointed man.

The publication of this book, written for the most part in happier circumstances, is the result of his secret misfortune. From that point of view, as a belated last monument of self-laudation mixed with present bitterness, it is worthy of our pity. I, who do not pretend to be politically his friend, am sorry for him that he has published it. It will be received with a chorus of praise in the ignorant Press; but elsewhere it will only emphasise his lethal quarrel with the Egyptian people.

As a work of history, "Modern Egypt" is to a large extent a fraud. It is not true history at all, but a bit of special pleading by an interested and insincere pleader. It hardly pretends to have a regard for truth, other than official truth. It is a picture, painted, like the scenery of a theatre, to enhance the glory of a chief actor. There is the sombre background of a pre-Cromerian past, relieved with hardly a ray of official light. The native rulers of Egypt pass in grim procession, dimly shown, spendthrifts and fools and murderers. There is no exception to the dark costuming of their characters. Said Pasha, whose reign is still remembered by the quite old fellahin of the Delta as their "Age of Gold," a period favourably compared by them even with the present age, when the land tax stood at 40 piastres in contrast to the 160 piastres of to-day, when living was incredibly cheap and the yoke of administration sat easily on their necks, stands in Lord Cromer's pages no less lugubriously draped than the half mad but economical Abbas, or the rapacious prodigal Ismail. Short flashes, borrowed from Senior's Journals, display the viceregal incapacities and reveal their crimes. All this, however, is only a stage manager's arrangement, a contrast devised to heighten the effect of the first entry of Great Britain with Sir Evelyn Baring on the scene.

Lord Cromer (then Major Baring) arrived in Egypt in 1877, in a subordinate financial position, and remained there a short three years. This period is treated with lucidity and at length. On his own ground, finance, Lord Cromer is not open to criticism, at least by me; and this part of his book is, I do not doubt it, entirely correct. The facts were within the writer's personal knowledge, and he has no object in perverting them. One thing only I will point out, for it is in accordance with my estimate of his character. Whereas he is generous in his praise of such comparatively small official fry as Sir Gerald Fitzgerald, his French colleague, de Blignières, and Sir Auckland Colvin, who has recently adulated him in a ponderous work, he has hardly a word of acknowledgment for his only conspicuous rival in the financial rescue of Egypt, Sir Rivers Wilson. That Sir Rivers, President of the Commission of Inquiry and President of the Commission of Liquidation, was the true author of the financial system on which Lord Cromer's triumphs have since been built, is, I believe, undeniable. But in Lord Cromer's account of these two Commissions his name occurs almost without commendation. The first year of the dual control is a brief episode of light. Then Major Baring leaves Cairo for another post in India, and darkness once more descends on the Egyptian stage.

What shall I say of the account given of the Revolution of 1881-2? Here Lord Cromer, having nothing to say of his own doings, for he was absent during the whole period, and, moreover, has a purpose to serve in adopting the official version of events as his own, preserves a discreet silence, except to endorse the manifold errors of the Blue Books. Any real statement of the truth would, he doubtless felt, invalidate the foundation of legality on which the fabric of his own administrative work was later to be based. So he carefully abstains from enquiry in any form likely to prejudice that position. As a diplomatist and a statesman this, I suppose, is fair game; but as an historian it is hardly "cricket."

I have long noticed that it is a part of Lord Cromer's habit of mind—doubtless the result of many years of the busy practical life he has led—to leave matters of the past, or present matters not directly connected with his work in hand, unexamined. I have noticed it in such cases of public interest as, living in Egypt, have been pressed on me by my Egyptian friends, and which at their request I have from time to time brought before him. I have always found him, while willing to listen, unwilling to examine. If the case happened to be one already treated, however ill, his impulse was not to reconsider it. It was enough in his judgment that it had been decided, no matter how, no matter by whom. He had no time to go back upon a chose jugée. This attitude of mind in an administrator is, I suppose, a necessity. He has to economise his attention. He cannot investigate things not absolutely urgent. But, as I have said, in an historian it is fatal. The chose jugée is precisely the thing it is his business to re-examine, and with a mind always ready to reverse a pronouncement not in accordance with better knowledge. Lord Cromer's mind is consequently quite unapt for the work of historic accuracy he has here professed to undertake. It is not history in any sense of taking real pains as to facts and telling the whole truth. Moreover, Lord Cromer is not sincere. Lord Cromer's long career at Cairo, where, working the diplomatic machinery of the "Veiled Protectorate," he was playing every day of his life a double rôle and always a feigned one, has warped his official sense of truth to the extent of making it incapable of straightforwardness. His whole atmosphere, sitting at his desk in the Kasr el Dubbara, nominally a Consul-General but in reality despotic master of Egypt, obliged by the dual character he had assumed to be at one moment responsible for everything, at the next devoid of authority, was one necessarily of make-believe. He could not, if he tried it, at the end of twenty years, divest his mind of unreality. And so it is in his book.

His account of the Revolution is wholly without desire to know or make known the reality. He never, in any instance, except once, where, following my lead, he saddles France with the responsibility of the "Joint Note," tries to come to grips with facts. He repeats sophisms he knows well to be untrue, because, to tell the truth would be untimely, indiscreet, injurious to the diplomatic make-believe on which England's position in Egypt and his own has for a generation rested. He knew, while he was writing, that to investigate the obscure intrigues of the years in question would, in the first place, occupy a vast deal of his valuable time, and in the second place, run for him a risk of having to remould, if he disclosed it, the diplomatic basis of his life. Therefore, he did not examine native evidence or call witness in any quarter where he would be likely to learn a new and tiresome truth. He preferred to take the official version as it stood. This, I repeat, is not a method of history. Historically "Modern Egypt" is an imposture.

Still less pardonable, it seems to me, is the petulant anger shown by him in a series of acid little notes appended quite recently to his original text, directed against my own work, "A Secret History of the Occupation of Egypt," where I have followed a method the reverse of his own. Enjoying, as he did not, unbounded leisure, and living in native Egyptian society—especially the society of those who had taken part in the revolution—I had for twenty years and more been collecting my materials of knowledge. I had at my elbow as my fellow labourer in the work the one man, a Moslem, in all Egypt with the most critical, the most judicious mind, as Lord Cromer himself acknowledges, the late Grand Mufti, Sheykh

Mohammed Abdu. Moreover, I was myself a free man, under no obligation to silence, either private or official, and with no other inducement to write except as a contribution to knowledge of the time. Whatever, then, may have been my original disqualification for an historic task—and Lord Cromer, forgetful of his own short trespass into the temple of the Muse, seems to think, with Mr. Moberly Bell, that poetry is a disqualification—I had advantages in writing of the period he could not really pretend to. His own narrative, though published to-day, was manifestly written no few years ago, certainly before the appearance of my own, and the publication of my history seems to have annoyed him. My novel presentment, drawn from native sources, of the Egyptian revolutionary case, was necessarily in contradiction of his conventional official one; and I imagine that the chief reason of his annoyance was the trouble it gave him by obliging him to some extent to reconsider, in light of it, the story he had told. It was, however, too late for him any longer to examine the native evidence he had neglected to consult during his official career. Sheykh Mohammed Abdu was dead, and he himself had left Cairo; nor was there means for him of rebutting the evidence I had got together other than a petulant denial. The result seems to have been a loss of temper, displaying itself in these notes. They are little stiletto thrusts, where the assailant, unable to bring matters to an issue face to face, seeks to discredit a rival narrator and political opponent by a side attack and dishonourable charges.

It is really astonishing that Lord Cromer, a man so high placed in the world's eye, should have condescended to such methods. I will give an instance. At page 255 of Lord Cromer's book it is recorded that, in January, 1882, I acted, at Sir Edward Malet's request, as intermediary for him with the Nationalists. The incident stands in my own book, where the true account is given of what took place between me and the Nationalist deputies, members of their new Assembly. It was a question between one party which claimed to vote the Budget, and another party which, under Sir Edward Malet's and Sir Auckland Colvin's pressure, were for yielding the right. There was no question whatever of the army in the case, nor was there a word said about their relations with it in my discussion with them. Yet Lord Cromer, after quoting my book, has the ill-faith to remark: "The selection (of Mr. Blunt as intermediary) was an unfortunate one He advised the Nationalists to hold to the army or they would be 'annexed to Europe.'" Now this plainly implies that I betrayed the trust reposed in me by Sir Edward Malet, and that my book shows that I had done so. The ill-faith consists in applying to this occasion, where I was acting as intermediary, words which, on a quite different occasion and under quite different circumstances, four months later, and when I had long ceased to be Malet's intermediary, I telegraphed from England. I put it plainly to Lord Cromer here: Is this fair dealing in any sense, either as a controversialist or an historian, or simply as an honourable man?

Some half dozen other little treacheries, not quite so bad perhaps as this one, are scattered over Lord Cromer's record of the Revolution, with all of which I am ready to deal seriatim when the occasion serves. But for the moment I content myself with this one. It will suffice to show that the estimate of Lord Cromer's as a calm, deliberate mind, incapable of other than straightforward dealing, and as such the mind of a reliable historian, is the reverse of true. I have still much to say upon this head, and upon the more interesting revelations of character contained in the later sections of the book. But for to-day this must suffice. I hope to renew my criticism of "Modern Egypt" in a later number of THE ACADEMY.

WILFRID SCAWEN BLUNT.

THE BOOKLOVERS' MECCA

LONDON, which is a city of multitudinous memories, contains many centres of attraction, and he must be a dull and unimaginative being who is slow to perceive the romance of Westminster Abbey or the dark and sombre mystery of the Tower. The emotions aroused by these great buildings, however, are charged with an intensity too awful for the more commonplace moments of life. I suppose that for each one of us there is some little spot of London soil—some church, perhaps, or dingy thoroughfare—that we cherish for reasons quite individual and peculiar. To meditative minds the Charing Cross Road holds associations which the more historic parts of London fail to supply. For it is here that the second-hand bookseller plies his ancient and honourable trade.

We hunt the sweet berry
With purple-stained ardour;
Each bramble one hooks in
Is bent 'neath its load:
It's free and it's merry
In Nature's rich larder—
But O! to hunt books in
The Charing Cross Road!

So sings Mr. E. V. Lucas, in a pleasant poem of anticipations, and I, for one, am whole-heartedly with the genial author of "Fireside and Sunshine" in this matter. For I reckon an afternoon's adventures among the London bookstalls as among the chief joys of existence.

The second-hand bookseller has not escaped the leavening influence of democracy. He has surrendered quietude and distinction for (I hope) an increase of trade. But the old aristocratic seclusion which belonged to him in a former time he can no longer claim. He shares his newly-found habitat with publishers and pickle-makers.

Yet something of the splendid tradition of a former age still lingers round his new home. After all, no mere change of place or circumstance can avail to destroy the romance of his trade. The long line of books which temptingly awaits your inspection outside his shop awakens a thousand memories, desires, conjectures. From what dismantled library has come this gorgeously-bound edition of the letters and poems of Gray? This small, well-worn "De Imitatione Christi," each page of which is scored all over with pencil notes—how came it here? Meditatively one turns over the volumes, rejecting that, lingering for a moment over this. Here is one with a book-plate. "Ex Libris—" You start as you recognise the name of a distinguished author, one whose works are familiar on your own bookshelves. And this man, whom, not knowing, you have loved and venerated, could sell his Lamb like any common huckster! Hardly can you believe in the possibility of such sacrilege.

You toss contemptuously aside a handful of modern novels. But here is a book which arrests your attention—"Companions of my Solitude." It is the second edition, published in 1851, and printed with the old-fashioned "s's"—surely one of the last of its kind. You have, perhaps, a liking for these early Victorian writers, and you are prepared to make the bookseller a reasonable offer. He anticipates you by asking ninepence. Oh, Arthur Helps! Arthur Helps! How are the mighty fallen!

I remember coming across a volume of stray verses in one of these Charing Cross Road shops. The verses themselves were of no intrinsic value—Heaven forgive me, for the man is a friend of mine!—but the book contained on the fly-leaf the autograph of Lionel Johnson. I cheerfully paid the half-crown demanded, and carried my treasure home with feelings of heartfelt satisfaction. I had saved it from other, and perhaps profaner hands.

If, though no book-lover yourself, you are in search of new experiences, you could hardly do better than visit a few of these shops one afternoon. An interested spectator of the great human comedy will find much to engage his attention. The best time is about five o'clock—or, if the day happens to be Saturday, a little earlier—for it is then that book-buyers most do congregate.

It is a heterogeneous assemblage. You may easily distinguish the born bookworm, however, by a slight stoop of the shoulder, and by his manner in handling books. He approaches each volume with a certain reverence, as well knowing the homage that is due to these emperors of the mind. While others, after a casual and careless glance, pass quickly by, he is content to linger, for an hour or more if need be. The young man intent on forming a library after the approved pattern of an Avebury or an Acton is less patient. He snatches eagerly at some coveted volume—a Green's "Short History," perhaps—for the possession of which he is quite willing to barter his last half-crown. The clergyman in search of theological literature is a frequent visitor. Then there is the professional student, the man of many books. His pockets bulge with them, and he carries them under his arm. He is perhaps the most popular of all customers with the second-hand bookseller, for there is always something that he wants.

If you have not been too absorbed in watching the clientèle of the bookstall, you will have learned by now something about the books themselves. You find, for instance, that Mr. Kipling's novels are in great demand, particularly those in the old blue edition. Just inside some of the shops there are small bookcases with about four shelves, and you find a certain incongruity in the fact that on one of these shelves Miss Marie Corelli's "Barabbas" is placed next to George Meredith's "Diana of the Crossways." Yet, even while you reflect on this strange juxtaposition, "Barabbas" is sold and "Diana" remains. Historical books and memoirs—particularly if recently published—appear to fetch good prices. Poetry, I fear, is a drug in the market, though Mr. Swinburne still manfully holds his own. First editions of Stephen Phillips, for which a year or two ago you had to pay two and sometimes three guineas, can now be purchased for a mere song. A half-crown will buy you a "Herod." Of theological works there is a great variety, and they are all cheap. Not so books of travel, which, for some reason or other, still retain their ancient popularity. The great English classics may, it seems, be obtained at a trifling cost, and even early editions are, as a rule, not expensive. The growth of the reprint and the coming of "Everyman's Library" have tended to cheapen prices. They have also, I am afraid, tended to lessen the traditional respect for literature. For, as Ruskin long since pointed out, it is a distinguishing characteristic of human nature that it values only those things that it has been at some sacrifice to obtain.

Personally, I am no bibliomaniac, and I buy books in order to read them, but I have no use for the modern reprint. I would not surrender my "Aids to Reflection"—it is the fourth edition—in its two small octavo volumes bound in dark green boards for the most gorgeously-produced edition of this year of grace 1908. There is an aristocratic stateliness and charm about these older volumes which is wholly lacking in their successors. The spirit of the author still lingers in their pages. It is an intellectual delight to pick up some Pickering volume, for instance, with the publisher's advertisements facing the fly-leaf, or some volume of eighteenth-century verse, with Stothard's or Westall's engravings. As for the reprint, it is a mere parvenu in the world of books.

The theme, however, though tempting, is of the nature of a digression. Perhaps, after all, it is the human aspect of the question which is of the greatest and most permanent interest. Even the dingy book-stall is not without its tragedies. I remember, some years ago, entering a second-hand bookshop not far from one of the great London railway stations, when my attention was arrested by the sight of a small, shabbily-dressed man who was at that moment leaving the shop. He reminded me strangely of Watts's portrait of John Stuart Mill, and there was a certain look in his eyes that haunted me for days.

The bookseller turned to me: "An old customer of mine, sir," he remarked. "He's taken to selling his books lately, though—I don't know why."

T. MICHAEL POPE.

FIRST AID TO LISTENERS

It is an age in which little problems are continually being set for music-loving people to solve. No sooner is the problem set than we are supplied with a ready-made crib, and generally more than one, to the answer.

The latest problem has been the music of Debussy. We had a short time in which to toy with it. We listened to a single orchestral piece by him, "L'après-midi d'un faune," a few piano pieces, an occasional song; the most enterprising of our educational centres, the Royal College of Music, introduced us to his string quartet. Soon, however, Queen's Hall would allow us no longer respite. M. Claude Debussy was summoned to conduct his own work here in London and to let us hear what he is really worth. He came on February 1st, we both saw and heard; we took our little problem home to ruminate thereon, and lo! upon the table lay a little book, "Living Masters of Music: Claude Achille Debussy," was inscribed upon its cover. It was the ready-made crib which Mr. Lane put into our hands at the moment that the Queen's Hall Orchestra set us our examination paper. We need not be superior to the use of a crib, but we do demand that it should be an efficient one. To test this we must see clearly what it is that the listener to Debussy's music needs to be told. He cannot hear "L'après-midi d'un faune" and the three symphonic sketches, "La mer," played in succession, as they were on February 1st, without realising that their composer is working in a different medium to that in which other music has been moulded. Something in his system of combining sounds is new. Here is "something rich and strange," to which we only hesitate to give the name of beauty till we can do so with complete knowledge. That it is the outcome of a mind full of fantastic imaginings is certain, and the composer knows so well how to handle his peculiar idiom that he easily carries his hearers with him and makes them share his visions in virtue of the actual sound of his music. For although he gives titles and descriptions to accompany his works, yet one does not need the poem of Mallarmé to see the pictures which "L'après-midi d'un faune" brings before one, nor do the titles of the three sea pieces add much to their meaning. The newcomer to Debussy's music feels all this even if he does not grasp it mentally, but if he rebels against the hypnotic condition into which the music lures him, and determines, as it were, to look it in the face and to know how its composer works, and what this strange medium of expression actually is, his difficulties begin and he turns to the crib for help.

There seemed hope that Mrs. Franz Liebich, the author of this book, would shed some light here in a chapter headed "Modus operandi." She begins by telling us that when M. Debussy was serving his term of military service he "took great delight in listening to the overtones of bugles and bells." She then sets forth the table of overtones generated by the note CC up to the 16th harmonic, and goes on to say that "the seventh harmonic (B flat) is about the limit of exploited intervals used by most contemporary composers." The inference, then, is that Debussy's music is specially concerned with the treatment of the upper harmonics (8 to 16) as consonances with the generating note and each other. Such an idea seems to demand a certain amount of demonstration and to merit at least one definite illustration. But Mrs. Liebich passes it by with merely this sketchy suggestion. Does she mean that Debussy's music is founded upon a system of just temperament, for only so can the notes of the upper harmonics be used? Even the seventh harmonic, which she calls B flat, is no such thing, and, as a matter of fact, has been discarded quite definitely from the musical scale. Having waded through this somewhat elaborate display of explanation, it seems to amount to no more than this, that, as a young man, Debussy cultivated his naturally acute sense of hearing by listening to the upper partials of bugles and bells and that they served to make him familiar with unusual sound combinations; we are given no evidence that he has evolved a definite harmonic system from them, or that he consciously builds upon them. After this disappointment one welcomes the practical point which Mrs. Liebich makes when she speaks of Debussy's use of scales other than those of the major and minor modes. The listener soon notices that Debussy's avoidance of the diatonic semitone, the progression of leading-note to tonic, is responsible for at least half of the effects which give him new sensations in hearing this music. Mrs. Liebich tells us that Debussy's scales are founded on the ecclesiastical modes, especially the Dorian and Mixolydian. Again, we should like confirmation of the statement by example; for each one of the modes contains the diatonic semitone twice in the octave, and the peculiarity of Debussy's melodies often is that they are composed upon a scale of whole tones only. The weakness of Mrs. Liebich's book is a not uncommon one with writers on music, a certain objection to coming to close quarters with the facts of the subject. She is much happier in drawing an analogy between Debussy's standpoint and the theories of the impressionist school of painters than in dealing with these questions of musical technique, overtones, scales and so forth. Finally, she brushes aside with some impatience "theoretical ideas and formulas lending themselves willingly to the scalpel of analysis" (a phrase of which she seems fond), and triumphantly produces half a sentence of Browning to cover her retreat:

a flash of the will that can,
Existent behind all laws.

From the description of individual works perhaps the novice will get a little more help than from the "Modus operandi" chapter, especially when the themes are quoted. But still some extraordinary sentences baffle an ordinary intelligence. What, for instance, does this mean?

The frequent recurrence of the ternary arabesque, which is a favourite device of the composer, gives the printed score a likeness to the art of the goldsmith.

Perhaps if an example of the "ternary arabesque" were given (the term as applied to music is surely the invention of the author) we could perceive this likeness.

If there be any use in writing about composers who are yet hardly at the height of their powers, it must be that the writing is the work of one who sees straight and sees deeply and so can help others to do so. Having read this book from cover to cover we come back to our problem with but little fresh light upon it. It amounts to this: What does Debussy add to our musical language? We have noted his use of a strange scale. That is, after all, little more than a formula, which, when we get used to it, may prove to be only a mannerism. A much more valuable contribution is his delicate perception of the appropriate use of dynamic force and balance of tone. It is probable that for all its new sound there are not in Debussy's music many actual cases of chords and progressions never used before, but he makes us hear them as new by his way of carefully adjusting the balance between their various sounds, and insisting upon them by repetition, keeping the tone always subdued when the movement is complex, and only rising to fortissimo to achieve a climax, never so as to obscure the actual musical progression. He therefore gives us a better chance of assimilating his music than do many modern composers, who rush through the most eventful passages with an almost brutal torrent of tone. If Mrs. Liebich had emphasised these and other salient qualities her little book would have been more useful to musicians. As it is, her desultory description may give to the casual reader some idea of the composer's personality, which the quotations of his own words about music will make more definite.

H. C. C.

TANTÆNE ANIMIS CŒLESTIBUS IRÆ?

ANGER may not be, probably is not, the most fruitful source of inspiration for literary art, but to deny that it is and has always been one of the most powerful incentives to the poet and the prose-writer would be to fly in the face of all history. There is a Divine wrath as well as a Divine love, and if human love is always, however faintly and dimly, in a greater or less degree a reflection of Divine love, so also there is a human anger which is a reflection of Divine anger. Not always so, of course; there is an anger which may be a remote or even a close reflection of the Infernal Rage, but it is not of that form of passion which I now propose to speak. For the purposes of this article I will take anger to signify the passion which inspires those who feel injustice and oppression or of those who revolt against ignorance and wickedness and stupidity, or what they firmly and steadfastly believe to be ignorance and wickedness and stupidity. It is important to note, in passing, that those inspired by this "noble rage" may really be quite wrong (as far as we can ever assert that anyone is quite wrong), and yet, provided their emotion of indignation is a genuine one, they will derive the same inspiration from it as if they were right. Milton was, broadly speaking, from my point of view, quite wrong about everything except poetry: he lived for the greater part of his life more or less in a state of indignation and scorn and contempt, and, as it happened, his indignation and scorn and contempt were (as I judge it) completely and tragically mis-directed, and yet, as they were real and not feigned, they gave him the most superb inspiration. One reads, for example, his magnificent sonnet, "Avenge, O Lord, Thy slaughtered saints," and one remembers that Milton was one of the most powerful influences thrown into the scale in favour of Protestantism, and of the body and soul-destroying "Puritanism," falsely so called, which was to seize on this country with so deadly a grip; one remembers that he admired and revered the arch-scoundrel Cromwell, who may justly be said to have laid the foundations of that detestation of personal liberty which is rapidly become our national characteristic; and, in spite of one's hatred of his views and one's scorn of his sophistries, one accepts his sonnet as one of the finest sonnets ever written in the English language. Rage and scorn and contempt produced in Shelley's case on the one hand one of his most perfect and noble poems, "Adonais," and on the other hand inspired his violent anti-Christian and atheistic writing. In the one case he was right, in the other he was wrong, but there was no difference in the splendour of his writing. "Prometheus Unbound" is as fine as "Adonais." How much anger was there behind the inspiration of Dante, of Shakespeare, of Plato, and how much behind that of Blake, of Keats, and of Mr. Swinburne? Let everyone examine the proposition for himself, it is not necessary to labour the point. I maintain that it is an absolutely indisputable fact that anger is an essential part of all great inspiration. The love of the beautiful implies the hatred of the ugly, admiration for the fine involves contempt for the mean. A man or a woman who is incapable of anger and who does not often feel the emotion of anger will never write a really fine poem or a really great book. I need hardly point out that I do not wish to suggest that a man of genius should go through life in a perpetual state of bad temper, the anger I refer to has nothing to do with temper, it may and does coincide with the suavest manners and the most courteous demeanour in the ordinary relations of life. What I say is that genius or any kind of creative ability in literature cannot exist without occasional anger. The only superior human beings who are justified in never feeling anger are those who have so far abstracted themselves from earthly things as to have become saints. But saints do not produce works of pure art after they have become saints, though they may do so during the process of achieving saintliness. Leaving saints aside and coming down with a thud to very earthly regions, I will illustrate my point by saying that a man who edits a party newspaper cannot do it well unless he is capable of feeling anger against those who are opposed to the policy of his party. There have been a great many reasons and explanations advanced as to the causes which brought about the recent disastrous failure of a certain Liberal daily paper (there is no mystery, I mean the Tribune), but I will venture to give it as my firm opinion that the reason why this Liberal daily paper came to grief was the very simple one that the editor of the paper was a convinced Conservative. It is notorious that, when Mr. Pryor left the Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette to take up the editorship of the Tribune, his colleagues on the paper he had left and those on the staffs of the Conservative organs, the Daily Express and Standard, gave him a dinner of congratulation. There was no concealment about it, it was reported in all the papers, and nobody seemed to be the least surprised. To me it has always appeared one of the most amazing pieces of cynicism that has been recorded in recent history. Not, let me hasten to add, on the part of Mr. Pryor, whose ability is as conspicuous as his integrity, and who went as near to achieving an impossible task in the editorship of the Tribune as any man could go unassisted by potential anger. The cynicism was on the part of those who took it for granted that a man's private convictions could be successfully made subservient to the ends of those who employed him, to the extent of putting him into a position where it was part of his plain duty to express disapproval, and occasionally contempt, for that which he really admired and approved. I have more than half a suspicion that a similar lack of conviction lies behind what I take leave to call the obvious decline in the excellence of the Westminster Gazette. Here, however, I have no facts to go upon, I merely record my own impressions for what they are worth. When I read the Westminster Gazette on Mr. McKenna's Education Bill, when I find it quoting with professions of admiration and joy the amazing nonsense propounded from time to time by Canon Hensley Henson, I sigh and refer to my copy of "The Comments of Bagshot." Either Mr. Spender does not really agree with the opinions on these subjects expressed in the Westminster Gazette or he is a dual personality. Jekyll wrote "The Comments of Bagshot," and Hyde edits the Westminster Gazette. But I am getting away from my point, and I will state it again in other terms by saying that without liability to anger there can be no real sincerity; and here it will, no doubt, begin to dawn on my readers that this article is somewhat in the nature of a personal explanation, or I should say, more properly, an editorial explanation. THE ACADEMY has been reproached because its editorial notes have an "acid" flavour. We, to speak editorially in the names of myself and my contributors, do not deny the soft impeachment. It is no surprise to us to find that people whose whole attitude of mind is diametrically opposed to our own disapprove of the "tone" of our notes. We are resigned to that and have even listened, with what meekness we can muster, to the eternal boredom of those references to "the old Saturday Review," with which our "elders and betters" are wont to chasten our ardours. (By the way, "the old Saturday Review" was not exactly made up of treacle and soft soap, if we are rightly informed.) Know then, all men by these presents that if the notes in THE ACADEMY are sometimes "acid" it is because they are the gratuitous work of men who have real convictions on certain subjects, of men who write, not for money or even for honour and glory (since they are anonymous), but for the love of literature and for the love of what they hold to be the finer things of life. This, and not any desire to "show off" or to indulge in what schoolboys call "scores," accounts for the occasional "acidity" complained of. "The young men who do the notes for THE ACADEMY," as the Daily Mail would call us (some of us have grey hair or bald heads, but if you write notes you are always young), plead guilty to the indictment that they do sometimes feel indignation and anger; and I have endeavoured to explain, I hope successfully, my conviction that to do good work in any department of literature from the highest to the most humble there must be in its producers, co-existent with the bread of enthusiasm, the salt of anger. Of course, it would be easy enough to get rid of the "acidity" complained of. A few professional journalists of conveniently unsettled convictions, at so much a line, would do the trick in no time. A weekly supply of "crisp, pithy pars," such as would satisfy the souls of those who object to our present notes, would, no doubt, be rich in valuable results. We can even see in our mind's eye the happy day when, under their soothing influence, "Dr." Clifford, "Dr." Campbell, and Mr. Hall Caine would become subscribers to THE ACADEMY, and when we should enjoy the felicity of being called "broad-minded" and "tolerant," and the like by people of their intellectual calibre. But this picture does not allure us, and we venture to think that it would be equally abhorrent to the vast majority of our largely-increased body of readers. These may rest assured that as long as THE ACADEMY remains under its present editorship there will be no timid "climbing down," no surrender to the milk-and-watery conventionality of those who are afraid of good, plain English, and who are for ever telling us that Mr. So-and-So doesn't like this, that Mr. Such-and-Such can't understand why we do that, and that Mrs. Somebody Else thinks it such a pity that we do t'other thing. If THE ACADEMY, which is at present the only uncommercial paper in London, is to survive, those who write in its columns will continue to write as they have written before, without fear or favour; if on the other hand it is to go under, it will go down, "acidity" and all, with the flag nailed to the mast. The people of this country have the sort of journalism they deserve. If they want wash and gush and log-rolling and "broad-mindedness" and "tolerance" and all the other humbugging cant of the average newspaper they can have it from a thousand sources; but if, on the other hand, they want decent, clean literary journalism, written with sincerity and conviction for the love and glory of literature and the fine things of life, they can have that too. My belief is that they do want it, or rather that there are a sufficient number of people in this country to supply the comparatively limited circulation which is all that is desired or hoped for by THE ACADEMY. If I am given fair play and a little necessary time, I hope to prove it.

A. D.

THE LIBRARY TABLE

In the Track of R. L. Stevenson and Elsewhere in Old France. By J. A. HAMMERTON. (J. W. Arrow-smith, 6s.)

THE maker of books who invites his readers to travel with him over the ground that Robert Louis Stevenson has described in his "Travels with a Donkey in the Cevennes" must have either a high sense of his own merit or a very low sense of humour not to see the obvious innuendo which such a travelling must raise. Neither the merits nor the humour of Mr. Hammerton are very striking; in fact, this book gives us the impression that Stevenson's tour was made through a mightily uninteresting country, whereas we had previously believed it to be of surpassing interest, such was the glamour that the original "Travels" had cast around it all. And the humour, too, is not of a kind to appeal to us, if the calling of the sacred images of the Roman Catholic churches he visited dolls and idols be taken as a sample.

In reality just about half the book has to do with Stevenson's country, and of the rest a small portion is taken up with the ground immortalised by that great writer, Mr. S. R. Crockett, for whom we fear Mr. Hammerton has as great a regard as he has for Stevenson; another bit is given to Tarascon and Daudet. In this way much quotation ekes out the book.

But, after all, Mr. Hammerton is quite a capable journalist, and when he keeps himself to such subjects as "Round about a French Fair," his writing should make quite entertaining reading in a Protestant Sunday magazine. Where, however, a little knowledge is necessary, he gets himself into difficulties; and so the last chapter, on "The Palace of the Angels"—that is, Mont St. Michel—contains some curious passages and astounding information. He says:

There is not a single buttress, not a window, not an arch, not a pillar, that does not discharge some duty, and the removal of which would not weaken in some degree a part of the scheme.

And further on:

It is beautiful beyond description, and yet we may be certain that its builders never thought of mere beauty in its construction, but built purely to meet the exigencies of the situation, and to provide the best possible accommodation for the inhabitants of the monastery and their dependants. As one writer has put it, "the beauty just happened." It is only when we find builders striving after effect that we are face to face with decadent art.

Such folly is pathetic. One would have thought that, face to face with the beauties of Mont St. Michel, even gross ignorance might have yielded to commonsense.

Shelley's Letters to Elizabeth Hitchener. Edited by BERTRAM DOBELL. (Dobell, 5s. net.)

To Field Place, a country house in Sussex, at the beginning of last century, when the landed gentry were even more rigorously elect and respectable than they are to-day, a young man returned from University College, Oxford. He returned under a cloud. He had been "sent down" for holding opinions contrary to the welfare of the Church. For he thought and declared the God in which the Church and State would have men believe, did not exist. He was not at all ashamed of these opinions, but vented them on principle whenever occasion offered, and he was a veritable thorn in the side of the county magnates. Small wonder, then, that he did not stay long in their midst, but preferred to take lonely journeys into Wales. He stayed long enough, however, to make the acquaintance of a strange woman who kept a school in the neighbourhood, and he persisted, in spite of his family's position in the county, to treat this woman not only as a friend but as an equal. He was quite blind to the importance of social distinctions, and to the advantages of birth and breeding. The woman was older than he, and in the opinion of the county, who could judge a woman as well as they could judge a horse, and on much the same lines, she was not at all exceptional. Such is the background, as it were, to the story of Shelley's devotion to Miss Elizabeth Hitchener. This book contains the letters which he wrote. Though we feel under an obligation to Mr. Dobell for publishing them in their entirety, for the delightful format of the book, and for the valuable notes which he has appended, we are not able to agree with his judgment of the letters. He describes them as "effusions of overbubbling sentimentality and affected emotion," which were chiefly inspired by the high-flown novels of the time. No man even in his youth felt more sincerely and more deeply than Shelley. No one cared so intensely for the truth. To what he considered the truth he was content to sacrifice everything. In these letters Shelley is giving expression to the truths which he felt so keenly, that the final effort to express them made him a supreme poet. They tell how he, at the age of twenty, went with Harriet, his wife, to Ireland to stir up in the Irish the spirit of freedom; they show his hatred of oppression and of injustice; and his belief in human nature, when unstifled by custom. That faith never left him though he often experienced what is known as disillusion: and in this unwavering constancy lies the inspiration of his life. Though he suffered as only a man like Shelley can suffer, he never became bitter, he never lost his power of joy, his brave gladness. These letters make one realise that the poem of his life was as beautiful as his own most beautiful song, and as sincere and true.

The Man Eaters of Tsavo. By LIEUT.-COLONEL J. H. PATTERSON, D.S.O. (Macmillan, 7s. 6d. net.)

IF half the travellers' tales of this or any other age had the fascination of this simple story, the term would never have become a reproach. It has not fallen to the lot of many men to be the subject of a hymn of worship, extolling their bravery as that of a saviour. To fewer still, we should think, has come such an honour on such good grounds; and when to these distinctions Colonel Patterson adds that of telling the story without a trace of self-consciousness, and without the smallest touch of boastfulness, he may indeed be counted fortunate among men. The skill and nerve of the sportsman, resource, and modesty are, it is true, attributes which we are fond, not without reason, of regarding as the characteristics of our Empire builders; but it is not often that we are given the opportunity of appreciating their presence in one individual through the unconscious medium of himself.

After all, it was his beloved Tsavo bridge that filled Colonel Patterson's mind. It is as much upon the trials and humours of its building that he lingers as upon the grim excitement of his campaign against the disturbers of the peace of his encampments. But it is this very unconsciousness that brings into strong relief the ghastly strain that must have been imposed upon every soul in those beast-beleaguered tents. And the flashes of humour that betray us to an unexpected smile, even in the midst of the excitement of a chase which is not one-sided, give us a vision of that happy, enduring patience which Africa, above all continents, seems to develop in her tamers.

There is tragedy in the story too. Apart from the grim tale of coolie victims claimed by the man-eaters, the ghastly deaths of Mr. O'Hara and Mr. Ryall, and of the poor gun-boy, Bhoota, are recounted with telling simplicity. Indeed, it is the artlessness, the lack of "style," which gives this book its force, and lifts it from the level of mere romance to that of living truth. One feels in reading that this was as it is written, and from between the lines emerges what is not written—that the personal factor bulked large in the turn of events.

We should like to quote much, but there is one sentence which must be quoted, and which should serve to emphasise the first essential of true sportsmanship.

Much as I should have liked to have added a giraffe to my collection of trophies, I left them undisturbed, as I think it a pity to shoot these rather rare and very harmless creatures, unless one is required for a special purpose.

Colonel Patterson used his camera instead of his rifle, and the charming picture he gives us is a far more telling result than any trophy could have been.

The pictures in the book are a special delight. There is one on almost every page, and they form a running commentary upon the text, which enables the least informed of readers to visualise each succeeding scene in the story. Incidents, comparatively unimportant in themselves, become essential parts of the background before which the story moves. And from cover to cover the fascination of the narrative holds, not only for a single reading, but many times over.

FICTION

Imperial Brown of Brixton. By REGINALD TURNER. (Chapman and Hall, 6s.)

MR. REGINALD TURNER is a well-known writer who has produced many novels that have attracted a great deal of attention, and have won him a host of admirers. But in his latest work he has forsaken the novel of manners and has produced instead a work of pure humour. How successful he has been will be seen at once when we say that no more amusing book of this kind has appeared since R. L. Stevenson gave us "The Wrong Box." From beginning to end of "Imperial Brown of Brixton" the reader is kept in a constant roar of laughter, and if at times the hero seems to be getting into steep places, Mr. Turner quickly extricates him, and the method of extrication only adds to our amusement.

Imperial Brown is an assistant at the Brixton Emporium, and he is sick of it—"sick of putting the feet of socks round men's clenched fists, a proceeding he had never been able to see the logic of, though he did it just as a doubting priest may minister the rite of baptism"; his ambition has always been to see the world, and now at last a fortunate legacy makes it possible. He lands with his two bags and his "wee mercy" at Mouleville, a watering place on the north coast of France, which seems to be Dieppe with a spice of Boulogne thrown in. At first he mixes almost entirely with English people, and stays at a hotel with an English landlord—who, by the way, is one of the gems of the book. But he soon tires of it all, and longs to probe the mysteries of French life: and he has not long to wait, for he falls into the clutches of an English guide, who introduces him into the circle of a band of French criminals, under the pretence that they are impoverished aristocrats. He is induced to believe that he has joined a society of conspirators to restore Prince Louis Napoleon to power. He is fleeced first one way and then another, any excuse being good enough for the innocent Brown. Now he is helping the party with funds, now paying an exorbitant price for an inferior room under the belief that it was the bedroom of the great Napoleon; but he jibs at last, but not till he has been induced to fly from Mouleville in disguise, under the idea that he is the exact image of Louis Napoleon. His adventures are most thrilling, and at the same time most farcical, and at one time they seem likely to end in prison, for the whole gang, including poor Brown, are arrested on a charge of burglary. How it all ends Mr. Turner must be left to tell himself.

The book contains many real characters, who in themselves are far from being farcical. Brown himself is a most interesting person, for whom no one can help having a real feeling of affection. Nor is he so foolish as might be thought; to him it is all a new world, for his knowledge and his experience are limited by his Brixton horizon. And herein lies the brilliance of Mr. Turner's conception, the mirth is almost entirely produced by the situations, while the interest in the story is maintained by the hold that the different characters have on the imagination of the reader.

Among the chief of these characters is "the lady of the Casino," whom Mr. Turner has drawn with great cleverness, and almost touched with tragedy, and there is pathos, too, about the story of the disreputable guide, Duveen. They belong to a gallery of portraits that was begun by the late Bret Harte. To these must be added that most amusing person the landlord of the Hôtel des Deux Globes. He is a gem of the first water, and to have met him in real life would have been a pure joy. Mr. Turner is to be warmly congratulated on a most delightful book.

The Queen's Friend. By HELENE VACARESCO. (Werner Laurie, 6s.)

THE author of this book has been decidedly unfortunate in the form in which she has cast her matter. She is a poet, pre-eminently. We have never known a poet who could write a novel of any merit, though we remember several who have tried and failed. The rapture of a poet of distinction cannot last through the manual labour involved in padding out his expression of it into a requisite and necessary eighty to ninety thousand words. There are passages of great beauty in "The Queen's Friend"—the title, by the way, is hardly justified—but there is no sustained exaltation. The author touches the heights of the sublime, only to trip and fall back into the mud of the almost ridiculous. And her movement is too slow: it is only somewhere about the hundredth page that interest in the characters is awakened, though there is in the preceding chapters much to delight the senses. The character-drawing is remarkably good on the whole, though here again there are lapses that seem due mainly to the author's boredom. The picture of the life of the English household, in particular, is well done. We wish that his relations with his Roumanian wife had been shown from a more intimate standpoint, and with greater detail. On the cover of the book the publisher informs the public that: "The close friendship between the Queen of Roumania, Carmen Sylva, and Hélène Vacaresco is well known, and also the romance of the projected marriage between the young poet and the royal prince of Roumania. This project was abandoned for State reasons, but it created an idyllic and legendary atmosphere round the author." We sincerely hope that neither this nor the blatant advertisement which precedes and follows it will deter anyone from reading the novel. Apart from its poetic qualities and in spite of its many deficiencies, it has great charm. The picture of Roumanian life and scenery, drawn as it is from first hand knowledge, cannot fail to attract English readers.

The Anchorage. By W. H. KOEBEL. (Francis Griffiths, 6s.)

WE are afraid Mr. Koebel's book has been written too late to attain the success it deserves. It is too quiet for a twentieth-century reading public, which clamours for incident at any price and at least one chapter over which it is necessary to draw a veil. The author of "The Anchorage" tells his story with all the slowness and deliberation of the old three-volume novel. Nothing will induce him to hurry. His method suggests a football match at which the opposing teams have lined up and are waiting for the referee. The match is to last, say, only an hour, and it is thirty minutes before he arrives. Mr. Koebel, however, does, as it were, in the half hour of anxious waiting show you one player breaking away from the line and having a shot at goal with a practice-ball. And when the match really starts, though the play is very gentlemanly and keen and quiet, he describes the contest with great care. Nothing escapes him. Even when a player's shirt bursts open at the neck, he notes the fact and the incident occasioning it with meticulous accuracy and a wealth of detail. . . . But perhaps our metaphor is a little unfair to Mr. Koebel, for he is never dull and prosaic. Our only complaint is that in his description of New Zealand life his descriptions have never quite the breeziness of, say, Mr. Way Elkington's "Adrift in New Zealand." He has not the power to transport us from the desk's dead wood to the shade of the living tree. On the other hand, he is a more dispassionate observer. Mr. Elkington is a vagabond—a splendid vagabond. Mr. Koebel is not so satisfied to make his bed on the hillside, with the stars for quilt and the heather for couch; and therefore he sees life in more varied aspects, and if he has not Mr. Elkington's descriptive charm, he is more trustworthy. In his picture of the man who finds anchorage in the New Zealand farm in which most of the action centres, he shows acute insight into and knowledge of human nature. "The Anchorage" is decidedly a book to read.

The Golden Horseshoe. By ROBERT AITKEN. (Greening, 6s.)

To those who love to sit by the hearth and fire their blood with tales of wild and dashing adventure, we strongly recommend "The Golden Horseshoe." There is not a dull page in the whole book, from the first to last chapter, and the story is told with a verve and enthusiasm which carries the reader along, willy nilly, to the sound of revolver shots and strange Spanish oaths until, with a sigh of relief, he sees the fugitive safely on board their friend's yacht, steaming out of the fatal harbour. Adventure follows adventure with kaleidoscopic rapidity; the characters escape, are recaptured, flee again and are retaken; they assume disguises and cast them off, to appear again, the women in men's clothes, the men dressed as old women; they are besieged in a fortress and are only saved at the eleventh hour by a balloon and the intervention of a convenient earthquake. Time after time they are apparently lost, only to reappear triumphant in some totally unexpected quarter. It is a vigorous and striking book.

D R A M A

"A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM"

YESTERDAY I was in Oxford upon a flying visit of inspection, the subject of which was the yearly play by the members of the University Dramatic Society, and the result was an evening, if not quite of unqualified approval, certainly of much enjoyment. For many reasons these Shakespearean revels of undergraduate Oxford must always have their peculiar charm, but I dare say that last night's entertainment found me more sentimentally inclined than usual. Years and years ago (they say nine, but it seems ninety) when the O.U.D.S. last gave a A Midsummer Night's Dream, I saw it from the behind the footlights. In that blessed position one does not criticise—one enjoys; and though the performance is said now to have been the worst in the whole history of Oxford acting (a fact that modesty should perhaps forbid me to mention) to one at least of the players it seemed then that perfection had spoken her last word, and the memory of that unforgettably happy week gave me yesterday a tender interest in its successor.

Those were the far-off days in which Mr. Bernard Shaw had but just surrendered the critical stall of the Saturday Review to the gentleman who now occupies it with such distinction. Then, possibly, Oxford still knew the latter's worth better than London, and I well recall our emotion behind the curtain when it was reported that He—the Infant-Phenomenon of Letters—was in front. How eagerly, too, we listened to the words that fell from those wise lips during the feast that followed; and how much more eagerly we welcomed, a week later, the printed words that might perhaps show us our own names glorified with His praise! I do not think that we found them. To the best of my remembrance, indeed, the article was for three-quarters of its length a disquisition—witty, paradoxical, and brilliant, of course—upon the experience of revisiting Oxford, and the "mimes" themselves made but a cursory appearance in the tail of it. Poor mimes! We were sadly disappointed, and for my own part I date a suspicion of contemporary criticism from that hour.

And now I am doing very much the same thing myself. But, in truth, from outside this matter bears a different aspect, and it is no slight to the performance at the New Theatre last evening to confess that it provided only a part of my pleasure in the visit that it occasioned. Good, however, in many ways it was, not I admit the best of many that I have seen upon the same stage, but better certainly than could be given by any other company of amateurs I know of. The play itself, to begin with, is fortunately suited to its players. It is a masque, written, one feels, in a holiday humour, for it breathes the very extravagance and poetry of youth; and youth, happily, is the strong point of the O.U.D.S. They are all young, gloriously, undisguisably young, and the play is the better for it. Some arbitrary distinctions of age, it is true, the author has pretended to make, as that Egeus should be the elder of Theseus, and Starveling wrinkle his face and affect a quavering falsetto. What of that? No Athenian tailor over the age of nineteen could display such whole-hearted enthusiasm for a minor part in an indifferent interlude, and not all the trickery of Clarkson shall persuade me that any of the characters in last night's comedy were other than the delightful and high-spirited boys whom Shakespeare himself had obviously intended them to be.

It was youth, too, that made of Lysander and Demetrius, the most difficult parts in the play, as gallant a pair of lovers as maiden might desire, and thus, incidentally, lessened our impatience over their somewhat slender and talkative intrigue. Youth confessed was in the heels of Flute and the grave-visaged Quince at the first notes of the Bergomask. As for the fairies, they were just as young as, and only a little taller than, real fairies are. Watching them, I remembered that other performance of which I have already spoken, and was grateful for so dainty a chorus. Last time, the ladies, kindly, enthusiastic ladies, who were good enough to help us—but I will forbear. Many of them, no doubt, are still alive.

I repeat that, taking it all in all, it was an excellent entertainment, and much to the taste of an audience that, to the returned wanderer, was by no means its least interesting part. We applauded everybody, but the clown scenes especially roused us to a laughter for which your London playhouses might long in vain. I only hope the actors on the stage enjoyed themselves as much. I believe they did. I like to fancy them moving in that transfigured world of theirs, beneath strange heights of shadowy canvas, where unseen music sounds, and the scent of grease-paint is as the perfumes of Arabia: Et ego in Arcadia vixi! To-day, I think, there will be a great sale of newspapers in Oxford, and I know the haste with which certain columns in them will be scanned, till (skipping that inevitable reference to Mr. Arthur Bourchier—what praisers of time past are these dramatic critics!) the readers may attain the more important mention of Second Citizen or First Attendant.

I protest they shall be disappointed for me. Not but that I could if I would, for there was much last night that seemed worthy of notice. But the truth is, not only that in a performance such as this comparisons are unseemly, because the society is the important thing, not the individual, but that already I grow confused. There were more players, in my fancy, than ever appeared upon the stage, and other voices, now and again, seemed to speak in the familiar words. It might be that, unawares, I should praise the Theseus of a Treasury official, or an Oberon who has been Reverend these many years. Silence is better.

But, lest that silence be mistaken, I beg here to take my successors collectively by the hand, and to tell them all, even those of them about whom it would not be true, that the O.U.D.S. has every reason to be grateful for their performance. "A very good piece of work, I assure you, and a merry"; the words of Bully Bottom might stand as a motto for the whole. Yet—to confess again—they were other words of his that lingered most in my own thoughts; that I found myself repeating as we came out of the theatre into the darkened streets, amongst the laughing crowd that was so like a hundred I remembered, so like and yet so strangely different:

"Where be those lads? Where be those hearts?"

ARTHUR ECKERSLEY.

"THE GATES OF THE MORNING" AT THE STAGE SOCIETY

A MORE remarkable play than this, by Miss Margaret M. Mack, has not been seen in London for a long time, and the members of the Stage Society are much to be congratulated on the courage of their committee in having produced it. As a first play by a new playwright it shows a great deal more than mere promise, for here is an achievement of which many a well-known playwright might have been proud. In many ways the ideas that Miss Mack was trying to enforce were so complex that even the most experienced dramatist might have hesitated as to their suitability to stage representation, and perhaps I may be pardoned if I failed after seeing the play only once in catching hold of all the ideas it contained.

The play concerns itself with the attitude of several widely different characters on the subject of motherhood. The principal character is a revivalist preacher named Samuel Wilson, who is also a linen-draper's assistant; he is ardently sincere, but intensely conceited of his powers, and at the same time most amusing with his tags of Scripture and his commercial similes. He has recently married Alice Larne, who has a baby by a man who died too suddenly to have made her his wife. Wilson is quite aware of his goodness in having married her under the circumstances, but he is genuinely in love with her, and only anxious to be able to induce his wife to leave the child with her mother. Mrs. Larne is a rich lady, who has allowed her daughter to run away from home to go on the stage as a chorus girl, and who is entirely devoted to a pug dog. Then there is Miss Nancy Larne, Alice's aunt, a young lady about thirty-two years of age, who lives with Mrs. Larne; she has been used for some years to act the part of the Madonna in a church mystery play, and though she is engaged to a young artist and is likely to be married at once, she is anxious to adopt a child, and Alice's baby seems a favourable opportunity; but she certainly has no desire for a child of her own. There is also, in the first act, a dying "unfortunate," Mill Robyn, whom Wilson has "converted," but who relapses from time to time into her old ways of thinking, and has to be brought back to grace by the most impassioned revivalist eloquence. It was a most curiously compounded play; at times it was so amusing that the audience did nothing but laugh, and then, again, it became so serious that many of the audience were shocked at the plain-speaking and unconventional arguments on the maternity question. The first act, which ends with the most impressive death of Mill, might almost have been a complete play in itself, and was entirely admirable. The second act, which takes place at Mrs. Larne's house, contained many interesting features. The unavailing efforts of Wilson to move Mrs. Larne from her pug worship to take an interest in her grandchild, were as amusing as the fatuous complacency with which the efforts were parried. But the real essence of the play came out in the third act, when Alice tries to regain her child from Nancy. Her violent denunciation of the others, including her husband, who lets out that he has prayed twice a day that he may never have any children, and her scorn of the sham Madonna in Nancy, lead to statements being made that I can only imagine the Censor failed to understand when he read the play in MS. If the play can at all justly be said to have missed success, the cause must be found in the fact that so little warning is given until near the end of how serious a purpose Miss Mack had in view in writing the play. One's interest at the beginning is so entirely taken up with the character of Wilson, that one naturally fancies that his sincerity in the face of difficulties is to be the theme, and though this certainly remains a serious feature to the end, it is entirely swallowed up by the importance of the thesis which is argued so minutely and unrestrainedly all through the last act.

Mr. Norman Page gave an excellent performance as Samuel Wilson. He really became the half-educated, fervent, but self-deceiving revivalist, and one's interest in him never wavered. Miss Sydney Fairbrother added another to her successes as the dying girl; there was that mixture of pathos and humour which only a great artist is able to represent. Miss Amy Lamborn played with great restraint and yet real passion as Alice Wilson, and Miss Alice Mansfield gave a most amusing performance as Mrs. Larne. I am sure Miss Vera Coburn was a great deal too young looking for the part of Nancy, otherwise she acted very well.

When I say that there was a ruthlessness in the arguments of the play that reminded me of Ibsen, and a wittiness in the dialogue that was reminiscent of Bernard Shaw, I am trying to express my feeling that, even if imperfect, The Gates of the Morning is a genuine work of art.

A. C.

CORRESPONDENCE

BROWBEATING BOOKSELLERS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The incurable optimism of critics is responsible for two deplorable events: (1) Now that nearly every book is praised indiscriminately readers have ceased to pay any attention to reviews, (2) booksellers have come to regard all disapproval of their wares as a malicious libel on themselves.

Some years ago a very famous bookseller issued a very large book. I gave a frank opinion of it in a great Review. The bookseller immediately intimated that advertisements would be discontinued; he threatened even to cease sending books if he were flouted again.

The other day a petty bookseller submitted a novel, and I warned the readers of John Bull that I had found it stupid, tedious twaddle. This happened to be my honest opinion. I could not have expressed any other without deceiving and defrauding the public. Messrs. Greening, however, immediately opened a campaign against me. Having no case for the defence of their book, they proceeded to heap personal abuse upon me, as though I were a pickpocket or an attorney.

They began by inundating the press with advertisements, in which they sneered at me as "notable or notorious" and "peculiar in" my "views," as though only the wildest eccentricity could explain a failure to admire their foundling.

Their next step was to issue an advertising circular, which they entitled "the Imp, a Monthly Magazine." It is almost exclusively composed of direct and indirect puffs of the firm's books and their authors. On a previous occasion, however, they announced on their cover that purchasers would find an open letter to one Hall Caine. But if anybody was lured by this promise of personalities to purchase a copy, he must have been disappointed to find only an announcement that the "letter" had been suppressed in deference to the fears of the printer.

Evidently, however, in my case the printer was less timid, for the March issue contains many riotous references to myself. I am kindly reminded that I am "no longer young"; I am accused of being "bald" and "bearded"; regrets are expressed that a "saving piece (sic) of humour" did not prevent me from making myself ridiculous; and there is a final pronouncement that "to be abused by Mr. Vivian is in itself a recommendation."

Now, sir, such graceful exhibitions of a fine frenzy do not cause me sleepless nights. Having fought with beasts in an electoral arena, I am not to be frightened by the false fire which belches from behind a bookseller's barrow. But others, who share my belief that a critic's duty is to criticise, may be silenced by the menace of personal recrimination. Some may be engaged in a perpetual struggle with the wolf at their door, and may dread dismissal by an editor whom publishers have reft of his advertisements. Others may love admiration, and may fear the consequences of libels which attribute glistening crowns and hairy, germ-infested faces. Others, again, may intend to write books and will endeavour to propitiate booksellers at all costs, even at the cost of being accessories to the sale of trash.

Bonaparte is dead, and there remains no one to mete out justice to booksellers. Will you not use your powerful influence to protect critics, now resisted in the execution of their duty to the public?

March 4.

HERBERT VIVIAN.

CHARLES I.—HIS NAME

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The question which your correspondent "B" propounds in your issue of February 29th, as to the reason of the selection of the name "Charles" for the second son of James I., is an interesting one. Though documentary evidence has not been forthcoming to settle this matter, the following is a reasonable conjecture:—

In Scotland the custom has existed for centuries, and still prevails, that the first son of a marriage should be named after the father or paternal grandfather, and the first daughter after the mother or maternal grandmother. The second son was most frequently named after the father's brother, or failing that connection, the grandfather's brother. Subsequent children might be named after remoter ancestors.

This method was exactly followed by James I. in naming his three sons. The eldest son was named Henry Frederick, the first name being after his paternal grandfather, Henry Lord Darnley; and the second after his maternal grandfather, Frederick II. of Denmark. As King James was an only child, there was no uncle to supply the name for the second son, so a step further back in the genealogy was taken, and he was named "Charles," after his grand-uncle, Charles Earl of Lenox, the brother of Henry Lord Darnley, and the father of Lady Arabella Stuart. The third son, who only lived for three months, was named "Robert," probably after Robert II., the founder of the Stewart Dynasty.

It may be asked, How did the names Henry and Charles come into the Lenox family? The answer is simple. Henry Lord Darnley, was the grandson of Margaret Tudor, daughter of Henry VII., sister of Henry VIII., wife of James IV., and, by her second marriage, wife of Archibald Earl of Angus. Margaret Tudor's daughter, Margaret Douglas, married Matthew Earl of Lenox, and was mother of Henry Stuart Lord Darnley. In the genealogy of the Stuarts and Darnleys, the name of Henry does not occur previous to the birth of Henry Lord Darnley, so that the name must have come from the Tudors. In 1891 Lady Elizabeth Cust published (privately) a remarkable volume, entitled "Some Account of the Stuarts of Aubigny in France," in which the genealogy is clearly traced. The name "Charles" first appears in the family-names of Lenox with the advent of Charles Stuart, brother of Lord Darnley. As his uncle, John Stuart Lord D'Aubigny (brother of Matthew Earl of Lenox), was in high favour with Charles IX. of France, it is probable that the name was derived from that monarch, with whom the Earl of Lenox would be acquainted when he was a naturalised French subject at the Courts of Francis I. and Henri II.

The naming of the daughters of James I. is also an interesting subject. The eldest was called Elizabeth, after the Queen of England, whom James wished to propitiate. The second was named Margaret, after her paternal great-grandmother, Margaret Douglas. The name of the third was Mary, after her paternal grandmother, Mary Queen of Scots. The origin of "Sophia," the name of the fourth, is obscure.

March. 2.

A. H. MILLAR.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The name of Charles was popular in France, and doubtless came over to Scotland with Queen Mary. Many French words did. I believe "gigot" is still used by Caledonian housewives; also "petticoat-tail," which is derived from petit gatel.

Charles was the first name of James I., but King Charles the Martyr is said to have been named after his paternal great-uncle, Lord Charles Stuart (see "The Life of Charles I., 1600-1625," by E. Beresford Chancellor. London, 1886).

It is interesting to note the derivation of the name Lat. carus, Fr. cher, and the fact that Draga, the name of a Queen, who was also assassinated, is derived from a word meaning "dear."

March 4.

JIM CROW.

THE FRENCH PEASANT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I hope you will allow me to protest against Mr. Machen's quoting "La Terre" as an accurate portrait of the modern French peasant. It has been fiercely denied in quarters where they are qualified to pronounce an opinion. In "Le Roman Naturaliste," M. Brunetière devotes a chapter to "La Terre," in which, with a moral indignation very like Mr. Machen's own, he denounces it as an outrage both on art and on the French peasant whom it professes to describe. Zola's method, he shows, is to accumulate hideous stories from the police news, pile them together in a horrible dunghill, and call the result "life"! In another essay—I regret to say that I cannot give chapter and verse, but I am quite sure of the fact, for I possess the book, which is mislaid—M. Brunetière gives evidence from several authorities that the peasants of La Beauce, the scene of "La Terre," are extremely delicate, almost prudish in their language; and yet, according to the "Apostle of Naturalism," the earth could hardly match such a set of Yahoos! The poor, especially in cities, as M. Brunetière points out, are often degraded, and use horrible language—horrible to us, but not to them, being meaningless by vain repetitions—but even here there are often heroic virtues and life-long self-sacrifices, as the records of the Prix Montyon prove, which M. Zola never sees, or does not think worth recording, having an eye, like the old man with the muck-rake in Bunyan, only for the treasures of the dustbin.

Jules Lemaitre calls the Rougon Macquart series a pessimist epic of human bestiality: he goes on to remark that Zola is not a realist, an observer of actual life at all, as Daudet and others are, but in his way a prose Hugo, less of an artist, of course, but with the same turn for symbolism and flamboyant exaggeration of what he sees in his mind's eye.

I have myself lived in France and talked to the French peasant, and found him full of tact and good breeding, in gentlemanly manners infinitely superior to our own lower orders, either in town or country; but, as I am an obscure person, let me quote a passage from Matthew Arnold's essay on "Equality":

Mr. Hamerton is an excellent observer and reporter, and has lived many years in France. He says of the French peasantry that they are exceedingly ignorant. So they are. But, he adds, "they are at the same time full of intelligence; their manners are excellent; they have delicate perceptions; they have tact; they have a certain refinement which a brutalised peasantry could not possibly have. If you talk to one of them at his own home, or in his field, he will enter into conversation with you easily, and sustain his part in a perfectly becoming way, with a pleasant combination of dignity and quiet humour. The interval between him and a Kentish labourer is enormous."

Mr. Machen may be right, or wrong, as to the "United States of Gehenna," to which, however, I regret that no humorous American replied with a little criticism of our own failings (acerrima proximorum odia?—TACITUS); but I am quite sure that, with his fiery ecclesiastical prejudices, he does not understand the French peasant of to-day.

H. M.

[Mr. Machen writes: So far as I can discover the points in "H. M.'s" letter are these:

1. That M. Brunetière disagreed with M. Zola.
2. That even in French cities heroic virtues are to be found.
3. That M. Jules Lemaitre thinks that Zola was a pessimist.
4. That "H. M." likes French peasants.
5. That Mr. Hamerton liked French peasants.

The second proposition I do not deny; the others seem to me more or less irrelevant. I mean they prove nothing in particular. I might say "I admire York Cathedral," and "H. M." might retort, "Yes; but Smollett hated it, and Smollett was a very keen observer and had no fiery ecclesiastical prejudices." Or, again, I might observe that I did not think very much of "The Epic of Hades"; to which, of course, "H. M." would answer, "So much the worse for you, as John Bright thought Lewis Morris the greatest poet of the age, and John Bright had no fiery ecclesiastical prejudices." This sort of argument will not lead one very far; for my part I know, as all the world knows, that Zola was an honest man, and a fair man, and a lover of truth—he gave his proofs, let it be remembered—and that it is a monstrous absurdity to suppose that such a man would concoct a lying and malignant fiction concerning his own countrymen. Indeed, "H. M." should be the last to urge the contrary to this proposition, since Emile Zola was certainly not a man of fiery ecclesiastical prejudices. Finally—to take a point of mere literature—"H. M." should be aware that Symbolists are the only true Realists.]

[We will supplement Mr. Machen's reply by observing that there is considerable corroboration of Zola's view of the French peasant to be found in Balzac. "Les Paysans" is in its way almost as strong an indictment of the French peasant as "La Terre."—ED.]

COCKNEY RHYMES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I exceedingly regret to have overlooked the distinction drawn by Prof. Skeat, thereby incurring his just rebuke. I apologise to him and to your readers.

March 2.

T. S. O.

"FRANKLY IDIOTIC"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The contention of Mr. Porter that it is not obvious that yain in Hebrew and oinos in Greek mean "wine" is undoubtedly true. It is not obvious; no more obvious than that khalab in Hebrew and gala in Greek mean "milk," and not a mixture of chalk and water: one cannot prove it. But when a new interpretation, which has never been heard of until within the last few years, is put upon these words—viz., that they denote a decoction styled "unfermented wine"—the burden of proof lies with those who put forward this theory: it is incumbent upon them to prove that such a thing as "unfermented wine" was known to the ancient world at all.

Possibly the following extract from a private letter of a Jewish professor may be of interest:

Wine was commonly so strong that it needed dilution with water. Unless it would bear dilution by at least a third as much water as wine, it was not regarded as deserving the name of wine. Hence the ordinary word for pouring out wine is masag (lit. mix). There are many references to the intoxicating effects of wine, but moderation in drinking was strictly enjoined. Wine was held in very high repute as a food, as a medicine, and as a stimulant of joyousness. Wine was required at many religious ceremonies, especially at the Sabbath sanctification and in the Passover Eve. . . . "Wine of the vat"—i.e., wine before complete fermentation—was drunk as a beverage, but was not held in favourable repute, and was not normally used for religious ceremonial. . . . As the law now stands in the Jewish codes, for the Passover red wine is to be preferred, but it may be very much diluted. Raisin wine, made by steeping or boiling raisins, may be used, and is very commonly employed. The temperate habits of Jews are by some attributed to the very fact that wine is so frequently associated with religious usage. Thus the sanctification of wine-drinking is held to produce a reluctance to over-indulgence and a feeling in favour of strict moderation.

The fullest discussion of the whole question is to be found in A. M. Wilson's book, "The Wines of the Bible" (1897), which is at the same time virtually a criticism of "The Temperance Bible Commentary," where the opposite side is argued. His conclusion is that so far as the ancients are concerned there was no such thing as unfermented wine.

I fear that nothing can be inferred from the Vulgate calix meus inebrians, as the Hebrew undoubtedly means "my overflowing cup," and I fancy that most Roman Catholic writers interpret inebriare in the sense of "saturate" rather than "intoxicate," both here and in the well-known "Anima Christi." The reproach levelled at Our Lord of being a glutton and a wine-bibber is more to the point.

It is a pity that teetotalers damage a good cause by over-statements: to me—who have been a total abstainer for sixteen years, and who intend to remain so until the rest of the world becomes temperate—it does seem "frankly idiotic" to denounce the temperate use of wine because of its abuse, as it would be to denounce the using of marriage because of the "corruption which is in the world by lust," a corruption far more widespread and far more detrimental to the religious and moral sense than that caused by the misuse of intoxicating liquors.

March 3.

J. M. NEWLAND SMITH.

EAST AND WEST

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—IN THE ACADEMY of the 8th and 22nd February I have just seen two notices, under the above title, of a recent book of mine entitled "The Crescent versus the Cross." I am aware that it is not considered good form for an author to enter into a discussion with the reviewer of his book. Nevertheless, I shall expect from your courtesy that you will allow me to make a few remarks on the criticisms of my reviewer. I should read with equanimity the views of a literary reviewer who kept the personality of the author out of his mind when treating the subject of his book, no matter whether the author were his friend or his foe. Your reviewer violates this dignified rule when he says, with evident disdain, that, in spite of my "academic distinctions," my work is a superficial appeal ad populum. In reviewing my book along with some other works written with totally different objects, he compares only one portion of my book with theirs, with an evident confusion of judgment. He praises one of these authors, a Semitic writer who seems to have dealt with the comparative merits of Islam, Christianity, and Judaism; at the same time he attacks me, hinting that I am incapable of showing such scholarship in dealing with these subjects. His disdain blinds him to the fact that I have put forward no pretensions to being acquainted with Semitic literature, about which he makes so pedantic a display.

Your reviewer reproaches me with confusing together the Gospel, nationality, customs, trade, politics, etc. His knowledge of the affairs of the world is apparently very vague, and he therefore does not see that the Christian world has been confusing these things ever since medieval times, and that it was on account of such a confusion of thought that all the bloody wars were waged by Christendom against Islam, and more especially against my own nation. The reviewer remarks with pointless sarcasm that I am annoyed "because the friends of the dead in the West, as in Turkey, care more for the manner of sepulture than the fact." This is another misrepresentation of the views I expressed in my book. What I observed was that, as in the matter of birth and marriage, so in death also, superfluous ceremonies afford great opportunities for the priesthood to uphold their old intolerant influence among the superstitious masses. In order to find an appreciation of Islam your reviewer says, "We will turn from the Efendi" (which simply means Mr. and is, of course, not my title) "back to Richard Burton, or to some of the instructed officials," who, he remarks, are embraced in my "condemnation" (such as, I suppose, the late Sir William Muir). No Mussulman who is a student of English literature would be grateful to him for this kind of appreciation, as the former gentleman is regarded by them as one of those Occidentals who like to entertain their European readers of sensuous temperament by giving them shady traditions in vogue among the vulgar in the Orient, while the latter always promoted missionary efforts under the guise of Oriental scholarship and entertained a deep-seated hatred against Islam. After finding me devoid of any philosophic sense, your reviewer concludes his criticism with a philosophic display of his opinion about Islam, which I find full of high-sounding phrases without much sense. I may add that "The Crescent versus the Cross," which the reviewer has treated with downright abuse, has been regarded worthy of translation into the four great Oriental languages—namely, Arabic, Turkish, Hindustani, and Persian, and it will soon appear in these languages.

HALIL HALID.

[Our reviewer writes that he has not the advantage of any knowledge whatever of the personality of the author, beyond what may be found between the covers of his book, and a very brief note in the public press stating that he had been chosen to represent the University of Cambridge at the Congress of Orientalists. Our reviewer concludes that the author supposes him to be some acquaintance ill-disposed to him: this is entirely erroneous. Our reviewer does not allude to any Semitic writer who has dealt with the comparative merits of Islam, Christianity, and Judaism, nor to the late Sir William Muir, nor to such portions of Burton's "Arabian Nights" as are valuable to the curious in pornography. Nor does he suppose that any Mussulman would be "grateful" for any hafr appreciation of his religion; he would suppose Mussulmans to be satisfied with it without such patronage.—Ed.]

FRENCH AND LANGUE D'OC

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In an article entitled "Burns's Home-spun," published in your issue of February 22nd, the following remarks occur:

After many strange vicissitudes the ancient speech of Alfred lingers in scraps of patois among the orchards of Somerset, the fens of Lincoln, on the downs of Wessex, in the dales of Cumberland, on the moors of Yorkshire, and in the solitary glens of Scotland. Exactly the same thing has taken place in France, where the peasant of the South employs the ancient language of the Troubadours, the true Langue d'Oc, from which modern French has diverged so much that they are now practically different tongues.

Langue d'Oc and French have always been different tongues. Langue d'Oc, more usually called Provençal, is an independent language derived, like French, Italian, and most other languages of Southern Europe, from Latin. During the Middle Ages it was spoken throughout the southern part of France, while in the North, French, or "Langue d'Oil," as it was sometimes called, was employed. Provençal was used as a literary language by the southern French poets, the Troubadours, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, but after this period Provençal literature, for political reasons, began to decline, and almost ceased to exist in the fifteenth century. Lately an attempt to revive Provençal as a literary language has been made by Mistral and others.

The language spoken to-day by the peasants of Southern France, and written by Mistral, is indeed the language of the Troubadours, but it has altered and developed from the medieval language just as much as modern English has developed from the English of, say, Layamon, or modern French from the French of Chrestien de Troyes or any other writer of Northern France in the twelfth or thirteenth century.

March 3.

BARBARA SMYTHE.

THE SICILIAN PLAYERS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I was glad to read the appreciation of the Sicilian Players which appeared in your last issue. It is so far removed from the cock-sure methods of the ordinary professional critic as to be a really scientific document. There are so many of these gentlemen lying in wait for the opportunity of explaining a new thrill, that it is pleasant to find one who is anxious to temper his judgment by reason. For over the Sicilian histrionic methods a good many have lost their heads.

As a student of acting, I have seen those people, and to find a parallel standard I have had recourse to an extensive experience of provincial acting, ranging from first-class to "portable" theatres. It is with the acting of the last-named houses I propose to deal. I hope I am doing no injustice to the actors I have seen in the "portables," to say that the plays in which they appeared entirely concerned themselves with the crude and elemental passions. I think it was Zola who said that Art was Nature seen through a temperament. To gain the approval of their audience, it was necessary that they should use realistic methods. At bottom, realism is simply the representation of certain passions in so accurate a fashion that it shall give the simulation of Nature—and such simulation should set up the concomitant emotion, or passion, in the mind of the spectator; the cruder the nature of the actor, the more real will the effect of his acting be to an audience equally crude in its emotions. Hence your "portable" actor prides himself upon the realism with which he can depict a hand to hand struggle, the simulation of an epileptic fit, or the representation of the death of a lawless man. All these things the Sicilian Players can do well, because their racial qualities are elementary, and they are possessed of a temperament to which these crude passions appeal as capable of mimicry.

There is another thing in which the "portable" actor is deficient or careless, that is stage management. As a rule, on "portable" stages, persons and things "occur." My point will be better understood when it is stated that the aim of the modern stage manager is to see that the characters in the background should move in perfect harmony with the actions of the characters in the foreground. The ideal of stage-management may briefly be described as—to produce a series of pictures, the balance of which is so equably preserved that at no moment is the theme lost sight of through the over-predominance of minor details. In the closing scene of Malia the only impression I carried away was that of a helter-skelter of people obtruding themselves towards the footlights—the principals struggling to break through to the front of the stage, the brouhaha of contending parties, a sudden tiger-like spring, and then the curtain fell. What I had missed was the mimetic representation of overwhelming passion in the principal players—instead of witnessing the fierce combat of two rivals in love, with their elemental passions raising them to a pitch of tragic grandeur, the whole thing appeared to me to be simply a vulgar row.

I refuse to accept Signora Aguglia as a second Duse or Bernhardt. To mention her in the same sentence is to degrade them. She is an exceptionally clever mime, capable of representing certain crude passions. In my view, she failed to bring out the finer part of Iana in Malia. In those silent passages where, in the hopelessness of her love, she kneels before the image, I saw no trace of the struggle of conflicting emotions fighting for possession of her soul. Instead of that, there was the crude emotionalism which one associates with those of a grosser nature. Her movements of abandon were sheer animalism when they were not devoted to morbid mimicry of pathological states.

But all these things do not make up the highest art. We have no lack of realistic actors in England. A sterling histrion like Mr. Warner can give you a horribly realistic representation of Coupeau, or the picture of a paralytic with astonishing accuracy. But that style of thing is no longer popular. The modern actor, if he be an artist, eliminates those repulsive details, so that cultured as the playgoer has now become, I am surprised at this sudden display of atavism on the part of the public—this eager assistance at what may be termed a success of curiosity. Those who saw the same players in La Figlia di Jorio could judge that, temperamentally, they were unable to depict the finer emotions in D'Annunzio's play. As for Signor Grasso, he is the one brilliant exception, and as I have already trespassed too much upon the courtesy of your space, I must content myself by recording my gratitude for the privilege of witnessing the initial efforts, in England, of a really great artist.

March 2.

ROBB LAWSON.

CENSORSHIP OF PLAYS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—We desire to express our sympathy with the dramatic authors in their demand for the abolition of the present system of censorship of plays. We are all anxious that the moral and educational influence of the drama shall be for good, but we agree that the present method of supervision has failed to achieve this object, and we should be glad to see the necessary public control secured by other means.

William Agnew.
Maurice Baring.
Sidney Ball.
H. Belloc.
Arthur C. Benson.
E. F. Benson.
Max Beerbohm.
Wilfrid Scawen Blunt.
R. A. Bray.
H. E. Butler.
S. H. Butcher.
R. J. Campbell.
Edgar F. Carrit.
Winston S. Churchill.
B. A. Crackanthorpe.
Walter Crane.
Jennie Cornwallis West.
G. Lowes Dickinson.
Maria Theresa Earle.
A. S. F. Farquharson.
Everard Feilding.
H. A. L. Fisher.
J. W. Fortescue.
Douglas Freshfield.
Roger Fry.
Feodora Gleichen.
Edmund Gosse.
W. H. Hadow.
H. Rider Haggard.
H. L. Henderson.
Stewart Headlam.
Clemence Housman.
H. W. B. Joseph.
Herbert Jeykyl.
K. Leeds.
L. G. Wickham Legg.
Betty Lewis.

Oliver Lodge.
Lucas.
Emily Lutyens.
Lytton.
Edith Lyttelton.
H. J. Mackinder.
Charles F. G. Masterman.
P. Chalmers Mitchell.
A. R. Orage.
William Poel.
Mary E. Ponsonby.
A. Quiller Couch.
Robert T. Rait.
Walter Raleigh.
Charles Ricketts.
G. Grant Robertson.
William Rothenstein.
Bertrand Russell.
Margaret of Sarawak.
Ernest de Selincourt.
Charles Shannon.
Edith Sichel.
Ethel Smyth.
Edward F. Spence.
Henry Scott Holland.
L. Alma-Tadema.
R. J. E. Tiddy.
T. Fisher Unwin.
Allan F. Walden.
Charles Waldstein.
Emery Walker.
Sidney Webb.
Beatrice Webb.
Frederick Whelen.
A. E. Zimmern.
F. de Zulueta.

FRAMEHOUSE = WORKHOUSE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—On page 1A of "A Commentarie vpon the Fiftene Psalmes, called Psalmi Graduum, that is, Psalmes of Degrees: Faithfully copied out of the Lectures of D. Martin Luther, very frutefull and comfortable for all Christian afflicted consciences to reade. Translated out of Latine into English by HENRY BVLL. Imprinted at London . . . 1577." one finds these words: "And the common people are as it were, the framehouse of Satan, because they loth and despise that which is dayly taught them." A marginal note to this says: "The common people are the framhowse or workehowse of the deuill.—Deut. 29." These quotations might with advantage be added to "The Historical English Dictionary in its next edition."

February 29.

EDWARD S. DODGSON.

[Our List of Books Received has again been unavoidably held over.]

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE
RED DRINK THE WHITE
& BLUE
 DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
 & AFTER DINNER.
 In making use less quantity, it being so much
 stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

The Best Tonic

For the restoration of energy and vitality; the relief of mental and nervous exhaustion, impaired digestion or appetite, there is no remedy so beneficial as

Horsford's Acid Phosphate

(Non-Alcoholic.)

It is a scientific and carefully prepared preparation of the phosphates that provides the tonic and nerve food needed to improve general health.

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 154 Old Street, London, E. C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.
 Fullset Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

Ready, Monday, March 2nd,
 "THE BOOK MONTHLY" for March, 6d. net.

CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR
 The Pen and the Book; fresh, crisp paragraphs about both; also a variety of Illustrations.
 AN UNLISTED LEGION
 Books that have Never Been Written—and Others.
 WHO BUY REPRINTS?
 Not the Middle Classes, but the Working Man—By John Cawker.
 "AS WE WERE SAYING—"
 Sir Henry Drummond Wolf's Stories of Literary Men.
 A LONDON LETTER
 Mr. Meredith at Home on his Eightieth Birthday—By the Editor.
 LIGHT AND LEADING
 New Fast and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.
 THE GENERAL READER
 Snap-Shot Reviews of the Best and Best-Selling Books.
 NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY
 Particulars of Interesting Volumes likely to be Published this Month.
 BOOKS OF THE MONTH
 A Classified Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions, and Reprints of February.
 OUR EXCHANGE AND MART of Books Wanted and For Sale.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

The Autotype Company

74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON

MONOCHROME COPIES

BY THE PERMANENT AUTOTYPE CARBON
 PROCESS OF PICTURES BY OLD MASTERS
 From the PRINCIPAL COLLECTIONS OF NOTE.

NUMEROUS EXAMPLES OF WORKS BY MODERN ARTISTS

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY'S Processes of Permanent Photographic Reproduction are extensively employed by the Trustees of the British Museum, the Local Government Board, many of the Learned Societies, and leading Publishers.

COPIES OF COINS, SEALS, MEDALS, MSS., DRAWINGS, ENGRAVINGS, ART OBJECTS, MICROSCOPIC WORKS, &c.

For Limited Editions the Autotype Processes of Book Illustrations are cheaper than any existing methods of Block Reproductions, and yield infinitely superior results.

Inquiries are invited from those requiring Book Illustrations of the very highest quality. SPECIMENS AND ESTIMATES SUBMITTED.

The Autotype Fine Art Gallery

74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Open Free Daily, 10 to 6

Sir Hubert Von Herkomer AND PUBLIC OPINION

Sir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey to the Editor of "Public Opinion," says, on February 11th, 1908:—

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper, PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which would be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged, and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly. From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is, after all, not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you, with all my heart, continuous success with your paper.

Yours very truly,

(Signed) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

PUBLIC OPINION A WEEKLY REVIEW of CURRENT "THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY"

Every Friday Twopence
 EDITED BY PERCY L. PARKER

The Purpose of PUBLIC OPINION is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political, and social progress.

PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent Post Free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 15s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to—

PUBLIC OPINION, 50 & 51 Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

SPECIMENS FREE ON APPLICATION

Swan Sonnenschein & Co. LIMITED.

THE EVIL OF THE MILLIONAIRE

By FRANCIS MINTON, Rector of Cottingham. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

NEW VOLUME OF SIR JAMES RAMSAY'S HISTORY.

The Dawn of the Constitution

Or, The Reigns of Henry III. and Edward I.
A.D. 1216-1307.

With Maps and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s.

HISTORY AND ETHNOGRAPHY OF SOUTH AFRICA

(South of the Zambesi.) By G. McCALL THEAL. Vol. I.—THE PORTUGUESE IN SOUTH AFRICA, 1505-1700. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d.

MENTAL PATHOLOGY IN RELATION TO PSYCHOLOGY

By Prof. STORRING. Translated by THOMAS LOVEDAY, M.A., Professor of Philosophy in the South African College. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.

THE WILL TO DOUBT; Or, The Place of Doubt in Human Experience.

By ALFRED H. LLOYD, Ph.D., Professor of Philosophy in the University of Michigan. Crown 8vo, cloth, 4s. 6d.

LUDWIG II. OF BAVARIA

By CLARA TSCHUDI. Translated by ETHEL H. HEARN. With Coloured Portrait. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d.

WILLIAM CLARKE

A Collection of his Writings, with a Biographical Sketch. Edited by HERBERT BURROWS and JOHN A. HOBSON. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d.

PRODUCTION: A Study in Economics

By P. H. CASTBERG, of Christiania. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.

ATTENTION

By W. B. PILLSBURY, Professor of Philosophy in the University of Michigan. Large 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THOUGHT AND THINGS, OR GENETIC LOGIC

Vol. II. Experimental Logic. By JAMES MARK BALDWIN, Professor in the Johns Hopkins University. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

DICTIONARY OF SPANISH QUOTATIONS

By T. B. HARBOTTLE and MARTIN HUME, C. de la Rea, Academia Española, Lecturer in Spanish History and Literature, Pembroke College, Cambridge. With Authors and Subjects Index. Small demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

EIGHTEENTH YEAR OF ISSUE. Price 3s. 6d. net.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS YEAR-BOOK, 1908

SIXTH ANNUAL ISSUE. Price 7s. 6d. net.

THE SCHOOLMASTERS' YEAR-BOOK AND DIRECTORY, 1908

"A book of reference that the educational profession and the Press have by this time found to be indispensable."—ATHENÆUM.

SWAN SONNENSCHN & CO., LTD.,
25 High Street, Bloomsbury, W.C.

From GREENING'S NEW LIST

Send a post-card for Greening's 1908 Catalogue of General Literature.

TO BE PUBLISHED ON 10th MARCH.

Messrs. GREENING desire to apologise to subscribers for the delay in the publication of the new work by SAMUEL COWAN, entitled:—

The Royal House of Stuart

This work, in two handsome volumes, will positively be on sale at all the best booksellers on Tuesday, 10th March. Price for the two vols., £2 2s. net.

The delay in publication is due to the elaborate nature of the work and the difficulty experienced in procuring some of the illustrations. The work contains the most complete collection of Stuart portraits ever published. Among others the authentic Orkney portrait of Mary Queen of Scots, now, for the first time, reproduced by permission of His Grace the Duke of Sutherland; also the portrait of Queen Annabella Drummond, wife of Robert III., from the private collection, and by permission of Sir James Drummond, of Hawthornden.

The "Royal House of Stuart" is undoubtedly the most interesting chapter we possess of Scottish History, and the author starts as far back as the Eleventh Century, when we get a glimpse of the Thanes of Lochaber, the progenitors of the Stuarts. The early part of the work is devoted to an outline in brief of the High Stewards of Scotland, the first time that a consecutive narrative of these officers of the Crown has been attempted, and this is succeeded by a condensed narrative of the official life and administration of every Sovereign of the House of Stuart, concluding with Queen Anne, the last Sovereign of the Stuart line.

The Royal House of Stuart

By SAMUEL COWAN, J.P. 22 2s. net.

By the AUTHOR of "THE CURSE OF THE ROMANOFFS."

ROYAL LOVERS AND MISTRESSES

The Romance of European Sovereigns. By DR. A. S. RAPOPORT. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, cloth, 16s. net. [Ready in April.]

AN IMPORTANT SOCIOLOGICAL WORK.

EDUCATION, PERSONALITY AND CRIME

A Study in Multiple Personality in its relation to Crime.

The book will contain Notes selected from the study of about 200 criminals, including murderers, thieves, pickpockets, loafers and burglars.

By DR. ALBERT WILSON. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net. [Ready in April.]

GREENING'S NEW FICTION

NEARLY 20,000 COPIES SOLD.

BEAU BROCADE

By the BARONESS ORCZY, Author of "The Scarlet Pimpernel." 6s.

THE WHITE ROSE MYSTERY.

A Tale of Conspiracy by GERALD BISS, Author of "The Dupe." 6s.

THE WHITE ROSE MYSTERY.

By GERALD BISS. SECOND EDITION NOW READY. 6s.

DAILY TELEGRAPH says: "A breathlessly exciting novel. It is a wonderful story. In some imperious fashion of its own it compels attention. You simply cannot help reading it. Its vivacity is infectious."

"A terrible but a noble piece of work."

VINCENZO'S VENDETTA.

By JOSEPH PRAGUE.

THE MORNING POST: "Mr. Prague writes as one who has mastered his art, and claims of right a high place among contemporary novelists. We expect a great future for the author, for he has painted in his hero a fit subject for tragedy, a man whose fall affects us like the fall of a Roland, fires the imagination and purges the soul."

VINCENZO'S VENDETTA. 6s.

A FINE PIECE OF WORK BY A NEW AUTHOR.

THE LOVE SEEKERS.

A Dramatic Novel. By MARY WALPOLE. 6s.

THE MORNING POST: "A book of carefully studied character drawing in which the characters are conceived and brought into relation in a proper philosophic scheme. There is dramatic art in the telling. Miss Walpole has essayed an interesting study, and has done it well."

THE SCOTSMAN: "Full of animation in its delineations of the wayward emotions of women."

By the HON. MRS. WALTER FORBES.

LEROUX. A Dramatic Novel.

6s.

BY THE JEWISH KIPLING.

THE NEW GALATEA. By SAMUEL GORDON. 6s.

Mr. Samuel Gordon is to be classed among the small but noteworthy band of novelists, including Maarten Maartens and Joseph Conrad, to whom English is an acquired language. In fact, Mr. Gordon did not speak or write a word of English till well in his teens. But that did not prevent him from earning, for his Jewish stories, the title of "The Jewish Kipling." However, for his novel, "The New Galatea," Mr. Gordon has chosen a thoroughly English group of characters, and handles a theme which in its boldness is reminiscent of the most advanced Continental writers, with a delicacy which cannot offend even the most Puritanical taste.

GREENING & CO., LTD., 91 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1871

MARCH 14, 1908

PRICE THREEPENCE

ABERDEEN ART GALLERY.

The ART GALLERY COMMITTEE are prepared to receive applications for the APPOINTMENT OF DIRECTOR AND CURATOR of the Art Gallery and Industrial Museum. Salary, £300 per annum. The Curator will have to devote the whole of his time to the duties of the office and must be a competent organiser of Picture and Arts Exhibitions, and capable of lecturing upon Art subjects.

Applications, stating age, qualifications and previous experience, and accompanied by testimonials, to be lodged with the Town Clerk on or before the 14th instant.

W. GORDON, Town Clerk.

Town House, Aberdeen.

THE MOSHER BOOKS

THE NEW CATALOGUE FOR 1908

is now ready, and will be sent free on request to booklovers anywhere that can be reached by mail. This Catalogue, like those that preceded it, is not made up of old and hackneyed quotations concerning books. You are not wearied by "a jollie good book" jingle and that sort of thing, but you are treated to some very genuine prose and verse not seen in every cut and decidedly dried anthology.

THOMAS B. MOSHER, PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

JUST PUBLISHED. 8vo, boards, 1s. net.

THE SLING.

Remarks in connection with Lectures delivered in the Royal Institution, May, 1905, to June, 1907.

By WM. LEIGHTON JORDAN.

London: Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co., Ltd.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds of Type-writing carefully done at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3d. 6d. per 100.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

TYPEWRITING, 8d. per Thousand, including paper and postage. MSS. neatly and clearly typed. Satisfaction guaranteed.—Miss DREW, 84 Park Row, Bristol.

NOTICE.

All communications to the Editor should be addressed to 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

All business communications must be sent to The Manager of "The Academy," 67 Long Acre, W.C.

Books for Sale

PARISH AND SHAW'S DICTIONARY OF THE KENTISH DIALECT AND PROVINCIALISMS IN USE IN THE COUNTY OF KENT (pub. 10s.), 2s., free.—W. E. GOULDEN, Second-hand Bookseller, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

5 WORKS BY CANON RAWNSLEY:—Ruskin and the Lakes; A Rambler's Note-Book at the Lakes; Life and Nature at the Lakes; Lake Country Sketches; Memories of the Tennysons. Published at 3s. 6d. net, for 1s. 6d.; new.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

BOOKS.—ALL OUT-OF-PRINT and RARE BOOKS on any subject SUPPLIED. The most expert Bookfinder extant. Please state wants and ask for CATALOGUE. I make a special feature of exchanging any Saleable Books for others selected from my various Lists. Special List of 2,000 Books I particularly want post free.—EDW. BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16 John Bright Street, Birmingham. Oscar Wilde's Poems 21s., for 10s. 6d.; Ballad of Reading Gaol, 5s. Who's Who, 2 vols., 1907, 11s. net, for 5s.

THE FAUNA OF BRITISH INDIA, including Ceylon and Burma. Published under the authority of the Secretary of State for India in Council. Medium 8vo, with two coloured plates and numerous illustrations. COLEOPTERA (CHRYSMELIDÆ), Vol. I, price £1.

London: Taylor & Francis, Red Lion Court, Fleet Street. Calcutta and Simla: Thacker, Spink & Co. Bombay: Thacker & Co., Ltd. Burma: Myles Standish & Co., Rangoon. Berlin: Friedlander & Sohn, Carlstrasse, 11.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:—

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical Advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley, Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A Furnished House in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

Books, etc., Wanted

THE CAMBRIDGE LITERARY AGENCY, which is placing Novels, Short Stories, Articles, and Poems with over 100 (One Hundred) Publishers and Periodicals, sold, on December 31, 12 Short Stories and a Serial by UNKNOWN WRITERS. Hundreds of unique testimonials. All MSS. submitted by GEORGE G. MAGNUS, 115 Strand, London.

WILL PURCHASE AT ANY TIME.

ILLUMINATED MANUSCRIPTS, from the earliest times till the beginning of the XVIth Century; Incunabula and other Early Printed Books; Illustrated Books, Prints, from the XVth and the beginning of the XVIth Century. Rare Old Books and Prints.—JACQUES ROSENTHAL, Munich, Bavaria. 10, Karlstr. 10.

QUEEN SQUARE CLUB.

A social club for men and women interested in politics, literature or art. Lectures, entertainments, chess and bridge. An exquisite Queen Anne club-house, close to the British Museum and Russell Square Station. Inexpensive lunch and dinner. Subscription two guineas.—Apply Secretary, 9 Queen Square, Bloomsbury.

Science plus Art

in the making of

The Historians' History of the World

No single generation can claim a monopoly of artistic genius, or an aggregate endowment of artistic genius evolved out of and advancing upon the genius of past generations. Are there sculptors living, for example, whose work renders superfluous the work of Phidias, of Praxiteles, of Michelangelo? Are there painters living whose work makes us wish to dispense with the canvases of Botticelli, of Raphael, of Titian, of Rembrandt, of Velasquez? Are there dramatists living whose works cause us to forget Sophocles, Æschylus and Euripides, Molière and Corneille, Jonson, Shakespeare, Goethe, and Victor Hugo?

Yet the knowledge of anatomy in which Michelangelo took such pride is the stock knowledge of thousands of students of to-day; the technique of the masters of the Renaissance is at the finger-ends of other thousands; and the structure of the ancient dramas has been subjected to the scalpel of a thousand critics. If knowledge alone would suffice, thousands of students of to-day might surpass the greatest works of art and all the masters.

But knowledge alone does not suffice. Knowledge alone may produce a science. It may explain and interpret an art, but it cannot create that art. For this there is requisite knowledge plus the something—often indefinable save through its results—called artistic genius.

All this is true of every art whatsoever; of the art of historical composition no less true than of the others. Mere knowledge may produce a Polybius, a Diodorus, a Dion Cassius, a Froissart, a Freeman, or a Gardiner; it could not produce an Herodotus, a Livy, a Macchiavelli, a Gibbon, a Froude, a Carlyle, or a Macaulay. And what is obviously true of these master writers and a score or two of their fellows is true in greater or less degree of some hundreds of less famous narrators, each of whom has contributed to world-history some description of an event, some estimate of a character, or some analysis of an institution that bears the stamp not of knowledge alone, but of knowledge plus something—enthusiasm, in sight, artistic feeling—that raises it out of the ordinary and makes it in its way an incomparable and priceless heritage.

It was chiefly the pursuit of these well-told stories that led the editors of The Historians' History of the World to search throughout the mazes of historical literature, in all languages. For the most part such search was not necessary to establish mere facts. These could have been supplied by the direct contributors to The History—each in his own particular field—out of the resources of their own studies. Had nothing more been desired than the production of an authoritative, scientifically exact record of world-history, without pre-eminent regard to the literary quality of that record, by far the most facile method would have been to have each prominent contributor write de novo the entire history of the nation or the period of which his studies had given him supreme knowledge. Nor would the resulting history have lacked in literary merit, as the names of these contributors will adequately testify. But these scholars themselves would be the first to declare that their joint efforts, thus applied, could by no possibility hope to produce a narrative every part of which would bear comparison, as a literary production, with already existing narratives, scattered throughout the literature of many peoples and of various ages.

To find these ideal narratives, as we have said, the editors of The Historians' History searched far and wide; in the highways of literature and in its byways. They searched with equal avidity through the literatures of all languages; they gave impartial heed to great names and names that were obscure; they sought the writer who had the gift of story-telling wherever he might be found.

How well they succeeded no one can fully realise who has not scanned at some length the pages of The Historians' History. But hundreds of critics have so examined those pages, and their almost unanimous voice has attested the extraordinary success of one of the most herculean of literary undertakings. Other hundreds of general readers who would lay no claim to literary insight have similarly testified to the engrossing character of the narrative which this ingenious method has produced. Meantime some scores of technical students attest that the literary pre-eminence of The Historians' History has been achieved at no sacrifice of scientific accuracy. It has more than once been said, and it may with full justice be repeated, that the book represents the happiest combination of historical scholarship with literary acumen that ever went to the production of a large historical work.

THE FREE BOOKLET.

We have no space, even were it desirable, to extend the argument here. But a full account of The History is given, together with sample pages and illustrations, in a Descriptive Booklet which will be sent gratis and post-free on application. This Booklet explains the scope and plan of The Historians' History of the World—25 volumes covering the entire history of the world, from the earliest times to the present, in a continuous and fascinating narrative. It explains also the low price at which The History is now offered, and the easy terms of payment—amounting to only 4d. per day—on which it may be secured. The coupon enables you to obtain the Booklet gratis and post free.

INQUIRY FORM.

The Times (Book Club),

Date.....

380, Oxford Street, London, W.

Please send me, gratis and post-free, the Descriptive Booklet of The Historians' History of the World, with specimen pages, particulars of prices in various bindings, and the convenient terms of payment.

Name.....
(Please write clearly.)

Address.....
A. 3.

CONTENTS

	Page.		Page.
Life and Letters	551	The Heart of Gambetta	560
The Destroyer	553	Happiness and Horror	561
Reviews :		"The Limit"	563
Politics and Tariffs	553	Irish Pictures	564
Two American Mythologies	554	Shorter Reviews	565
Mr. Hardy's Drama	555	Fiction	565
Two Books about the Navy	557	Drama :
Lord Cromer's Book: Its Personal Aspect.—Part II.	557	"The House" and "Mrs. Bill" at the Court Theatre	566
		Correspondence	567
		Books Received	570

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-Class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to The Wilsford Press, Ltd., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The Publishing Offices of THE ACADEMY are at 67 Long Acre, London, W.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

THE recent publication of some of Queen Victoria's letters has reminded the public of the amazing toleration extended to the late Baron Stockmar's continual interference in British affairs during the earlier part of her late Majesty's reign. It is, therefore, not surprising that legitimate curiosity has been excited concerning the German Emperor's letter to Lord Tweedmouth. We fully share in that curiosity, but we cannot share in the indignation of the majority of our most reputable contemporaries, against the Times, for having drawn public attention to the letter. Since we have no knowledge of the manner in which the Times obtained its information, we can express no opinion as to its legitimacy, but we cannot join in condemning our contemporary on the ground of its having exceeded the duties of the Press by publishing the information.

Since there is no reason to suspect his Imperial Majesty of sinister motives in writing to Lord Tweedmouth, and every reason for trusting Lord Tweedmouth's and Sir Edward Grey's honour and independence, we have no sympathy with those individual members of the House of Commons who have shown a disposition to press for more detailed information than they see fit to give. It is time to admit frankly that public control over the details of the foreign relations of a great nation is a sheer fiction, and must remain impossible, if any consistent policy is to be maintained. Public control has never yet prevented war, and the most useless and ultimately disastrous wars have generally been the most popular.

There is no reason, except the fetish of party government, why the services of distinguished statesmen, such as Lord Lansdowne and Sir Edward Grey, should not be at the disposal of the country simultaneously, in the conduct of foreign affairs. We rejoice that the opponents of the ridiculous and illogical system of party Government are gaining strength and speaking more plainly every day, and we are not sorry that Lord Lansdowne, Lord Rosebery, and Mr. Balfour have had this opportunity of showing that they will not allow party considerations to prevent Lord Tweedmouth and Sir Edward Grey from exercising their discretion freely in a matter of this kind, merely because they belong to a different political faction from themselves.

We learn with some surprise and considerable regret that the project for a memorial to Shakespeare has not fallen through. The committee has collected a certain amount of money, and is now looking about for a site and a design. Doubtless they will get both, and the latter will ruin the former. On merely æsthetic grounds the little half-moon of green which Park Crescent folds in its arms is more beautiful in most lights than any product of modern architecture and sculpture is likely to be; but æsthetic objections to the scheme are not the heaviest. Is it realised that if we build a memorial to Shakespeare in London we shall be putting him a little above Prince Albert, a good deal below Queen Victoria? And have we forgotten Milton's sonnet?

Memorials are erected from one or more of three causes: the impulse of personal affection driving to practical expression; the need for reminding the present and future ages of the work of the man or woman celebrated; the desire to boast before foreign countries. Neither of the first two causes is operative in the case of Shakespeare. We have no personal affection for him, not only because we never knew him personally, but because the Shakespeare of the public imagination is a purely fantastic being guaranteed by no evidence whatever. We may easily forget Canning, or Disraeli, or Havelock, or Hugh Rose, even Gordon, because war and politics are things of the moment, snow upon the desert's dusty face. We can never forget Shakespeare. And as for boasting before foreign countries, it would be futile. France would smile, Germany is already quite dangerously jealous, and modern America pretends to be of English descent in order to claim its share. It would be much more sensible and more graceful to spend the money in putting up memorials to Goethe and Molière.

The idea of a Shakespeare Memorial is either ridiculous or offensive, or both. But a practical use might be found for the money collected. Sir John Hare suggests a National Theatre. There is much to be said for this; but the money would be better spent, perhaps, in paying Mr. Tree never to produce Shakespeare again. A still better scheme would be to devote it to teaching people to act and dance and sing for themselves. Nothing is more deplorable, nor more socially dangerous, than the dependence of us all, rich and poor alike, on professional amusers. From the gallery-boy at the "Mo" to the Jew in the stalls of the Gaiety, we are helpless without the paid mime; and if the money was ours, we should hand it over to Mr. Louis Parker, Mr. F. R. Benson, Mrs. Kimmins, and a few others, and send them up and down the country teaching the people the lost art of play.

There would still be room in plenty for the professional who deserved it—for such an artist, for instance, as Miss Maud Allan, the dancer. The event of the week—the only event worth serious consideration, to the mind of the writer of this note—has been her appearance at the Palace. He believes this to be literally the first time London has had the chance of seeing the most beautiful of the arts perfectly exhibited. It is impossible to compare Miss Allan with Mlle. Genée, because they move in totally different worlds. Each is perfect in her own art; but we hold Miss Allan's art—the art of dramatic posture-dancing—to be the higher. We can imagine no better katharsis for the Puritan than to witness Miss Allan's "Salome" dance; and we commend, as highly as her consummate art, that lady's courage in devoting every gift and beauty she possesses to its service.

What has become of the "Baconians"? So far as we know, they have for some time forborne to shake the foundations of the literary world, and one is sorry for this silence. For, after all, there was something grandiose about the Baconian doctrine, and, since folly must always be with us, it is better that it should be on the great scale.

One thinks, with laughter, of Ignatius Donnelly's "discovery"—that the whole of Shakespeare's plays are a book intus et foris scriptus, containing a hidden history of the Elizabethan Age, and yet one cannot help envying the "discoverer," who was, no doubt, as fully possessed with a sense of the magnificence of his theory as was Columbus when the shores of the New World appeared on the horizon. How Donnelly must have enjoyed the working out of his scheme, the marshalling of those intricate systems of figures, the infinite labours of calculation, and, above all, the "results" which rewarded his toils. One hopes that he died a convinced Baconian; disillusionment would have been too cruel.

And the later developments have not lacked their majestic and imposing follies. Puzzles are very well; one can have some good fun with many of them; but how pale and trifling are their joys compared with those of a theory which makes all the literature of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries one vast puzzle, which bids us scan misprints and decorative title-pages, and even watermarks, with a firm assurance that the minutest yod may be a fingerpost of the hidden mystery. Mr. W. H. Mallock once caused the frontispiece to the first English version of Montaigne to be reproduced in illustration of the great theory. In the centre—if one remembers rightly—there were displayed certain arches; you turned the page to one side, and these arches became capital B's. The deduction, of course, was that Bacon wrote Montaigne's essays; a simple but splendid logical process. Baconianism, it will be seen, was not long content with its haul of Shakespeare; it went abroad and added Montaigne and Cervantes to Bacon's achievements, and then, returning, swept in practically the whole of Elizabethan and Jacobean literature, including Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy."

Nor was this enough. There was a lady who wrote a book to show that not only did Bacon write all the works of his age, but that he also founded Rosicrucianism and Freemasonry, and that St. Paul's Cathedral was constructed from his designs. And, best of all, the Baconian activities persist to this day, and the Baconian Secrets—it is not quite clear what these are—are preserved in the keeping of the officials of the British Museum and of the great paper-making firms, as appears by the continued use of certain water-marks. And there is a school within a school which not only maintains that "Shakespeare" was written by Bacon, but holds that Romeo and Juliet is an allegory of the Orphic Mysteries. On a rainy day one shakes off gloom in meditating on these matters, and one cannot help wishing that it were all true. Still, one must not forget that there are real literary and historical mysteries which await solution. Is the whole of modern drama to be traced back to the dramatic "performance" of the Easter sequence Victimæ Paschali? What is the history of the root cam or gam (a word in common use in Shakespeare's time)? Is the French Compagnonage, which celebrates—or did celebrate till quite recently—such curious rites, related to Freemasonry; and is there anything to be said in favour of the theory which makes each body a descendant of the Roman Collegium?

Last week's Punch contains a cartoon representing "Mr. Punch" standing with two children while in the background a Nonconformist minister, an Anglican Bishop, and a Roman Catholic priest are represented as indulging in a violent brawl. Mr. Punch has a grieved face, the face of the typical British Idiot who never can understand anything. He says "These children want better education," and the three brawlers in the background reply, "Don't interfere with us, we're busy fighting." This is the sort of thing one expects to see in a violent partisan paper like the Westminster Gazette, signed by "The Office Boy;" but it is a disgrace that a paper with the traditions of Punch should thus ignorantly and maliciously attack the Established Church of this country and the Roman Catholics because, in the most dignified and strictly moderate language, they have announced their intention of resisting the efforts of unscrupulous political Nonconformists to seize their schools and compel their schoolchildren to adopt the religion of Mr. McKenna under pain of heavy penalties. The people of this country who are eccentric enough to desire that their children should be educated in the faith of their fathers and who are not attracted by "the New Theology" may well be thankful that their interests are not safeguarded by "Mr. Punch" in his capacity of the typical British Idiot.

The current number of the Reperiorium für Kunstwissenschaft, so ably edited by Professor H. Thode and Dr. von Tschudi, contains an interesting note by Freiherr von Hadeln on two pictures in the National Gallery, No. 808, and No. 1440, which at present hangs immediately above Gallery VII. These half-length figures, now representing St. Peter Martyr and St. Dominic, were first attributed to Gentile Bellini by Morelli, who pointed out that the cartellini ascribing them to Giovanni are both additions. This attribution has been generally accepted, though the authorities of the Gallery still retain the old one. But, according to Freiherr von Hadeln, the figures were originally far from being what they now seem. He maintains that what Gentile actually painted was the portraits of two Dominican monks, and that these were transformed by additions of a much later date into representations of the saints whose emblems and names they now bear. He points out that the inscription "Imago Fratris Theodori Urbinati" can be distinguished under the later addition in the St. Dominic canvas, a fact which any one can see for himself by examining the canvas, or indeed by consulting the catalogue, though the compilers of the latter have committed a precise inaccuracy which is quite inexcusable. They state that the date MDXV. is inscribed on the cartellino. It is not, but is upon the parapet below the original inscription, and in very much smaller characters, added apparently at a much later date even than the cartellino.

Freiherr von Hadeln expresses the opinion that the pictures ought to be restored to their original state by a careful removal, not only of the cartellini, but also of the halos and other emblems. We must distinguish between the pictures. The St. Peter Martyr panel is, of course, in a better state, and might probably be successfully restored. But we find it less easy to believe that the St. Dominic canvas could now be brought back to a state which would enable it to rank, as Freiherr von Hadeln contends, with the "Caterina Cornaro" at Pesth, or the "Sultan Mahomet" in Lady Layard's possession. It is only fair to observe that the authorities of the National Gallery, whether past or present, are not responsible for the suspicious appearance of the canvas, for it does not belong to the Gallery, but is a loan from the Victoria and Albert Museum.

We have pleasure in announcing that Mr. Laurence Binyon will give a series of four lectures in the Theatre of the Albert Hall on Thursday afternoons from the 19th of March to the 6th of April, at half-past five o'clock. The lectures will each last for one hour, and will deal—First, with China in the Twelfth Century, one of the recurring Chinese periods of "illumination" and culture; the Second, with the growth of a National Art in Japan, which culminated in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries; the Third, with the Chinese Renaissance in Japan, which was triumphant in the fifteenth century, and the second wave of influence of the Ming art of China; the Fourth, with the Later Art of China and Japan, showing the last impulse from China in Japan in the eighteenth century, and certain European influences. Tickets may be obtained from Messrs. Carfax and Co., 24, Bury Street, St. James's, S.W., at the price of one guinea for the course, or 6s. for a single lecture.

Lady Grove contributed a characteristic letter to last Tuesday's Westminster Gazette. Her contention is that the entrance of women into the political arena would tend to leaven the "hysteria" by which mere men are liable to be infected in matters touching Imperial interests. Here are a few samples from her letter indicating the sort of soothing influence which might be expected to be infused into party politics by the accession to its ranks of the Suffragist sisterhood:

I can say that a more mischievous exhibition of party vindictiveness under a false pretence of concern for high Imperial interests than the action of the Times . . . it is difficult to conceive.

Has the Times correspondent any idea what such rhodomontade would mean? I doubt if any other sane, intelligent human being does (sic).

I imagined that they and this method of expressing them were confined to the utterances of half-educated nursery governesses or their charges.

Now, irrespective of any opinion as to the justification for the "scare" raised by the Times in connection with the Kaiser's correspondence with Lord Tweedmouth, we should like to point out that the person who is primarily responsible for the policy adopted by the Times in the present juncture is the military correspondent of that journal. He is unquestionably one of the most able and brilliant men in his own line in this country. So far is he from being under any suspicion of being a mere party man that it is notorious that he supplied most of the details and materials for the attack on the late Government's military policy, and that he has steadily supported Mr. Haldane's policy under the present Government. In fact, he is in military matters conspicuously and notoriously free from any party bias whatsoever. Whether he was right or wrong in drawing public attention to a state of affairs which he considered dangerous is a matter of opinion; but to speak of his action as "mischievous exhibition of party vindictiveness" is to betray a quite remarkable ignorance as to the real facts and motives underlying the policy of the Times as directed by him. Lady Grove's letter will not advance the cause of Woman's Suffrage, but as an object-lesson it is of inestimable value.

THE DESTROYER

He stands on high in the torch-glare,
 With planted feet, with lifted axe:
 Behind, a gulf of crimson air;
 Beneath, the old wall that gapes and cracks.
 Tossed fragments crash to dust and smoke.
 Exulting life, aloft he stands
 And drives his unrepentant stroke,
 Nor heeds the havoc of his hands.
 Below, one lingers gazing. Why
 Within his heart does secret joy
 Quivering awaken and reply
 To each home-blow, Destroy, destroy!
 Lulled in the casual feast of sense,
 Awed by the ages' fortress-walls,
 Out of its slumber roused, intense,
 To the swung axe a demon calls;
 Man's Demon, never satiate,
 That finds nought made to its desire.
 How shall it to this world be mate,—
 To a world of stone, a heart of fire?

LAURENCE BINYON.

REVIEWS

POLITICS AND TARIFFS

Sixty Years of Protection in Canada. By EDWARD PORRITT.
 (Macmillan, 6s. net.)

At the present moment Mr. Edward Porritt's book on the working of commercial tariffs in Canada should secure a great many readers, for it is impossible not to see that the struggle in the British constituencies, whether we think of bye-elections or of the next general election, will revolve for some time round the proposals for tariff reform. The various political parties know this, and all our legislators know it, however paramount to any of them individually the claims of temperance or educational questions, for example, may seem; the situation implied, therefore, is that every thoughtful man and woman among us should be acquiring information with a view to giving or to influencing a well-deliberated vote on this crucial matter of Imperial policy. Four or five years ago an attitude of neutrality towards the movement for tariff reform was reasonable; a faith in which we were all brought up was rudely challenged on grounds that had not been well considered, and it was at that juncture the course of a prudent person to demand time in which to weigh the possibilities of numerous issues which were receiving no attention from either convinced reformers or equally convinced free traders. There was sense four or five years ago in the attitude of those who refused to make up their minds immediately. But May, 1903, is now a fairly distant date, and, complicated though the whole matter of fiscal legislation may be, it will soon become a proof of pusillanimity rather than of sagacity to be found taking neither side. And as the assailants of the present order of things grow more aggressive it becomes more incumbent upon the free traders to defend their faith upon other than historical grounds. They have been feeling for some time the necessity of showing that a system which undoubtedly worked well in the middle of last century is still so essentially good that to tamper with it would be an act of almost impious rashness, and at this moment no efforts are being spared to demonstrate that in countries where protection is stringent real prosperity is absent.

There is no country whose experiences it could be more pertinent to quote than Canada, because for many reasons we have of late been led to regard our vast western Dominion as among the most valuable assets of the crown. German, French, and American statistics, when urged for or against free trade, are regarded as interesting by most of us—and no doubt the conditions of these countries, as far as they are analogous to those prevalent in the British Isles have their lessons for us; but it is impossible not to feel that the views of Canada, and the situation as existent in Canada, appeal with more direct force. In a measure this is right, as the policy of tariff reform is advocated largely on the ground that it would play an important part in welding our Empire into a homogeneous whole; and in a measure it is wrong, as the social conditions of Great Britain much more closely represent, if only by the size of population and the magnitude and diversity of affairs, those of Germany than those of Canada. So we must not exaggerate the assistance to us that a knowledge of Canadian affairs may be when we are striving to arrive at an impression upon tariff reform that shall be sufficiently clear-cut to warrant our voting upon it; but at the same time we do well, of course, to learn what we can from Canada.

Mr. Porritt loses no time in revealing the lessons which he wishes to teach us. His first chapter deals with what he terms "the grip" of the protected interests on the Canadian government and the Canadian press, and the text of this chapter is formed by the following words of Sir Richard Cartwright, the present Liberal Minister of Trade and Commerce in the Canadian Parliament:

The moment you introduce the Protective system you create a class whose interests are essentially different from those of the people at large, and who become the ready contributors to corruption funds, sharing with their masters the plunder which they have been enabled to take from the people.

The quotation is not dated, and it probably belongs to the period of Sir Richard Cartwright's career when he was one of the leaders of the Liberal party through many long years of opposition, during which time he became recognised as the chief financial critic of the Conservative policy of qualified protection. It is known that the Liberal party since they have been in office in Canada have modified their views considerably upon the whole question of fiscal legislation, so that a sermon preached from an old dictum of Sir Richard Cartwright loses much of its authority, as the author has repudiated, to a great extent, the views which he enunciated formerly—or, at any rate, is in a Cabinet which holds a very different opinion from those views. This does not daunt Mr. Porritt, however. He finds the old Sir Richard Cartwright—the man in opposition whose duty it was to oppose—to be the real man; and the new Sir Richard Cartwright—the man whose words as well as his deeds have to be tempered by the responsibilities of office—a negligible factor in Canadian politics. The same courage is manifested throughout the book, which is a frank and forcible pamphlet against protection, wherein every attempt is made to show the logic of free trade views by a recapitulation of the history of protection in Canada from 1846 until the present day—1846 being, of course, the date of the repeal of the Corn Laws in Great Britain by Sir Robert Peel. That history is told by Mr. Porritt so as to leave no doubt on the mind that protection, as demanded by the manufacturing interests in Canada, is the bane of the Dominion, and that the fiscal and commercial freedom accruing to Canada through the adoption by the mother country of free trade has been at the bottom of Canadian prosperity. So abundantly and overwhelmingly clear does he make this out to us that it is inevitable that we should suspect his reading of history, for if the advantages of free trade to Canada were as conspicuous as he believes them to be, the present differences of opinion could not exist.

Mr. Porritt describes how the action of Sir Robert Peel was received at first with consternation in Canada, where many leaders of thought held that the only possible reply to such a disturbance of the commercial ties between the mother country and the colony was the secession of the colony. He does not minimise the seriousness of the disloyal feeling produced, but he passes very lightly over the actual and material effect in Upper Canada of the fiscal revolution in Great Britain. We have always understood that the Canadians—at least, many of those engaged in the grain and lumber businesses—suffered very severely when the preferential bond with Great Britain was divided; but Mr. Porritt does not linger over this part of the story, preferring to state that “the year of the adoption of free trade in England saw also the beginning of the era of fiscal freedom for Canada,” before passing to an elaborate review of the Elgin-Marcy treaty. This was the treaty of conditional reciprocity between the United States and Canada which followed upon the realisation by Canada that the home government had not insisted on reciprocity for the Dominion when throwing open the ports of Great Britain to the imports of the United States. The advantages which this treaty gave to the maritime provinces of the Dominion were undoubted, for which reason the United States abrogated it as soon as possible. This is all well explained in Mr. Porritt's book, for he has the gift of exposition and knows the authorities whom it is best to consult; but the fact that the Elgin-Marcy treaty during its short life brought some benefits to some parts of Canada is not a proof that all Canada bloomed into prosperity under conditions attributable to the establishment of free trade in Great Britain.

The last half of Mr. Porritt's book can be described briefly as a denunciation of what is known in Canada as the National Policy—that is to say, a policy of protection of Canadian industries. Mr. Porritt adopts the picture of the situation drawn by Mr. Goldwin Smith, who has said that on the neck of the Canadian there rides an association of protected manufacturers making the community and all the great interests of the country contributory to their gains. The sage of Toronto is always eloquent, usually positive, but not invariably right. The facts which Mr. Porritt has recorded are undeniable, but there are other facts which would put a different complexion upon them. The protectionist movement in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec between 1846 and the Confederation is an indication that, whatever the opinion of the maritime provinces, swayed by the profits of American reciprocity, may have been, Montreal, Toronto, and Quebec, three fairly important centres, did not share it. There was here a distinct feeling in favour of protection, and Mr. Porritt is reticent on the matter. He accounts for the present desire for protection as an expression of the grasping nature of certain groups of manufacturers, but for practical purposes those manufacturers had no existence until thirty years or forty years after the adoption by Great Britain of free trade. The gap in the argument is sure to be supplied by the protectionist, who will say that all along Canada has been simply shaping towards a self-supporting position, and that then, as now, her rulers have believed that some measure of protection, whether they approve theoretically of it or no, has been found necessary if the profits of development are to be turned to the best advantage for the country.

Mr. Porritt writes with absolute sincerity, and after giving close personal attention to the situation; but the virtue of his advocacy of the cause of free trade is detracted from by his inability to see the history of Canada from any standpoint save that of the convinced free trader. We began by saying that the experiences of a country like Canada in the matter of protective tariffs would be of particular interest to persons still striving to make up their minds which way they should vote in the near future at home. Many such persons may read this book, but we should not be at all surprised if the result proved exactly opposite to that desired by Mr. Porritt. Let us imagine the case of the elector—and his like must be numerous—who knows this much of Canada, that it is a country which of late years has made enormous progression, and has increased in riches, population, and importance day by day. He reads in Mr. Porritt's book that all this fine result has been secured under a system of protection, and is asked by Mr. Porritt to curse the system because, if it were abolished, the country would be so much wealthier and happier. The elector may be convinced and register a free trade vote in England. But he may rebel against Mr. Porritt's conclusions, which are necessarily based on theory, and regard only the material facts. He may argue to himself that the rise of Canada is an undeniable truth, that a higher rise under different conditions can only be a matter of argument, and find himself, after perusal of a well-informed and vigorous free trade tract, a recalcitrant protectionist.

TWO AMERICAN MYTHOLOGIES.

The Mythologies of Ancient Mexico and Peru. By LEWIS SPENCE. Religions Ancient and Modern. (Constable and Co., 1s. net.)

If this volume can be taken as a true sample of Messrs. Constable's series they can be highly congratulated. But though they have many contributors recognised as authorities in their several subjects, it is too much to expect that many of the volumes will reach the standard of Mr. Spence's. It is a model of sound knowledge, crystallised in an attractive form, and enlivened by original criticism. Mr. Spence succeeds in giving his readers, in an hour, a comprehensive view of the nature of the Mexican and Peruvian religions, corrected up to the latest guesses of modern research, with sufficient detail of those terrible and picturesque rites and mythologies to attract the attention and impress the memory. He performs this feat in some eighty small pages and some fifteen thousand words. The first and last of his six short chapters he devotes to epitomising the latest surmises as to the origin of American peoples and religions, and the question of foreign influence on the latter. It is supposed that America was once united to Europe by land, of which Iceland and the Farö Islands are the remains. By this isthmus, it is likely that our remotest ancestors, the Proto-Europeans, migrated into America. It is possible that the "Skraellings," found in North America by the Norsemen in the tenth century, may have been the least mixed descendants of these first settlers from Europe. Similarly and more probably, Proto-Mongolians migrated by way of the Behring Strait. The variety of shapes in the crania of the Amerinds (American-Indians) shows that they were evolved from races of more than one type the Proto-Mongolian being the largest element. The Red man would, therefore, be the development of the Yellow man before he became Mongolian, with some admixture of the White man before he became European. By the time of the second discovery of North America, no race resembling "Skraellings" remained, and the type of the Red man had become mainly Mongolian. But the rapid approximation of Europeans to the Amerind type, which is taking place before our eyes, may point to an apparent rather than real disappearance of the Proto-European element, which was evident in the "Skraellings." As regards the Mexican and Peruvian races in particular, at the time of the second discovery of America, both were, in their own countries, later races, which had imposed themselves by conquest on earlier, advanced civilisations, in the case of the Mexicans, only some four hundred years before the arrival of Columbus. Both countries also were at that time expecting the speedy fulfilment of legends, which promised the arrival of a beneficent race, which should be white and bearded. In Mexico, the influence of the white-clad priests of Quetzalcoatl, a deity probably adopted from the earlier inhabitants by their Aztec and Toltec conquerors, no doubt procured the friendly reception of the Spaniards. In the mythology and religion of both countries, there is very little trace of elements extraneous to America, though it is just possible that Buddhist priests from Cabul, according to the Chinese annals, visited those parts of America in the fifth century. Such influence would, of course, be traceable in the milder religion of Peru and the cult of Quetzalcoatl in Mexico, and not in the sanguinary rites peculiar to the Aztecs. The stories of Celtic visits—that of St. Brendan from Ireland, and that of Prince Madoc from Wales in the year 1170—have scarcely obtained any historical confirmation. We confine our remarks mainly to these less interesting chapters of Mr. Spence's book, because something of the more interesting rites of both countries is well known through Prescott, whose works have been brought up to date by copious notes in recent editions easily obtainable. We desire rather, in the small space left us, to notice a few of the clear and pertinent comments of Mr. Spence. He differentiates admirably between Totemism and Naturalism. "Naturalism is the worship of some natural phenomenon," whether it be the sun, or some animal, or plant. The religion of the Peruvians was much more naturalistic in this sense than that of the Mexicans. It was as naturalism, that the late Professor Max Müller and his companions attempted to explain all religions, and, in our estimation, threw no light on any. We welcome Mr. Spence's impatience at a school which seemed to us, even in our early youth, full of dull charlatanism, and we now hope is fast disappearing. Totemism is the belief in blood-kinship of a family or tribe with an animal or plant, originally adopted as a symbol. The origin of the worship of Huitzilopochtli ("the humming-bird on the left") was, Mr. Spence considers with great likelihood, partly totemic. That god was the Ares of the Aztecs, and their peculiar tribal deity. Totemism probably existed once among the Peruvians, but there is little trace of it by the time of the arrival of the Spaniards. Mr. Spence also notices the absolutely theocratic nature of the empire of Peru :

The Inca was the direct representative of the sun upon earth. He was the very keystone of a socio-religious edifice, to equal which, in intricacy of design and organisation, the entire history of man has no parallel to offer.

All crime was a direct offence against the majesty of the Inca, who, as viceroy of the Sun on earth, had been blasphemed by the breaking of his law.

Mr. Spence also notices that behind and above the theocracy of Peru, and the polytheism of both countries, celebrated as it was in Mexico by atrocious ritual massacres, was the idea of One Supreme Being, to Whom appeal was made, especially in the rites of confession and absolution. The many gods were but, as it were, the personification of His attributes. Mr. Spence is of those who hold that "the knowledge of that power is inalienable from the mind of man." He notices also that the sacrifices of the Mexicans were probably, and in some cases certainly, offered, not to appease the gods, but to nourish them. A possible parallel occurs to us in those curious texts of the Mosaic law and prophecies, which refer to the "food" (pabulum) and the "table" (mensa) of the Lord ; and more certainly in the narrative of Bel and the Dragon.

Finally, we may for once disagree with Mr. Spence, for he finds it difficult to believe that a people so imbrued [as were the Mexicans] in a religion of bloodshed could have been punctilious in matters of morality. It seems certain, however, that as a race [they] were austere moral, pious, truth-loving, and loyal as citizens, and even the sanguinary priests do not appear to have reaped any benefit from their terrible offices.

We are not surprised, for such complete possession by Moloch seems to imply the exclusion of softer daemons.

MR. HARDY'S DRAMA

The Dynasts. A Drama. By THOMAS HARDY. Vol. 3. (Macmillan, 4s. 6d. net.)

It would be a brilliant thing to say that Mr. Hardy's "Dynasts" is too philosophical to be good drama, and too dramatic to be sound philosophy ; but unfortunately it would be untrue. The really true and candid thing to say is, we fancy, that the work is so extraordinary in aim and energy and scope that we are almost baffled in attempting to comprehend it. But it has—most clearly it has—the one quality which could make so large and various a thing coherently vital ; it has philosophical unity.

There are, of course, many people who read Mr. Hardy's novels only for the story ; there are some few, doubtless, who read them only for their expression of the modern questioning mind at its highest ; and there are others, far less numerous (we fear) than the former, but more considerable (we hope) than the latter, who read them as they read Romeo and Juliet, as they read of aught noble and profound in prose or verse

Presenting Thebes or Pelops' line,
Or the tale of Troy divine.

So the publication of the first volume of this work was an arresting event. The author's deep interest in the Napoleonic period, and his acquaintance with men who bore their part in the burden of that great day, these are known to the readers of the Wessex novels. Those loud years of strife and menace form a background for the novelist's imaginative operations, as they do in many of Balzac's novels. In a drama of Napoleon, then, we said . . .

And again : Who among those who hold the true faith of the treasurableness and inspiration of the English Turgenev could fail to look with keen expectation for the work wherein a vaster theme and vaster events should be the medium of his imaginative activity ? The novels have declared so powerful a dramatic force, so sure a sense of dramatic "inevitableness" (to use a cumbrous phrase) that we have looked somewhat urgently for the completion of the promised trilogy. And lastly, we have wondered whether, in spite of his plain dramatic sense, the master of irony would not find himself trammelled in his larger scheme by the limits of his ironic perception. Would not the ironist defeat the dramatist?

At least, we remembered, Mr. Hardy had never been delicately careful of the weed Reputation; he had not hesitated to follow the long series of prose fiction with two volumes of short poems—receiving what thankful welcome from true lovers of true poetry is already known.

Nothing in the "Dynasts," then—and we mean it as the highest tribute—has greatly surprised us; our doubts are dissipated. There are a hundred fine things in it that we should like to mention. There is the singular gnomic force which Mr. Hardy expresses sometimes more clearly in his verse than in his prose. There is the old sense of sardonic laughter somewhere just behind yon cloud or flower, within this lichened rock, in the sunlight frayed from that line of tossing bayonets. There is, as always in his profoundest work, keen sense of:

The heavy and the weary weight
Of all this unintelligible World.

And there are a hundred fine, bright, natural things; dialogue as sharp and volleying as any to be found where quick-minded men meet, rustic humour as rich as—well, as Mr. Hardy's best, for more we cannot say; songs that have surely been overheard, so rightly sung are they. . . . Does the reader remember this from the first volume?—

In the wild October night-time, when the wind raved round the land,
And the Back-sea met the Front-sea, and our doors were blocked with sand,
And we heard the drub of Dead-man's Bay, where bones of thousands are,
We knew not what the day had done for us at Trafalgar.
All) Had done
Had done
For us at Trafalgar!

The new volume contains another, sung by a Peninsula Sergeant:

When we lay where Budmouth Beach is
O, the girls were fresh as peaches,
With their tall and tossing figures and their eyes of blue and brown!
And our hearts would ache with longing
As we passed from our sing-singing,
With a smart Clink! Clink! up the Esplanade and down.

These clearly are the work of the author of "Valenciennes" and the other fine "songs of action" in "Wessex Poems."

This trilogy, however, has more notable qualities. True it is bare of ornament: you will find no mere rhetoric permitted for rhetoric's sake; you will rather perceive a noble austerity and disparagement of unessential felicities. You must even be prepared for a certain harshness of verse, sign of an imperfect mastery of the medium, though it is strange how insignificant this defect appears in the whole drama, especially in the blank-verse parts, which are grave and weighty, often mightily kindling with the living fire. Outweighing every defect, however, there is a singular comprehensive power and clarity of imagination in the vast views which the author commands by a single phrase; as when you look with him from a remote lofty eye-station upon "four groups of moth-like transport ships silently skimming the wide liquid plain;" or, when, in the simple description of a linking "dumb show," he unfolds the immense panorama of conflict as a mere "see-saw," noting characteristically how close by a little stream "continues to trickle unconcernedly to sea." More plainly still is this power manifest in the brief vivid descriptions of the great campaigns; and, perhaps, the best instance is to be found in the splendid and lurid confusion of the Waterloo scenes, with their powerful suggestion of the flinging gambler's fury and failure, and the sombre disenchantment following strife.

We may say all this, and more, without approaching the vital point—that is, Mr. Hardy's own attitude. It is, we take it, plain that he has not written three volumes simply in order to give us vivid pictures of crowded campaigns or a clear and sympathetic characterisation of Napoleon the Conqueror; though these things he assuredly has done. Beyond all this he gives us what is more valuable than thirty volumes of vivid pictures; he gives us a philosophical conception of the vast era, and suggests an interpretation of its national movements—indeed, of human progress itself. Here is the great theme. A finer background he could hardly have chosen, nor one more certain of appeal to thoughtful English readers. The Napoleonic spirit is not dead; its mouthpieces change and pass, thinking they stand for themselves. Mr. Hardy tells us that Napoleon did not stand for himself only, nor for France only; he stood, as we may conceive, for man insurgent, awhile dominant, teased with glory, exposed, smothered. Mr. Hardy spares us the hateful gibe of supposing that lives vanished like smoke and tears fell like rain merely for the aggrandisement of an inordinately ambitious soldier. There is a Hand behind the Show; but is that Hand moved blindly, or does it only seem to move blindly because beyond our comprehension? We are like children who, coming as we think to an irresponsible, hearty pantomime, are suddenly confronted with the Electra or The Trojan Women. Puppets still, of pantomime or tragedy, are the dim figures on the distant dwarfed stage. But what of the Hand, the Brain behind?

It is with the answer to such obstinate questionings that the development of this profound drama is concerned. The suggestion of the activity of what Mr. Hardy calls the Immanent Will is repeated throughout by Spirits of the Pities and Ironies, the Spirit Sinister, and the Spirit of the Years; a Will hinted and glimpsed, distrusted, and finally praised. The pervading idea of the Immanent Will informing the affairs of an infinitesimal world gives unity to the survey thereof. It does more—it affords a persistent clue to the meaning of the mystery of the heaving, bloody earth, that else were merely grotesque and grim. It is the Immanent Will,

The purposive, unmotivated, dominant Thing
Which sways in brooding dark men's wayfaring!

The Spirit of the Pities, interpreting the motions of the all but inscrutable, discerns:

Yet is it but Napoleon who has failed;
The pale pathetic peoples still plod on Through hoodwinkings to light.

Napoleon himself perceives, as in a glass darkly, the Moving Finger writing:

I have ever known
That such a Will I passively obeyed!

but he, supreme Egoist, does not perceive that it is more than his own fate that is written, more than the fate of a dynasty; to him the writing is indecipherable. For the vaster issues of the spinning world's destiny are suggested. Brooding over the expiring frenzy of Waterloo, the Ironie Spirits determine of the Immanent Will

A fixed foresightless dream
Is its whole philosopheme.

But Mr. Hardy does not end with this. The illumination of the Will itself is indicated, and the consequent redemption of the illimitable failure of the world. There is an After Scene in which the author's conception reaches full height. The Spirit of the Years speaks of the "Great Foresightless" weaving its "ceaseless artistries in Circumstance;" of which "but one flimsy ribbon" is all that they have watched. The Pities sing the Will Beneficent:

Who hadst not shaped such souls as we
If tender mercy lacked in Thee!

And following the still sombre questionings of the Spirit of the Years and the Spirit Ironie, sounds the final chorus:

But a stirring thrills the air
Like to sounds of joyance there,
That the rages
Of the ages

Shall be cancelled, and deliverance offered from the darts that were,
Consciousness the Will informing, till It fashion all things fair

Is it only years that have passed since Mr. Hardy wrote the great and hopeless chapters of "Tess" and "Jude the Obscure"? However that be, we are happy to have the completion of a work wherein a great theme is developed in the great manner of which only a mature and powerful genius is capable. And thankful as we are to the author for the vital energy and fine distinction of his drama, we are yet more thankful for the profound conception by which it is illuminated and unified—conception of a finer and loftier wisdom than any discovered by the noblest of his prose writings.

TWO BOOKS ABOUT THE NAVY

Champions of the Fleet. By EDWARD FRASER. (John Lane, 6s.)

The Royal Navy. Painted by NORMAN WILKINSON. Described by H. L. SWINBURNE. (A. and C. Black, 20s.)

PUBLIC interest in the Royal Navy, the growth of which has been so marked during the last ten years, is naturally reacting on our literary activity. Not only is British naval history, formerly somewhat neglected, receiving that attention which is its just due, but there is a tendency to produce "popularising" books on the subject of less austerity than the bulky tomes of the formal historian.

The general standard of these works is high. The invincible spirit of our forefathers lives essentially in the history of the sea service, and cannot fail to inspire, in some measure, the pen of the writer. The two books here considered, although very different in conception, are no exceptions to this rule. Like its title, Mr. Fraser's volume of rambling naval history is discursive and loosely knit, but contains much that is of interest and value from antiquarian, historical, and sentimental points of view. Herein are set forth the services and histories, from the building of their prototypes to the present day, of certain renowned men-of-war and of the officers whose deeds have given to those ships' names their lustre. The book is defective in construction and displays some literary inequality. In Chapter I., for instance, the flavour of the excellent description of the first Dreadnought's exploits in action with the Armada is marred by the concluding "flying glance" at the Dreadnought of to-day—this "glance" consisting of jejune statistics about that very fine engine of war, and the application of exaggerated epithet to her capabilities. Appropriate to the moment, Mr. Fraser calls attention to the part which the Navy took in the military foundation of the Indian Empire. It will be new to most readers that naval guns had a decisive influence on the fortunes of the "fiery few" at Plassey, the renown of which, in most English minds, is exclusively associated with the name of Clive. There are nineteen illustrations, chiefly reproduced from contemporary prints.

The "Royal Navy" is a book with which, at a moment when the Navy seems likely to be dragged into the disastrous arena of party politics, one could wish that potent individual, "the Man in the Street," to be made acquainted. Even those "free and independent electors" who view Naval expenditure through the distorting prism of "anti-patriotic bias," or, to go further, even a "bloated armament" sentimentalist, might acquire some historical ballast in reading it. Admirably printed and attractively bound, it contains, in a surprisingly limited space, a history of the development of the Navy from the reign of King Alfred to the present time. In spite of the necessary condensation, Mr. Swinburne has done substantial justice to his fascinating subject. He writes concisely and to the point, and, although the ground covered is vast, there appear to be no serious omissions. In dealing with the war services of the Navy in modern times, however, he has fallen headlong into the pitfall of contemporary historians. Markedly in chronicling the naval side of the Egyptian and South African Wars he has devoted far too much of his small space to detail and to the relation of the personal services of individuals: this portion of the text standing, in these respects, in unhappy contrast with his admirably condensed history of the Tudor Navy and of "Eighteen Hundred and War Time."

The book is provided throughout with beautiful reproductions of water-colours by Mr. Norman Wilkinson, illustrative of the various types in the long evolution from Alfred's "King's Ships" to the modern man-of-war. These pictures should tend to convince even the most bigoted that, as regards fighting-ships at any rate, the coming of the Age of Coal and Steam has not meant the total destruction of the Romance of the Sea, or the final loss of the artistic aspect of "tall ships." The book concludes with an article on the Seaman's Dress by Commander C. N. Robinson, R.N., which is illustrated by J. Jellicoe.

LORD CROMER'S BOOK—ITS PERSONAL ASPECT

PART II.

IN a first article, published in THE ACADEMY of March 7th, I showed how little Lord Cromer's habit of mind—contracted during his long years of diplomatic make-believe at Cairo—had suited him for the delicate task of historian undertaken by him in his book, "Modern Egypt." Neither the instinct of truth, unblunted by the daily necessities of a false official position, was his, nor a zeal for critical inquiry, nor that strong sense of justice which is so necessary in an historian ready, as a first duty, to reopen hasty decisions and repair wrongs, known to be wrongs. I showed how this was exemplified in Lord Cromer's account of the Revolution of 1882, compiled, as it is, not from fresh and impartial sources, for he had no personal knowledge of that period, but exclusively from the stale record of the Blue Books arranged to suit the case for British intervention, whose special pleader he had made himself. To-day I propose to show how he has dealt with the years immediately following 1882, those of his own early diplomatic career as Consul-General at Cairo. Here his first object is to prove that England's long stay in Egypt has been a fatality imposed on her, not by his mistakes, but by the nature of things, and her failure to fulfil her promises due only to the fact that the promises were impossible. Neither of these propositions is true. Lord Cromer's method in attempting to prove them is as little straightforward as in the earlier case. Ignoring the true reasons which made the intention of an immediate evacuation of Egypt fail, he lays the whole burden of responsibility on the Mahdist rising in the Soudan; while, with regard to the promises made to the Egyptians of restoring to them some kind of constitutional self-government, he contents himself with an attempt to show that Lord Dufferin's "Charter" of 1883, poor reparation as it was for what they had lost, was never seriously intended, either by him or by the Government of the day in Downing Street which entrusted him with its drawing up. On both these points I have it in my power to contribute evidence in contradiction to Lord Cromer's reasoning, evidence, which he cannot have been altogether ignorant of, and which is yet wholly absent from his book.

I may begin by saying that, long before the date of Lord Dufferin's mission to Egypt, I had the advantage of knowing Lord Dufferin personally well. As a mere boy attached to the Athens Legation, and when Lord Dufferin himself was only thirty-four, I was fortunate enough to see much of him during some months that he spent in Greece on his way back home from a first tourist's visit to Egypt in 1859. He was travelling at the time with his mother, to whom he was through life touchingly devoted, and both were kind to me, and the friendly relations thus formed at Athens were, I am glad to remember, maintained between us while she lived and afterwards till his own death in 1902. It was consequently with some confidence that I looked to him, when he came on his mission of reconstruction to Cairo after Tel-el-Kebir, for a fair judgment of the Egyptian case. Nor was I wholly disappointed. It is certain that the disclosures made in connection with the trial of Arabi disposed him to a course which, if it had been taken boldly and at once, would have solved the problem both of an early evacuation and of the placing of Egypt on a self-governing basis. The idea, as I heard it at the time, was to restore the National Party in its civilian elements to power, and so secure the co-operation of the only body of opinion in the country really desirous of reform and constitutional progress. I do not affirm that this idea ever took the shape of a definite proposal made by Lord Dufferin to the Foreign Office, but it certainly underlay the project of recreating Egyptian liberty formulated in his celebrated dispatch. Sir Charles Wilson was, I know, mentioned as a successor to Sir Edward Malet in this connection, and the strong sympathy he had acquired at the time of the trial with Nationalism would have suited him well for the post. It was even half promised that Arabi himself might after a short interval be allowed with the rest of the exiles to return to Egypt and take part in the National reconstruction. I will tell what I know of this.

On December 8th, 1882, General Gordon called on me in London and discussed the whole matter with me; and I find the following note of what he told me on that occasion. He had read the first part of my narrative, published in the Nineteenth Century review, of the events before the war, and he advised me strongly to leave it for the present unfinished:

"You do not require it," he said, "for your own justification, and as to the Government, they are resolved now to do justice. You may have perfect faith in Mr. Gladstone, and I know that he intends to restore Arabi as soon as public opinion shall have cooled down, and he can do it without too sudden a reversal of his policy. Arabi will be back in Egypt in a couple of years, and you can then write your history far more effectively than now."

Three weeks later I received a letter, dated December 26th, in which he repeats the information:

Arabi (Gordon writes) will be back in a couple of years, say in eighteen months. I think things are very critical in Cairo, and the day I called on you I went to Brett [the present Lord Esher, who was then Lord Hartington's Private Secretary at the War Office], and begged him to urge Government to assemble the Notables at once. Napoleon suffered far more from the revolts of Cairo than from the troops. Colvin is to be recalled.

I have never learned in so many words precisely what it was that prevented an idea quite easy of execution at the time, and which alone could have solved the double problem of evacuation and liberal reconstruction, from being put into execution. It is, however, pretty clear to me that the true obstacle to it was the unfortunate identification of English policy with the maintenance of the Khedive Tewfik on the throne. Tewfik was both detested and despised in Egypt—detested by the Nationalists for having deserted the National cause to the enemy after the bombardment of Alexandria, despised by his own small Court party of Turkish pashas for his subservience to English orders. To have left him face to face with his own angry subjects unsupported by British bayonets would have been to risk another revolution. There was only one way in which the policy identified with Lord Dufferin's name could have been made to work successfully, and that would have been to replace Tewfik through the Sultan by a more capable and less unpopular Khedive. For this extreme logic, however, the British Government was not prepared. It would have involved the admission of mistakes altogether damning, and there was behind all their counsels the constant pressure of Finance urging them to be content with a prince who had throughout made himself the pliant servant of their interests. This was the true reason, I do not doubt it, of the failure.

Of Lord Dufferin's personal view of what he intended by his charter I have, fortunately, by me a written record. Among the conversations I had with him in later years about Egypt I find one set down in my diary exactly to the point. It was in 1892, when he had been for some time

Ambassador at Paris, and it was at Paris that it occurred. I give it textually thus:

October 19th.—Called on Lord Dufferin, who was in the same room that Lytton used to work in. He was very charming to me, asking me to give him a copy of my new book [the Kelmescott Edition of the "Sonnets of Proteus"] for his "Helen's Tower," a library named after his mother. . . . I then asked him to help me about Arabi's release, and he spoke nicely of him, and promised to say a word in his favour next time he should have an opportunity. On the general question of Egypt he also volunteered some remarks. He said that, on the whole policy of retaining or abandoning a Mediterranean influence, no responsible person would be willing to give an opinion uncalled for; but that, if Egypt was to be evacuated, there was only one way—namely, to build up some sort of self-government. He was especially opposed to Turkish rule, and had always intended, in the settlement he made, that the government should be in the hands of the native Egyptians, not the Turks. He had devised his "Constitution" for Egypt with that idea. He was not one of those who thought popular government foreign to Eastern ideas. On the contrary, the East had been the home of Councils and Mejlisses, and he had always been of opinion that, if you could put Egypt to work in vacuo, there was nothing to prevent success. He had been glad to see that Baring recognised the help rendered him by the Councils, and he had written to tell him so. We then discussed how the power of the Councils might be increased, and also the safeguards against interference from Constantinople. He talked with so much interest that his servant had to come in and remind him that he had an appointment to breakfast somewhere; and so it ended.

This, though brief, is an important record, and all the more so when it is recollected that it refers to a time when there was the opportunity, caused by the death of Tewfik and the accession of the present Khedive, for making a fresh start at Cairo, had Lord Cromer been willing, in the direction of self-government. It was a private talk recorded at the time, and worth reams of official dispatches.

A more curious bit of evidence is that which I have to give in regard to Mr. Gladstone on the same important point. The full detail of it is, in a manner, forced upon me by one of those little stiletto-stabs in the form of foot-notes appended to the text of Lord Cromer's book, which I noticed in my first article. In it, under guise of defending Mr. Gladstone from an unjust imputation, he seeks, as far as I can understand his motive, to minimise Mr. Gladstone's secret sympathy with the cause of liberty I from time to time was pleading with him. The circumstances of the case were these. In the month of August, 1883, I was on the point of leaving England for India, where it was my design to inquire into the true condition of the native races, and especially of the Mohamedan community, with respect to eventual Home Rule. It was a year since I had had any communication with Downing Street or with Mr. Gladstone. Lord Granville and the Foreign Office were, as I knew, enraged at my interference with their plans in connection with the trials at Cairo, and Mr. Gladstone was estranged from me partly by this, and more especially by the common action which I had latterly taken with Lord Randolph Churchill, in our joint attempt to stop the persecution of the Nationalists, which, after Lord Dufferin's departure from Egypt, had been scandalously renewed. I was quite unprepared for any communication from Mr. Gladstone, nor had I seen his private secretary, Sir Edward Hamilton, the usual channel of my communications with him, for many months, when I received a message from the late Sir James Knowles, editor of the Nineteenth Century review, asking to see me. What happened at the interview that followed is related in two letters written by me at the time to a political friend:

August 30th, 1883.—At James Street I found many important letters, among others a note from Knowles, asking me to breakfast at Clapham; there he gave me the news. He has seen Mr. Gladstone lately, and is assured he will both stay in office, and, if he can find some way for his pride, restore the National Party in Egypt. It appears they are quite aware the present state of things cannot be made to go on, and Sir Evelyn Baring has been appointed with carte blanche to devise a new policy in place of Malet's and Dufferin's, which have proved failures. Baring has written an article in the Nineteenth Century on Lord Ripon's policy in India, full of the most Liberal ideas, which will come out in October, and Knowles thinks he will receive me with open arms. So he advises me to be there soon after he arrives, and thinks the Government will be delighted if we can get Arabi returned [at the election for the General Assembly] for Cairo, and other Nationalists for other places.

Sir James had on one or two occasions conveyed to me messages already from Mr. Gladstone, and, in consequence of this new communication, I agreed to stop at Cairo on my way to India and see how the land lay. A second letter says :

September 8th, 1883.—We have taken our places at Suez, and hope to arrive at Cairo about the 25th, and by that time Malet and Colvin will have gone their way, let us hope for ever; and if there is anything in Knowles's argument, I shall find the field open for me with Baring. At the same time I confess I feel far from sanguine. In the first place, I do not trust Mr. Gladstone as you do. And then I know the difficulties; these will be immense, and without really cordial co-operation from Baring I could do nothing at all that would be any good. . . . Half-an-hour's talk with Baring will probably be enough to show me whether it is worth while my staying in Egypt, or whether I should not rather go on to India. . . . There are still strong influences about the Sultan in favour of Arab independence in Egypt, and, if the English Government chooses, the party could be restored. But it all depends upon the action of our Government.

Three days after this was written, and at the moment of my departure, another communication reached me, this time from Sir Edward Hamilton, also asking to see me. His note was from Downing Street, and I find the following in my diary :

September 12th, 1883.—Spent the day in London. A letter had come from Eddy Hamilton by the morning's post, asking to see me before I went abroad, and I went to Downing Street at one o'clock. Mr. Gladstone is away yachting, and Eddy is acting Prime Minister, and a very great man. I had not been to Downing Street since last year, just upon a year ago, when I went to ask for Arabi's life. Eddy was extremely amiable this time, and asked me what I was going to do in the East. I told him my plans exactly—that I was going first to Egypt, and should call on Baring, and, if I found him favourably disposed, should propose to him a restoration of the National Party, but if he would not listen I should go on to Ceylon and India; that I could not do anything in Egypt without Baring's countenance, for the people would not dare to come to speak to me, but, if Baring would help, I thought I could get the Nationalist leaders elected at the elections; but all depended on the action of our officials. Also, as to India, that I had no intention of inciting to rebellion [this in allusion to attacks recently made on me by the Anglo-Indian Press, and an attempt to induce Lord Ripon to forbid my visit]; that I should go first to Lord Ripon, then to Lyall, and afterwards to the provinces; that the subjects I wished principally to study were the financial condition of the country—that is to say, to find out whether our financial administration was really ruining India, and to ascertain the views of the natives with regard to Home Rule. Of both these plans Eddy seemed to approve, said that Baring would be sure to wish to see me and listen to all I had to say; and, though he did not commit himself to anything very definite about the rest, did not disapprove. I take it, therefore, that Knowles had authority for what he told me a fortnight ago, and that Mr. Gladstone, if not the rest of the Cabinet, really wishes to restore Arabi if he can only find an excuse. . . . With regard to India, Eddy said he would write to Primrose, Lord Ripon's private secretary, to show me all attention; so, on the whole, I am highly satisfied with my visit. . . . We had some talk about Randolph Churchill. He (Hamilton) said that my connection with him in Egyptian affairs did me harm; but I don't believe that, and I look upon Churchill as quite as serious a politician as the rest with whom I have had to deal. . . . He does not affect any high principles, but he acts squarely.

I regret that I cannot give here even an epitome of what my journal has to tell during the month that followed this visit to Downing Street. It is of extreme interest in regard to Egypt, and of the policy which was being pursued there, and I shall publish it some day without reserve. Suffice it to say that I found what was almost a reign of terror going on at Cairo. The civilian leaders of the National Party, no less than the military leaders, had gone their way into exile. Sheikh Mohammed Abdu was in Syria, and the remnant of those who had taken any prominent part in the revolution were living in holes and corners in perpetual fear of arrest. The city was honey-combed with spies. Many patriots were in prison. I myself found in one of the prisons, to which I managed to get entry, amongst other proscribed persons the now well-known Saad Zaglul, Minister to-day of Public Instruction, and Lord Cromer's latest protégé. The following is from a letter I wrote to Sir Edward Hamilton immediately after having seen Lord Cromer :

Cairo, September 28th, 1883.—I promised to write to you, and I will keep my promise, but you must not expect me to say anything pleasant or flattering. I found Baring extremely amiable and willing to listen to all I had to say, and I believe he told me his own views frankly. Our ideas on many reforms wanted in Egypt were the same. His scheme for relieving the debts of the peasantry seemed a sound one, and he struck me generally as being a man of sympathy and courage. But when I have said this I have said all. On the main point of giving Egypt back her liberty we are worlds apart. He neither wishes it nor has the least idea of attempting it. "What Egypt wants," he told me, "is peace and order, not another revolution. We have restored the Khedive and the Circassians to power, and I shall do my best to keep them there."

With regard to Dufferin's famous charter, I find neither he nor any one else look upon it as in the least serious, or as the least important—and they are right. The elections are not serious, nor were ever intended to be by those who drafted the charter. The electoral lists are drawn up by the Government, the voting takes place under the eye of the Governor and in the Prefecture of Police, and in most instances the Governor or the Prefect of Police are the candidates chosen. It could not have been otherwise. The Circassians have been encouraged to re-establish their rule by a reign of terror. There is no protection of any kind against arbitrary arrest, arbitrary confiscation of property, and imprisonment without trial. The prisons in the country districts are still full of untried men. There is no liberty of speech or of the Press; and at Alexandria they began the elections by hanging two more men charged with instigating the riots of last year. . . . Yet, less than two years ago, there were both freedom of speech and of the Press, elections fairly representative, and the beginning of a real Constitution. It may have been necessary for Imperial or International reasons to destroy this and to revert to a system of "peace and order," as Baring calls it. But it cannot be necessary to talk of having given the Egyptians liberty. . . .

This letter and a second, posted by me at Suez, October 3rd, at the moment of my leaving for Ceylon and India, were sent for submission, as had long been customary between Hamilton and me, to Mr. Gladstone. My second letter placed before him what was in truth the crux of the situation at Cairo—namely, the impossibility of re-establishing native self-government through the weak and unwilling instrumentality of Tewfik, regarded, as he was at that time, by all as a traitor to his country, cruel in his vengeance taken on the Nationalists, and a tool of foreign intervention. I expressed my view that if Mr. Gladstone was in earnest in his desire to restore liberty to Egypt some other prince must be placed on the Khedival throne—for choice Prince Halim, a liberal-minded man, who had also the advantage of being a candidate favoured by the Sultan. This was the only logical course. Sir Edward Hamilton's answer will show that both letters were laid before Mr. Gladstone, and suggests the reason, already alluded to, why my advice was disregarded. Sir Edward writes :

Haddo House, October 21st, 1883.—Your two interesting letters written from Egypt, for which many thanks, have both reached me while I am holiday-making in Scotland, but I have taken steps to secure their being seen by Mr. Gladstone. Your account of affairs in Egypt is, to say the least of it, depressing. I won't make any comments on what you say. I will content myself with being the receptacle of bad news and the conduit-pipe of it to headquarters. I will only say that I can't conceive how it would be possible, without the grossest breach of faith, for the English Government to countenance the ousting of Tewfik, whatever sort of fellow he may be.

This seems to me conclusive of the true reason of Lord Cromer's failure to evacuate. The evidence given by the letters and the other contemporary records of Mr. Gladstone's secret understanding of Egyptian things at the moment of Sir Evelyn Baring's entry upon the Cairo stage as British Resident will serve as a useful corrective of Lord Cromer's official narrative. Its value is not impaired by the fact that Mr. Gladstone employed an indirect method of communicating his wish to me, nor by the further fact that in an odd little mystifying note, quoted by Lord Cromer, he pretended ignorance of the how and why of his private secretary's correspondence with me :

I know not how it is that he (Blunt) writes to Hamilton.

That was Mr. Gladstone's way of doing things; and it must be borne in mind that I was officially at the moment in Coventry at Downing Street. Mr. Gladstone was often at strange shifts during his periods of office between 1880 and 1885 to reconcile his former principles with his present practice, and to run with his own liberty-loving hare while hunting with those conscienceless Whig hounds, his colleagues in the Cabinet. It does not even invalidate my testimony to remember that, when the story of Mr. Gladstone's connection with my visit to Egypt was blurted out unexpectedly by Lord Randolph Churchill in Parliament, Mr. Gladstone affected entire ignorance of the whole affair and even got poor Sir Edward Hamilton to write him a note, which he read to the House of Commons, declaring that his conversation with me on September 12th in Downing Street had been "wholly exclusive of politics." These little deceptions are too common to count seriously.

But again I have left myself no space for dealing fully with Lord Cromer's version and perversion of things. The Gordon mission must for the present remain undealt with here.

WILFRID SCAWEN BLUNT.

THE HEART OF GAMBETTA

It is possible that the heart of Gambetta was his most characteristic and most significant organ. Yet there was the nose of Gambetta, a short, eminently Semitic nose which marked the man. There was the eye of Gambetta, a goggled, protuberant eye, which, according to M. Henri Rochefort, who knew him in his youth, became such a disfiguring deformity that it had to be excised, and replaced by a glass substitute. It had helped, together with the other eye, to fix upon Gambetta's features that permanent Levantine leer, robbing the face of dignity, and still lingering on the death mask, the preservation of which we owe to the Republican piety of M. Alphonse Legros. There was the tongue of Gambetta, over which flowed such tides of talk as never were before nor since—interminable streams of gab, converting his poor, ragged, yellow-toothed jaws into veritable Niagara Falls of irresponsible nonsense. Then there was the brain of Gambetta, which, after his death, was found to be of abnormally small weight—weighing little more than, in fact, if as much as, that of an ordinary orang-outang. Still the man was eloquent, physically and mentally active, not wholly bereft of ideals, both moral and political, and though one may laugh at the efforts of the mentally-under-sized and morally-underbred Jackpuddings, the Laurs and the Reinachs, who endeavour to place him upon a pedestal of immortality, to proclaim him as the saviour of France, the genius of modern progress, and the high priest of Democracy, one is obliged to recognise that, his intellectual limitations, his vices, and his vulgarity notwithstanding, he was in several honourable respects superior to many of his followers, certain monied and unmonied rapsallions, shifting sheenies, scurrying curs, who, in spite of their internecine squabbles (principally over a division of "graft"), continue to claim him as their common "Master." On the cover of Miss Violette Montagu's translation of M. Francis Laur's book, The Heart of Gambetta, the publisher (Mr. John Lane) has had the ingenious idea of stamping in gold a double heart. No symbol could have been more apt. Gambetta was a double-hearted man. This is not what the publisher meant to convey, but so it was.

The double-hearted Gambetta may not have been wilfully insincere. Here was a moral condition which lay beyond the scope of his personal control. He was born, as it were, with a double heart. His double-heartedness was a consequence of his descent from two equally strenuous and self-assertive races. On the father's side he was a Jew of Genoese origin, on the mother's side he came of that energetic, voluble, calculating stock peculiar to the town of Cahors, his birthplace, which in the Middle Ages produced the "Cahorsins," the usurers who took the place of the Jews in England after their expulsion by Edward the First—a Meridional race, harder-headed if no less talkative than the Marseillaise, with a strong strain of Latin blood in their veins, and an ancient Semitic streak as well, which might have been initially Arab or even Phœnician. There could not have been much of the Frank, or the Gaul, or the Celt about Gambetta. His consciousness of this fact is visible in the persistence with which he called his disciples to witness that he was a Frenchman, and the most patriotic of Frenchmen. He was ever on his guard against a suspicion—which, during his lifetime at any rate, his bitterest enemies never raised—that he might be mistaken for a foreigner.

The anti-Semitic movement had no spokesmen in France at that time, if exception be made of Albert Regnard, whose popular influence was insignificant. Gambetta, moreover, was a professed Freethinker, and not a practising Jew. Yet he himself gives in these letters to his mistress an accurate and highly significant description of his dual-heartedness. "Dear, adored wife," he writes from Genoa, on February 15th, 1882, "what memories, and yet what poignant regrets, I feel in this spot! Here I walked with thee, adored, embraced thee, and thou art absent, and I feel too lonely in this great marble city, which always seems to me like my cradle. I breathe more freely here than elsewhere, and I feel myself quite at home; its history comes back to me like a tradition of my own family Though a true Frenchman, I feel a hereditary regret to behold once more all the great witnesses of the fortunes of the proud Genoese Republic;" and then, of course, comes the characteristic rhetorical caper without which Gambetta would have been false to his name, the peddling réclame of his own political wares—"a Republic where strength and dignity walked hand-in-hand with the liberty of the people," which, needless to add, is not true.

That as a statesman Gambetta, as far as his nature would allow, was honest may be conceded; but the letters to his mistress which M. Francis Laur has published show how dangerously situated are nations that confide their destinies to double-hearted men. The Dictator that Gambetta had become, in consequence of the dementia of a people "knocked silly" by disastrous war and political upheaval and intoxicated by flaming words, did not hesitate to enter into secret negotiations with Bismarck, whom he called the "Monster," a nickname the superficiality of which alone earmarks its inventor, and with Pope Leo XIII., in spite of the war-cry which he himself had raised of "Le Cléricalisme, voilà l'ennemi." The disciples of Gambetta, who never since his death have ceased to squabble among themselves, are in disagreement as to whether it should be admitted that he actually had a secret interview with Bismarck or not. Herbert Bismarck denied it; but that Gambetta should have invented the whole story—though quite possible—seems to be the least creditable solution of the problem.

These are the two political revelations—the Bismarck interview and the visit to the Vatican—in Gambetta's letters to Léonie Léon which give historical value to the correspondence and justify its publication. Nothing else does. Outside of this, The Heart of Gambetta is a sorry tale of illicit love, ending in tragedy, which the comments of M. Francis Laur are unable to relieve, though written in a style pretentious to the point of burlesqueness. M. Laur has no sense of humour, for which one may occasionally be grateful, since, owing to this deficiency, such exquisite but highly characteristic touches as the following are allowed to pass. M. Laur is describing Gambetta's early rendezvous with his mistress:—

This time she is first at the place of meeting. Her tall, elegant figure throws a harmonious shadow on the mass of greenery rapidly fading at the approach of autumn.

The great man arrives at last with hurried steps, a rather untidy bouquet in his hands. He gathered it himself as he came through the gardens of the Petit Trianon, for he knows the gardener.

"Here are some flowers to beg your forgiveness."

In the at first sight insignificant-seeming detail—"he knew the gardener"—we have the germ of that Opportunist policy with which Gambetta's name as a statesman is primarily identified. It is to the Opportunism, invented by Gambetta, that so many of the crises and scandals from which France has suffered during the thirty years are directly traceable. The Panamists, too, "knew the gardener."

The last chapter of the tragedy of Gambetta is fruitful of a stern moral lesson, which M. Francis Laur fails apparently to perceive. Gambetta's inconscience, his innate Bohemianism, blinded him to the fact that the illicit relations in which he openly lived with Léonie Léon were looked on with disapproval by French society, which in those days was not a whit less strait-laced than it is to-day, and, if anything, rather more so. The poor woman herself was fully conscious of the fact. The scandal was such that when "the Great Tribune" died, literally from over-eating, the common people of the neighbourhood immediately spread about a legend, evidently untrue, but which has persisted to this day, that his mistress had shot him in a fit of jealousy.

The end, when it came, was, M. Laur's lyrics notwithstanding, miserable enough. How little could Gambetta have suspected as he lay on his deathbed that the name of Reinach would become as illustrious in the annals of criminality as that of Cartouche, that his own biographer, M. Laur, would be cuffed out of politics in the midst of the Chamber by another eminent Gambettist, M. Constans, who in his turn was to be the malleus of the Boulangists, a party which grew out of Gambettism, and to which, notwithstanding Mr. Macdonald's statement to the contrary in the Preface of this book, M. Laur certainly belonged until he finally abandoned politics for business. Nor, it is to be hoped, could the Republican leader have foreseen, in that supreme moment, the abandonment of his then youthful henchman Delcassé, in obedience to a mere gesture on the part of Germany, or the collapse of his old friend Spuller's effort to reconcile Church with State on the principles of an esprit nouveau. Yet to a statesman with half of his experience and insight it must have been obvious that the politicians he was leaving behind him were ill-equipped for the realisation of his brilliant schemes. The unhappy woman who had shared his last moments slinks guiltily from the house as soon as death enters it. Her tragedy, drawn out for another twenty-four years, is not less melancholy than his.

ROWLAND STRONG.

HAPPINESS AND HORROR

I SUPPOSE there are still many persons left who labour under the delusion that the age in which we live is the most wonderful, the most splendid, the most happy, and the most civilised age that ever has been since the foundation of the world.

Of course, seventy or eighty years ago, any one who had ventured to doubt this proposition would have been thought quite mad. Macaulay's work is permeated by the assumption that the whole history of the ages had been but a long and tiresome though necessary preparation for the First Reform Bill and the triumph of Whiggery in all the departments of life. To begin with the Church: the martyrs had died, we are to presume, that the Church of England, freed from the errors and enthusiasms of Papists and Methodists, might be a moderate and useful branch of the Civil Service. All the architects of the world had painfully toiled at such fantastic trifles as the Parthenon, the Pyramids, Cologne Cathedral, and Westminster Abbey that we, the heirs of all the ages, might have the privilege of gazing at the supreme beauties of Gower Street. The feudal system was a hideous mass of terror and cruelty: we had supplanted it by the factory system, and under that happy régime the whole of England was being rapidly turned into a gigantic ashpit and coal-hole.

One need not go on with the list: everything, in the estimation of Macaulay and the early Victorians, was infinitely better than it had ever been before, and all antiquity—for to Macaulay Greek Philosophy was as foolish as the Scholasticism of the Middle Ages—was in darkness and we were in light. As far as I remember, the one test by which the nineteenth century triumphed over all other ages was its astounding fertility in mechanical invention: on one side Macaulay marshals all art, all architecture, all poetry, all philosophy; and then triumphantly proves that the nineteenth century alone had made the steam-engine—ergo, that the nineteenth century alone is truly civilised! It is, indeed, astounding that any one can ever have talked such outrageous nonsense; it is extraordinary how any one out of a lunatic asylum could have believed that the factory system in crafts, the Civil Service Church in religion, the invention of devices to make men's lives more comfortable and convenient, the absence of all poetry and all imagination from every place and every region of humanity constituted the ideal world for a human being to dwell in.

Of course, such a line of argument would be quite easy to understand if the speaker were not a man, but the Learned Pig.

"What I want," the Learned Pig might very properly say, "is a world in which my sty is warm and comfortable, well sheltered by improved appliances from rain and east wind. All the mountains must, of course, be levelled, the woods (beech woods excepted) must be grubbed up, and cathedrals and all that sort of thing must be cleared right away—because my end and aim in life is WASH; and all the earth is required to grow me meal, cabbages, and potatoes. I do not want Fine Art, or Poetry, or Religion, or Fine Talk of any description: kindly leave off wasting your time in such nonsense and devote your talents to inventing me a new mechanical washtub, with a patent arrangement by which I may suck Wash when I am asleep. When you have done this, it will be the Golden Age."

Now all this would be quite sound sense in the mouth of a Pig: because, as a matter of fact, a Pig's aim in life is to secure as much wash as possible; and the Pig who gets the most wash is the best Pig, the Ideal Pig. Men, however, are not Pigs. Their being, their aims are, in reality, entirely different, and we must not be tempted to confuse those two excellent but quite distinct creatures because they possess certain things, such as stomachs, in common. It seems to me that the whole of modern civilisation, in its amiable as well as its unamiable aspects, is vitiated by this one false premiss—that Man on the whole equals Pig, and that if you see to his material comforts, his bodily ease, he will be quite happy. Conservatives, Liberals, and Socialists are all alike involved in this one error; behind all their widely divergent arguments lies the wholly false proposition that Physical Comfort will bring about happiness, that Physical Comfort is happiness.

In spite of all our experience since the days of Macaulay, we have not yet got this nonsense out of our heads. It was only the other day that I read in a daily paper that in a year or two happiness all round was bound to come—bound to come with a rush on the wings of flying machines, in the intestines of turbine engines and reciprocating machinery. As one meets this rubbish in popular journalism, I suppose that the populace still clings to the gospel of Macaulay, to the theory which flings all philosophy and all art and all religion on one side as irrelevant, because philosophy and art and religion have no "fruit"—in other words, do not lead to the invention of machinery. But the newspaper on one side; I think that one comes across this notion of modern superiority in quarters very remote from popular journalism. It is my business occasionally to look through books of modern theology, and I find in almost all of them the suppressed premiss that "modern thought," or the "modern mind," is somehow or other vastly superior to the ancient mind, or the mediæval mind. So far as I can remember, this premiss is usually, at all events, a suppressed one—it is something to be taken for granted—and again and again I have wondered why it should be taken for granted, I have desired, all in vain, to see the conclusion of our superiority argued and demonstrated. I suppose, however, that the divines are really moved by much the same reasons as Macaulay and the newspaper writers. They know that we can get to Manchester about five times as fast as was possible a hundred years ago; ergo we are five times happier and better and wiser than our great-grandfathers—to say nothing of our remoter ancestors, who may have taken weeks on the journey. I admit the fact of this higher speed of travelling, but I deny the minor. I say that the length of time in which it is possible to get to the cotton-factories from London is not of the smallest consideration in estimating the sum of human happiness, and I think that if the cost of this rapid transit were fairly accounted for and reckoned up—we should find that we were paying for our corridor express train a most hideous sum, with interest calculated at the rate of about ten thousand per cent. per diem. For, you see, the fact is that Manchester—as modern conditions have made it—is not worth going to at all; on the contrary, any man not a maniac would pay heavily to be transported to some region where Manchester and places like Manchester were impossible, unheard of, and wholly out of the question.

But now there comes the rather important point as to what does constitute happiness—that is, real civilisation. Churchmen can have no difficulty here, for Churchmen cannot deny that all the aims of “modern civilisation”—the real aims, not the sometimes loudly-expressed aims—are, from the point of view of Christianity, entirely and utterly damnable. For the real aims of our day are entirely directed towards the increase of bodily comfort, convenience, and pleasure, towards the increase and improvement of all material goods. It is, of course, demonstrable, that the first Christians were exhorted to take no thought at all for any such matters, to purge their souls utterly of the notion that happiness of any sort or kind is obtainable through physical or material channels. It is clear, beyond contradiction, that the first Christians were taught a gospel which is in direct contradiction to all the common precepts of the present time. They were to take example by the lilies, to avoid saving money, to disregard, and indeed shudder at, material wealth, and never to bother about their material prospects in the future. I know that there is a party calling itself Christian which, somehow or other, escapes this conclusion as to the unimportance, or rather nullity, of material comforts in the Christian system. I have listened to a lecture which made the Magnificat into a sort of Socialist Programme. Frankly, I cannot understand this point of view; I see no room for it on any reading of the early Christian documents. The rich are denounced in these, certainly; but there is no word said in favour of moderate prosperity all round as the way of happiness. Park Lane is dangerous to the soul, doubtless; but there is nothing to show that salvation dwells in Peckham.

But this is a side-issue. What I have to prove is that man is not the Learned Pig, and that measures which would ensure the happiness of the latter will not at all advance the happiness of the former. Well, I have mentioned Socialism; I have declared my disagreement with its positive statement that the equalisation of wealth would make us all much happier. Now I want to declare my adhesion to its negative statement, its declaration that in modern civilisation, so-called, there is not merely a lack of happiness, but a great and ever-increasing horror, misery, ugliness, and degradation. I call the Socialists into the witness-box especially because I am not on their side, because they are under no suspicion of being the praisers of the bygone time, the friends of Toryism, or Religionism, or Reaction (as it is called) of any kind. If I said I once knew a country parson and a Tory squire who thought the whole modern system of things rotten and abominable, the witnesses might be suspected. But one cannot say that such men as Shaw and Wells and the rest of them are either parsons, squires, or under the thumb of either parson or squire; and so, with all confidence, I cite their opinions as to the machinery and conditions of modern life. It is Mr. Wells, I believe, who pictures humanity in modern times under the figure of a man struggling in a hideous swamp, and, with his very efforts to escape, sinking deeper and deeper into the foul, abhorred slime. And this is the result of our “civilisation”—that is, of our theory that man is the Learned Pig, that the more machines you give him the happier he will be. In a word, the Socialist conclusion is in direct contradiction to the Macaulay and daily paper conclusion, which is, briefly, the more machines the more happiness.

And one does not need to take any man's word for the misery and horror and hideousness of our time. It is not necessary to go to Mr. Wells; we can look for ourselves.

We can go to Manchester direct and see what it is like, and wonder that human beings have allowed themselves to be brought to such a pass. I do not know how many square miles of abomination and horror that city contains; but when I think of it its existence seems incredible to me. We used to take all this sort of thing for granted, of course, in the Victorian days; we were proud of our great industrial centres; we reckoned them a mark of civilisation, and a country such as Spain, which does not possess industrial centres, or possesses very few of them, we called uncivilised, retrograde, unhappy. I have never seen a bull-fight—it is a cruel sport, doubtless—but I have no hesitation in declaring that the Spanish peasant in his poor hut, with his Sunday Mass, and his crust of bread, and draught of wine that owes nothing to the chemist, is very much nearer to true civilisation than a cotton-spinner or steel-worker in Manchester or Sheffield; and of the latter one does not know that there is much to choose between the fate of the master or of the man. We have accepted all those miles of horrors, we have been pleased with the infinite sub-division of labour in our factories, and we see the result—the modern manufacturing town, which is hideous, its suburbs which are more hideous still, and its industrial slave population which is most hideous of all, since by the very conditions of its existence, by the fact of its daily mechanical work, without interest, without invention, without the trace of art, without a drop of the most joyful cup of creation, it is fast losing the resemblance of humanity, it is fast parting with the differentia which distinguishes a man from a beaver or a bee. I do not insist on the fact that while wealth abounds in a few hands most of the workers are poor, and some are wretched; that, as a manufacturer's wife has observed, the better the iron-trade, the more miserable the people seem to become. This is to be noted: that a scheme of things which has for its only excuse the production of money and material comfort has in practice worked out as a scheme which deprives the greater number of money and plunges them into the acutest material discomfort. That is amusing enough, but it is not my chief point, because, as I have said, I think happiness is a state which exists independently of material things. Probably—certainly—there have been many happy men much poorer than Lancashire or Yorkshire millhands ever have been, just as there are millionaires more wretched than the wretchedest slave in all the Black Country. Here is a chief part of the whole squalid tragedy; the poor fellows who turn themselves into machines for ten or twelve hours every day doubtless imagine that if they could get more money they would be happy. This, I say, is the tragedy, since we know that they would be not in the least happy if each man had a thousand a year. What is the good of presenting the purple-nosed drunkard at the corner public-house with the key of a cellar well stocked with the purest vintages of Bordeaux? Suppose that he once possessed a palate, many years of the chemical drench called four-ale and the poisonous corn-spirit called whisky have ruined that palate for ever; to him the noblest magnum of Lafite were but sour wash. I will not say that no man can turn himself into an unintelligent machine and be happy; I do say that there is not one man in ten thousand who can accomplish this feat. There is, of course, the point of view which makes happiness consist in doing what one likes; but this position was confuted a long time ago by Socrates. He pointed out that if the fulfilment of desire, quâ desire, constituted bliss, then the man with the itch was ideally happy, since he desired to scratch himself, and did so—all day long.

So far as I remember, Oscar Wilde, in his De Profundis, deplored the evils of the Renaissance—the ugliness to which it inevitably led. Candidly, I agree with him. I think that the Renaissance had in it all the seeds of death; that in spite of its infinite technical perfection, its wonderful knowledge of anatomy, its musical skill, its sense of beauty in colour, its rapture over the Classics raised like young men that had been dead from the tomb, its delight (in England, at all events) in its discovery that the vulgar tongue was in itself an exquisite instrument of prose and poetry, its sense of release as from a long, dark imprisonment, its wonder over the new world beyond the seas, its dreams of strange things, yet to be made known—in spite of all these things, in the heart of the Renaissance lurked the architecture of Gower Street and Camden Town, the "poetry" of Pope and of Pope's indifferent imitators, the life that Smollett and Hogarth have illustrated, the worse life that followed, the music of Stainer and Barnby, the painting—of many worthy persons. It is odd enough; but the Renaissance, starting out, no doubt, with an immense sense of escape and liberty, with the exultation of one who has freed himself from weary loads, with a determination to be original, ended, in most of the arts, as a servile tenth-rate ape of antique models, wearying the world with imitations of architecture of which the world was weary in the sixth century, tiring the reader with stuff about nymphs and shepherds which was third or fourth hand when Virgil and Horace made use of it. Credite posteri says Horace, with reference to some preposterous statement of his concerning fauns or satyrs; and we know that posterity has never believed in those fauns, and that Horace himself, if he had really thought that he saw a faun or a satyr would have gone on the voyage to Anticyra—where they sent lunatics. And yet that brave, original, daring Renaissance brought back these weary, worn-out "stock" nymphs and fauns and shepherds into literature, and if one wanders in desolate northern quarters of London one may see the influence of the Parthenon brooding, a shabby stucco ghost, over horrible little semi-detached villas. Well, the end of the Renaissance was death, as I say, in most of the arts at all events; and yet we must confess that at the beginning of the putrefaction, and for many years after it had begun, the hues were very splendid. The châteaux of Touraine, the dome of St. Paul's, the work of Shakespeare—these are not things to be despised.

I think that here is the distinction between the Renaissance and that illegitimate child of the Renaissance—modern civilisation, properly so-called. Not only are the ends bad, but the means are bad; not only is there hell at the bottom of the descent, but the descent itself is by steps of pit-refuse and burning marl. Perhaps the Renaissance people were excessive in their joy over the rediscovery of the Greek classics; but at all events the "Odyssey" is something and somewhat: it is not mere blatant nonsense, as are the modern discoveries that all men are born free and equal; that government should be by the people, through the people, for the people; that commercial prosperity leads to happiness; that adulteration is a form of competition; that the drink traffic is a great evil; that factory-chimneys are better than cathedral spires; that unlimited education is a pure boon and blessing to everybody. It is one thing to worship false gods or even devils—deplorable practices both, I am sure—but if we must serve demons, at least let us do so in a reasonably artistic temple, not in such a piece of tomfoolery as the Tabernacle in the Tottenham Court Road.

But we have chosen to worship our false gods in squalid temples indeed; witness America, which, I take it, is the most acute epitome of all modern ideals and methods. I need not reiterate "The United States of Gehenna;" it is enough to say that the Judges are elected by the people; and the "justice" of the United States stinks to heaven. In America all men are equal before the law; and the rich man can commit any crime with impunity, while the poor man is killed, with hideous tortures, by the most modern electric apparatus. The Government is for the people, by the people—and the rest of this ugly gibberish—and never since the beginning of the world, I suppose, has a people been so shamelessly and abominably robbed by its rulers, never has the whole machinery of government been so openly prostituted to the most disgraceful and wicked ends. Our House of Lords is an absurd anachronism, I believe, according to modern views; but, at all events, it is not in the grip of the Oil Trust. Bishops in the House of Lords are, of course, specially ridiculous; but whatever their failings, they do not employ the sheriffs and law-courts to sell men into dreadful slavery. And there is the completest religious liberty, certainly, and with results that might make Bedlam envious, and Colney Hatch strive in vain in the endeavour to produce something still more maniacal in the way of so-called religion. I think a system called New Thought is the latest result of American liberty. It is a religion entirely suited to the parent soil: it does not promise the joys of Paradise, but I believe it guarantees a handsome income, if the directions are faithfully carried out. America, then, is the representative of modern civilisation in its purest form; but America is only a very violent example of what our modern civilisation brings about. We ourselves in England are a little better; but how have we fallen from what we once were! Go to an old farmhouse in the country: you will see a dwelling-place which had no more important designer than the local mason, which is yet altogether lovely and pleasant, and suited to its purpose. Inside there may be oak chests which the village carpenter made; and to have such a house and such chests now we must employ an artist who will design for us copies of them more or less good as the case may be. And the tavern hard by will, likely enough, have a sign swinging from curiously scrolled ironwork—the art of the blacksmith over the way; to get such work now it would be necessary to go to an Art Guild, which would make a copy of sorts. And go into some of the old churches, and if you are fortunate you will see carved angels about the roofs, and grinning monsters and strange fantasies; and then you can think of the workmen who made these things and compare them with the workmen of our days—compare their lives, compare their thoughts.

Or perhaps this is too high-flown. Well; think of what we eat and drink in this "advanced" age, in this age of material progress, with its everlasting "gas" about sanitation, its fine contempt for the dirty old times. How many children are poisoned every year with filthy milk? How much nauseous muck have we swallowed with our beer—under the pleasing style of "substitutes"? It is hard indeed that Man in modern times, having made up his mind that he is a Pig, and having acted accordingly, should be poisoned in his wash, should be given unmentionable filth instead of his legitimate tub of potatoes and cabbage. It is not without amusement that I think of an age which, having scoffed at the bread of angels, cannot get an unadulterated cottage loaf, which, having refused the wine of Heaven, can scarcely obtain a decent glass of common beer for love or money.

And we cannot even contrive to be robbed with decency. I should think Robin Hood was a horrible nuisance. It must be quite unpleasant to be captured by a Sicilian brigand. But Robin did not pose as the benefactor of the people whom he despoiled, and the brigands, when they relieve you of your gold watch, do not say that they are promoting your commercial prosperity or developing your natural resources. Robin was a scoundrel I am sure, but he was not a company promoter. And real happiness, the real moyen de parvenir? Well; there was once a Frenchman who uttered a remarkable aphorism: "The philosopher, the good man, and the saint are all happy, but the saint is by far the happiest, so much is man made for sanctity."

ARTHUR MACHEN.

"THE LIMIT"

"For poetry is nothing if not perfect," remarks Virgil to his faithful servant Eros, in Mr. T. H. Warren's "The Death of Virgil" (Murray), and I can cordially say that I wish this were strictly true. If poetry that is not perfect were nothing, Mr. Warren's "Death of Virgil" would have no existence, for it is about the very worst poetry I have ever had the misfortune to read. Mr. Gladstone wrote some pretty bad verse in his time, and Lord Cromer has done his share, but Mr. Warren easily beats them both. The poem is in dramatic form, and the greater part of it is made up of interminable soliloquies on the part of Virgil, out of whose mouth Mr. Warren has caused to proceed a torrent of dreary platitudes, couched in a quite remarkably unmelodious and halting blank verse. If Mr. Warren were merely an unknown young gentleman who had been rash enough to make the too common mistake of allowing his ambition to outrun his prudence by publishing a volume of verse, it would neither be necessary nor kind to do more than to say very briefly that his verse was very poor, and to advise him to abandon any effort to do that for which he was obviously unfitted. But Mr. Warren is President of Magdalen College, and is at present Vice-Chancellor of the University of Oxford. Thus what would be merely a harmless error of judgment in the case of an unknown man becomes in his case a very serious lapse from that reserve and dignity which should distinguish his high position. It is not merely that Mr. Warren's verse is bad in the sense of being dull and uninspired; if that were all it might well be passed over in silence. Mr. Warren is a distinguished classical scholar, and many such scholars have written bad verses which were yet characterised by correct versification and at least some elementary knowledge of the technique of the very difficult art of poetry. But Mr. Warren's lines, in addition to being dull and uninspired, are absolutely faulty and false. The poem is supposed to be written in decasyllabic lines, yet over and over again he follows up a passage of ten-syllabled lines by an eleven, twelve, or fourteen syllabled one, the effect being exactly that of a child painfully playing a passage on the piano and suddenly coming down on an F natural when it should have played an F sharp. To quote examples:

When the fierce sun bred thick in air and soil,
Those seeds of lower life that slay the higher,
To batten on its grave, and flourish most
'Mid such "corpse cities," as he aptly called them—
Nay, was it his friend, Sulpicius, or himself?
The grand old Orator, lord of piller.

The italics are mine. The last line is a syllable too long.
Here is a line:

I hope I shall not outlive all my friends, where, in order to make the line scan, the reader has to put the accent on the first syllable of outlive—thus: outlive—producing a very clumsy effect.

Here again:

And once it happened in the theatre,
I had stepped in quietly, and, as I deemed, unnoticed.

The second line is no less than four syllables too long, recalling the delicious parody of a prize poem which appeared a great many years ago in the Oxford Magazine. The subject was Belisarius, and one of the most comical features of the poem was the way in which, every now and then, one of the lines seemed to get altogether out of hand and run away. I remember one couplet:

And thus affairs were brought into a state precarious,
As well as most annoying to a proud man like Belisarius.

Here is another example from Mr. Warren:

Rounding their edges like the mother-bear,
That licks her lumpish whelp to shapeliness;
Manipulating name and theme intractable.

The last line is a perfect Alexandrine. I am aware, of course, that Milton, in that superb passage in "At a Solemn Music," has a sequence of eleven decasyllables, followed by one Alexandrine:

That we on earth with undiscording voice
May rightly answer that melodious noise.

To his celestial concert us unite,
To live with him and sing in endless morn of light.

But there the Alexandrine is the last line of the poem, and the effect is as grand as it is deliberate and artful; in Mr. Warren's case the Alexandrine is sandwiched in between two ten-syllabled lines, and, quite obviously, owes its existence not to any desire to obtain a deliberate effect, but simply to Mr. Warren's defective ear for rhythm. To turn from defects in metre, of which I could multiply examples almost indefinitely, does Mr. Warren seriously think he is writing poetry when he stains fair white paper with this sort of thing?—

The one-sixth to the generous Mæcenæ,
The residue of Varius and Tucca,
With all my writings published and unpublished
To be dealt with according to instructions.

The passage, on account of the infinite bathos of the fourth line, surely gains a right to a place in Mr. Robert Ross's contemplated anthology, "A Thousand and One Gems of Bad Poetry." Here is a couplet worthy of notice:

Parodies out-Catullusing Catullus,
Abuse without the excuse of personal passion.

The accidental rhyme in the second line has a singular inelegance.

When "the Apothecary" in Mr. Warren's poem suddenly appears at the moment of Virgil's death, he remarks:

I fear me 'tis no faint; it is the end.

My opinion is that for the President of Magdalen and Vice-Chancellor of the University of Oxford to give publicity to a volume of verse which would disgrace a fourth-form school-boy is, as our American friends would say, "the limit."

A. D.

IRISH PICTURES

MANY are the painters with Irish names—"Irish by birth or descent," as a Guildhall catalogue once said; but genuine Irish painters, artists who have been trained in Ireland, live, work and exhibit in Ireland—and sell, of course, in America—these are, indeed, hard to find. After some searching, I can think of scarce half a dozen qualified to come into this second category. There is Mr. Nathaniel Hone, the veteran landscape painter, but his noble view of Nature attains to universality, and though Ireland should be proud to possess so distinguished a painter, it would be extravagant to detect a national or racial characteristic in his canvases. Less accomplished technically, Mr. George Russell—better known in England, perhaps, as the poet "A. E."—reveals more of the Celtic spirit in his sensitive, imaginative idylls. A painter of visions and dreams, of fairies, and the "good people," Mr. Russell, a modern Blake, is an interpreter of the ideals and aspirations, rather than of the life and aspects of his country. Of the few Irish painters who set out to depict their own time and country, it will generally be conceded that the two most interesting are Mr. Dermot O'Brien and Mr. Jack B. Yeats. The work of the former may be seen occasionally at exhibitions of the New English Art Club; the latter is at the time of writing showing a collection of his "Pictures of Life in the West of Ireland" at the Walker Gallery in New Bond Street.

At once more realistic in his aims than Mr. Russell, and more consciously decorative in his methods, Mr. Yeats shares with his brother Irishman a naïveté of outlook and simplicity of means which may be styled appropriate to, if not actually characteristic of, the rising national art of Ireland. And this very directness, this straightforward way of going, as it were, to the heart of the whole to be expressed, instead of labouring in a pettifogging spirit with minor details of expression, is artistically to be counted unto Mr. Yeats for righteousness; though in the sight of the pedant it renders his work unequal, and often faulty. But pedants are apt to forget that "uncertainty in the delineation of form" does not necessarily imply impotence in the expression of life, and there are many draughtsmen academically more correct than Mr. Yeats who might envy him his power of suggesting action and movement. How many artists are there who could give us the same tumultuous whirl of life and movement with the pure economy of Mr. Yeats's "Catching a Run-away"? This power of suggesting movement and a remarkable insight into character seem to me the salient features of Mr. Yeats's art, and when they are combined, as in the little picture of "The Circus Clown," they result in a work of sterling worth, which lacks nothing for completeness. It is this insight into character, pathetic in the case of the clown, which, pushed further into humorous extravagance, reveals Mr. Yeats as a caricaturist of surprising powers. It is possibly in this department that he will eventually attain his highest distinction, and for sheer masterliness there is nothing in this collection so unassailable technically and so irresistible in its appeal as the pungent satire on the Saxon entitled "Beer." In this little drawing of a typical London bar and its frequenters the essential sordidness of English low-life is expressed with the wit as well as the broad flowing freedom of a Rowlandson. It would be easy to multiply examples of Mr. Yeats's ability in other directions, of his skill in giving the aspect of a crowd, of his talent for composing his subjects into decorative designs; but these partake of the body of his art, and, as it has already been indicated, it is the spirit which renders this art most precious, an art which may unhesitatingly be termed Irish, an art which in these modest beginnings is still worth watching and cultivating.

FRANK RUTTER.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Children's Children. By GERTRUDE BONE. With Drawings by MUIRHEAD BONE. (Duckworth and Co., 6s. net and 25s. net.)

IN studying the pleasant drawings by Mr. Muirhead Bone which illustrate Mrs. Bone's pastoral tragedy, "Children's Children," we are carried back fifty years to the days of Millais and Houghton as book-illustrators. The book contains some sixty odd drawings, landscape and figure studies, all conceived in the sentiment characteristic of the early magazine illustrators. All are happy in choice and full of a country atmosphere. Some of the drawings of children show Mr. Bone's intimate knowledge of child form and give a vivid suggestion of movement—qualities which would have delighted the author of "Rab and his Friends." One especially pleasing study, in which repose is depicted in every limb, is that of a sleeping child, lying with his hands tucked under his chin and his head sunk in a cushion. Full of action is the picture of the same small boy following the crawling baby to the cottage door. These two studies have been as evidently drawn from the model, as have the scaffoldings with which we must always associate Mr. Muirhead Bone's name. Both show the same intimate knowledge of subject.

The landscapes also contain the same atmosphere of quiet country life. Although they are confined to the smaller drawings, being often merely headings to chapters, a feeling of distance is suggested by a few inches of meadow stretching away to some far-off cottage or steeple. One specially successful chapter-heading depicts a village inn, the sign-post flapping in the wind, the docile cart-horse awaiting the pleasure of the labourer refreshing himself within.

A cottage interior, with the company assembled round the open fire, suggests Rembrandt in treatment, while many of the studies of peasants in the fields carry our thoughts direct to the work of Millet. The book closes with one of its happiest illustrations—a full-page drawing of the lonely old hero of the tale seated at the fireside with his dog as sole companion. Into this we read more than the able modelling of old age—there is an unmistakable impression of abject loneliness and sorrow.

And yet, full of the charm of sentiment and the atmosphere of village life as these illustrations are, there is, perhaps, in them less sincerity and individuality than in many of Mr. Bone's unequalled pencil-drawings. We feel that it is into his drawings of the scaffoldings of our vast interiors and of the exteriors of our London streets that he has wrought the real strength of his art.

Mrs. Bone's story has been reserved for separate notice.

A Family Chronicle. Derived from Notes and Letters selected by BARBARINA, THE HON. LADY GREY. Edited by GERTRUDE LYSTER. (Murray, 12s. net.) PRIVATE family records tend to remind one of that delightful verse:

"Oh skip your dear uncle," the bellman exclaimed,
As he angrily tingled his bell, though there is sometimes good reason for presenting such archives to the public, in the family's intimacy and correspondence with men and women of fame. To a limited extent there is some justification for the editor of this volume, which contains references to many well-known people, and letters from Lady Dacre, Miss Mitford, Fanny Kemble, Sydney Smith, the Hon. Mrs. Norton, and others. But they are mostly of slight importance, nor can the general reader find any connected interest in the book, which is much too discursive. It belongs to the class of work that might very well have been privately printed for the edification of the family. For example, two chapters are taken up with journals in which occur such entries as:

Jan. 25, 1844. Papa and Uncle Will come to town for Aunt Balfour's funeral. They and Mr. Whitbread dined here, and very snug we were.

Nov. 2, 1844. Granny and grandpapa went to town.

History of Mediæval Civilisation, and of Modern to the End of the Seventeenth Century. By CHARLES SEIGNOBOS, Doctor of Letters of the University Par. (London: T. Fisher Unwin, 5s. net.)

THIS is simply a class-book of sketchy paragraphs marked with headlines, and gives the idea of lectures to novices expanded from notes, a procession of bald facts baldly stated. The range of the book is far beyond its limited compass. There is no real grasp of the development of civilisation, but an amazing inability to appreciate the culture of older countries. Criticisms on art and literature are absolutely crude. Two paragraphs are given to the Anglo-Saxons, in which we read that:

Beowulf is the only Saxon poem that remains to us.

In a very short chapter on the Renaissance we are informed that:

The painter did not seek to give an air of holiness to the faces.

Music is dismissed in two pages. A few more are devoted to architecture, and we are told that:

No Gothic church has ever been finished. They (sic!) lack towers, spires. . . .

Was Gothic building also suppressed? For later we read that:

The Reformation suppressed the clergy, Pope, Bishops, priests, and monks.

In a paragraph headed "Progress of the Sciences" we learn:—

There were invented in Holland two kinds of instruments, which greatly increased the field of observation: the microscope (1590) showed objects too small, the telescope (1609) objects too far away to be seen with the naked eye.

We do not pretend to know for what class of reader this sort of "primer" has been written. But we now better understand the American prig-child's version of an old rhyme:—

Twinkle, twinkle little star,
I don't wonder what you are,
For I know so much, you see,
More of you than you of me.

FICTION

The Nun. By RENÉ BAZIN. (Eveleigh Nash, 6s.)

M. RENÉ BAZIN, whose former novels have dealt largely with the lighter and more idyllic side of peasant life in France, has given us, in "The Nun," a tragic picture of the social demoralisation which has followed as an almost inevitable consequence from the suppression of the religious houses. His heroine, Pascale Mouvand, is a girl of an ardent and imaginative temperament, with infinite capacities for happiness. A little afraid of life, however, she decides, after consideration, to enter a convent. Here, surrounded by stronger and austerer spirits than herself, the devotional side of her nature finds free expression, and the years go by in peaceful calm, broken only by the small duties incidental to convent life. At length the Government intervenes, and the small community of Sisters is turned adrift to fare as best it may. Pascale, cast suddenly upon the world, finds herself surrounded with temptations. Ultimately she succumbs, and, drifting by pure force of circumstance from bad to worse, we find her at last the unwilling agent of a brutalised souleneur. The book closes with her murder. She has offered herself as a voluntary victim to the man she hates.

There is, perhaps, a touch of melodrama about the concluding pages, but the story is powerfully told, and with a fine artistic restraint that is more convincing than whole chapters of flamboyant rhetoric. M. Bazin is no mere pamphleteer, and it may be assumed that his object in writing "The Nun" was primarily to produce an artistic work of fiction. Nevertheless, the book is worth reading as an indication of the trend of modern democracy in France.

Come and Find Me. By ELIZABETH ROBINS. (Heinemann, 6s.)

MISS ROBINS has made a name for herself by her indubitable cleverness; but with more than cleverness she is not endowed. She never penetrates below the surface of men or things; of the surface, however, she writes with sufficient vividness to hold the attention of the reader throughout the length of her stories. Though her characters are machine-made rather than alive, the machine is of the latest pattern, and is manipulated with great dexterity. "Come and Find Me," like "The Magnetic North," is a story of the ice-bound regions. Long before the rush of gold-seekers to Alaska, Nathaniel Mar had discovered gold in those regions. But he lost the nugget and the dust which would have helped to prove his statement, and no one would put any trust in his tale. So he married and settled in a bank—the Palmas Valley Bank of Valdivia. He is married when the story opens, and he tells the son of his friend Galbraith, whom he has adopted, the story of his adventure—to keep him good while he is sitting on the stool of penitence. His story is one of the most exciting episodes in the book. But thereafter comes a protracted account of the Mars' life in Valdivia, which is not of great interest. Indeed, until Hildegard, Mar's daughter, starts for the Pole to fetch her father, who, though quite an old man, has at last managed to find time and money for his great enterprise, the book drags. We are not sufficiently interested in Hildegard's imaginary love for young Galbraith, or in her real love for Cheviot, to endure the length of its treatment. But the chapters describing Hildegard's great journey, and her adventures at the gold settlement, and her tragic return are thrilling. The excellence of the finale makes one regret that the earlier and middle portions of the book are constructed so vaguely as they are.

The Gang. By DAVID WHITELAW. (Greening, 3s. 6d.)

THERE is a real fund of humour in "The Gang." It is written in a spirit of frank levity, and it is refreshing to meet with a book as unpretentious as it is amusing. The curiously negative little agent, Mr. Piddington, who is torn from his peaceful and thoroughly British homestead ("Mafeking," Ladysmith Road, Tooting) and hurled into the midst of a burlesque civil war in "Pilania," where he is made to go through incredible and fantastic adventures, is described with a whimsical humour which is irresistible. There is no attempt at either wit or satire in the story; it is pure, good-natured fun, and, if the humour is more that of farce than of comedy, it is not the less amusing for that. The revolution over—owing to a soldier in the rebel army getting "rather badly hurt in the hand"—Mr. Piddington is permitted to return to his family. Unfortunately, he lingers in Paris on his homeward route, and another series of surprising mishaps overtakes him. The book is adorned with "a few slight illustrations by the author," which are as unpretentious and original as everything else about this quaint production.

Beau Brocade: a Romance of the Road. By BARONESS ORCZY. (Greening, 6s.)

"BEAU BROCADE, a Romance of the Road," is the descriptive, if condensed, title of the three hundred pages of very conventional sentimentality which form Baroness Orczy's novel. "Beau Brocade" is all that a highwayman with such a name should be: handsome, chivalrous, brave, faultlessly attired, in spite of the fact that his nights are frequently spent in a ditch; the rescuer of distressed damsels and the plague of choleric county magistrates. The "Romance of the Road" is very much the same as any other Dick Turpin tale. The gallant outlaw first frightens the lady, then dances with her on a lonely heath to the pastoral strains of a shepherd's pipe; he saves her brother, a Jacobite fugitive, from the King's men; is wounded in her service and staggers to her feet, a pale but fascinating wreck; is pardoned by a gracious Royal Duke, and is last seen holding the lady "closely, very closely to his strong, brave heart," murmuring "My dream! My wife!"—a very satisfactory if commonplace finale.

The Chichester Intrigue. By THOMAS COBB. (Lane, 6s.)

WE have not a very profound sympathy with Mr. Lambert Amory; nor is the story of his search after proof of Miss Thornhill's true character very interesting. There is in the intrigue the material of a very pretty farce; but farce is not at all the attitude adopted by Mr. Thomas Cobb. He writes in sober earnest about this upright man who plays the amateur detective with regard to the exact relationship which Miss Thornhill had, as a girl, with his dead friend, Chichester, the handsome actor. He is actuated by the noblest motives. His friend, Sir Hugo Warbrook, is likely to propose to Miss Thornhill. Amory is not very fond of his friend, but quite fond enough to make it his duty to be quite sure that the girl is (to use Mr. Cobb's phraseology) fit to become a man's wife. The difficulties in his honest way are many, because there are three women of the same name, each of whom might have written the incriminating letter. Sir Hugo learns enough to make the girl undesirable to him; but Lambert learns more—that she only met Chichester at the railway station, and that the intended escapade was brought to an untimely end by the intervention of the actor's jealous wife—and accordingly is overcome by pity and love and marries her himself. The intrigue makes a dreary tale, though Mr. Cobb has expended much care in the telling.

DRAMA

"THE HOUSE" & "MRS. BILL" AT THE COURT THEATRE

EVERYONE interested in the progress of serious drama will regret to think that this is to be the last play produced by Mr. Otho Stuart. His management both at the Adelphi and at this theatre has been fruitful of so many really good plays that it seems surprising that he has chosen to say farewell with such a remarkably commonplace production. Mrs. Bill is called a "slight comedy of pleasant people" on the programme, and is by Captain John Kendall, who graces the famous mahogany table of "Mr. Punch" under the name of "Dum-dum." However amusing he may be in the pages of our contemporary, there was little sign of either wit or humour in his play, and it would be only charitable to suppose that, like many another man, he has yielded to the solicitations of his friends and given to the public what was intended for a mere private occasion. For this play simply reeks of amateur theatricals; and, though it has been my lot to witness in the sacred cause of charity many a West-end success turned to this baser use, I do not ever remember to have seen the order reversed and skilled actors playing in what was apparently intended for the humbler duty. One can imagine how it all happened. The distinguished member of the Punch staff goes to spend his Christmas in the country. He is besieged with entreaties to write a play that will suit the capabilities of his friends—two ladies' parts and four men's. And so the play gets written. The title-part is for the energetic lady who arranges the annual show; and how it fits her! Then there is to be a part for Uncle Henry, who rather fancies himself in "Henry Kemble" parts—Mrs. Bill's husband; and another for dear old Charlie, the Oxford Freshman, who has a reputation for his imitations of Mr. Hawtreys—Lieutenant Carter. But the crux of the whole thing is how to deal with the curate, who can't act and must be included, and so the part of Captain Smith is invented, and a very clever invention under the circumstances it is. No one, however incapable, could possibly fail of success in it; it is a part to be borne in mind by all organisers of theatrical entertainments where the caste has to contain one pronounced male duffer, and I am sure they will reap their reward. Mrs. Bill played by amateurs cannot miss fire; it is like Gothic architecture—wholly suited to its purpose.

The scene is laid in India. Mrs. Bill is the match-making aunt, who wishes her niece Mabel to marry well. Mabel is entirely taken up with a young subaltern, who is always referred to as "the mere boy," and who is entirely ineligible. Then a great hero, Captain Smith, appears; he is eligible, and so Mrs. Bill supports him until it turns out that "the mere boy" has been left a thousand a year. Then Captain Smith is supposed to be killed, but he comes to life again just in time to marry Mabel, who has been settling her wedding-day with "the mere boy." It is not an exhilarating play, but the actors fought bravely with the difficulties. Miss Marie Illington as the rather flirtatious aunt played cleverly, and gave great point to the conventional cynicism of her remarks. Mr. E. W. Garden took the part of her husband, a kindly old official, very much afraid of his wife, and got all there was out of it. Mr. Vivian Gilbert and Mr. Rudge Harding were distinctly good as "the mere boy" and Captain Smith respectively, and Miss Beatrice Terry acted very prettily as Mabel. Mr. Arthur Holmes-Gore had a silly part as the Colonel of the regiment, and was thrown away on it.

On the night of its production Mrs. Bill preceded The House, by George Gloriel, but in the future the order is to be changed, and I fear that Mrs. Bill will appear even less attractive when it follows that wonderful play. For The House immediately grips the imagination; it has been seen for some time past at the Court, but only at matinées, and up to the present I have had no opportunity of mentioning it here. The House, of course, deals with the workhouse, and is a satire on the extravagance of some Boards of Guardians in their administration of the Poor Law. In the first act is a family reduced to the direst straits of poverty, but still retaining all its abhorrence of anything in the nature of charity and a terror that any member of it should be branded with the name of "pauper." But the wife, with the utmost reluctance, comes to the conclusion that her old father must go to "the house." The discussion between her and her daughter and her husband is of the most poignant and heartrending type, and the anguish and final submission of the old man brings down the curtain on one of the most tragic acts I have seen for a long time. To find anything to compare with it I must go back to the performance of the second act of Brand in 1893, or possibly of The Lower Depths by Gorki, produced by the Stage Society a few years ago. In the last act the atmosphere is quite different—the family is getting out of its difficulties and the old man is to return. In a scene of the most delightful comedy it gradually comes out that "the house" instead of being a hell is an earthly paradise: the old man has no intention of returning to the hardships of self-respecting poverty, and he wins his hearers over to his view to such an extent that they too are to qualify and join in the comforts and luxuries of "the house." It is a curious mixture, this play with one act tragedy and the other comedy, but there is little doubt that it is the finest and most dramatic piece to be seen in London at the moment; and it is as excellently acted as it is conceived. Mr. Albert Chevalier as the old father, and Miss Alice Beet as his daughter, are perfect, while Mr. Arthur Holmes-Gore and Miss Mabel Garden fill the other two parts quite admirably. To miss seeing The House would be as great a mistake as, having seen it, to wait and see Mrs. Bill.

A. C.

CORRESPONDENCE

"TANTÆNE ANIMIS CŒLESTIBUS IRÆ"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—“A. D.’s” article in your last issue is most refreshing. The prevailing spirit of modern journalism is insincerity. Most of the writers of to-day on the Press lack convictions, or if they possess them, lack the courage to express them. This is due mainly to that cursed spirit of universal tolerance which, heralded as a great virtue, is, in fact, one of the most poisonous of vices. Modern tolerance is absolutely paralysing in its effects, teaching, as it does, that it really does not very much matter after all what a man believes, or says, or does. “I would die for a candle,” said a Catholic preacher in a sermon I once heard. We want more writers on the Press who would be willing “to die for a candle.” As it is, the newspaper proprietor of to-day regards convictions as a purchasable commodity. He hires his editors, his leader writers, and paragraphists, as he hires his stenographers and typists, and expects from them—and generally gets from them—the same unquestioning obedience. In the case of a sudden change of policy on his part, such as adopting Tariff Reform after having been a violent Free Trader, he sometimes thinks it wise slightly to increase the salaries of his editorial staff—as a tribute to decency.

Even editors who are unhampered by proprietors of this kind frequently exhibit a terrible dread of expressing strong convictions. They desire to be safe. They are so afraid of hurting the feelings of some other editor or journalist who may some day be useful. They seem to have their eyes always on the silver teapot, which, if only they keep “safe,” they can rely upon having presented to them at the end of their careers as “a mark of esteem” from their “fellow-journalists.” With that silver teapot (perhaps filled with sovereigns) ever in view a policy of universal propitiation must be followed. Now, Sir, “A. D.” gets at the root of the matter when he says that anger, or “holy wrath,” as it is rightly called, is one of the greatest incentives to effective writing. What we want is a revival of intolerance—intolerance of cant, of humbug, of meanness; intolerance that will not rest content with things as they are; intolerance that does care what a man thinks, because it knows that unless he thinks rightly he cannot act rightly; intolerance of the foul cynicism that teaches that every man has his price. Many of us are filled with blind, inarticulate fury at the things we see. Many of us feel things we can never express. Let those, at any rate, who can find words express what they feel at any cost.

A. E. M. F.

March 10.

"FRANKLY IDIOTIC"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As to the pretension of Mr. Caleb Porter, that the wine of the Bible was without alcohol, and only pure sweet grape-juice, let me kindly tell you that this is utterly erroneous. The wine of the Bible is alcoholic wine, as it of necessity must be. Has Mr. Caleb Porter ever been present at the grape and wine harvest in a southern country? Certainly not. For otherwise he would have seen what enormous quantities of ripe grapes are collected and have the juice pressed out of them. Now this wine is, of course, for the present, grape-juice; but within some very few days (the quicker the hotter the climate is, and Palestine is rather hot), it has changed into alcoholic wine by way of fermentation. Ergo, when Mr. Caleb Porter pretends that the Jews of the Bible only drank wine unfermented—i.e., without alcohol—he makes believe that those people drank all their enormous stores of grape-juice within a fortnight; for under the climate of Palestine they could not prevent the grape-juice—to the distress of the then teetotalers—turning into alcoholic real “wine” in almost no time. And to drink the grape-juice in such quantities would simply be suicidal; dysentery of the worst kind would be the consequence.

So when Mr. Caleb Porter says that there is no proof that the wine of the Bible was alcoholic, it must be said that the wine of the Bible must be considered as being alcoholic as long as Mr. Caleb Porter cannot prove that the old Jews knew how to prevent the fermentation of fresh grape-juice.

As to the smoking of tobacco, I cannot understand why people with common sense lament just about this one kind of acting upon one's nerves. Smoking is one only of those numerous stimulantia, as tea and coffee, hot and cold baths are for instance. When people wonder what better work Hobbes, &c., would have done without the drug of tobacco, I could ask the question, How more logical would Mr. Caleb Porter be without the drug of tea?—I take it as granted that Mr. Caleb Porter, as an Englishman, drinks tea regularly. Yes, tea! I can assure him that my nervous system reacts on a small dose of tea as on poison, for I do not drink the "drug" of tea. But a handful of cigarettes does me much good, and makes me feel happy and vigorous. Q.E.D.

ROBERT LUTZ.

March 4.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I agree with you when you say that the proposition—"work of any kind done by a man who smokes is certain to be ill-done"—is proved to be contradictory by the instances of Hobbes, Tennyson, and Carlyle; but that proposition is far removed from Dr. Fairbairn's, and farther still from mine. I think the doctor's dicta were somewhat badly put, but his contention was that "work done by the strength (italics mine) of alcohol or the soothing influence of the pipe is certain to be ill-done." I consider this to be, in the main, true, though it would doubtless prove more acceptable to your readers in sympathetic paraphrase. Yet even as it stands it is a very different thing to the proposition which you rightly assert to be contradictory. I am quite open to conviction. I am neither a teetotaler nor a non-smoker, and my only knowledge of Dr. Fairbairn is gleaned from your note in "Life and Letters;" but I really do not see any reason for the "frankly idiotic" phrase.

Tobacco and alcohol are narcotic poisons, and their use causes the divergence of the user from that state known as "mens sana in corpore sano." Work done in their strength is therefore extremely likely, if not certain, to be done—cleverly and brilliantly, if you will, but—verily ill in comparison with the greatest, the best, the most enduring work, which I cannot help still thinking has never yet owed its inspiration to alcohol or tobacco:

Shall I smite with a barren whip?
Shall I urge with a vulgar spur?
The womb of the whip is barren indeed,
After its kind cometh seed from seed.

I suppose it will not be denied that the finest work ever done by man in one particular direction is that of Fra Angelico, but it is easy to imagine his descent to the level of, say, Fra Filippo Lippi through indulgence in drugs; at any rate, the difference is clear in the work of these two great men, and the genius of the former is patently of that kind which "cometh not forth but by prayer and fasting." Whether Angelico drank wine or not, we may be quite certain that his best work did not owe its strength to alcohol.

Where are we to draw the line between Tennyson's pipe and Coleridge's decanter of laudanum?

Men and women have been from all time, and are still, drug-taking animals the world over, but I should think it amounts to almost a mathematical certainty that work owing its strength to the use of alcohol, nicotine, opium, cannabis indica, theine, caffeine, cocaine, or any of the hundred and one poisons that the as yet unemancipated part of man's nature still craves, must be—in direct proportion to such use—ill-done, and this quite compatibly with its being work which shall delight both gentle and simple, the crowd and the choice, by undoubted brilliance and cleverness.

Compare Dante with Coleridge, and note how the children of Coleridge's brain are decimated by his "barren whip."

As for the Psalmist, is it not a case of the "pathetic fallacy?" and what bearing can it have on the matter of alcohol? David very probably drank a good deal of intoxicating wine during his life, but the beautiful Psalm in which the phrase mea calix inebrians occurs does not strike one as being inspired by these potations. Vous m'avez comme enivré de joie might be spoken or chanted without impropriety by all the Bands of Hope or Total Abstinence Leagues that ever tried to turn men from one form of vice to another.

The subject of the wines of the ancients is an extremely interesting one. It seems fairly evident that a good deal of non-alcoholic wine was drunk, and I believe it was usual to start a dinner-party with a product of the grape very closely resembling the "grape-soup" or red-currant jelly you mention.

Then there is Joseph's dream, and the pressing of the grapes direct into Pharaoh's cup.

In our version of the Scriptures drunkenness does not always imply alcoholism; repletion is to be understood in the following:—"One is hungry and another is drunken;" "Blessed art thou, O land, when thy King is the son of nobles and thy princes eat in due season for strength and not for drunkenness." No one doubts that wine has been used by many men famous for mighty works, but I take it that is not Dr. Fairbairn's point at all; his point, as I read it, is that work which has relied upon a drug for its inspiration and strength is certain to be ill-done. I cannot for the life of me see where the "frank idiocy" comes in. I would myself be inclined to think that the ill-doing in some of the best work of some of our best men is directly or indirectly owing to a cowardly inhauling of the granum thuris in calice vini, rejected by Him Who spake as no man ever spake, being drunk, not with wine, but with the Ghost of God.

CALEB PORTER.

March, 1908.

TWO REPLIES TO MR. VIVIAN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—For Mr. Vivian to object to personalities in journalism is surely the height of cynical irony. Having himself introduced personalities into his review, he seemed to us fair game when we ventured to disagree with his verdict on the book. We are surprised that our mildly humorous remarks should have evoked such bitter resentment against The Imp. When we referred to Mr. Vivian as no longer young, it was mainly with the object of recalling a delightful phrase which appeared in an ACADEMY note. Everybody knows that Mr. Herbert Vivian is neither "bald" nor "bearded," and that his appearance is, if possible, more youthful than his behaviour. We did not, therefore, contemplate for a moment that our remarks could cause him any serious annoyance. Our "piece" of impudence would have been forgiven by any one with a "saving grace (sic) of humour." For the rest, we can only hope that Mr. Vivian's abuse will not prove to be other than a recommendation.

THE EDITOR The Imp.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Herbert Vivian must really forgive us for having made fun of him. We can assure him we had no desire to hurt his feelings. His solemn letter to you, in which he holds us up as a "petty" firm of booksellers who desire to browbeat him and prevent him and others from writing honest criticisms on the books we publish, is so amusing that it is hard to take it seriously. But lest any of your readers should imagine that we resent, or ever have resented, adverse criticisms of our books, we trust you will allow us briefly to state the facts as they are, and not as they appear to Mr. Vivian's heated imagination. For a weekly journal called John Bull Mr. Vivian reviewed "The White Rose Mystery" published by us. Not content with pouring out his scorn on this book, he further suggested that the Duke of Norfolk would have a good case against the author for criminal libel. We were so entertained by this idea that we thought it too good to be wasted, and as we consider we have as much right to use an unfavourable as a favourable notice, we introduced Mr. Vivian's remarks into our advertisements, thus making a pleasing change from the monotonous repetition of eulogies. It is true that we prefaced our quotation by referring to Mr. Vivian as a "notable" or "notorious" critic, and stated that he was peculiar in his views, but we were under the impression that this could afford him nothing but gratification. As, however, he objects to the epithet "notorious," we promise to refer to him in future only as "notable," although we cannot help still considering him peculiar. This is the sum total of our transgressions, and it is surprising to find that our innocent endeavours to increase the sale of our book have appeared to Mr. Vivian in so sinister a light. So far from having experienced the "fine frenzy" to which he refers, or having desired, as he elegantly phrases it, "to belch false fire" from behind our "barrow," our attitude all along has been one of grateful expectancy.

We disclaim as publishers all responsibility for the editorial comments in The Imp which Mr. Vivian has quite unwarrantably attributed to us as part of a deliberate campaign. We trust, therefore, that Mr. Vivian will consent to bury the hatchet, and in future allow us the same liberty in the compilation of our advertisements as we willingly grant him in the writing of his reviews.

GREENING & CO., LTD.

March 9.

HANDEL

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your notes in this week's issue defending Handel against adverse criticism, gave me much pleasure, as did also your allusion to Mr. Heathcote Statham's "Thoughts on Music."

Attention might specially have been drawn, I think, to the beautiful style in which this book is written. The style and the soundness of judgment make the work one of the most interesting and valuable essays in criticism of Handel and other composers that we have.

I first saw it at the library in St. Martin's Lane three years ago, and have since read it at least a dozen times.

W. M.

March 9.

THE SICILIAN PLAYERS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—When shall we Englishmen learn to distrust the intellect and the reason? Where the final appeal is made always to the intellect there can be no honesty.

These remarks are suggested by your critic and correspondent as touching the Sicilian Players. The critics of the Sicilian Players have, I think, one and all, at least as many as I have read, really been greatly surprised at the magnificent art of the Sicilian Players, of Cav. Grasso and the leaders of his company; but being always chary of acknowledging greatness, they have appealed to the intellect in order to reverse the verdict of their feelings, over which the sole control lies in the intellect or the reason. It is, however, chiefly with your correspondent that I should like to "break a lance."

Now first, surely "realisation" is just as true a part of art as "suggestion." There is room for both, it being arguable, of course, that the one is a higher form of art than the other, though each is good art or bad art according as you please. Your correspondent, however, relegates realisation or, as he has it, "realism" in art to the actors of the "portable" theatres, where, apparently, the lowest class of "provincial acting" is to be found; and, instituting a parallel between the realistic acting of these, presumably, third-class actors and the realistic acting of the Sicilian Players, he thus, of course, at once dismisses the possibility of these players being anything other than third-class actors themselves, though he afterwards excepts Cav. Grasso, to call him a mere tiro of a "really great artist." Not to argue this point, I would ask Mr. Lawson whether he would have us really believe that a Frenchman, say, cultured in the truest sense of the word, but with a very slight acquaintance of English, could, after seeing a company of provincial actors, belonging to one of these "portable" theatres, in one of their plays "entirely concerning itself with the crude and elemental passions" (mark, crude and elemental!), say with heartfelt belief, "I have never seen such wonderful acting before!" Yet, "change the parts and the scene," and this is what is happening night after night now in London, each visit deepening the first impression.

But, secondly, Mr. Lawson says of Signorina Aguglia, "She is an exceptionally clever mime, capable of representing certain crude passions." And that is all! Now, what passion is more common and universally considered more ennobling than love or passion? Further, apparently, Signorina Aguglia, in Mr. Lawson's opinion, could not represent, for all her "exceptional cleverness as a mime," any but "certain" of the crude passions, and therefore, of course, none of the higher, because not crude passions. (Would Mr. Lawson please tell us what these passions are?) And, if there is one thing certain, it is that Signorina Aguglia is not "clever" in any strict sense of the word. We do not ourselves think her a finished artist in the sense in which Cav. Grasso is a finished artist; but we regard her, in the words of some critic, as an artist of remarkable promise. Does Mr. Lawson (and here he has many of the "intellectual" critics with him) really think that Signorina Aguglia's acting is not the outcome and outpouring of any soul-emotion or heart-emotion at all? Is her sobbing—the truest to life that most of us have ever seen or heard—merely the result of close study? Is it her mimetic powers that make her shed real tears? Is it credible that any actor could, night after night, in scene after scene, merely by virtue of wonderful mimetic capacity, maintain so surely, so realistically, without ever once failing, as is admitted by all in the case of Signorina Aguglia, those marvellously swift transitions from harshness to sweetness through the whole gamut of the human voice, that complete command over facial expression, changing every moment, and that entire control over the body? No! Such a theory is incredible, impossible! And it must continue incredible until such critics as Mr. Lawson bring conclusive evidence to support their theories.

Finally, what does Mr. Lawson mean by "sheer animalism"? Our criticism suffers sadly from the use of terms unaccompanied by any explanation. Let Mr. Lawson explain what he means by "sheer animalism"! This is a theory that has been advocated by many of those critics who, in Mr. Lawson's words, "over the Sicilian players have lost their heads." We sadly fear that Mr. Lawson has fared no better than those critics whom he thus lightly dismisses. At any rate, his theory is quite unintelligible.

My excuse for writing must be that I cannot allow such unmeaning criticism, as it seems to me, of real greatness to pass unchallenged.

W. H. MORANT.

March 8.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I quite agree with Mr. Robb Lawson's interesting letter. I have played in "portables" myself, and, as he says, the rendering of the various emotions is left to the impulse of the moment. This may produce a striking effect, but it is not the best art.

A PLAYGOER.

March 7.

"THE CAUSE OF THE CHILDREN"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The conscience of the nation has been aroused to the needs of the child, the outcome of which has been the Children's Bill, recently introduced into Parliament. The Bill has the cordial support of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, which has long laboured in the cause of suffering childhood. The extent and magnitude of the Society's work in safeguarding the lives of children throughout the land and rescuing them from systematic cruelty, starvation, and neglect is seldom realised. The records for the past month show that no less than 3,888 cases were dealt with, affecting the lives of 11,426 children. It is sad to note that eighty-six of these cases ended in death. It is also a significant fact that 3,022 children were known to be insured for a total of £15,607.

The aim of the Society is "that every child in the land shall live an endurable life." Great as its efforts have been in this direction, there is room for considerable extension. There are districts yet untouched where children suffer, and where, if funds permitted, inspectors would be placed without delay.

L. L. HORNBROOK.

CHURCH SCHOOLS' EMERGENCY LEAGUE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have been directed by my Committee to send you the following resolution:—

Resolution passed at a Meeting of the Manchester Centre of the Church Schools' Emergency League—

"That this meeting protests against the unjust and reactionary character of the Education Bill, 1908, and calls upon all Churchmen and others who care for the true interests of education, to resist it in every possible way."

T. E. CLEWORTH, Hon. Secretary.

March 5.

FRENCH AND LANGUE D'OC

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—For purposes of classification philologists are wont to talk of the different dialects of one speech; but as there are no hard-and-fast lines in Nature, so in language one dialect shades off imperceptibly into the other as the colours of a rainbow. If French, or Langue d'Oïl, and Provençal, or Langue d'Oc, are both derived from Latin, they were originally the same, however wide the divergence now. My illustration, however, was a rough generalisation, to show that the degraded speech of the peasant of to-day is a remnant of the highly-inflected literary language of yesterday. In spite of the fact that Mistral, and before him Roumanille, wrote in the ancient language of Provence, it is still the speech of the peasant, and is doomed. Mistral, whom I met three years ago at Arles, confessed this himself, and there is the same strain of regret, you will remember, running through the whole of his recently-published memoirs, in which folklore and legend are rescued from oblivion, car il est de mode aujourd'hui de renier absolument tout ce qui est de tradition, as he says. All this is, of course, irrelevant to the main issue of an essay on the language of Burns, and, in my opinion, is not worth answering.

JAMES P. PARK.

March 9.

THE NAME OF CHARLES I.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I think there can be very little doubt that Charles I. was called after his father's uncle—Charles Stuart, fifth Earl of Lennox—who is, perhaps, best known to history as the father of the ill-fated Lady Arabella Stuart.

It is rather curious that, from an historical point of view, the continuity of the actual service of our grand old Church is rarely insisted upon.

On one of the shelves of a bookcase at home rests an old quarto volume, massively bound, with brass studs and a centre having engraved thereon "R. G." and entitled "The Book of Common Prayer," with a colophon, "London: Printed by Robert Barker, Printer to the King's most Excellent Majestie; And by the Assignes of John Bill, 1637."

The monogram is that of its original owner, Richard Gladgie, and it does not require a great stretch of our imagination to picture him turning over the leaves from Sunday to Sunday, during the long years of anxiety and trouble of the later years of King Charles's reign, repeating much as we repeat to-day the words of the prayer for our present Sovereign Lord, then with some slight difference of punctuation, and printed in quaint black letter, now so trying to some modern readers' eyes:—

¶ A PRAYER FOR THE KING'S MAJESTIE.

○ Lord our heavenly Father, high and mightie, King of Kings, Lord of lords, the only ruler of Princes, which dost from thy Throne behold all the dwellers upon earth, most heartily we beseech thee with thy favour to behold our most gracious Sovereigne Lord King CHARLES, and so replenish him with the grace of thy holy Spirit, that he may alway incline to thy will, and walk in thy way: endue him plenteously with heavenly gifts, grant him in health and wealth long to live, strengthen him that he may banquish and overcome all his enemies, and finally after this life he may attain everlasting Joy and felicitie, through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

It often seems to me one of the great beauties of our Church and faith that the very words are not only sacred, but also sacred in a different sense, as old family furniture and portraits are, consecrated by the use and memory of our forefathers for many long generations.

I fear I must apologise for a long digression.

H. R. LEIGHTON.

March 4.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In her "History of Christian Names" the late Miss Yonge has said that Charles the First was named after the Emperor Charles the Fifth. "His name impressed James I. with the idea that this must be a fortunate name: when, in the hope of averting the unhappy doom that had pursued five James Stuarts in succession, he called his sons Henry and Charles." I do not know on what authority this statement rests. Of course, James was the son of Henry Lord Darnley, and the descendant of King Henry the Seventh.

H. B. F.

THE FRENCH PEASANT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I think many people have questioned the general truth of the picture of the French peasant given in "La Terre." I have been a great deal about France, and talked to many peasants; but, of course, to pronounce a really competent opinion, one must actually live some time in close contact with the peasants. George Sand gave a picture of the Berry peasants very different from Zola's of the Beaucerons, and, though she wrote some time ago, it is not likely that the peasant character in that quiet district has altered perceptibly in the meantime.

Balzac, I think, did not deal with peasant life in his beloved Touraine; but, had he done so, the results would surely have been such as to afford a pleasant picture of the tiller of the soil of the garden of France. "Les Paysans," I think, deals with peasants in quite another district. I have not the book by me.

René Bazin has written several novels of peasant life in the Vendée, notably "La Terre qui Meurt," the scene of which can easily be traced; and the picture he gives of the peasants, though sometimes saddening, is not repulsive.

Loti has introduced Brittany peasants into several novels, notably "Mon Frère Yves" and "Pêcheur d'Islande;" surely it would not be contended that on the whole he represents them in an ugly light. Yves drank too much sometimes, certainly; but then he was a sailor.

Maupassant has given us many sketches of Normandy peasants. On the whole these are unpleasing rather than pleasing, but it is not so much that he represents the Normandy peasants as vicious, but as grasping, money-grubbing, and even callous.

CONSTANCE A. BARNICOAT.

BOOKS RECEIVED

EDUCATIONAL

Coleman, Walter Moore. Lessons in Hygienic Physiology. Macmillan, 3s.

Wright, Joseph and Elizabeth Mary. Old English Grammar. Oxford University Press, 6s. net.

La Bibliothèque de mon Oncle. Par Rodolphe Töpffer. Macmillan, 6d.

Siepmann, Otto. A Short French Grammar. Macmillan, 2s. 6d.

Hayens, Herbert. The Story of Europe. Collins, 1s. 6d.

Readings from Dickens. Cassell, 6d.

Herbert Strang's Historical Series: A Mariner of England, With the Black Prince, With Marlborough to Malplaquet. Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton, 1s. each.

The Oxford Readers. Book I., 8d.; Book II., 10d. The Oxford Story Readers. 2d. and 3d. each. Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton.

FICTION.

Vacaresco, Hélène. The Queen's Friend. Werner Laurie, 6s.

Fisher, A. O. Withyford. Chatto & Windus, 6s.

Aitken, Robert. The Golden Horseshoe. Greening, 6s.

Prague, Joseph. Vincenzo's Vendella. Greening, 6s.

Hardy, Iza Duffus. Love in Idleness. Digby Long, 6s.

Tytler, Sarah. The Two Lady Lascelles. Digby Long, 6s.

Hallen, A. L. Angelin: A Venile King. Digby Long, 6s.

Meadows, Alice Maud. Three Lovers and One Lass. Digby Long, 6s.

Walpole, Mary. The Love Seekers. Greening, 6s.

Earlston, Peter. The Place Taker. Greening, 6s.

Adcock, A. St. John. The World that Never Was. Griffiths, 6s. net.

Koebel, W. H. The Anchorage. Griffiths, 6s.

Vaile, P. A. Woman the Adorer. Griffiths, 2s. 6d. net.

Lang, L. Lockhart. The Imbeciles. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

Maclaren, Ian. Graham of Claverhouse. Murray, 6s.

White, Fred M. Craven Fortune. Ward Lock, 6s.

Roberts, Morley. Captain Spink. Nash, 6s.

Burgin, G. B. Galanda's Garden. Nash, 6s.

Bazin, René. The Nun. Nash, 6s.

Hinkson, H. A. Father Alphonsus. Fisher Unwin, 6s.

Bloundelle Burton, J. The Last of her Race. John Milne, 6s.

Emmett, Kathleen P. The Silver Zone. Murray, 6s.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Some Special Studies in Genealogy. By Gerald Fothergill, Josiah Newman, Chas. A. Beenan. Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent, 2s. 6d. net.

Rainbow, W. J. A Guide to the Study of Australian Butterflies. Melbourne: Lothian, 3s. 6d.

Marble, Annie Russell. Heralds of American Literature. Fisher Unwin, 6s. 6d. net.

Wolff, Sir Henry Drummond. Rambling Recollections. In 2 vols. Macmillan, 30s. net.

Scott-James, R.A. Modernism and Romance. Lane, 7s. 6d.

Schwann, Duncan. The Spirit of Parliament. Alston Rivers, 3s. 6d. net.

Egypt and How to See It. Illustrated by A. O. Lamplough. Ballantyne, n.p.

Corner, Caroline. Ceylon. Lane, 10s. 6d. net.

Folk Songs from Somerset. Gathered and edited by Cecil J. Sharp. Simpkin, 5s. net.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED WHITE & BLUE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
& AFTER DINNER.In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

Nervous Disorders

A deficiency of the phosphates causes a lowering of nervous tone, indicated by exhaustion, restlessness, headache or insomnia.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate (Non-Alcoholic)

supplies the nerve cells with health-giving life force, restores strength and induces restful sleep without the use of dangerous drugs.

An Ideal Tonic in Nervous Diseases

- If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art specially dealt with.

Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE ARUNDEL CLUB

FOR THE PUBLICATION OF PHOTOGRAPHIC REPRODUCTIONS OF WORKS OF ART IN PRIVATE COLLECTIONS AND ELSEWHERE.

The Committee consists of the following:

LORD BALCARRES, M.P.
SIR WALTER ARMSTRONG.
SIR MARTIN CONWAY.
SIDNEY COLVIN, Esq.
R. C. WITT, Esq.
LIONEL CUST, Esq., M.V.O.
CLAUDE PHILLIPS, Esq.

G. F. WARNER, Esq.
HERBERT COOK, Esq.
JOHN S. SARGENT, Esq., R.A.
ROGER FREY, Esq.
CHARLES RICKETTS, Esq.
BOWYER NICHOLS, Esq.
ALBAN HEAD, Esq.

Hon. Secretary and Hon. Treasurer:

ROBERT ROSS, Esq., 15 Vicarage Gardens, Kensington, London, W.

Two Great French Classics

By Anatole France.

THAÏS

The Beautiful Actress of the Byzantine Empire (IVth Cent.).One Vol., cr. 8vo, on Hand-made Paper,
Six Shillings (free by post).

THE WELL OF SANTA CLARA

Twenty fascinating stories, full of noble ideas, expressed in chaste and refined language, and distinguished by that exquisite grace and ironical subtlety for which Anatole France is peerless.

One Vol., pott 8vo, on Hand-made Paper,
10s. 6d. (free).CHARLES CARRINGTON, Publisher,
13 Faubourg Montmartre, PARIS.

Sir Hubert Von Herkomer AND PUBLIC OPINION

Sir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey to the Editor of "Public Opinion," says, on February 11th, 1908:—

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper, PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which would be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged, and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly. From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is, after all, not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you, with all my heart, continuous success with your paper.

Yours very truly,

(Signed) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

PUBLIC OPINION A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY

Every Friday. Twopence.

EDITED BY PERCY L. PARKER.

The Purpose of PUBLIC OPINION is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political, and social progress.

PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent Post Free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to—

PUBLIC OPINION, 30 & 31 Temple House,
Tallis St., London, E.C.

-SPECIMENS FREE ON APPLICATION.

RE-ISSUE OF THE DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY.

Edited by LESLIE STEPHEN and SIDNEY LEE.
IN TWENTY-TWO VOLUMES

Cloth, gilt top, 15s. net each; or half-morocco, marbled edges, 21s. net each.
The volume will be identical with the Original Edition in type and size of page. Errors have, as far as possible, been corrected, and some of the bibliographies have been revised, but otherwise the text remains unaltered. The price is one-third of that of the original edition, and the volumes will occupy about one-third of the space required by that edition.

Volume I. (ABBADIE-BEADON) IS NOW READY,
And a Volume will be published each succeeding month until the completion of the Edition in DECEMBER, 1939.

The STANDARD says:—"There is no need at this time of day to say anything in praise of the most exhaustive and most varied picture accessible of national life during the march of events in no less than ten centuries. . . . The work is now issued at one-third of the original price—a concession to students and other people of slender purse which we have not the least doubt will be not merely gratefully recognised but promptly rewarded by a great and continuous sale."

* Prospectus, with Specimen Pages, post-free on application.

THE ALIEN SISTERS.

By Mrs. PERCY DEARMER,
Author of "The Difficult Way," "Brownjohn's," &c. &c. 6s.
SIDNEY DARK in the Daily Express says:—"A sincere human story; one of those rare novels that carries with it real intellectual pleasure and stimulus."

BRITISH SOCIALISM:
An Examination of its Doctrines, Policy, Aims, and Practical Proposals.

By J. ELLIS BARKER, Author of "Modern Germany," "The Rise and Decline of the Netherlands," &c. Sm. demy 8vo., 10s. 6d. net.
The Daily Mail says:—"No review could do justice to this admirable book; the reader should buy or borrow it and study it for himself."

London: SMITH ELDER and CO., 15 Waterloo Place, S.W.

A COMPLETE TRAVEL LIBRARY of over 1,000 PAGES

More than 500 beautiful photographic illustrations, including reproductions of valuable old maps and prints.

The above series of Travel Books may be obtained by sending stamps or P.O. for 2/6 to the Superintendent of the Line, Paddington Station, London, W.

JAMES C. INGLIS, General Manager.

G. W. R.

For 2/6 POST FREE

PROCLAIMED BY THE PRESS
TO BE THE NE PLUS ULTRA OF RAILWAY LITERATURE.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH says:

"Wholly admirable pictures and brightly-written letterpress well fulfil their purpose."

THE SPHERE says:

"There is not a single point of interest omitted."

THE WORLD says:

"The literary matter is of considerable merit, and the illustrations are admirable."

MADAME says:

"Both dainty and artistic, containing a mine of information written in the proper spirit of appreciation."

From GREENING'S NEW LIST

Send a post-card for Greening's 1908 Catalogue of General Literature.

TO BE PUBLISHED ON 10th MARCH.

Messrs. GREENING desire to apologise to subscribers for the delay in publication of the new work by SAMUEL COWAN, entitled:—

The Royal House of Stuart

This work, in two handsome volumes, will positively be on sale at all the best booksellers on Tuesday, 10th March. Price for the two vols., £2 2s. net.

The delay in publication is due to the elaborate nature of the work and the difficulty experienced in procuring some of the illustrations. The work contains the most complete collection of Stuart portraits ever published. Among others, the authentic Orkney portrait of Mary Queen of Scots, now, for the first time, reproduced by permission of his Grace the Duke of Sutherland; also the portrait of Queen Annabella Drummond, wife of Robert III., from the private collection, and by permission of Sir James Drummond, of Hawthornden.

The "Royal House of Stuart" is undoubtedly the most interesting chapter we possess of Scottish history, and the author starts as far back as the Eleventh Century, when we get a glimpse of the Thanes of Lochaber, the progenitors of the Stuarts. The early part of the work is devoted to an outline in brief of the High Stewards of Scotland, the first time that a consecutive narrative of these officers of the Crown has been attempted, and this is succeeded by a condensed narrative of the official life and administration of every Sovereign of the House of Stuart, concluding with Queen Anne, the last Sovereign of the Stuart line.

The Royal House of Stuart

By SAMUEL COWAN, J.P. £2 2s. net.

By the Author of "THE CURSE OF THE ROMANOFFS."
ROYAL LOVERS AND MISTRESSES
The Romance of European Sovereigns. By Dr. A. S. RAPPOPORT.
Illustrated. Demy 8vo, cloth, 16s. net. [Ready in April.]

AN IMPORTANT SOCIOLOGICAL WORK.
EDUCATION, PERSONALITY & CRIME
A Study in Multiple Personality in its relation to Crime.

The book will contain Notes selected from the study of about 200 criminals, including murderers, thieves, pickpockets, loafers and burglars.

By Dr. ALBERT WILSON. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net. [Ready in April.]

GREENING'S NEW FICTION

NEARLY 20,000 COPIES SOLD.

BEAU BROCADE

By the BARONESS ORCZY, Author of "The Scarlet Pimpernel." 6s.

THE WHITE ROSE MYSTERY

A Tale of Conspiracy by GERALD BISS, Author of "The Dupe." 6s.

THE WHITE ROSE MYSTERY

By GERALD BISS. SECOND EDITION NOW READY. 6s.

DAILY TELEGRAPH says: "A breathlessly exciting novel. It is a wonderful story. In some imperious fashion of its own it compels attention. You simply cannot help reading it. Its vivacity is infectious."

"A terrible but a noble piece of work."

VINCENZO'S VENDETTA

By JOSEPH PRAGUE.

THE MORNING POST: Mr. Prague writes as one who has mastered his art, and claims of right a high place among contemporary novelists. We expect a great future for the author, for he has painted in his hero a fit subject for tragedy, a man whose fall affects us like the fall of a Roland, fires the imagination and purges the soul."

VINCENZO'S VENDETTA. 6s.

A FINE PIECE OF WORK BY A NEW AUTHOR.

THE LOVE SEEKERS

A Dramatic Novel. By MARY WALPOLE. 6s.

THE MORNING POST: "A book of carefully studied character-drawing in which the characters are conceived and brought into relation in a proper philosophic scheme. There is dramatic art in the telling. Miss Walpole has essayed an interesting study, and has done it well."

THE SCOTSMAN: "Full of animation in its delineations of the wayward emotions of women."

By the Hon. Mrs. WALTER FORBES.

LEROUX. A Dramatic Novel. 6s.

BY [THE JEWISH] KIPLING.

The NEW GALATEA. By SAMUEL GORDON. 6s

Mr. Samuel Gordon is to be classed among the small but noteworthy band of novelists including Maarten Maartens and Joseph Conrad, to whom English is an acquired language. In fact, Mr. Gordon did not speak or write a word of English till well in his teens. But that did not prevent him from earning, for his Jewish stories, the title of "The Jewish Kipling." However, for his novel, "The New Galatea," Mr. Gordon has chosen a thoroughly English group of characters, and handles a theme which in its boldness is reminiscent of the most advanced Continental writers, with a delicacy which cannot offend even the most Puritanical taste.

GREENING & CO., LTD., 91 ST. MARTIN'S LANE LONDON, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1872

MARCH 21, 1908

PRICE THREEPENCE

Art

SHEPHERD BROS'. SPRING EXHIBITION of Early British Masters includes choice works by

Reynolds Hoppner Raeburn Cotman
Gainsborough Crome Whealley Vincent
Romney Constable Wilson Stark, &c.
SHEPHERDS' GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's, S.W.

THE MOSHER BOOKS

THE NEW CATALOGUE FOR 1908

is now ready, and will be sent free on request to booklovers anywhere that can be reached by mail. This Catalogue, like those that preceded it, is not made up of old and hackneyed quotations concerning books. You are not wearied by "a jollie good book" jingle and that sort of thing, but you are treated to some very genuine prose and verse not seen in every cut and decidedly dried anthology.

THOMAS B. MOSHER, PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

JUST PUBLISHED. 8vo, boards, 1s. net.

THE SLING.

Remarks in connection with Lectures delivered in the Royal Institution, May, 1905, to June, 1907.

By WM. LEIGHTON JORDAN.

London: Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co., Ltd.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds of Type-writing carefully done at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3d. 6d. per 100.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

TYPEWRITING, 8d. per Thousand, including paper and postage. MSS. neatly and clearly typed. Satisfaction guaranteed.—Miss DREW, 84 Park Row, Bristol.

NOTICE.

All communications to the Editor should be addressed to 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

All business communications must be sent to The Manager of "The Academy," 67 Long Acre, W.C.

Books for Sale

OLD WEST SURREY. Some Notes and Memories by GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 330 Illustrations from photographs by the Author. 8vo, art cloth as issued. Longmans, 1904. 12s. 6d. net for 6s.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

PARISH AND SHAW'S DICTIONARY OF THE KENTISH DIALECT AND PROVINCIALISMS IN USE IN THE COUNTY OF KENT (pub. 10s.), 2s., free.—W. E. GOULDEN, Second-hand Bookseller, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

5 WORKS BY CANON RAWNSLEY:—Ruskin and the Lakes; A Rambler's Note-Book at the Lakes; Life and Nature at the Lakes; Lake Country Sketches; Memories of the Tennysons. Published at 3s. 6d. net, for 1s. 6d.; new.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

BOOKS.—ALL OUT-OF-PRINT and RARE BOOKS on any subject SUPPLIED. The most expert Bookfinder extant. Please state wants and ask for CATALOGUE. I make a special feature of exchanging any Saleable Books for others selected from my various Lists. Special List of 2,000 Books I particularly want post free.—EDW. BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16 John Bright Street, Birmingham. Oscar Wilde's Poems 21s., for 10s. 6d.; Ballad of Reading Gaol, 5s. Who's Who, 2 vols., 1907, 11s. net, for 5s.

THE FAUNA OF BRITISH INDIA, including Ceylon and Burma. Published under the authority of the Secretary of State for India in Council. Medium 8vo, with two coloured plates and numerous illustrations. COLEOPTERA (CHRYSOEIDÆ), Vol. I., price 1s. London: Taylor & Francis, Red Lion Court, Fleet Street. Calcutta and Simla: Thacker, Spink & Co. Bombay: Thacker & Co., Ltd. Burma: Myles Standish & Co., Rangoon. Berlin: Friedlander & Sohn Carlstrasse 11.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:—

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical Advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley, Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A Furnished House in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

Books, etc., Wanted

THE CAMBRIDGE LITERARY AGENCY, which is placing Novels, Short Stories, Articles, and Poems with over 100 (One Hundred) Publishers and Periodicals, sold, on December 31, 12 Short Stories and a Serial by UNKNOWN WRITERS. Hundreds of unique testimonials. All MSS. submitted by GEORGE G. MAGNUS, 115 Strand, London.

WILL PURCHASE AT ANY TIME.

ILLUMINATED MANUSCRIPTS, from the earliest times till the beginning of the XVIIth Century; Incunabula and other Early Printed Books; Illustrated Books, Prints, from the XVth and the beginning of the XVIth Century. Rare Old Books and Prints.—JACQUES ROSENTHAL, Munich, Bavaria. 10, Karlstr. 10.

QUEEN SQUARE CLUB.

A social club for men and women interested in politics, literature or art. Lectures, entertainments, chess and bridge. An exquisite Queen Anne club-house, close to the British Museum and Russell Square Station. Inexpensive lunch and dinner. Subscription two guineas.—Apply Secretary, 9 Queen Square Bloomsbury.

THE LATEST BOOKS

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS.

JUST PUBLISHED.

Messrs. GREENING have pleasure in announcing that they have now ready the important work by SAMUEL COWAN, J.P., Author of "Mary, Queen of Scots," "The Gowrie Conspiracy," &c., entitled—

THE ROYAL HOUSE OF STUART

Demy 8vo, cloth, 2 Vols., £2 2s. net.

¶ This Work, the publication of which has been delayed owing to the immense difficulties of securing some of the pictures, is illustrated with portraits of all the Stuart Sovereigns, and CONTAINS THE MOST COMPLETE COLLECTION OF STUART PORTRAITS ever brought together, including a large number hitherto unpublished. By special permission of the Duke of Sutherland the famous Orkney portrait of Mary Queen of Scots has been now for the first time reproduced, while another valuable picture—the portrait of Queen Annabella Drummond, wife of Robert III.—is also given through the courtesy of Sir James Drummond of Hawthornden.

NEW FICTION

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SCARLET PIMPERNEL."

BEAU BROCADE

By the BARONESS ORCZY, 6th Edition.

20th Thousand. 6s.

THE TIMES—"A gallant, swinging romance."

MORNING POST—"The book is a triumph of good rushing narrative."

A THRILLING ROMANCE.

LEROUX

By the Hon. Mrs. WALTER FORBES, Author of "The Official," "A Gentleman," &c. 6s.

A REALLY FUNNY BOOK.

THE GANG

Written and Illustrated by DAVID WHITELAW.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

DAILY TELEGRAPH—"A rollicking farce, in which we rush all over Europe and hold our breath at the speed and diversity of complications. . . . The illustrations, which are by the author himself, are extremely good and as highly diverting as the text."

A FINE PIECE OF WORK BY A NEW AUTHOR.

THE LOVE SEEKERS

A Dramatic Novel. By MARY WALPOLE, 6s.

THE MORNING POST—"A book of carefully studied character-drawing in which the characters are conceived and brought into relation in a proper philosophical scheme. . . . There is dramatic art in the telling. Miss Walpole has essayed an interesting study, and has done it well."

"A TERRIBLE BUT A NOBLE PIECE OF WORK."

VINCENZO'S VENDETTA

By JOSEPH PRAGUE, Author of "The Abductors," 6s.

THE MORNING POST—"Mr. Prague writes as one who has mastered his art, and claims of right a high place among contemporary novelists. We expect a great future for the author, for he has painted in his hero a fit subject for tragedy, a man whose fall affects us like the fall of a Roland, fires the imagination and purges the soul."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "RICHARD THE BRAZEN."

THE BLUE OCEAN'S DAUGHTER

A Romance by CYRUS TOWNSEND BRAWLEY, 6s.

A REMARKABLE NOVEL BY THE "JEWISH KIPLING."

THE NEW GALATEA

By SAMUEL GORDON, 6s.

¶ Mr. Samuel Gordon is to be classed among the small but noteworthy band of novelists, including Maarten Maartens and Joseph Conrad, to whom English is an acquired language. In fact, Mr. Gordon did not speak or write a word of English till well in his teens. But that did not prevent him from earning for his Jewish stories, the title of "The Jewish Kipling." However, for his novel, "The New Galatea," Mr. Gordon has chosen a thoroughly English group of characters, and handles a theme which in its boldness is reminiscent of the most advanced Continental writers, with a delicacy which cannot offend even the most Puritanical taste.

A DASHING TALE OF ADVENTURE.

THE GOLDEN HORSESHOE

By ROBERT AITKEN, 6s.

¶ Mr. Robert Aitken is a young English writer who lives in America. "The Golden Horseshoe" has had a phenomenal success there, over 20,000 copies being sold in a short time. The plot is full of stirring incident. Love and adventure are the keynotes of the book. It is sound, healthy fiction of the best class.

A DRAMATIC STORY.

THE HARVEST OF DECEIT

By CLIVE PEMBERTON, 6s.

DAILY GRAPHIC—"It is a great subject, and, as treated by the author, it will find many readers. . . . As a detective story writer, Clive Pemberton has shown real ingenuity."

(NEARLY READY).—LUCAS CLEEVE'S LATEST NOVEL.

THE CARDINAL AND LADY SUSAN

A Story of Intrigue by LUCAS CLEEVE, Author of "The Mascotte of Park Lane," &c. 6s.

HOUGHTON TOWNLEY'S NEW NOVEL.

THE SPLENDID COWARD

The Story of a Double Life.

By HOUGHTON TOWNLEY, Author of "The Bishop's Emeralds," &c. 6s.

SEND A P.C. FOR GREENING'S NEW CATALOGUE.

GREENING & CO., Ltd., 91 St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

MESSRS. DENT'S BOOKS.

ST. CATHERINE OF SIENA.

By EDMUND G. GARDNER.

With an Appendix containing some hitherto Unpublished Letters of St. Catherine. A Study in the Italian Religion, Literature, and History of the Fourteenth Century. Illustrated in Photogravure. 16s. net.

"St. Catherine has been the theme of a good many recent books. . . . But the most elaborate and comprehensive biography is that of Mr. Edmund G. Gardner, who writes with obvious sympathy and with a full knowledge of all the materials. . . . An interesting book."—Daily Telegraph.

"No better interpretation in either of the character of St. Catherine or the great part which she played in Italy in the dramatic century in which her lot was cast has ever appeared in the English language."—Standard.

THE DISCIPLE OF A SAINT.

A Novel. Being the Imaginary Biography of Raniero di Landoccio dei Pagliarini, Secretary to St. Catherine of Siena.

By VIDA D. SCUDDER.

Author of "St. Catherine, as Seen in Her Letters." Crown 8vo., 4s. 6d. net.

CITIES OF ITALY.

By ARTHUR SYMONS. Crown 8vo., 4s. 6d. net.

"The author has many gifts which give his essays distinction and charm."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Symons is always picturesque, and his book is a delightful record of pleasant hours in a sunny land."—Manchester Guardian.

FLOWER GROUPING IN ENGLISH, SCOTCH, AND IRISH GARDENS.

Text by ROSE KINGSLEY, "E. V. B.," the Hon. EMILY LAWLESS, WALTER P. WRIGHT, &c.

With Notes and 56 Illustrations in Colour by MARGARET WATERFIELD.

Square crown 4to., 1l. 1s. net.

"A very handsome volume, finely illustrated with pictures of what has been done in many gardens of the United Kingdom. Miss Waterfield has had the help of able co-contributors, and has given garden-lovers not only a book, but an ideal—nay, many ideals."—Spectator. Prospectus post-free.

Fourth Edition.]

GARDEN COLOUR.

By Mrs. C. W. EARLE, "E. V. B.," ROSE KINGSLEY, Hon. VICARY GIBBS, &c.

With over 50 Full-page Coloured Illustrations from Water-colour Drawings by MARGARET WATERFIELD. Square crown 4to., 1l. 1s. net.

"Full of 'verbal' colour and enthusiasm, this work will come as a great treat into the hands of any person with a true love of flowers. It will be doubly acceptable to those who take a keen personal interest in the growth of their flowers, having a value far transcending that of the merely practical handbook."—Daily Telegraph.

SIGISMONDO MALATESTA.

By EDWARD HUTTON.

Illustrated in Photogravure. Square demy 8vo., 12s. 6d. net.

A Study of a Fifteenth Century Italian Despot.

"A fine work of art, conceived and carried out to the end in an artistic spirit that often deserves to be called consummate. . . . a living and a faithful picture of the stirring times and some of the strenuous men of the early Renaissance."—Saturday Review.

THE OLD VENETIAN PALACES AND OLD VENETIAN FOLK.

By THOMAS O'KEY, Author of "Venice and Its Story" (now in its Third Edition). With 50 Illustrations in Colour and many in Line by THEYOR HADDON, R.B.A., and several Reproductions from the Works of JOHN RUSKIN.

4to., cloth, 1l. 1s. net.

"A volume of quite exceptional charm and interest. . . . Mr. Haddon's illustrations are very beautiful; he has caught the true inwardness of Venetian scenery. . . . Certainly a book to possess."—Guardian. Prospectus post-free.

"Guides to the spirit of the place."—Daily News.

THE MEDIAEVAL TOWNS.

"LITERARY GUIDE-BOOKS."

With numerous Illustrations, Reproductions, and Maps. Fcap. 8vo. (pocketable), cloth, gilt, and limp paste grain roan bindings. Volumes now ready.

Assisi	Constantinople	Moscow
Nuremberg	Perugia	Prague
Edinburgh	Bruges	Brussels
Cambridge	Chartres	Ferrara
London	Paris	Rome
Siena	Seville	Verona
	Milan. (Nearly ready.)

Cloth, 4s. 6d. net; leather, 5s. 6d. net.

Illustrated London News—"They are guide-books, books for study, and books for reference, and at the same time little galleries of art."

Other Volumes in preparation. Please write for Prospectus.

LES CLASSIQUES FRANCAIS.

Edited by H. WARNER ALLEN.

Each with an etched Frontispiece by J. AYTON SYMINGTON.

Cloth, 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. net.

Special List sent free on Application.

J. M. DENT and CO., 30, Bedford Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page.		Page.
Life and Letters	575	Lord Cromer's Book: Its
The Crown	577	Personal Aspect.—Part III.	593
Reviews :		Shorter Reviews	595
Ibsen	577	Fiction	597
Two Poets	578	Miss Maud Allan's Salome
University Reform	579	Dance	598
Letters from the Raven	580	Correspondence	599
A Mislaid Poet	581	Books Received	601
Candles	583

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-Class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to The Wilsford Press, Ltd., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The Publishing Offices of THE ACADEMY are at 67 Long Acre, London, W.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

MR. HAROLD SPENDER has written a very remarkable article in the Daily Chronicle on the burning question of the new Licensing Bill. He begins by a quotation from Holy Writ, paralleling the making of beer with the making of silver shrines for Diana of the Ephesians, from which it would appear that Mr. Spender looks upon brewing as being quite as grave an offence as idolatry. He goes on to ask how much "the trade" costs us in "order, sanity, well-being, and domestic peace :—"

What is the price (he asks) we pay in prisons, workhouses, lunatic asylums, inebriate homes? What in deaths, broken lives, shattered homes?

And then Mr. Spender proceeds to prove his case. First of all, as to crime; the Chief Constable of Nottingham is cited to show that 50 per cent. of the nation's crime is due to drink alone, then the official return of criminal statistics is quoted to the effect that :

not in any single year since the beginning of this twentieth century has the number of offences against the law due to drink been less than 200,000.

And next comes Death. In England and Wales during 1906 there were 2,281 deaths due to "alcoholism," and in the period 1896-1900 the rate per million of such deaths was 85·8; and, in addition, coroners' juries in 1906 attributed 797 violent deaths to "excessive drinking." From these statistics Mr. Harold Spender draws the conclusion that the reaper Death is "no mean ally" of the firm of Bass and the Vicar of Burton-on-Trent. Moreover, these persons have another ally—his name is Madness, of which alcohol is conspicuous as a "predisposing or exciting cause." From 1900 to 1905 no less than 2,349 men and 989 women "passed within the portals of lunatic asylums owing to drink." As for poverty, Mr. Charles Booth found that, on an analysis of 4,000 cases of London poverty, 14 per cent. were directly due to drink, while the Manchester Guardians stated in 1884 that 51 per cent. of their cases were due to the same cause. And, furthermore, Mr. Spender points to the statistics of Inebriate Homes, and to the long list of "separation orders" for drunkenness. "Red Ruin and the breaking-up of laws," he says, "are the true gifts of the brewers to the nation." Crime, death, poverty, madness, red ruin—these, he affirms, are the plain and manifest results of the brewing, sale, and consumption of beer:

Well, the long and the short of all this is that Mr. Harold Spender denounces the whole trade in beer as the worst evil that has ever afflicted the human race. Beer is worse than the Borgia poison, for this killed only the body, while that plunges body, soul, mind, and spirit, all things without and all things within, into utter ruin, misery, degradation, and death. On one side beer brings woe and desolation to the humblest cottage, on the other it threatens the whole State, the body politic of this fair realm of England. Ruin, utter, irretrievable, finally follows in its train; all hell lurks at the bottom of every bottle of Bass. And what, then, does Mr. Harold Spender propose? What can he propose but the swift and stern annihilation of all this horror; it shall not be felony, one would say, to brew small ale, but felony to brew at all, felony to sell, felony to drink—"Delenda est Burtonia." But who can hesitate? If, by a mere Act of Parliament, it be possible to raise the sum of happiness, morality, sanity, wealth by an advantage of 50 per cent., what is to be done but to pass such an Act quickly, to make the mere possession of beer as dangerous as the possession of dynamite bombs? And Mr. Harold Spender says that all that is necessary is to pass the Licensing Bill, which, so far as we understand, will largely diminish the number of public-houses, while leaving the "club" free to establish itself in every byway. The dynamite emporiums are to be strictly limited in number; it will be necessary to walk six miles before buying dynamite on Sundays, the throwing of bombs will be forbidden after ten o'clock on Sunday nights under penalty of fine, and before inaugurating any club or society for the purpose of promoting assassination by high explosives it will be necessary to announce a series of lectures (to be delivered on the club premises) on Earth-worms and Aeronauts, so that the authorities may be convinced that such club is not merely and simply a dynamiting club. Of course, the analogy is feeble. Dynamite only kills the body of the especial victim or victims, while beer spreads madness, death, poverty, lunacy, misery wholesale. Still, the analogy will serve.

The election of M. Poincaré to the French Academy seems so reasonable to those who know his work, that it is inevitable that we should feel surprised that he has not been asked already to sit among the forty. He is the great apostle of the doctrine of "Science for the Sake of Science," so that his devotion to the cause of science leads him often to appear as actually the opponent of science. For we are all of us wedded to a conception of the value of science which can be estimated by the material good which we can extract from its lessons. On a solid mathematical basis physical laws are founded, and, guided by those laws, we make the elements and forces of Nature earn dividends for us—therefore we reverence what we term the truth of science. M. Poincaré will have no part in this sort of worship of science, which he regards as cupboard-love. His ultra-philosophical mind enables him to regard the unassailable verities as conventions or useful methods of expression; the facts of time and space are with him always relative—true to this extent, that if the premisses be exact, the deductions are exact; but imaginary to this extent, that as the premisses are not absolute, but only the interpretations of the human brain, the deductions also are not absolute. M. Jules Sageret, in the Mercure de France of March 1st, has a timely little essay on la commodité scientifique, as he terms the position of Poincaré towards science, and from this lucid little exposition of an attitude which requires a good deal of metaphysical explanation, we can gather how great a savant the new Immortal is, and how expansive and illuminating is his teaching.

The phrase "the dignity of labour" has no more sense than "the dignity of natation" or "the dignity of perspiration." All three actions are undignified for Cabinet Ministers in Hyde Park, and may be necessary to the preservation of life under other circumstances. The first hackneyed phrase was invented by or for those who have so little sense of personal dignity as to be secretly ashamed of their right to provide for their own necessities. Some one of a like class of mind taught the wretched agricultural labourers that their useful and handsome smocks were less respectable garments than worn and ill-made coats. We have often wondered whether he was a candidate for demagoguery, or an acute slop-shopman. But in what does the dignity of labour consist, in the act or the object? Dr. Clifford, we suppose, thinks the mental and vocal labour of organising conscience-strikes immensely dignified. We wonder whether Dr. Fairbairn thinks there is any dignity in brewing.

Our contemporary The Sphere publishes an interesting illustration of French ecclesiastics engaged in various forms of handicraft, ranging from ornamental painting—from the specimen offered to view, we deprecate this exercise—to bee-keeping. We include the last, because we believe that those working insects, like their present types, require peculiar manipulation. Our contemporary's contributor also quotes the book, "Les Métiers Possibles du Prêtre de Demain," and represents its author, the Abbé Louis Ballu, as:

passing in review the employments which he considers compatible with the ecclesiastical dignity.

We have not read the book, though we shall do so, but the contributor must surely unintentionally misinterpret the author. Since net-fishing and tent-making were not incompatible with the pontifical and episcopal dignities, no labour is incompatible with the sacerdotal, nor, as far as we know, is any forbidden by ecclesiastical authority, in cases of necessity. French ecclesiastics are not the men to cherish vague illusions as to dignity or indignity in labour.

To Monsieur l'Abbé Ballu is apparently due the honour of having initiated a union of ecclesiastic workmen, formed with the object of supporting themselves under their persecution by the French Government, during hours when they are not occupied by their spiritual functions—at least, for so long as the Government permits them to do so. It is likely that this will not be for long, and the majority of our English contemporaries which applaud the dominance of French Freemasonry, may soon have to find excuses for further application of its peculiar notions of liberty. They can easily do so on the analogy of similar restrictions in England, applicable to the clergy of the Church of England. Though none such restrictions exist in the case of Nonconformist ministers, we do not fancy that many compete for "the dignity of labour" which their political brethren commend so loudly.

Since the writers of these "Life and Letters" are not collectively unable, if necessary, to provide and cook their own food, raise their own vegetables, and otherwise shift for themselves with their own hands, we should have some right to congratulate these French ecclesiastics on their spirited action, if anything else were to be expected from men who have always shown the finest examples under persecution. We cannot attribute to them any increase or decrease of dignity for using their natural or acquired faculties for their own support. We do not ourselves exercise our own much, because we are engaged in the loftier occupation of providing amusement or wholesome irritants to our readers. On the reverse side, we may be allowed to point out to those worthy persons who keep the Bible open with their fists, that when they begin to read it, they will find nothing in it about the labour of the Person Whose example they desire to follow. Christ's work in the carpenter's shop is traditional and consequently reference to it is incompatible with "simple Bible teaching." No single stroke of manual labour is recorded of Him in the Bible. His working of miracles—if not a Popish invention—was a distinct breach of the "Laws" of Science, by which our simple teachers desire to correct that purely sacerdotal compilation.

The Jewish Historical Society of England this year for the first time is issuing to its members advance fascicules of Transactions. This is a good plan since it should keep up interest in the current work of the Society, and by submitting it to wider criticism, should enable authors to modify their conclusions, and so give greater value to the more permanent yearly volume. The current fascicule, the second, consists of a paper on King Alfred and the Mosaic Law by Professor Liebermann, who considers that Alfred, when translating the Decalogue, "must have used some text besides the Vulgate, which, however, seems now not to be known." Professor Liebermann discusses Alfred's purpose in prefixing the decrees of Exodus to his own code. It was not with any intention of giving them practical effect, but rather to show his people God's legislation, in some respects more severe, in others milder, than the Anglo-Saxon laws. His object was "half ethical, half political." A curious example of both intentions is found in the fact that while he omitted the Second Commandment as an apparent prohibition of Christian Saxon practices, he diplomatically "appended the prohibition of metal idols from a later verse in Exodus, an insertion directed against the heathenism introduced by the Danish invaders." Many other points are discussed, and the whole paper is full of interest.

We are glad to announce that Miss Gertrude Kingston will deliver two lectures on "The Drama and the Public" at 20, Hanover Square, at three o'clock, the first on March 26th and the second on March 31st. The scheme of the lectures is to consider historically the attitude of the public in England to the drama. The first lecture will deal with the Stuart Period, the beginning of the conflict; and the second with the Georgian Period, including the story of the interference of the State and of the censorship. Discussion is invited at the end of each lecture, and tickets can be obtained (12s. 6d. for both lectures, or 7s. 6d. for either) from the Social Bureau, 30, New Bond Street; or from Mrs. Silver (Miss Gertrude Kingston), 24, Victoria Square, Grosvenor Gardens, S.W. As a speaker, Miss Gertrude Kingston can compare with any in London of either sex, and since the subject of her lectures is one on which a great diversity of opinion exists, the discussion which will follow them is also likely to be very interesting.

The recent manifesto signed by various "eminent" Congregational ministers, which appeared a little while ago in the leading newspapers, is a delightful sign of the times. It marks one more among the countless "splits" among Nonconformists, and it amounts practically to the excommunication of Mr. R. J. Campbell from the general body of the "Free Churches." Even the Congregational ministers have at last come to the conclusion that there must be some limit to their "broad-minded tolerance," and the denouncers of dogma have had to fall back, willy-nilly, on—Dogma. Mr. Stead has seized the opportunity to interview Mr. Campbell, and the "interview" appears in this month's Review of Reviews. We apologise to our readers for quoting from it, but we feel that it is our painful duty:

Oh! (says Mr. Stead) there comes in my fundamental article of faith. That is, that we are all junior partners of God Almighty. Our duty is to do what He tells us, and it is our Senior Partner's duty, which He duly performs, to give us straight tips as to what He wants us to do.

This is the sort of thing that produces in our case what Stevenson called "deadly nausea and racking of the bones."

We learn that the feeling of the Welsh Nonconformist members of Parliament is very strongly opposed to the proposed census of attendances at "places of religious worship" in Wales. We are not surprised. The Nonconformists, by a continual process of "bluff," and by false assertions constantly made in public and in their own organs, have succeeded in impressing on the country a belief that they represent at least half of the whole population of these islands. As a matter of fact they represent about one-sixth, or rather less. If the real facts as to their comparatively small numbers were made apparent, as they would be if the proposed census took place, their political power would collapse like a squeezed balloon. Small wonder, then, that they dislike the idea of a census! However, census or no census, there seems every prospect that their weakness will shortly be exposed. It looks at present very much as if the next General Election would resolve itself into a struggle between Nonconformists on the one side and the rest of England on the other. For our part we can wish and pray for nothing better.

Our remarks on March 7th concerning Mr. McKenna's name as an element for rhyme have been taken rather more seriously than we intended, and we have received a considerable number of "Limericks." There is a great unanimity in the choice of either "senna" or "Ravenna," one rhymers alone has discovered "duenna," two use "when a," and two "pen a." In order not to disappoint the rhymers, we print the rhyme signed "S. T.," which we think the best, with apologies to the Minister of Education for this frivolous use of his name:

There was a young man called McKenna,
Who one day proceeded to pen a Preposterous Bill;
But the country felt ill
And said, "Go to Gehenna, McKenna!"

THE CROWN

To-morrow slowly bears to me the crown
Of all my days and deeds, from fortune wrung
With sword and smile, quick thrust and dallying tongue,
Hates masked with love, and terrors trampled down.
For not to me, by right of ancient wrong,
Doth easy kingship fall from kingly sires;
No random throw of chance my life attires
In regal purple; but with labour long
Of desperate day, and swift, unslumbering night,
I smiled and slew and jostled through the years,
Till, one by one, my foes were put to flight,
And, one by one, behind me fell my fears.
Now none withstands me; and I feel, at last,
The sceptre in my grasp; for, when day comes,
And dawn is startled by the roll of drums,
My conquest, bruited on the heralds' blast,
Shall hail me king through all the cowering lands.
To-morrow—yet to-night I may not sleep;
But, like a robber, by the guards I creep
Into the chamber where the great throne stands,
To await the dawning majesty of day.
No sound is there, no light, save from the moon
Falls one dim ray to where, at stroke of noon,
My knees shall bend before him who shall lay
The gold upon my brow; when I shall rise
To stoop no more; and, throned on mailed power,
Shall sway the lands and peoples from that hour,
Unchallenged, and a king in all men's eyes.
Yet dawn delays. Before the throne I kneel
To await the morrow's crown . . . but, who art thou
Who settest this cold circle on my brow,
That grips my temples in a vice of steel?
Hark, hark the drums! Yet terror chokes my breath;
I cannot rise; my limbs are turned to stone.
Oh, who art thou who sittest on my throne?

"I am the king whom all men bow to—Death!"

WILFRID WILSON GIBSON.

REVIEWS

IBSEN

The Collected Works of Henrik Ibsen. Copyright Edition. Eleven Volumes. With Introductions by WILLIAM ARCHER and C. H. HERFORD, Litt.D., M.A. (Heinemann, 4s. net each.)

Ibsen. By EDMUND GOSSE. Literary Lives Series. (Hodder and Stoughton, 3s. 6d.)

In the public mind Dr. Gosse and Mr. Archer are regarded as an Ibsen Trust; they have—it is more or less rightly supposed—made a "corner" in Ibsen, and though they do not ostensibly conduct operations in concert, the fact that "There they are!" to some extent warns other people off. In Mr. Archer's edition of the works he has received some assistance from Professor Herford; but it will always be known, and rightly, as Archer's edition. It will remain for long, probably for good, the standard edition, and it richly deserves the honour. It is practically complete—though we admit we should much like to have a look at Catilina; it is gravely, thoroughly, and critically edited, and the translations are—save for occasional "bookishness" and occasional awkwardness, due mainly, no doubt, to a desire to keep close to the original—completely satisfying to those who are not knowledgeable in the Norse. In the same way, Mr. Gosse's will probably remain the only Life for the present. Admirable as it is, light in touch, humorous, full of apt allusion, and particularly valuable for its insistence on the intellectual upheaval of Norway as a factor in Ibsen's development, it is not a book, in our opinion, which could not be greatly improved on the issue of a new edition. Here and there it is, to tell the truth, a little thin, a little perfunctory, and a little slipshod, and we doubt whether Dr. Gosse read his proofs. Had he done so he would never have allowed "Colonel Newcombe" to pass him, nor have approved on second thoughts the word irradicable (which can only mean "impossible to root") instead of ineradicable, nor have printed two different translations of the same sentence from one of Ibsen's letters on pp. 190 and 192.

To Mr. Archer and Dr. Gosse no one would grudge their command of the Ibsen Trust. Mr. Archer has stuck to Ibsen through thick and thin for thirty years, defending him against all kinds of foolish or malicious misconstruction, enduring on his behalf all sorts of attack, by innuendo and otherwise, on his own motives, forcing Ibsen, to our great good, down our throats, and seeing that we got him as pure as could be in the circumstances. Dr. Gosse, on the other hand, was actually the first to introduce Ibsen to our then inhospitable shores. There are, however, at least two other names which the present generation, happy in its right comprehension of the great Norwegian poet, should not forget to honour; and it is a pleasant duty to take this opportunity of recording that the first English translation of any Ibsen play, The Doll's House, was the work of Miss Lord, and was actually produced and acted by a small company of enthusiasts in 1885, four years before Miss Achurch appeared as Nora; and that the first English translation of Brand was that by Mr. "William Wilson" published in 1891. Professor Herford makes no mention of his predecessor's Brand; Mr. Archer allows only a slighting reference to Miss Lord's courageous pioneering. And it is in our opinion particularly important to remember Mr. "Wilson's" translation of Brand. Celeris paribus, we would always prefer a prose to a verse translation of a poem. We lose much, it is true; but what we lose is exactly what we cannot get "in its quiddity" from anything but the original; and for those of us whom even the desire to know Brand or Peer Gynt in the original cannot spur to mastering the Scandinavian tongues, a prose translation—especially when the prose is as good as Mr. "Wilson's"—is much safer. We want to know what the author said; no translation can tell us exactly how he said it; and—to take an instance—the famous speech of Brand's in Act IV. just after the departure of the Mayor or Baillie gives us a much clearer and firmer idea not only of Brand's peculiar religious views, but actually of the man himself in the sober prose translation than we receive from the spirited verse of Professor Herford.

Echoes of old strifes linger in all these books—echoes of the days when Mr. Clement Scott and the other mid-Victorians railed at Ibsen for an obscene defiler of the purity of the home, and the Examiner of Plays declared him publicly to be "too absurd altogether" to be worth censoring. To others Ibsen was a gross provincial realist, to others a revolutionary; to others, again, in Mr. "Wilson's" words, "his theatre was the suburban chapel of a new denomination." Present days are fortunate in that these struggles and mistakes have rolled away. We see that, "if men who 'have missions' engage in decent devotion before a gargoyle, and women of enlightened morality transpose the negatives in the Ten Commandments with respectable intentions, Herr Ibsen's work is ill-interpreted." Present days understand that Ibsen was right in always speaking of himself as a "poet." He is, indeed, a "maker," a poietes. He does not want to teach—though possibly Mr. "Wilson" goes too far in saying that his mind is unable to teach anything; he wanted, as he himself said of Hedda Gabler, "to depict human beings, human emotions, and human destinies, upon a groundwork of certain of the social conditions and principles of the present day." That sentence gives the clue to his work. Professor C. E. Vaughan, in his new and very interesting book, "Types of Tragic Drama," examines the realism of Ibsen, and decides that in only one respect is he a realist at all, in that he takes the material for his characters straight from the life of his own country and his own time—and that is why Dr. Gosse is so right to lay emphasis on the importance, in the study of Ibsen, of some knowledge of the Sturm und Drang of the Norway of those days. But so soon as Ibsen has taken his material, he ceases to use it like a realist. He was the first, and is still the supreme example of a poet making great tragic stuff out of the minute study of common life. The finished thing, the play (which remains a poem even when the author was most determined to deny it all poetic ornament), is no piece of realism. It becomes symbolical, mystical, idealistic. Words cannot express the subtlety of the movements of the half-realised or unrealised, the vague, subconscious elements of the minds and characters of these people; symbol must be called in to help; and beneath the spoken dialogue there runs another unspoken but mentally audible dialogue, in which deep calls to deep. Still less are these plays tracts. It is easy to think of Ibsen as a glum and silent doctor. He comes abruptly into the sick-room. The first thing he does is to open the window; the second to look at you with an expression that says unmistakably, "If you want to be better, it's you, not I, that can make you so." He prescribes you no medicine, but he leaves you with the will to recover and the courage to get up. That is the limit of his advice. And to regard him only as a doctor, concerned with the healing of your own little ills, to imagine that his only work is to open your window and rouse your will-power, is grossly to misconceive the extent of the man's activities and his importance to the world.

TWO POETS

New Poems. By HERBERT TRENCH. (Methuen, 6s.)

Interludes and Poems. By LASCELLES ABERCROMBIE. (Lane, 5s. net.)

THE accident of choice has brought together these two volumes by writers of various power and accomplishment, who are yet curiously alike in their absorption in ideas. In another respect, too, are they alike: they both treat the Muse unchivalrously, forgetting that she has not been in any degree illiberal in her gifts to them.

Mr. Trench is only less discourteous to the Muse herself than Mr. Abercrombie. He flings her a harsh epithet, cries roughly in her ear, and in her name is guilty of barbarous rhythms and impossible forms. Pure perversity seems answerable for this violence, and often, alas! the Muse herself retorts with perversity, standing afar, averted, all but inappeasable. And then she will not hear aught that Mr. Trench utters in her name, and he is discordant, untunable, uncertain; or she cries to him, as he himself has told us in his "Stanzas to Poetry:"

Thy song shall be imperfect, never fear.

When she is farthest from him and most obdurate in deafness, he can but sing, of the "Daughters of Joy:"

You, from the dance yonder?
In tears, at this street-corner?
"I am going home, my friend."
(Strange, that you knew me!)

Dances are not for the sore heart, nor lights for the scorner."

At his worst he is strong; never is he trivial; but, in all seriousness, we could wish he had yielded a heartier and humbler service to her who will not accept save of a man's best. There is a grave and often noble music in these singular poems which it is a happiness to detect, even amid the harsher rumbling of metrical conflict; and when he is disengaged from the trouble of that strife, and has indeed that meditative leisure of soul in which only may the still small voice of perfect poetry be heard, then we verily have cause to thank him.

It were unfair, though hardly unreasonable, to judge the opening poem, "Apollo and the Seaman," by the recent performance of the illuminated symphony of this title at Queen's Hall. The new art of the blackboard, as it was termed, is as old as childhood; but new or old, ill or good, it would be hard to discover anything in verse more grotesquely inappropriate as theme for such a performance. The poem is a fine one, with a music of its own and a large general argument which is all that poetry can bear. But to argue with an orchestra and magic-lantern! . . . Enough of this! The subject of the poem itself is the loss of "the great ship Immortality" through the mutiny of Hell and the reproaches of the righteous; the anguish of the Seaman who hears of this; and Apollo's consolation of him with the thought that, though Immortality is gone down like the sun, the race of man lives and wins from sea to sea, and the Seaman himself will live in his child, with whose life his own is really one. It is a large theme, rendered somewhat obscurely into throbbing words. If we cannot accept Mr. Trench's melancholy conclusion, and if we think that the Seaman's natural objection to personal extinction is hardly well met by his bright interlocutor, we are nevertheless conscious of the sincerity of the author. To an unfortunate lapse of judgment must we assign it that Mr. Trench, not content with using the form of the "Ancient Mariner" for a poem of the modern mariner of thought, should also borrow the machinery of that earlier work—hanging, in place of the Albatross, a token "Judge Thyself" round the necks of the Immortality's rebels. Mr. Trench's invention, surely, needed no such poor contrivance. And, moreover, since the original of the form adopted is thus brought to mind in reading this poem, unconscious comparison is inevitable. It is not in depreciation of Mr. Trench's verse—which, if never magical, is frequently sonorous, noble, awakening—that we say it were far better had the comparison been rendered impossible. Of the other pieces in the book we have already spoken in general. Despite the creaking of the hinges, we like more than a little the "Stanzas to Tolstoy," and, unreservedly, the perfect little song "I heard a Soldier." We will quote one rare passage from "The Shepherd" for its antique loveliness, standing quite alone for beauty in the whole volume:

Or I, a Shepherd, am in Thessaly;
And the twilight village cries, "Hath he not come
On the last scented load of myrtle home?" . . .
He sits in the great valley wide and still Blocked by the snow-capt Mountain, and his sheep,
Tawny and dark, roam far and crop their fill
Along the pastures, by the river deep.
His wandering fingers teach the steps at will Melodies cool as water, soft as sleep.

That is, we think, the finest thing in a book which, but for regrettable defects of form, would have been as entirely delightful as it is remarkable.

Of Mr. Lascelles Abercrombie we frankly confess that we hardly know how to speak. Never, we think, have we found such fluency and power entangled with such grave imperfections. What a second book may reveal of Mr. Abercrombie we do not know, but his first volume is astonishing and irritating, as well as welcome, and makes us curious concerning a second. The rhythm of his blank verse is often of a breakneck kind; he affects strange words which drive us to the dictionary—or would, if we were not already bored. Here is a passage, no worse than another, from the first of these Interludes:

Do some horror upon me, send some worm
Of eager malady to crawl my skin
Tracking, or blow uncleanness on it, of sores
Or vile obliterating trash, surfair
Stiff in a stark mask.

Responding to this forcible prayer, God appears and, promising protection of the devout lady's virginity, enters into a discourse of His own Being.

Mr. Abercrombie, too, is given to those large, loose, empty phrases behind which is no vision or thought:

Thickets of stars, and windy plains of sky,
Where slope space reaches the lower lifelessness.

When He, thy Son, down to His promist judgment
Rides out of Heaven upon Eternity
Harnesses under His hands, and with one stroke
Of wielded holiness on this clotted nature
Breaks up mortality and turns to ghost
The whole fixed starry creature of the world. . . .

There is generally a looseness and rapidity of verse, a tortuous vehemence of language, which would make the simplest matter difficult. Think, then, of the perplexity prepared for the reader when the subject is the nature of Sin, the nature of God, the World, Self. Bravely, even violently, does Mr. Abercrombie attack these ancient problems, and his force of language might be convincing if only his meaning were clear. So often it isn't. The large ample phrases, the archaic words and strangled lines, go racing by, as though an assembly of the halt and lame, receiving power but not beauty of motion, were put to flight by sudden dreadful fear. Of the shorter poems at the end of the book, the first, "Soul and Body," unfortunately reminds us of a finer and loftier Ode by that incomparable singer, Coventry Patmore, "To the Body;" but if the involuntary comparison be put by, this is one of the most satisfying of all the pieces in the book. There is, too, an Ode, "Indignation," which but a little more zealous care had made perfect in its degree. We are sure Mr. Abercrombie, who but lately was writing to THE ACADEMY on the subject of "Cockney Rhymes," must agree that his rhyming of "sword" with "fraud" and "abroad" is indefensible. A small thing, perhaps, in a glowing Ode, but all the fire of it will not quite burn up this mote from vision.

It were mere waste of time to dwell thus tediously on the obvious faults of these poems if there were not fine and full evidence of real power; nor could we expect the author to forgive us for what might seem churlish severity if there were no excellences to name. Despite the unrestrained profuseness of imagery, despite the almost inextricable tangle of thought in the other longer poems, Mr. Abercrombie has given us in the Interlude called "Blind" a vital and original thing. It is curious to note that, while Mr. Trench hears poetry, Mr. Abercrombie sees it. His finest metaphors are of things seen. Flame runs through the imagery of this dreadful little tragedy of blind hate. It is not impeccable; the accuracy of the psychology may be doubted; the intrusion of metaphysics may be impatiently resented; but the subject is one an Elizabethan had loved for its grimness, and one which our author's singularly vehement manner is fully competent to develop. It is the simplest, the most direct of these Interludes, and it yields the best of the few passages quotable in illustration of the author's best quality. Here are the closing lines:

This crime is mine—O cramp is at my heart!—
I have the guilt. I need not so have grieved
About your eyes: it was I who was blind.
I know not how to bear you close to me,
The touch of your hands will be a fearful thing
For me henceforth. Give me your hands in mine;
The Lord in Heaven knows nothing can be
To any human soul more horrible
Than these poor dreadful hands; therefore I kiss them,
And it may do for prayer. At Judgment Day
Tell them, my child, you did not make his death.
I will not share it. It is all mine.

Even here there are hints of dangerous facility in the verse; bringing it a little nearer to prose than blank verse should dare to come. But if Mr. Abercrombie will occupy himself a little less darkly with questions of Why and Whence; if he will drive from his ears all remembrance and echo of Browning's verse—even, for a while, Shakespeare's—and permit himself a more frequent simplicity; if he will give himself to less unpleasant themes, he will, we believe, justify the highest promise of this book.

UNIVERSITY REFORM

John Bull and his Schools. By W. R. LAWSON. (Blackwood, 6s. net.)

SHOULD a great painter abandon his endeavours to paint a masterpiece and devote himself to producing pictures which will do well for Christmas supplements, or, perhaps, for bill-posters? Should Mr. Pater have torn his "Marius" manuscript to pieces, and consecrated his undoubted talents to the service of Til-Bils and Answers? Would it have been better if Poe had laid aside his studies in death and dissolution, and had come forward as a smart American journalist? These are not frivolous questions, intended to excite idle merriment; they are queries which are forced on us by Mr. Lawson's observations on the ancient Universities of England. The past history of the ancient University, he says, gives it little encouragement to be either hopeful or self-confident:

Throughout its seven centuries it has never been thoroughly in touch with the nation, and until a comparatively recent period it never showed much desire to be. Spasmodic efforts are now being made to atone for past neglect; but it may be that they have come too late.

Oxford and Cambridge, regarded as national institutions, appear to have always been in a more or less false position. At no period have they ever exhibited a large and definite policy worthy of their national prestige.

This is very sad. And again, apropos of the fact that the native of India may substitute papers on English literature for the ordinary examination on Greek and Latin literature, Mr. Lawson says:

The papers specially allowed to "natives of Asia" would make an ideal examination for English students, but in the University Babel no one can be permitted to use his own tongue. The youth who knows and loves Shakespeare has to talk Plato and Ovid, while the young Bengalee whose mind is steeped in the Vedas has to struggle with "Hamlet" or "Paradise Lost." What a wide field for Gilbertian satire invites exploration in the Oxford and Cambridge Schools. They calmly proceed on the assumption that for academic purposes a general exchange of languages is indispensable.

Turning to the title-page one sees that this book is addressed to "Parents, Ratepayers, and Men of Business," and that Mr. Lawson is the author of "Spain of To-day," "American Industrial Problems," "American Finance," "Regulating the Money Market," "The Bank of England," and "London County Council Finance." It is evident that Mr. Lawson has familiarised himself with the deepest problems of humanity; American finance, which has been the despair of sages and the bewilderment of saints, presents to him no difficulties. He does not affirm by any sign that he has studied at either of the ancient Universities—at those "old, ancient colleges," as a friend of Mark Twain once styled them. Perhaps a course at a Cambridge College might not have been amiss. The system has its disadvantages, but it tends to repress such a sentence as:

It has never been thoroughly in touch with the nation, and until a comparatively recent period it never showed much desire to be.

This phrase may appeal to parents, ratepayers, and men of business, but it leaves lovers of the English language cold, or even annoyed.

Nevertheless, however deplorable the manner of this remark, its matter is interesting enough. It recalls us to our starting-point—the question as to whether Mr. Pater should have abandoned “Marius” so that he might compose chatty articles on “How to Get On in the Grocery Business,” “How to Make a Fortune in Six Months.” Clearly “Marius” is not in touch with the nation. No country tradesman ever thinks of issuing a reproduction of Rossetti’s work in his Christmas almanack, and Poe has always seemed morbid and unhealthy to the great mass of Englishmen. It is quite clear that if it is the duty of everything and everybody to be in touch with the nation, then the Fine Arts must cease to exist, and the artists must devote themselves to something which is in touch with the Great Heart. If one is careful and knows the law on the subject there is a good deal to be said for Company Promoting. The Adulteration of Milk has its bright side, too; but, as Mr. Lawson notes, Commerce has not yet taken its place in the Scheme of National Education.

Quite seriously, this will not do at all. Firmly, and for about the thousandth time, we must repeat that this criterion of being “in touch with the nation” is a criterion of no earthly or heavenly value—unless it implies, as it usually does, that the system, or work, or institution thus lauded is successful because it appeals to our beastliest or most sordid instincts. The nation, by which we must understand the vast majority of people, is by no means a good, or just, or competent judge of any single subject; it has not enough sense to see that it gets a good piece of beef or a good potato for its Sunday dinner, it has not enough sense to manage a workhouse, it has not enough sense to light its own streets, it has not enough sense to keep its hard-earned money in its pocket when some plausible rascal, who has been bankrupt under disgraceful circumstances a dozen times over, comes along with his Prospectus, with his Mining Engineer’s “Report,” with his farrago of obvious and infamous lies. In touch with the nation! It would be no worse, it might be more entertaining, to praise this or blame that because this or that was or was not in touch with Colney Hatch. In touch with the nation! With the nation that one year went into hysterics of joy because it was just not defeated by the Boer Sharpshooters; that the next year thundered its applause at the name of “Buller,” that finally placed “Dr.” Clifford in power; heaven help anything or anybody that is in touch with the nation! One were certainly on the safer side if one symbolised with the maunderings of softening brains and senile dementia. We do not know whether the common accusation against the Universities—that their system unfits a man for success in commerce or the industrial system—is true or false. If it be true, it is certainly the highest praise, and the greatest glory, and the supremest merit of these ancient and honourable schools of learning.

We trust that we shall not be understood to maintain that the Universities, as they are, are perfect. On the contrary, we believe that they are in urgent need of reform—in a direction directly opposite to that indicated by Mr. Lawson. Their chief fault is to be sought in their endeavour to assume an office for which they were never intended: Oxford was, surely, never meant to be the Daily Mail in stone; it is sad enough to see poor, bewildered dons busily engaged in reading up obsolete absurdities from Germany and founding reputations (with the readers of “Robert Elsmere”) for fearless, desperate originality and heterodoxy. And, furthermore, a good deal might be justly said as to the horrible perversions which have crept into the teaching of Latin and Greek, as to the elaborate precautions which have been taken to disgust the ordinary student with the very name of “classic,” as to the nauseous and nauseating “editions” of great books. In all probability the road of reform lies in the abolition of all examinations, in the return to the ancient method of exacting original work and independent intelligence from the candidate for degrees: this would make an end of the crammer and his pupil the parrot. The sage Mr. Lawson is strongly in favour of the abolition of compulsory Greek—and, indeed, the “Odyssey” is of little use in dealing with American finance. But the right way would, in all likelihood, involve the adoption of compulsory Persian; and a knowledge of the elements of judicial astrology should certainly have great weight in the granting of honours.

LETTERS FROM THE RAVEN

Letters from the Raven. Being the Correspondence of Lafcadio Hearn with Henry Watkin. Edited by MILTON BRONNER. (Constable, 5s. net.)

WHATEVER came from the pen of Lafcadio Hearn will be welcome to those who are sensitive to the elusive charm of his personality. Like some will-o'-the-wisp, he hovers behind his subject, leading you on over the ghostly byeway which he loved, and always as he flits he points out the beauties, faint, spectral beauties, unseen by a less discerning eye. You hear his clear, low voice, but just as the features are becoming shaped and visible they diminish and disappear. To his intimate friends even he seems to have been more like a loyal and beautiful shadow than a man. His mind, his being remains unrevealed, however intimately he may write. Mystery he encouraged, for mystery and ghostliness were a part of his nature.

The present letters have been edited by Mr. Milton Bronner, and he has done his work well and reverently. We are, however, a little surprised that no mention should be made of the two large volumes which were published in the spring of last year, and edited as “The Life and Letters,” by Mrs. Bisland. To them this slender volume is a pleasant supplement. It contains letters which Hearn wrote to Mr. Henry Watkin, and to an interesting unknown lady in his youth. The latter letters were returned to the writer owing to a misunderstanding with the lady, and he, a little oddly, gave them to Mr. Watkin.

Neither this lady nor Mr. Watkin are, we think, mentioned in Mrs. Bisland’s book. But certainly Lafcadio Hearn’s letters to both these friends touch his character with the tinge of a colour which is not to be found in his other letters. Mr. Henry Watkin was the first man to give Hearn employment when he arrived in Cincinnati in 1869. He was then nineteen and Mr. Watkin forty-five. Mr. Watkin, a very old man, was still living at the time of this book’s writing in Cincinnati. Mr. Bronner records the following conversation which took place on their first meeting in the printing-shop:

“Well, my young man, how do you expect to earn a living?”
 “I don’t know.”
 “Have you any trade?”
 “No, sir.”
 “Can you do anything at all?”
 “Yes, sir; I might write.”
 “Umph! better learn some bread-winning trade and put off writing until later.”

And Hearn was installed as errand-boy to the printer. But very soon they were on more intimate terms than is usual between master and boy. He swept out the printer’s shop, and read the books in the printer’s library; and, when he obtained a post as reporter on the Enquirer, he paid constant, almost daily, visits to his friend and benefactor whom he called “Dad,” and who called him “The Raven.” When he found Mr. Watkin was not at home, he used to leave pinned to the door insulting little messages, on which were drawn, with some skill, angry or sorry or dishevelled ravens, as the case might be. When Lafcadio Hearn left Cincinnati, and travelled to New Orleans in the South, he wrote long letters to his old friend. They contain accounts of the desperate straits in which he was to obtain work, how he fought with illness and hunger. But he describes the tremendous effect which the first glimpse of Southern scenery made upon him, and the passage is a memorable one:

When I saw it first—sunrise over Louisiana—the tears sprang to my eyes. It was like young death—a dead bride crowned with orange flowers—a dead face that asked for a kiss. I cannot say how fair and rich and beautiful this dead South is. It has fascinated me.

The deadly struggle soon began, and his letters are long and harrowing; for over him hung always the terror that he would lose his sight. But just as he was coming to the end of his powers of endurance—"books and clothes all gone, shirt sticking through seat of my pants—literary work rejected East—get a five-cent meal once in two days—don't know one night where I'm going to sleep next—and am d—d sick with climate into the bargain"—he obtained a position as assistant-editor of a paper called the Item. "Somehow or other," as he puts it to the Dear Old Man, "when a man gets right down in the dirt, he jumps up again." Then come quaint schemes for making money quickly and enabling him to realise the dream, which always haunted him, of travelling to England, or Japan, or Greece, wherever the spirit moved him. But these schemes came to nothing. Very strangely these letters fulfil the prophecy which was made in one of the first. The passage illustrates the aloofness of Hearn's character so clearly that it is impossible not to quote it in its entirety:

Well, I suppose you are right. I live in and by extremes, and am on an extreme now. I write extremely often because I feel alone and extremely alone. By-and-by, if I get well, I shall write only by weeks, and with time perhaps only by months, and when at last comes the rush of business and busy newspaper work, only by years—until the times and places of old friendship are forgotten, and old faces have become dim as dreams, and these little spider-threads of attachments will finally yield to the long strain of a thousand miles.

But he remained loyal to the friend who had helped him so greatly at the outset of his career until the last years of his life, though indebtedness is not wont to strengthen any bond of affection among men. No ear could catch any hint of coldness or of change in the last letter which Lafcadio Hearn wrote to Henry Watkin; on the contrary, years had only deepened his affection:

Dear old Dad—How nice to get so dear a letter from you! I know the cost to you of writing it, and my dear old father must not imagine that I do not understand why he cannot write often. With his little grey loy it is much the same now: he finds it hard to write letters, and he has very few correspondents. . . . I have two or three dear friends in this world: is not that enough?—you being oldest and dearest.

The second part of the book contains Lafcadio Hearn's sixteen letters to the unknown lady. They show the odd traits of his whimsical mind; but they would be of greater interest if more details were known about the lady to whom they were written. We should then be able to distinguish between what he wanted to say and what he was obliged to say by her lack or power of understanding: so true is the axiom that it requires two to tell the truth. The book ends with extracts from the news-letters which Lafcadio Hearn wrote under the name of "Ozias Midwinter." He took the name from a character in "Armada," a novel by Wilkie Collins. Mr. Bronner has with great skill drawn a parallel between the character of Lafcadio Hearn and the character in the novel. He has shown why Ozias must have made a special appeal to Hearn's sympathy, and certainly the resemblances are most striking.

A MISLAID POET

IN the closing years of my favourite last century, when poetry was more discussed than it is now (at all events as a marketable commodity), few verse-writers were overlooked. Bosola's observation about "the neglected poets of your time" could not be quoted with any propriety. Mr. John Lane would make long and laborious journeys on the District Railway, armed bag-à-pied, in order to discover the new and unpublished; but now he has shot over all the remaining preserves; laurels and bays, so necessary for the breed "of men and women overwrought," have withered in the London soot. There was one bright creature, however, who escaped his rifle; she was brought down by another sportsman, and thus missed some of the fame which might have attached to her had she been trussed and hung in the Bodley Head. Poaching in the library at Thelema, I came across her by accident. Her song is not without significance.

In 1878 Georgiana Farrer mentioned on p. 190 of her "Miscellaneous Poems" "I am old by sin entangled;" but this was probably a pious exaggeration. Only some one young and intellectually very vigorous could have penned her startling numbers. I suggest that she retained more of her youth than, from religious motives, she thought it proper to admit. In the 'eighties, when incense was burned in drawing-rooms and people were talking about "The Blessed Damosel," she could write of Paradise:

A home where Jesus Christ is King,
A home where e'en Archangels sing,
Where common wealth is shared by all,
And God Himself lights up the Hall.

She was philosemite, and from the reference to Lord Beaconsfield we can easily date the following:

You who doubt the truth of Scripture,
Pray tell me then who are the Jews?
Scattered in all lands and nations,
Pray why their evidence refuse?

It seems to me you must be blind;
Are they not daily gaining ground?
We find them now in every land,
And well nigh ruling all around.

Their music is most sweet to hear;
Jews were Rossini and Mozart,
Mendelssohn, too, and Meyerbeer;
Grisi in song could charm the heart.

The funds their princes hold in hand;
Their merchants trade both near and far
Ill used and robbed they long have been Yet wealthy now they surely are.

In Germany who has great sway?
Prince Bismarck, most will answer me;
Our own Prime Minister retains
A name that shows his pedigree.

Who after this will dare to say
They nought in these strange people see
Do they not prove the Scripture true,
And throw a light on history?

The twenty-five years that have elapsed since the poem was written must have convinced those innocent persons who "saw nought" in our Israelitish compatriots; and I never heard before that Prince Bismarck or Mozart were of Jewish extraction!

Mrs. Farrer was, of course, an evangelical, somewhat old-fashioned for so late a date, and fairly early in her volume she warns us of what we may expect; she is anxious to damp any undue optimism as to the lightness of her muse. When worldly, foolish people like Whistler and Pater were talking of "art for art's sake," she could strike a decisive didactic blow:

My voice like thunder may appear,
Yet oft times I have shed a tear
Behind the peal, like rain in storm,
To moisten those I would reform.
Then pardon if my stormy mood,
Instead of blighting, does some good.
Sooner a thunder-clap think me
Than sunstroke sent in wrath on thee.

With a splendid Calvinism, too rare at that time (if I may say so in THE ACADEMY without offending Mr. Machen), she would not argue beyond a certain limit; there was an edge, she realised, to every platform; an ounce of assertion is worth pounds of proof. Religious discussion after a time, becomes barren:

Then hundredfolds to sinners
Must be repaid in Hell.
If you think such men winners,
We disagree. Farewell.

But to the person who is right (and Mrs. Farrer was never in a moment's doubt, though her prosody is influenced sometimes by the sceptical Matthew Arnold) there is no mean reward:

I sparkle resplendent,
A star in His crown,
And glitter for ever,
A gem of renown.

From internal evidence we can gauge her social position, while her views of caste appear in these radical days a trifle demodé. Her metaphors of sin are all derived from the life of paupers :

Paupers, through their sinful folly,
Are workers of iniquity,
Living on Jehovah's bounty,
Wasting in abject poverty.

A pauper's funeral their end,
No angels waft their souls on high ;
Rich they were thought on earth, perhaps,
Yet far from wealth accursed they lie.

Who are the rich ? God's Word declares,
The men whose treasure is above—
Those humble working gentlefolk—
Whose life flows on in deeds of love.

Despised in life I may remain,
Misunderstood by rich and poor ;
An entrance yet I hope to gain
To wealthy plains on endless shore.

No paupers in that heavenly land,
The sons of God are rich indeed ;
His daughters all His treasures share ;
It will their highest hopes exceed.

Those paupers who are "saved" are rewarded by material comforts such as graced the earthly home of Georgiana herself, "one of the humble working gentlefolk." She enjoys her own fireside with an almost Pecksniffian relish, and she profoundly observes as she sits beside her hearth :

Like forest trees men rise and grow ;
Good timber some will prove,
Others, decayed as fuel piled,
Prepared are for that stove

That burns for ever, Tophet called,
Heated by jealous heat,
Adapted to destroy all chaff,
And leave unscorched the wheat.

Excellent Georgiana ! She could not stand very much chaff of any kind I expect.

The alarming progress of ritualism in the 'eighties (pace, Mr. Machen !) disturbed her considerably, though it inspired some of her more weighty verses. They should be favourites with Dr. Clifford and Canon Hensley Henson :

Some men in our days cover over
A body deformed with their sin
A cross worked in various colours,
Forgetting that God looks within.

Alas ! in our churches at present
Simplicity seems quite despised ;
To represent things far above us
Are heathenish customs revived.

This evil is spreading among us,
And where will it end, can you tell ?
Join not with the misled around us,
Take warning, my readers

While the veneration of the Blessed Virgin goaded her into composition of stanzas unparalleled in the whole literature of Protestantism :

My readers, can you nowhere see
A parallel to Israel's sin ?
The House of God, at home, abroad
Idols are there—that house within.

Who incense burns ? are strange cakes made ?
What woman's chapel decked with gold
Stands full of unchecked worshippers
Like those idolators of old ?

The Blessed Virgin—blest she is
That does not make her Heaven's Queen !
Yet some are taught to worship her ;
What else does all this teaching mean ?

What she denied to the Mother of God she accorded (rather daringly, I opine) to one Harriet, whose death and future are recorded in the following lines :

Declining like the setting sun
After a course divinely run,
I saw a maiden passing fair
Reposing on an easy chair.

A Bridegroom of celestial mien
Came forth and claimed her for His Queen ;
One with His Father on His throne
She lives entirely His own.

Harrietolatry I thought was confined to the members of the defunct Shelley Society. But every reader of THE ACADEMY will feel the poignant truth of Mrs. Farrer's view of the Church of England—truer to-day than it could have been in the 'eighties :

The Church of England—grand old ship—
Toss'd is on a troubled sea !
Her sails are rent, her decks are foul'd
Mutiny on board must be.

The winds of discord howl around,
Wild disputers throw up foam,
From high to low she's beat about ;
Frighten'd some who love her roam.

I do not know if the last word is intended for a pun, but I scarcely think it is likely.

I would like to reconstruct Mrs. Farrer's home with its stiff Victorian chairs, its threaded antimacassars, its pictorial paper-weights, its wax flowers under glass shades, and the charming household porcelain from the Derby and Worcester furnaces. There must have been a sabbatic air of comfort about the dining-room which was soothing. I can see the engravings after Landseer, "The Stag at Bay," "Dignity and Impudence," or those after Martin, "The Plains of Heaven" and "The Great Day of His Wrath" and "Blucher Meeting Wellington" after Maclise ; I can see on each side of the mirror examples of the art of Daguerre which have already begun to produce in us the same sentiment that we get from the early Tuscans ; and on the mantelpiece a photograph of Harriet in a plush frame, the one touch of modernity in a room which was otherwise severely 1845 ; then, on a bookshelf which hung above the old tea-caddy and cut-glass sugar-bowl, Georgiana's library—"Line upon Line," "Precept upon Precept," "Jane the Cottager," "Pinnock's Scripture History," and a few costly works bound in the style of the Albert Memorial. The drawing-room, just a trifle damp, must have contained Mr. Hunt's "Light of the World," which Mrs. Farrer never quite learned to love, though it was a present from a missionary, and rendered fire and artificial light in the apartment unnecessary during the winter months. Would that Mrs. Farrer's home-life had come under the magic lens of Mr. Edmund Gosse, for it would now be classic, like the household of Sir Thomas More.

Whatever its attractions, Mrs. Farrer was at times induced to go abroad, visiting, I imagine, only the Protestant Cantons of Switzerland. She stayed, however, in Paris, which she apostrophises with Silylic candour :

O city of pleasure, what did I see
When passing through or staying in thee.
Bright shone the sun above, blue was the sky,
Everywhere music heard, none seemed to sigh.
Beautiful carriages in Champs Elysée
Filled with fair maidens on cushions easy.
Such was the outer side ; what was within ?
Most I was often told revelled in sin.
Sad its fate since I left, sadder 'twill be
If they go on in sin as seen by me.
Let us hope, ere too late, warned by the past
They may seek pleasures more likely to last,
Or like to Babylon it must decline,
And o'er its ruins its lovers repine.

But London hardly fares much better, in spite of Mrs. Farrer's own residence at Campden Hill, if I may hazard the locality :

To the tomb they must go,
Rich and poor all in woe,
Strange motley throng.
Wealth in its splendour weeps,
Poverty silence keeps ;
None last here long
So much for thee London.

Except in a spiritual sense, her existence was not an eventful one. It was, I think, the loss of some neighbour's child which suggested :

Nellarina forced exotic
Born to bloom in region fair,
Thou wert to me a narcotic,
Hope I did thy lot to share.

Any near personal sorrow she does not seem to have experienced, I am glad to say, else she might have regarded it as a grievance the consequences of which one dares not contemplate; you feel that Some One would have heard of it in no measured terms. Certainty and Content are, indeed, the dominating notes of her poetry rather than mere commonplace Hope:

I am bound for the land of Beulah.
There all the guests sing Hallelujah.
No longer time here let us squander,
But on the good things promised ponder.

It would be futile to discuss the exact position on Parnassus of a lady whose throne was secured on a more celestial mountain, even more difficult of access. But I think we may claim for her an honourable place in that new Oxford school of poetry of which Professor Mackail officially knows little, and of which the Vice-Chancellor (the President of Magdalen) is the distinguished protagonist. With all her acrid Evangelicalism she was a good soul, for she was fond of animals and children, and kind to them both in her own way; so I am sure some of her dreams have been realised, even if there has reached her nostrils just a whiff of those tolerating purgatorial fires which, spelt differently, she believed to be permanently prepared for the vast majority of her contemporaries.

ROBERT ROSS.

CANDLES

ONE of the first of those thoughtful surprises which commonly follow the period of unconsidering acceptance in earliest childhood was, for me, a surprise of a most prosaic order. Nothing, in fact, but that the street-lamps should be left burning, burning through the incalculable night, and not—as I had taken for granted—extinguished at my bedtime. Children's nights are indeed incalculable and infinite. To fall asleep in the soft "dimpsey" after an hour's idle singing and drowsy speculation, and then wake, startled, into the profound, still darkness; to sleep and wake again, from dreams and fears intolerably prolonged, into the same blank heaviness; yet again to sleep and feel yourself sleeping interminably, till you are heaved gently upon the sands of day—this is to have a sense of night's infinity. But that the courageous and steady lamp outside should burn unsmothered between the points of day and day, outlasting this infinity, was unthought-of, unthinkable.

The lights I remember were not the lofty electric lamps that now outstare and audaciously confound our metropolitan darkness, lights white or amber or purple; nor the piercing, afflicting green eyes of incandescent mantles. These were not; but the weary streets were lit, if lit it could be called, by those familiar yellow flickering gas-jets—so melancholy, secluded from rivalry one with another—lamps that served hardly to illuminate the road, but merely to mark its endless course. The lamplighter—at one time, I remember, a straight, austere-looking man, holding his rod with threatening authority as a flaming spear—must, I thought, be very familiar with the lamps he kindled. I took it for granted they were individual to him, thinking—since I knew not of number—he called them by name, as the carter called his horse; for what reason or necessity of communication I never asked. That, too, I took for granted.

It was not long after my first notice of street-lamps that I recollect having a light in my room to ease the appalling terror of sudden awakenings from clamorous dreams. Hours and hours have I lain watching dully the still, shapely flame, wondering, if wondering at all, why there was such a strange diminishing of the white column on which the flame was so delicately poised. Never, surely, was such exquisite balance maintained by cunning juggler or circus-rider as was kept by the serene flame which, puff as I might, flickered, but never—as I wanted it to do—fell over. At worst it would go out with the little bubble of petulant breath that smote it, but I saw that even then it did not fall; it simply vanished, leaving me dark and scared, crying (my sole evidence of precocity) for having done what I had done. I might often cry now when I have done the thing I wanted to do.

One night, in defiance of warning, of prophecy of ensuing distress, I had puffed my cheeks sore, and the candle, finally, out. Gratification struggled with regret, and in the midst of the struggle I was alarmed by a sudden rosy flicker on the wall. Darkness followed, and then another flicker of awful vividness. There was no more darkness, but a ceaseless play and counter-play of light and shadow in the room. Inevitably I connected, without understanding the absurdity of the connection, the astonishing stranger-light that invaded me with the puffing out of the patient candle-flame—patient no longer, I feared. But curiosity conquered fear, and I slipped from the tumbled bedclothes and peered between blind and window-frame. Then I felt a quick glow of excited delight.

Our garden was not a large one; it was, in fact, oppressively small. Small as it was, however, it was sometimes called a wilderness—a word I didn't then understand, save vaguely as a term of reprobation. There was a general green from wall to wall—green shadowed and chequered by two or three trees and a giant barrier reared high against the importunate sun. This barrier was huge stacks of timber, mighty planks of pine—(Was it pine?)—brought from Norway and unshipped slowly, without aid of crane or pulley, at the neighbouring canal wharf. Strong men carried each plank, staggering with the burden, laboriously from the low barge to the ascending stack; and I had sometimes watched them climbing the dreadful height on a single narrow tread where to falter was to fall. Strong men they needs must be; and many of them were grey-haired men who through many years had tramped those narrow planks and bent under the weight of others; strong men, with leathern wrist-bands and trousers caught below the knee with leathern straps and shining brass; and on their heads a kind of leathern cap or helmet, with broad neck-and-shoulder piece, whereon the load rested. Monstrous, threatening, and incredibly dreadful were those high stacks to me, standing four-square to all the winds that blow, and escaping none. Sometimes dull birds would rest in them, pigeons would circle around; but beyond these nothing ever lent the slightest amenity to the towering antagonists who reared themselves between the sun and our garden.

Nothing, until this night. The rosy flicker, the vivid flicker, the incessant play and counter-play of light and shadow over my bedroom wall—for these I had to thank one of those antagonists, the one directly contiguous to the garden. He was in flames. The danger simply did not occur to me; it was no more within my conception than the financial loss. I only regretted that my own candle was burnt out—a most unintelligible regret. The stars were all gone, lost in the near glare, but it was a clear, brisk night; there was little smoke, and the cool wind caught the lovely flames, and provoked an ascendant rivalry of a hundred rapid, fiery tongues. Shoutings and gongs and ringing hoofs of horses, and the immense concordant clamour of general alarm—these I hardly heard, being absorbed, as was inevitable, in the living leap and roar of emancipated flame. . . . Only when I was fetched away, and saw the scared faces of older people, did I know that I was expected to be afraid.

It is from then that my conscious memory of things is to be dated. Indeed, I have but one earlier memory of any kind, conscious or other. It is of a sister who died a little before or a little after the fire—I forget which. And her I only remember as light. My mother has told me of her golden hair, long and abundant, and I have the memory of the golden light of it amid the garden's monotonous green. I don't remember her face or her voice, but most clearly do I retain the sense of that young harmony of heavenly gold and green. To this day I seldom (I think) am aware of a like harmony in the visible world, but I am aware also of that all but unknown sister playing still in the green shade.

The fire was a solitary miracle, unrelated in its kind to anything else within my young experience; but the candle was a nightly wonder. For some reason now obscure, I did not again send desultory breaths against its steady brightness; but in the regular interval between bedtime and sleep, and in the hardly less regular intervals of broken oblivion, I watched and watched the gentle, luminous shape with a patience as serene and unwavering as that of the balanced spire of light itself. Against the mean mockery of night-lights I protested; lamps I was not to be trusted with; there was no gas-pipe in my room, and besides, I loathed gas. Of course, there were frequent objections to the expense of candles, but these objections only gave me a better appreciation of the beautiful things, and a higher conceit of my own importance that could demand such treasures. Perhaps, therefore, it is not surprising that my recollection of certain events should be associated with the recollection of light. I remember, more clearly than the event, the perfect summer weather that reigned—it really did reign, and ordained for me, at least, many delights—when my uncle was buried, and I remember that, when the incongruity of burial with such beautiful weather struck me with an odd surprise, it was to my dead uncle that, childishly, I charged the incongruity—of which, perhaps, he himself was poignantly sensible. There was a day, too, of perfect light, exquisite in memory as a February bird's song, when we all roamed for hours in a great forest, and played and rode and watched the wild things that flew and ran and crept, laying up for ourselves, unknowing, heavenly treasure for consolation of dark days. It was a grey and windy day of sombre light—I don't know whether in autumn or spring—when, not long after the splendid fire (too splendid for the weak nerves of my seniors), we moved to a house that had been taken for two years, but in which we stayed exactly twenty-two. These days, and others, I remember only or chiefly by their light—no great marvel in that, after all.

So I owe much to my humble candle—humble! nay, independent, effortless, faultless. Have we such another tiny perfection, the work of our hands? Standing in the choir of Westminster Abbey, listening to the flame-like purity of the boys' voices in Anthem and Psalm, I have watched, as if never before, the wavering light of the tall candles sheltered in clear glass bells inverted on the pews. And I have watched, too, the counterfeit candles employed for benefit of the choristers—tiny electric lamps of such an irreverent and vehement glare that they must needs be dimmed by paper screens. The contrast has distressed me, as I have thought of the furious enginry, half-naked men and furnaces at one end of the secret wires, and the fierce little electric eyes at the other; while here, simple, sufficient, continent, with no such disturbing reminder of the sweating world a mile or a hundred miles away, shines the illumination of childhood and manhood, of love-letters written or received, of weary wakeful hours, of dreams and sicknesses, of death-watches, of distracted prayers, and of the noble ceremonial of public worship, when the candles shining starlike at the gleaming altar serve not more sacredly and not less usefully, than the candles shining upon the eastern'd faces of gathered worshippers.

Like a simple, humble life, the candle burns down; and happy the life that is consumed in service of the altar or in illumination of the prayerful aisles. Neither, however, is the whole service of the candle. In rude lamps of iron or cardboard, with a single eye of white or red glass, you may see the faithful flame on many a time-tinged house-front of L—. There was, in particular, one old woman who, by day, hobbled to and fro in the market-place on gossip errands, living we knew not how unless by an "inward fire"—so cheerful was she—who, before night was well set, would stumble up from her cottage door, half sunk beneath the road, and hang, earliest of beacons, her little lantern high on the divers-coloured wall, mounting therefore, with infinite cautiousness, a stone step close by the low window. She was known as the Lantern Woman, and her sole possible pride must have been in the tiny guardian light hung, of her poverty, for use and guard of others. Perhaps she had felt the fascination of a candle, and could never have hung an oil lamp, as the grand folk of L— were wont to do—never have conceived or permitted the impersonal vulgarity of gas. Lights like hers are yet not more faithful and unforgettable than the poor wick burning in a bath of yellow fat—the nearest approach to the perfection of a candle that San S— had achieved when I knew it a few years since. San S— bore an ill-repute for revolutions, murderous brawls, family strife, and all manner of violent iniquity. The very violence of its iniquity served, however, to protect weaker inhabitants against the subtler, smoother, unpenalised iniquity of fraud and chicanery to which in England we are well accustomed, almost reconciled. Desperadoes were there by the dozen—some men of substance, some of education, with no difference between them save that the substance often surprisingly disappeared, while the education left always a trace, a distinction, which even in San S— was not wholly disesteemed. Rich or poor, informed or ignorant, they lived much alike, with an alien splendour of silver and jewels amid rudeness and bareness, or with an unrelieved poverty not much different in its material privation from the squalid splendour. I came across one of these poorer bravos one night in a lonely brick house, his own habitation, but less frequently inhabited by him than the tavern in the town kept by an Irish American who had come South—not from choice. Dennis lay dying, alone. For weeks, for months, he had not been so sober, he confessed, lying there, in the garrulity which so often is the last failing and final comfort of the wretched. Bits of personal history he flung me (who knew by repute a little of his life), speaking often in comely words, with but a thin thread of the prevalent Southern slang. But all his talk and recollections were of comparatively recent years—of strife, raids, plots, efforts, failures, disappointments, with little regret save for the failures. Then he was silent, and heaved over to his right side and watched the sombre wavering of the uncertain light, a wick floating in a bath of nearly exhausted fat, multiplying and distorting the prolific shadows that lurked and flickered in each corner and recess. He watched and said: "I'm like that, young mister; nearly out. . . . Wonder which'll go first?" The flame seemed slowly to kindle remoter memories, and he added: "That little light reminds me of many things I thought I'd done with. . . . Seems I shan't die in peace. I used to watch the candles burning every day for years and years. . . . d'ye know where?" I shook my head, but he did not appear to heed my answer. "Well, I suppose I should be ashamed to say it. I was in the choir at Westminster Abbey; it's a dirty river between there and here. . . . I suppose the candles are burning there now?" he added. I nodded, seeing he but wanted to talk, and not to listen; and I hadn't the heart to tell him that there were now electric imitations whose immoderate glare must needs be defeated by paper screens. "Good deal of difference between those old candles and this," he said, glancing at the poor little pool of yellow oil, gross, dirty, ill-smelling. "Same sort of difference between the choir and me now, lying here nearly out." He lay silent, summing up, I fancied; and I wondered what the judgment at the candid Bar of Self must be, after the hearing of charge and counter-charge, oath, evidence, and appeal. I don't know if he followed my thoughts, but he must have followed my unconscious glance at the table where his bright six-shooter lay—that and memory alone faithful to him. "Well, that's done some mischief, perhaps, but it saved me a lot." He said it judicially, not at all apologetically. Little more was spoken; he grew bitterly weary; the light swayed and went suddenly out, and I lit another wick. "I've lasted that out," he said, contentedly; and soon after died.

I smothered the new flare and went out softly, fixing a fragment of black cloth on the door for announcement of Dennis's death. The dark and the death bore heavily on me, but above were the pure cleansing candles of the night, burning unconsumed and sacredly upon the Altar of Eternity.

JOHN FREEMAN.

THE ACADEMY

MARCH 21, 1908

SPRING ANNOUNCEMENTS

IMPORTANT NEW LITERATURE

THE RHINE.

By H. J. MACKINDER, sometime Reader in Geography in the University of Oxford, Director of the London School of Economics, &c. Fully Illustrated after Water-colours by Mrs. James Jardine, with Two Folding Maps in Colour, and Index. Large fcap. 4to. (9 by 6½ in.), gilt top, 20s. net.
"Not for forty years has any work given us such a desire again to visit the glorious Valley of the Rhine as this. . . . Illustrations and text are admirable."—Publishers' Circular.

Illustrated Prospectus post-free.

CAIRO, JERUSALEM, and DAMASCUS:

Three Chief Cities of the Egyptian Sultans. By D. S. MARGOLIOUTH, D.Litt., Laudian Professor of Arabic in the University of Oxford. Fully Illustrated in Colour by W. S. S. Tyrwhitt, B.B.A., and Reginald Barratt, A.B.W.S. Large fcap. 4to., 20s. net.
"One of those comparatively few works that are both learned and readable. . . . The colour treatment is particularly masterly. . . . This reproduction of the very atmosphere of the East is a very distinct artistic triumph."—Glasgow Herald.

Illustrated Prospectus post-free.

MOLIÈRE: a Biography.

By H. C. CHATFIELD TAYLOR. With an Introduction by THOMAS F. CRANE, Professor of Romance Languages, Cornell University. With Index, Bibliography, and Ten Illustrations specially drawn by Job. Royal 8vo., buckram, gilt top, 10s. 6d. net.
"Mr. Chatfield Taylor . . . is to be congratulated upon a thoroughly workmanlike and eminently readable presentation of Molière. . . . Engagingly interesting."—Daily Telegraph.

JULIE DE LESPINASSE.

By the MARQUIS DE SÈVRE. Authorised English Version. With Photogravure Frontispiece from the only authentic Portrait of Mademoiselle de Lespinasse, by Carmontelle. Demy 8vo., art linen, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.
"One of the most enthralling and touching books that have been published of late years."—Spectator.

MARIE DE MEDICIS AND THE COURT OF FRANCE during the XVIIth Century.

Authorised English Version, translated from the French of M. Louis Batifol by MARY KING, under the Superintendence of H. W. C. DAVIS, Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford. With Colotype Frontispiece after a rare engraving of the Queen dated 1601. Demy 8vo., cloth, 7s. 6d. net.
[Ready shortly.]

THE MEDICI SERIES OF COLOURED REPRODUCTIONS AFTER THE OLD MASTERS.

"The Medici Reproductions are of surpassing excellence . . . give absolutely the impression of the pictures themselves, even as regards irregularities of surface."—Daily Telegraph
"Nothing of the kind so good and so cheap has ever before been offered to the public."—Burlington Magazine.

- I. LUINI. Head of the Virgin Mary (Fresco). Colour surface, 13½ by 10½ in. 12s. 6d. net.
- II. LEONARDO DA VINCI. Head of the Christ (Cartoon). Colour surface, 13½ by 10½ in. 12s. 6d. net.
- III. BOTTICELLI. The Virgin and Child (Tempera). Colour surface, 13½ by 9½ in. 12s. 6d. net.
- IV. LEONARDO DA VINCI. The Last Supper (Fresco). Colour surface, 31½ by 16 in. 25s. net.
- V. PIERO DELLA FRANCESCA. Portrait of an Unknown Lady. Colour surface, 15½ by 11½ in. 10s. 6d. net.
- VI. LORENZO DI CREDI. The Annunciation (Tempera). Colour surface, 17½ by 12 in. 15s. net.

OCCASIONAL PLATE, I.

LIPPI-FILIPPO. The Virgin, after the Painting in, Tempera on Wooden Panel, Uffizi Gallery, Florence, of the Virgin Child, St. John, and an Angel. Coloured surface, 13½ by 10 in. Size of Original, 36 by 24 in. 10s. 6d. net.

Further issues shortly.

Full particulars of Plates and Frames, with method of publication and terms of subscription, also other and cheaper reproductions from the Old Masters, will be found in an illustrated Prospectus, which may be had post-free on application.

Prospectuses of any or all of the following Series will be sent post-free on application, viz.:—

The Medici Series of Coloured Reproductions after the Old Masters.

The New Mediæval Library.

Bibliotheca Romanica.

The Shakespeare Library (including The Shakespeare Classics).

The King's Classics.

The St. Martin's Library.

Authors for the Pocket.

Messrs. CHATTO & WINDUS beg to announce that their Exhibition of the Medici Series of Coloured Reproductions and The Early Painters Series at the New Dudley Gallery, 169, Piccadilly, will remain open until the end of the month.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, Dept. A.C., 111 St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

THE GREATER ABBEYS OF ENGLAND.

By the Right Rev. ABBOT GASQUET.

Being some Account—Historical and, in reference to their remains, Topographical—of the greater Monastic Houses of England. With Sixty Illustrations in Water-colours after Warwick Goble, the subjects selected by the Author. Large fcap. 4to., cloth, gilt top, 20s. net.
[Ready shortly.]

Illustrated Prospectus post-free.

ARTISTS OF THE ITALIAN RENAISSANCE:

Being Stories of the Italian Artists of the Renaissance—their Influence upon, and their Share in, the History of their Times, as set forth by Vasari, Bidolf, Lanzi, and the Chroniclers. Collected and arranged by E. L. SEELEY. Large crown 8vo. (8 by 5½ in.), red buckram, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net. SPECIAL EDITION, pure rag paper, deckle edges, small 4to. (9 by 6½ in.), parchment, gilt top, 15s. net; whole vellum, 20s. net; whole red polished morocco, £1 10s. net.

STORIES OF THE ITALIAN ARTISTS FROM VASARI.

Collected and arranged by E. L. SEELEY. Large crown 8vo. (8 by 5½ in.), red buckram, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net. SPECIAL EDITION, pure rag paper, deckle edges, small 4to. (9 by 6½ in.), parchment, gilt top, 15s. net; whole vellum, 20s. net; whole red polished morocco, £1 10s. net.

FROM THE FORELAND TO PENZANCE.

The Ports and Harbours of the South Coast. By CLIVE HOLLAND. Fully Illustrated after Water-colours by Maurice Randall. Large fcap. 4to., cloth, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net.

Long before "Drake sailed the Main" the Harbours and Ports of the South Coast were old with history. Rye and Winchelsea are now far from reach of high water, but their name remains, although ports unknown to the world in their day are now the legitimate controllers of the Channel and its ships. Mr. Holland and Mr. Randall have, in these towns and their story, a subject made for the pen and brush in combination.
[Ready shortly.]

Illustrated Prospectus post-free.

THE OPEN AIR.

With Twelve Reproductions after Water-colours by Ruth Dolman and Coloured End-papers. Crown 8vo., cloth, coloured top, 5s. net; whole green parchment, 7s. 6d. net.
[April.]

THE NEW MEDIÆVAL LIBRARY.

NEW VOLUMES. Ready shortly.

THE BABEE'S BOOK: Mediæval Manners for the Young.

THE LEGEND OF THE HOLY FINA, Virgin of Santo Geminiano.

Other Volumes in preparation.

Size 6½ by 4½ inches, boards, cloth, 5s. net; whole brown pigskin, antique style, with clasps, 7s. 6d. net. Each volume contains photogravure or woodcut reproductions of the illustrations contained in the Works translated. Each volume further contains a title-page engraved upon wood, after notable contemporary examples.

BALLADS AND LYRICS OF LOVE.

Chiefly selected from Percy's Reliques. Edited by F. SIDGWICK, M.A. With 10 Coloured Plates and Title Design after Byam Shaw. Large fcap. 4to., cloth, gilt top, 6s. net. Also a limited Large Paper Edition, bound whole parchment, 12s. 6d. net.
[May.]

Illustrated Prospectus post-free.

A HISTORY OF THE JEWS IN ENGLAND.

By ALBERT M. HYAMSON.

With 16 Portraits and Views and 2 Maps. Demy 8vo., cloth, 4s. 6d. net.

The story told in these pages shows all the vicissitudes common these two thousand years to the lot of Jewry.

"A scholarly and instructive work which will be of use to both Jewish readers and to students of the general history of England."—Times.

THE STORY OF THE NATIONS

The Greatest Historical Library in the World

NEW VOLUME NOW READY.

THE ROMAN EMPIREB.C. 29—A.D. 476. By H. Stuart Jones, M.A. With Map and many other Illustrations. 5s.NOTE.—A detailed prospectus of the "Story of the Nations," the standard library of history, will be sent post-free on request.*

THE HISTORY OF IRELANDTO THE COMING OF HENRY II.By Arthur Ua. O'Clerigh, M.A., K.C. 10s. 6d. net.This volume is complete in itself. It is a record of Irish History from the earliest times to 1171.

HEALTH AT ITS BEST, V. CANCER AND OTHER DISEASESBy Robert Bell, M.B., M.D., F.F.P.S. 5s. net.This work is the result of a life-long experience and study of the subject.

THE SOCIALIST MOVEMENT IN ENGLANDBy Brougham Villiers. 10s. 6d. net."Thoughtful, clearly written, and well based in the study of the severer Socialistic literature, of which it provides a useful bibliography, the work cannot but prove of interest to readers in search of an introduction at once informative and sympathetic to this important subject."—The Scotsman.*

THE PROGRAMME OF MODERNISMA Reply to the Encyclical Pascendi of Pius X.Translated from the Italian by Father Tyrrell. Price 5s. net."Amidst the quickly growing mass of literature dealing with the Modernist Movement in the Roman Catholic Church, this little volume may, without hesitation, be singled out as the best source of information for those who want to know the facts in brief."—Manchester Guardian.*

CHRIST AND THE NATIONWestminster and Other Sermons.By H. Hensley Henson, Canon of Westminster. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

J. S. FLETCHER'S NEW NOVELPARADISE COURT*6s.A powerful story of love, mystery, and adventure.

"THE
BLUE
LAGOON"*READ THE NOVEL OF THE YEAR.
"THE BLUE LAGOON"By H. de Vere Stacpoole. Third Impression, 6s.*"THE BLUE LAGOON"

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1 Adelphi Terrace, London.

SPRING ANNOUNCEMENTS

MARCH 21, 1908

MESSRS. GEORGE ALLEN

Fiction

- The Devil of Dulverton. By F. J. Snell 6/0
 My Son and I. By Mrs. M. H. Spielmann 6/0
 The Sword of Welleren and other Stories. By Lord
 Dunsany net 6/0

Miscellaneous

- The Case Against Socialism. By P. C. Elgar and G. E.
 Raine net 5/0
 St. George for Merrie England. By Margaret H.
 Bulley net 5/0
 "Down with the Church." By J. L. Walton net 2/0
 Sketches from Life. In Town and Country. By Edward Carpenter net 5/0
 The Months. By the Right Hon. George W. E. Russell

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD

Fiction

- The Metropolis. By Upton Sinclair 6/0
 The Ways of Rebellion. By Reginald Farrer 6/0

Miscellaneous

- George Ridding: Schoolmaster and Bishop. By the Lady Laura Ridding net 15/0
 Pictorial Art in the Far East. By Laurence Binyon net 21/0
 Mines and Minerals of the British Empire. By R. G.
 Stokes. 6/0
 From their Point of View. By M. Loane net 8/6
 Power Gas-producers. By P. W. Robson net
 The Geology of Coal. By Dr. Walcot Gibson. 6/0
 The Influence of Alcohol and Other Drugs on Fatigue.
 By W. H. R. Rivers, M.D., F.R.C.P. net 4/6
 Movable Kidney: its Pathology, Treatment, and Symptoms. By H. W. Wilson, M.B., B.Sc., and
 C. M. H. Howell, M.B. net 7/6
 Turkey in Europe. By Sir Charles Eliot, K.C.M.G. net

MESSRS. GEORGE BELL & SONS

- Leland's Itinerary. By Miss Toulmin Smith. Vol. II., containing Parts IV. and V. With an Appendix of Extracts from Leland's "Collectanea."
 The Last Abbot of Glastonbury, and other Essays. By Abbot Gasquet.
 The Old English Bible, and other Essays. By Abbot Gasquet.
 Easter Eggs. By Christopher von Schmid. An Easter
 Idyll for Children. Illustrated in Colour and Black and White by Miss M. V. Wheelhouse.
 Balzac Les Chouans. By H. de Balzac. In "Les Classiques Français Illustres." Illustrated by J. Blake Greene.
 Decorative Heraldry. By Mr. G. W. Eve. A Practical
 Handbook of its Artistic Treatment.
 The Priory Church of St. Bartholomew the Great, Smithfield. By George Worley. To be issued uniform with "Bell's Cathedral Series."
 State and Family in Early Rome. By Charles W. L.
 Launspach.
 The Gospel of Pain; or, the Witness of Suffering to a Larger Life. By Thomas J. Hardy.
 Bohn's Libraries. Ranke's "History of the Popes," in 3 vols.; "Mignet's History of the French Revolution," in 1 vol.; Munro's translation of "Lucretius," with an Introduction by Mr. J. D. Duff; Mr. Temple Scott's edition of Swift's Prose Works, containing a full Index to the whole edition, and a Bibliography; together with Essays on "The Portraits of Swift and Stella," and "The Relations between Swift and Stella."
 The York Library. A New Translation of Goethe's Autobiography (Dichtung und Wahrheit). By Miss M.
 Steele Smith.
 Calverley's Translation of Theocritus and the Eclogues of Virgil. With an Introduction by Professor R. Y. Tyrrell.
 Bell's Miniature Biographies—Botticelli and Da Vinci.
 By R. H. Hobart Cust. Grieg, by Dr. E. Markham Lee.

MESSRS. BROWN LANGHAM

General Literature

- A Great Labour Leader: being the Life of the Rt. Hon.
 Thomas Burt, M.P. By Aaron Watson net 15/0
 The Indian Countryside. A Calendar and Diary. By Percival C. Scott O'Connor net 6/0
 Letters of Christina Rossetti. With Memoir and Introduction by W. M. Rossetti net 15/0
 Diary of Dr. Polidori. Edited, with Notes and Introduction, by his nephew, W. M. Rossetti net 6/0 Going Through the Mill. A Book dealing with many Interesting Problems of the Day. By Mrs. Gerald Paget net 5/0

Fiction

- The Brotherhood of Wisdom. By Frances J. Armour ... 6/0
 Faith Unfaithful. By Fred. Wynne, author of "Fortune's Fool" net 6/0
 Follow Up! A Story of Harrow School. By Archibald
 D. Fox.
 An Engagement of Convenience. By Louis Zangwill.

New Editions

- Benedictine Sketches of Married Life. By E. H. Lacon
 Watson net 1/0
 Reflections of a Householder. By E. H. Lacon
 Watson net 1/0

Sport

- Auction Bridge. By Vane Pennell net 2/6

MESSRS. CHATTO & WINDUS

Art

- Stories of the Flemish and Dutch Artists from the Time of the Van Eycks to the End of the Seventeenth Century.
 Collected and arranged by Victor Reynolds net 7/6
 Stories of the English Artists from Thornhill to Turner.
 Collected and arranged by Randall Davies net 7/6
 Artists of the Italian Renaissance: Being Stories of the Italian Artists of the Renaissance—their Influence upon, and their Share in, the History of their Times, as set forth by Vasari, Ridolfi, Lanzi, and the Chroniclers.
 Collected and arranged by E. L. Seeley net 7/6 Stories of the Italian Artists from Vasari. Collected and arranged by E. L. Seeley net 7/6
 The Little Flowers of S. Francis of Assisi: Being a new edition, wholly revised and in part augmented, of the Translation. By Professor T. W. Arnold net 7/6
 Women of Florence. Translated by Mary G. Steegmann from "La Donna Fiorentina Del Buon Tempo Antico."
 By Senator and Professor Isidoro del Lungo, of Florence. With an Introduction by Dr. Guido Biagi, Keeper of the Royal Medicean and Laurentian Library in Florence net 7/6
 Venice in the Eighteenth Century. By Philippe
 Monnier.
 Tuscan Feasts and Tuscan Friends. By Dorothy
 Neville Lees net 5/0
 In the Abruzzi. By Anne Macdonell net 6/0

Miscellaneous

- The Rhine. By H. G. Mackinder net 20/0
 Assisi of Saint Francis. By Mrs. Robert Goff net 20/0
 The Colour of Paris. Edited by M. Paul Descaves net 20/0
 The Greater Abbeys of England. By the Right Rev.
 Abbot Gasquet net 20/0
 Devon. By Lady Rosalind Northcote net 20/0
 From the Foreland to Penzance. By Clive Holland net 12/6
 A History of Babylonia and Assyria. By Leonard W.
 King. In 3 vols. each net 18/0
 A History of the Jews in England. By Albert M.
 Hyamson net 4/6
 The Paradise, or Garden of the Holy Fathers. Translated from the Syriac by Ernest A. Wallis Budge net 15/0
 The Curse of the Romanovs. By Angelo S. Rappoport. net 16/0
 Melba. An Authorised Biography. By Elvin Tracey.

MESSRS. CONSTABLE

Fiction

Lewis Rand. By Mary Johnston	6/0
Marotz. By John Ayscough	6/0
The Daughter. By Constance Smedley	6/0
Madame Daguerre. By W. E. Norris	6/0
Mr. Tuckerman's Nieces. By Helen Dawes Browne ...	6/0
The Burning Cresset. By Howard Pease	6/0
The Tree of Heaven : and other Stories. By Robert W. Chambers	6/0
The Ancient Law. By Ellen Glasgow	6/0
A Comedy of Moods. By Greville H. Tempny	6/0
Rose Macleod. By Alice Brown	6/0
The Little Brown Brother. By Stanley Portal Hyatt ...	6/0

Miscellaneous

The North-West Passage. By Ronald Amundsen. In Two Vols.....	31/6
Ice-Bound Heights of the Mustagh. By Fanny Bullock Workman and William Hunter Workman	21/0
The Making of Canada, 1763-1814. By A. G. Bradley. The Later Years of Catherine De Medici. By Edith Sichel	15/0
Dante's Lyrical Poems. By Edmund G. Gardner
My School and my Gospel. By Sir Hubert Von Herkomer	21/0
Memoirs of Monsieur Claude. Translated by Katherine Prescott Wormeley	12/6
John Greenleaf Whittier. By Bliss Perry	3/6
Life and Letters of H. Taine. Vol. III. Translated from the French by E. Spawel-Bayly	7/6
Letters from the Raven. Edited, with an Introduction, by Milton Bronner	5/0
Letters from India. By Alfred William Stratton	10/6
The Stannaries. By George R. Lewis.....	6/0
Romantic Tales from the Panjab, with Indian Night's Entertainment. Collected and Edited from Original Sources by Rev. Charles Swynnerton	6/0
The Soul of Spain. By Havelock Ellis	7/6
Portuguese Architecture. By W. Crum-Watson	25/0
Augustus St. Gaudens. By Royal Corlissos	31/6
A Short History of Engraving and Etching. By A. M. Hind
A History of the Volunteer Forces. By Cecil Seabag-Montefiore	15/0
Shropshire, Hereford, and Monmouth. By A. G. Bradley	5/0
By Thames and Cotswold. By William Holden Hutton	5/0
Elizabeth Drama, 1558-1642. By Felix Emanuel Schelling.....	31/6
New Poems. By St. John Lucas	5/0
Abraham Lincoln. By Carl Schurz and Truman H. Bartlett	42/0

Scientific Works.

Sewage Disposal Works. By Hugh P. Raikes	16/0
Heavy Electrical Engineering. By H. M. Hobart
Cranes. By Anton Böttcher	42/0
Hydraulics and its Application. By A. H. Gibson	18/0
Text-book of the Steam-engine. By John Richardson	12/6
Economics of American Railway Operation. By M. L. Byers	21/0
Boiler Construction. By Frank B. Kleinbans	12/6
Railway Shop Up-to-Date	12/6

MESSRS. DUCKWORTH & CO.

Fiction

Isle Raven. By Owen Vaughan ("Owen Rhoscomyl")	6/0
Rachel Chalfont. By Sophie Cole	6/0
No. 10 Downing Street. By W. Eyre Pascoe	21/0
Adam Cast Forth. By C. M. Doughty.....	4/6
Carotti's History of Art. Vol. I., Ancient Art. By Dr. Giulio Carotti. English Edition. Revised by Mrs. Arthur Strong, L.L.D.	5/0
Wanderings in Arabia. By C. M. Doughty. 2 vols.	16/0

MESSRS. GREENING

Fiction

Blue Ocean's Daughter. By Cyrus Brady	6/0
Leroux. By Hon. Mrs. Walter Forbes.....	6/0
The Love Seekers. By Mary Walpole.....	6/0
The Splendid Coward. By Houghton Townley.....	6/0
Let Erin Remember. By May Wynne	6/0
The Golden Horseshoe. By Robert Aitken	6/0

A Knight Errant in Turkey. By Arthur Oakstone	6/0
Beau Brocade. By the Baroness Orczy	6/0

Miscellaneous

Royal Lovers and Mistresses. By Dr. A. S. Rappoport.
Education, Personality and Crime. By Dr. Albert Wilson.
The Royal House of Stuart. In 2 vols. By Samuel Cowan.
From St. Ives to the Land's End. By Mr. A. T. Folliott Stokes.

MR. JOHN LANE

Art

Hubert and John Van Eyck : their Life and Work. By W. H. James Weale	105/0
Legend in Japanese Art. By Henri L. Joly	84/0

Fiction

The High Adventure. By Hugh de Selincourt	6/0
A Man of Genius. By M. P. Willcocks	6/0
The Bishop's Scapegoat. By T. B. Clegg.....	6/0
The Finances of Sir John Kynnersley. By A. C. Fox-Davies	6/0
The Child of Chance. By Maxime Formont	6/0
The Chichester Intrigue. By Thomas Cobb	6/0
The Gates that Shall not Prevail. By Herbert M. Farrington.....	6/0
Ashes. By Helen Hester Colvill.....	6/0
Lady Julia's Emerald. By Helen Hester Colvill	6/0
Absolution. By Clara Viebig	6/0
The Master Knot. By Alice Birkhead.....	6/0
Life's Unresting Sea. By F. E. Mills Young	6/0
Life and the Ironmonger. By F. J. Randall	6/0
The Isle of Maids. By M. T. Hainsselin	6/0
Arthur's Hotel. By A. Neil Lyons.....	6/0

Miscellaneous

The Life of Sir Halliday Macartney. By Demetrius C. Boulger	24/0
The Shakespeare Problem Restated. By George Greenwood	21/0
The Diary of a Lady-in-Waiting. By Lady Charlotte Bury. In 2 vols.	16/0
Ceylon. By Caroline Corner	10/6
The Daughter of Louis XVI. By G. Lenotre	10/6
The Path to Paris. By Frank Rutter	10/6
Birds of the Plains. By Douglas Dewar.....	10/6
The King's General in the West. By Roger Granville	10/6
Modernism and Romance. By Rolfe A. Scott-James	7/6
Apologia Diffidentis. By W. Compton Leith.....	7/6
César Franck. Translated from the French of Vincent d'Indy	7/6
Holly, Yew, and Box. By W. Dallimore and Thomas Moore	7/6
The Londons of the British Fleet. By Edward Fraser	6/0
Orthodoxy. By Gilbert K. Chesterton.....	5/0
The Iliad of the East. By Frederika Macdonald.....	5/0
Stained Glass Tours in France. By Charles Hitchcock Sherrett.....	5/0
The Re-Birth of Religion. By Dr. A. S. Crapsey	5/0
French Novelists of To-day. By Winifred Stephens	5/0

MESSRS. LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.

The Origin of Vertebrates. By Walter H. Gaskell.
Germany in the Dark and Middle Ages. Lectures. By William Stubbs.
The Russian Conquest of the Caucasus. By J. F. Baddeley.
India and the Empire. By the Hon. M. de P. Webb.
English Local Government from the Revolution to the Municipal Corporations Act. By Sydney and Beatrice Webb	25/0
Grant, Lincoln, and the Freedmen. By John Eaton in collaboration with Ethel Osgood Mason.....	9/0
The Economic History of the United States. By Ernest Ludlow Bogart	9/0
A Study of Splashes. By A. M. Worthington.
Lathe Design for High and Slow Speed Steels. By John T. Nicolson and Dempster Smith.
Work and Wages. By Sydney J. Chapman. With an Introduction by Lord Brassey	10/6
Missions to Hindus. By Louis George Milne.....	3/6
Parerga. By the Very Rev. Canon P. A. Sheehan.

Scientific

Thermo-Chemistry. By Julius Thomsen. Translated by Kallaune A. Burke	9/0
Stoichiometry. By Sydney Young.....	7/6

Theology

- The Christ the Son of God. By the Abbé Constant Fouardnet 6/0
The Holy Ghost the Comforter. By the Rev. G. F. Holdennet 2/6

MESSRS. MACMILLAN

Biography, History, and Travel

- The Autobiography of Montagu Burrows. Edited by his Son, Stephen M. Burrowsnet 24/0
Modern Egypt. By the Earl of Cromernet 3/6
The Diary of John Evelyn, 1620-1706. With an Introduction and Notes by Austin Dobsonnet 6/0
Highways and Byways in Hampshire. By D. H. Moutray Readnet 6/0
General History of Western Nations from 5000 B.C. to 1900 A.D. By Emil Reich.
American Nature Notes and Reminiscences. By F. C. Selous.
The Story of the Guides. By Colonel G. J. Young-husband.

Poetry and Drama

- Plays of Aeschylus. Translated into English Verse by E. D. A. Morsheadnet 2/6
Lyrical Poems of T. E. Brownnet 2/6

General Literature

- The Life of Richard Cobden. By John Morley. In Two Vols.net 8/0
Epic and Romance. By W. P. Kernet 4/0

Fiction

- The Prima Donna. By F. Marion Crawford 6/0
From Sea to Sea. By Rudyard Kipling. Vol. II.net 5/0
The Naulahka. By Rudyard Kipling and Wolcott Balestiernet 5/0

Theology

- Buddhist Essays. By Paul Dahlke.
The Letters of Martin Luther. Selected and Translated by Margaret A. Currie.

MESSRS. MASTERS & CO

- Lancelot Andrewes. A Life by the Rev. Douglas Maclean 3/6
The Great Oblation. By the Rev. Archibald Campbell Knowles 2/0
The Old Order Changeth. A Story. By Phœbe Allen 3/6

MESSRS. METHUEN

Educational

- Examples in Elementary Mechanics. By W. J. Dobbs 5/0
A History of Great Britain. By E. M. Wilmot Buxton 3/6
A School Latin Grammar. By H. G. Ford 2/6
A Junior Latin Prose. By H. N. Asman 2/6
Outlines of Physical Chemistry. By George Senter ... 2/6
An Organic Chemistry for Schools and Technical Institutes. By A. E. Dunstan 2/6
Instruction in Cookery. By Miss A. P. Thompson 2/6

Fiction

- Scarlet Runner. By C. N. and A. M. Williamson 6/0
The Lady of the Barge. By W. W. Jacobs 3/6
Flower o' the Orange. By Agnes and Egerton Castle ... 6/0
The Duke's Motto. By J. H. McCarthy 6/0
Many Junes. By Archibald Marshall 6/0
Sheaf of Corn. By Mary E. Mann 6/0
The Virgin Widow. By Randal Charlton 6/0
A Poppy Show. By H. B. Marriott Watson 6/0
The Sentimental Adventures of Jimmy Bulstrode. By Marie Van Vorst 6/0
The Magistrate's Own Case. By Baron Rosenkrantz ... 6/0
The Scourge. By Warrington Dawson 6/0
The Crooked Way. By William Le Queux 6/0
The Bad Times. By G. A. Birmingham 6/0
The Coward Behind the Curtain. By Richard Marsh ... 6/0
Colonel Kate. By K. L. Montgomery 6/0
Young Columbine. By Dorothea Deakin 6/0
Man and the Cassock. By Mrs. David G. Ritchie 6/0

Miscellaneous

- Jewellery. By H. Clifford Smithnet 25/0
The Russian Court in the Nineteenth Century. By E. A. Brayley Hodgettsnet 24/0
Woman through the Ages. By Emil Reichnet 21/0
Early Woodcut Initials. By Oscar Jenningsnet 21/0
A History of Germany. By C. T. Atkinsonnet 15/0

- The Poems of William Wordsworth. With Introduction and Notes by Nowell C. Smith. In 3 vols.net 15/0
The Romance of George Villiers. By Philip Gibbsnet 15/0
The Summer Garden of Pleasure. By Mrs. Stephen Batsonnet 15/0
The Life and Letters of Herbert Spencer. By David Duncannet 15/0
The Complete Motorist. By Filson Youngnet 12/6
Tragedy Queens of the Georgian Era. By John Fyvienet 12/6
Famous French Salons. By Frank Hamelnet 12/6
The Brave de Lauzun. By M. F. Sandarsnet 10/6
Madame de Layfayette. By Lilian Reanet 10/6
A Commentary on Exodus. By A. H. M'Neilenet 10/6
Diseases of Occupation. By Thomas Olivernet 10/6
The Causation and Prevention of Tuberculosis. By Arthur Newsholmenet 10/6
Bonaparte and the Consulate. By A. C. Thibaudeaunet 10/6
The Life of Napoleon Bonaparte. By S. Baring-Gouldnet 10/6
The Trials of Five Queens. By R. Storry Deans ... net 10/6
A Star of the Salons. By Camilla Jebbnet 10/6
The Complete Lawn-Tennis Player. By A. Wallis Myersnet 10/6
Advanced Golf. By James Braidnet 10/6
Home Life in Germany. By Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick net 10/6

MR. JOHN MURRAY

Educational

- The Year's Work in Classical Studies, 1907. Edited by W. H. D. Rousenet 2/6
Murray's French Texts. Edited by W. G. Hartog. La Mare au diable. Par George Sand 1/6
Confessions d'un ouvrier. By Emile Souvestre

Fiction

- Graham of Claverhouse. By Ian Maclaren 6/0
The Silver Zone. By Kathleen P. Emmett 6/0
Dominy's Dollars. By B. Paul Neuman 6/0
Rodwell. By Miss F. Hawtrey 6/0
Caroline. By Clementina Black 6/0
Mothers in Israel. By J. S. Fletcher 6/0
The Three Miss Graemes. By Miss MacNaughtan 6/0

Miscellaneous

- The Plate Collector's Guide. By Percy Macquoid ...net 6/0
The Trial and Crucifixion of Jesus Christ of Nazareth. By M. Brodrick
The Truth and Error of Christian Science. By Miss M. Carta Sturgenet 2/6
John Thadeus Delane, 1817-1879, Editor of "The Times": his Life and Correspondence. Compiled from hitherto unpublished Letters. By his Nephew, Arthur Irwin Dasent. In 2 vols.
Correspondence of George Canning and some Intimate Friends. Edited by Joscelyne Bagot. In 2 vols.
The Life and Correspondence of George, First Earl Macartney. By Mrs. Helen H. Robins.
Catherine of Bragança. By Lillias Campbell Davidson.
Memoir of Lettice Lady Falkland. Edited by Miss M. F. Howard.
Some American Impressions. By Monsignor Count Vay de Vaya and Luskod.
From Peking to Mandalay. By R. F. Johnston.
The Latins in the Levant. By William Miller.
Pearls and Parasites. By A. E. Shipley.
The Pleasant Land of France. By Rowland E. Prothero.
From Peking to Sikkim. By Count de Lesdain.
The Law of Hospitals. By Arthur Turnour Murray.
The King's Customs. By Henry Ashton and Henry Hurst Holland.
Indian Problems. By S. M. Mitra.
A Critical Examination of Socialism. By W. H. Mallock 6/0

MR. EVELEIGH NASH

Fiction

- The Nun. By René Bazin 6/0
The Magic of May. By "Iota." 6/0
The Fifth Queen Crowned. By Ford Madox Hueffer ... 6/0
The Thief on the Cross. By Mrs. Harold E. Gorst 6/0
A Misunderstood Man. By J. A. C. Sykes 6/0
The Lady in the Car. By William Le Queux 6/0
The Harvest Moon. By J. S. Fletcher 6/0
The Kiss of Helen. By Charles Marriott 6/0
Pedlar's Pack. By Oliver Onions 6/0
Captain Spink. By Morley Roberts 6/0

- Galahad's Garden. By G. B. Burgin 6/0
 The Worst Man in the World. By Frank Richardson... 6/0
 The Millionaire Girl. By "Rita" 6/0
 The Pardon. By Marie Van Vorst 6/0
 The Bloom o' the Heather. By S. R. Crockett 6/0

Miscellaneous

- Old England. By W. Shaw Sparrownet 24/0
 Hyde Park: its History and Romance. By Mrs. Alec Tweedienet 15/0
 Beau Brummel and his Times. By Roger Boutet de Monvelnet 10/0
 Leaves from a Lifenet 10/0
 The Life of an Empress. By Frédéric Loliéenet 15/0
 The Diary of a Looker-on. By C. Lewis Hind 7/6
 Voltaire, Montesquieu, and Rousseau in England. By Prof. J. Churton Collinsnet 7/6
 Problems of the Middle East. By Angus Hamilton...net 10/6
 Sport and Life on the Pacific Slope. By Horace Annesley Vachellnet 10/0
 Nooks and Corners of Old England. By Allan Fea...net 10/6

MESSRS. SMITH ELDERFiction

- Crossriggs. By Mary and Jane Findlater 6/0
 Dan Reach: Socialist. By the author of "Miss Molly," "Ingleheim," &c. 6/0
 The Allen Sisters. By Mrs. Percy Dearmer 6/0
 The Flemings. By Jessie and Charles Fielding Marsh... 6/0
 Wroth. By Agnes and Egerton Castle 6/0
 The Grey Knight. By Mrs. Henry De La Pasture 6/0
 Chateau Royal. By J. H. Yoxall, M.P. 6/0
 The Forefront of the Battle. By Andrew Loring 6/0
 The Forewarners. By Giovanni Cena 6/0

Miscellaneous

- The Cradle of the Deep. By Sir Frederick Treves, Bart.net 12/0
 English Socialism of To-day. By the Right Hon. H. O. Arnold-Forster, M.P.net 2/6
 The Victorian Chancellors. By J. B. Atlaynet 14/0
 Islands of the Vale. By Eleanor G. Haydennet 7/6
 Animal Life. By F. W. Gamblenet 6/0
 My Alpine Jubilee, 1851-1907. By Frederic Harrison.net 3/6
 The Passing of Morocco. By Frederick Moore 5/0
 Memories of Fifty Years. By Rudolph C. Lehmann, M.P.net 10/6
 British Socialism. By J. Ellis Barkernet 10/6
 Essays on Shakespeare and his Works. By Sir Spenser St. Johnnet 9/0

Reprints and New Editions

- A Life of William Shakespeare. By Sidney Leenet 10/6
 The Life and Letters of Robert Browning. By Mrs. Sutherland Orrnet 7/6
 Idlehurst. By John Halshamnet 5/0

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE

- Turbines. (Romance of Science Series.) By Engineer-Commander A. E. Tompkins, R.N. 3/6
 Spinning Tops. (Romance of Science Series.) By Professor J. Perry, M.E., F.R.S. 2/6
 The Fundamental Conceptions of Chemistry. (Manuals of Elementary Science.) By Professor S. M. Jorgensen, Professor of Chemistry at the University of Copenhagen. Translated from the latest German Edition by M. P. Appleby, B.A. 2/6
 Scandinavian Britain. (Early Britain Series.) By W. G. Collingwood, M.A., F.S.A. 7/6
 The Old Testament in the Light of the Historical Records and Legends of Assyria and Babylonia. By T. G. Pinches, LL.D., M.R.A.S. 7/6
 The Epistle to Diognetus. (Early Church Classics.) By the Rev. L. B. Radford, M.A. 7/6
 Domesday Book. A Popular Account of the Exchequer Manuscript, so-called, with Notes of the principal parts of general interest which it contains. By W. de Gray Birch, F.S.A. 7/6

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHN & CO.History, Biography, and Belles Lettres

- Dictionary of French Quotations. By Col. P. H. Dalbiac and T. B. Harbottle. Third (cheaper) edition.
 History of the English Landed Interest: its Customs, Laws, and Agriculture. By Russell M. Garnier. 2 vols. Second edition.

New Classical Library. Edited by Dr. Emil Reich:

1. An abridged edition of Seyffert's Dictionary of Antiquities.
 2. The Pandects (de verborum obligationibus) and the important parts of Gaius.
 3. Plato's Dialogues (The Sophist, Parmenides, Politicus and Timaeus). By H. F. Carlill, M.A.
- The Dawn of a Constitution, or the Reigns of Henry III., Edward I., Edward II., and Edward III. (1216-1377). By Sir James H. Ramsay, Bart., M.A.
 The History and Ethnography of Africa South of the Zambesi from the Settlement of the Portuguese at Sofala in September, 1505, to the Conquest of the Cape Colony by Great Britain in September, 1795. By Dr. G. M. Theal. Three vols:
 Vol. II. Formation of the Cape Colony by the Dutch.
 Vol. III. Account of the Dutch, Portuguese, Hottentots, and Bantu.
 The History of South Africa, 1860 to 1872.
 The Wonderful Century: its Successes and its Failures. By Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace. With portrait, charts, and 107 illustrations.

MR. T. FISHER UNWINBelles Lettres

- The Tragedies of Seneca. By Frank Justus Millernet 12/6
 The Novels of George Meredith. By E. E. J. Baileynet 5/0
 Within Four Walls, and Children at Play. By Leo Sarkadi Schullernet 5/0
 Wild Honey from Various Thyme. By Michael Fieldnet 5/0
 Artist Songs. By E. Richardsonnet 3/6
 Songs of a Sourdough. By Robert W. Servicenet 2/6

Fiction

- Eve's Apple. By Alphonse Courlander 6/0
 Paradise Court. By J. S. Fletcher 6/0
 The Traitor's Wife. By W. H. Williamson 6/0
 The Blue Lagoon. By H. de Vere Stacpoole 6/0
 An Old Man's Darling. By Lucas Cleeve 6/0
 The Terror of the Macdurgotts. By C. E. Playne 6/0
 Legions of the Dawn. By Allan Reeth 6/0
 The Dazzling Miss Davison. By Florence Warden 6/0
 Father Alphonsus. By H. A. Hinkson 6/0
 Marioza. By A. G. Hales 6/0

History

- A Literary History of Russia. By Professor A. Brücknernet 12/6
 Ancient Italy. By Ettore Paisnet 21/0
 The Story of British Diplomacy. By T. H. S. Escottnet 16/0
 History of Ireland to the Coming of Henry II. By Arthur O'Leighnet 10/6
 Oriental Campaigns and European Furloughsnet 7/6

Miscellaneous

- The Statutes of Wales. Collected, Arranged, and Edited by Ivor Bowennet 21/0
 Criminal Appeal and Evidence. By N. W. Sibleynet 15/0
 The Harrison Fisher Book. A Collection of Drawings in Colours and Black and White. With an Introduction by James B. Carringtonnet 10/6
 Chats on Miniatures. By J. J. Fosternet 5/0
 Chats on Book Plates. By W. H. K. Wrightnet 5/0
 Chats on Oriental China. By J. F. Blackernet 5/0
 Chats on Old Lace and Needlework. By Mrs. Lowesnet 5/0

Politics and Sociology

- The Socialist Movement in England. By Brougham Villiersnet 10/6
 The Swiss Democracy. By H. D. Lloyd and John A. Hobson 6/0
 Adam Smith and Modern Sociology. By Albion W. Smallnet 5/6

Science

- The Age of the Earth and other Geological Studies. By W. J. Sollasnet 6/0
 Nature Studies by Night and Day. By F. C. Snell 5/0
 Health at its Best v. Cancer and other Diseasesnet 5/0

Travel

- The Scenery of Sherwood Forest. By Joseph Rodgersnet 21/0
 The Confessions of a Beachcomber. By E. J. Banfieldnet 15/0
 Cults, Customs, and Superstitions of India. By J. Campbell Omannet 10/6

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY.

MODERN EGYPT

By the EARL OF CROMER.

With Portrait of Author and Map. 2 Vols., 21s. net.

THIRD IMPRESSION NOW READY.

RAMBLING RECOLLECTIONS

By Sir HENRY DRUMMOND WOLFF, G.C.B., G.C.M.G.
With Photogravure and other Illustrations. Two Vols., 8vo,
30s. net.

THE EVERSLEY TENNYSON

Annotated by ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON. In 9 Vols. Globe 8vo
4s. net each.

Vol. I. POEMS. Vol. II. POEMS.
Vol. III. ENOCH ARDEN and IN MEMORIAM.
Vol. IV. THE PRINCESS and MAUD.

EPIC AND ROMANCE

Essays on Mediæval Literature. By Prof. W. P. KER.
NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION. Globe 8vo, 4s. net.
[Eversley Series.]

THE PRIMADONNA A SEQUEL TO "SOPRANO."

By F. MARION CRAWFORD. Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

THE LETTERS OF MARTIN LUTHER

Selected and Translated by MARGARET A. CURRIE.
8vo, 12s. net.

. The first collection in English of the Letters of the great Reformer.

A NEW BOOK ON BUDDHISM.

THE INWARD LIGHT

By H. FIELDING HALL, Author of "The Soul of a People,"
&c. SECOND IMPRESSION. 8vo, 10s. net.

CONFESSIO MEDICI

By the Writer of "The Young People." Extra crown 8vo
3s. 6d. net.

. A volume of essays, full of warm-hearted kindness and quick humour, that appeal to all who take an interest in suffering humanity.

TYPES OF TRAGIC DRAMA

By Prof. O. E. VAUGHAN, M.A. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. net.

. A work which traces the growth of the drama from Æschylus to Ibsen.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., London.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS

NEW VOLUME IN THE PROGRESSIVE SCIENCE SERIES. HEREDITY.

By J. ARTHUR THOMSON, Regius Professor of Natural History in the University of Aberdeen, Author of "The Study of Animal Life." With Coloured and other Illustrations. Large crown
8vo, 9s. net.

MEMOIR OF LETTICE, LADY FALK- LAND. Edited by Miss M. F. HOWARD. With Illustrations. Square demy 8vo, 6s. net.

This is a reprint of a quaint monograph on Lady Lettice, wife of the celebrated Lord Falkland, written by her Chaplain, John Duneau, D.D., in 1647. It includes extracts from a devotional work which he had made for her use, in the style of St. Francis de Sales. There is also a reproduction of the original portrait-frontispiece and a critical and biographical introduction. Lord Clarendon described her as "a lady of most extraordinary wit and judgment, and of the most signal virtue and exemplary life that the age produced."

CATHERINE OF BRAGANÇA,

Infanta of Portugal and Queen-Consort of England. By LILLIAS
CAMPBELL DAVIDSON. With Portraits and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

A CHEAP EDITION.

LIFE OF ISABELLA BIRD

(MRS. BISHOP). By Miss ANNA M. STODDART. With Illustrations.
Large crown 8vo, 6s. net.

A NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "A LAME DOG'S DIARY."

THREE MISS GRAEMES.

By S. MACNAUGHTAN. 6s.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

CRITICAL ESSAYS OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

Crown 8vo, VOL. I. 1603-1650. VOL. II. 1650-1685.
5s. net each. Edited by J. E. SPINGARN.

[Immediately.]

ENGLISH SOCIETY IN THE ELEVENTH CENTURY

Essays in English Mediæval History. By Dr. PAUL VINOGRADOFF.

The Scotsman.—"... Displays, with a minute and exact learning which must make the work invaluable to students of the social history of the period, the features of a time of transition. ... The work embodies enormous amount of solid and well-digested learning in a field of historical inquiry rich in lessons bearing upon the political and economic problems of to-day."

8vo, 16s. net.

FREDERIC WILLIAM MAITLAND

Two Lectures and a Bibliography. By A. L. SMITH.

Spectator.—"This is a tribute of praise worthy of the man to whose memory it is paid—more it would not be possible to say.
No one could be better qualified to speak of his work than Mr. A. L. Smith. He knows it well, and he can appreciate it in a way that shows a real mastery of the subject.
Whether he is speaking of the general temper of the man, or of special instances in which he brought an illuminating genius to bear on problems of history, he always puts the case with remarkable clearness."

8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

BONAPARTISM

Six Lectures delivered in the University of London. By
H. A. L. FISHER.

The Athenæum.—"We mean no disrespect to Mr. Fisher that historical impressionism is the chief characteristic of the narrative, for it is impressionism of the best kind. Deftness of touch and a happy choice of illustrative details are among the attractions of this volume, and scholars will feel instinctively that stores of learning are held in reserve which would suffice to make a bulky tome."

8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

A CALENDAR OF THE COURT MINUTES, &c., OF THE EAST INDIA COMPANY, 1635-1639

By ETHEL BRUCE SAINSBURY. With an Introduction and Notes by WILLIAM FOSTER. (Published under the patronage of his Majesty's Secretary of State for India in Council.)

8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Morning Post.—"Miss Sainsbury has edited these ancient documents with consummate order and regularity, for the benefit of posterity."

Propectuses on Application

London: HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press,
Amen Corner, E.C.

NEW SPRING BOOKS

I.
CEYLON: The Paradise of Adam

By CAROLINE CORNER. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"A very lively and discursive account of a Lady's residence in the island, and makes excellent reading."—Globe."The whole book is charming . . . a delightfully airy humour through it all, with here and there a flash of vivid descriptive power. Cynthia has written no humdrum guide-book or diary of trivialities, but a series of pen-pictures, not one of which is commonplace or dull."—Pall Mall Gazette.II.
THE KING'S GENERAL IN THE WEST

Being the Life of Sir Richard Grenville, Baronet (1610-1659). By ROGER GRANVILLE, M.A., Sub-Dean of Exeter Cathedral. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

III.
THE CONDITION OF HUNTERS: THE CHOICE OF HORSES AND THEIR MANAGEMENT.

By NIMROD. The Veterinary portion revised and brought up to date by FRANK TOWNEND BARTON, M.R.C.V.S. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

IV.
APOLOGIA DIFFIDENTIS

By W. COMPTON LEITH. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Leith has written a very beautiful book, and perhaps the publisher's claim that this will prove a new classic is not too bold."—Daily Mail."A singularly beautiful and interesting book."—Daily Graphic.V.
MODERNISM AND ROMANCE

By R. A. SCOTT-JAMES. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"An ingenious, conscientious, and praiseworthy attempt to proportion and classify living literary values . . . may be cordially recommended as both suggestive and illuminative."—Observer.VI.
LIMBO AND OTHER ESSAYS

By VERNON LEE, Author of "The Enchanted Woods," "Hortus Vitæ," "The Spirit of Rome," etc. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

This volume contains several new Essays, and also a reprint of "Ariadne of Mantua," originally privately published by the Author and not sent out to the Press. [Ready March 25.]

NEW MUSICAL BOOKS

BRAHMS

By H. C. COLLES.

JUST OUT.

Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

[Music of the Masters.]

CLAUDE DEBUSSY

By Mrs. FRANZ LIEBICH.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

"We can cordially commend this genial and enthusiastic sketch. . . . This ingenious recital . . . really diverting anecdotes."—Spectator. [Living Masters of Music.]

VERSE

INTERLUDES AND POEMS

By LASCELLES ABERCROMBIE. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"Any half-dozen lines in this book would prove Mr. Abercrombie a poet. Almost any half-dozen would prove him a new poet: not a mere melodious gentle spirit who has loved Tennyson or Shelley . . . A man with a noble and exquisite sense of words and rhythms . . . having an artist's harmony of sensual and spiritual life. Mr. Abercrombie must move to things beyond the grandeur and subtlety of this book."—Mr. Edward Thomas in "Daily Chronicle".

NEW NOVELS

THE MASTER KNOT

A Novel by ALICE BIRKHEAD. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE CHICHESTER INTRIGUE

By THOMAS COBB, Author of "Mrs. Erricker's Reputation," etc. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"One of Mr. Cobb's clever mixtures of light society comedy and deeply tragic humanity . . . The mystery is undeniably interesting."—Evening Standard.LOVE AND THE IRONMONGER

By F. J. RANDALL. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Since the gay days of Mr. Anstey's 'Vice Versa' we can recall no book of purely farcical imagination so full of excellent entertainment."—Daily Telegraph. "A vastly amusing intrigue . . . a book no one can afford to neglect."—Daily Express.FINANCES OF SIR JOHN KYNNEERSLEY

By A. C. FOX-DAVIES, Author of "The Dangerville Inheritance," "The Mauleverer Murders," etc. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Extremely clever and entertaining."—Morning Post. "Thoroughly bold, smart, and ingenious."—Daily Graphic.GATES THAT SHALL NOT PREVAIL

A Novel by HERBERT M. FARRINGTON. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Just out.]

JOHN LANE, PUBLISHER, THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON, AND NEW YORK.

Messrs. BELL'S NEW BOOKS

THE CHILDREN'S BOOK FOR EASTER

READY ON MONDAY. Crown 4to, 2s. 6d. net.

EASTER EGGS: an Easter Idyll for Children.

By CHRISTOPH VON SCHMID, with many Illustrations in Colour and Black and White by Miss M. V. WHEELHOUSE, and specially designed Binding and End-papers.

Illustrated Prospectus on application.

NEW WORKS BY ABBOT GASQUET, D.D., O.S.B.

Crown 8vo, 6s. net each.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE BLACK BEACH in 1348 and 1349.

New and Revised Edition.

"By far the most interesting and exhaustive record to be found of this most appalling visitation."—Morning Post.THE LAST ABBOT OF GLASTONBURY, and other Essays. Illustrated.

IN THE PRESS.

THE OLD ENGLISH BIBLE, and other Essays.

Prospectus on application.

Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

DECORATIVE HERALDRY. A Practical Handbook of its Artistic Treatment. By G. W. EVE. With about 200 Illustrations. New and Revised Edition."He treats his subject with a width as well as a depth of knowledge that renders this volume amongst all modern writings the treatise on heraldry par excellence for artists."—Magazine of Art

Illustrated Prospectus on application.

LES CLASSIQUES FRANÇAIS ILLUSTRÉS

Publiés sous la direction de DANIEL O'CONNOR.

Small crown 8vo, with 8 Full-page Illustrations in Colour and about 30 in Black and White. 5s. net.

NOW READY.

GEORGE SAND: LES MAÎTRES SONNEURS.

Préface D'ÉMILE FAGUET, de l'Académie Française. Illustrations de M. V. WHEELHOUSE.

GEORGE SAND: LA MÈRE AU DIABLE.

Notice Analytique de C. A. SAINTE-BEUVE. Illustrations de GERTRUDE LEESE.

READY SHORTLY.

BALZAC: LES CHOUANS. Illustrations de J. BLAKE GREENE.

Illustrated Prospectus on application.

THE YORK LIBRARY

Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. net; limp leather, 3s. net.

GOETHE'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY. ("Dichtung und Wahrheit.") Revised Translations by M. STEELE-SMITH. Head Lecturer in Modern Languages at Newnham College, Cambridge. With an Introduction and Bibliography by KARL BREUL, Litt.D., Ph.D. 2 Vols. [Ready immediately.]THE IDYLLS OF THEOCRITUS. With the Eclogues of Virgil, rendered into English Verse by CHARLES STUART CALVERLEY. With an Introduction by Professor E. Y. TYRRELL. [Ready shortly.]BOHN'S LIBRARIES"The new series of Bohn's Libraries, on which judicious book-buyers have long learned to keep a careful eye."—Athenæum.

This well-known Series now includes upwards of 800 Volumes of Standard Works of European Literature in the English Language, on:—

HISTORY
BIOGRAPHY TOPOGRAPHY
ARCHÆOLOGY
THEOLOGY
ANTIQUITIESSCIENCE NATURAL HISTORY PHILOSOPHY
POETRY
ART
FICTION

Price 3s. 6d. or 5s. per Volume (with exceptions).

Write for Detailed Catalogue, which will be sent on application.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS,
York House, Portugal Street, Kingsway.

LORD CROMER'S BOOK—ITS PERSONAL ASPECT

PART III.

LORD CROMER'S account of the Soudan disasters in 1883 and 1884, and the defence he makes of his own share in them, and of the Gordon tragedy of 1885, stand as literature in brilliant contrast with all that precedes it in his book. Historically speaking, they are an oasis of fertility in the otherwise sterile desert of his untrustworthy narrative. Here, having his own credit to defend, he casts off, as it were, his official coat and sets to work digging in earnest, not merely in the thin soil of published Blue Books, but in all sorts of private records for evidence which shall clear his character. In his zeal for truth he cares nothing for diplomatic etiquette, or the feelings of the Foreign Office, or the reputation of a national hero, or the fair fame even of England. Facts he will have at any cost; and a great many unpleasant truths he sets before his readers. I am the last man in the world to quarrel with him for this. It is a gain to history; and, though his argument is of course not quite as candid as it seems, it still is a notable contribution to our knowledge of events.

My own part in those astonishing years, though not altogether a passive one, was one rather of a spectator than an actor, an actor sufficiently behind the scenes to have fresh evidence to give, both for Lord Cromer and against him. I knew Gordon and most of Gordon's relatives; I knew Colonel Stewart; I have talked with Zebehr; I was in communication with Downing Street during some of the most anxious moments there; and, above all, my connection with the Egyptian revolutionists of 1882 caused me to be in the confidence of those Panislamists who were themselves in communication with the Mahdi. As Lord Cromer's critic in his quarrel with Gordon I am able to maintain a detached attitude, having held all through that both he and Gordon were in the wrong. I know that their diagnosis of the Soudanese malady was on either side faulty—Gordon's I think more so than Cromer's—but of the two physicians who were killing the patient I believe that Gordon, if left quite to himself, might have blundered on to the right prescription, while Lord Cromer hardly could have done so. Between them prescribing different remedies the patient inevitably died.

But before I go into the merits of their quarrel, I may, perhaps, be permitted to show how, before ever Gordon appeared upon the scene, the whole Soudan trouble might have been, without difficulty, avoided. In this I am able to speak as one wise, not after the event, but before it. Lord Cromer begins his account of the trouble of 1883 with an elaborate argument of the uselessness of the Soudan to Egypt, and the necessity there was, especially after the defeat of Hicks by the Mahdi, of abandoning provinces which the Egyptian Government was incapable of defending or holding to any profit. Now I, as an Egyptian sympathiser, had long been of the opinion that Egypt had enough to do with her own purely Egyptian affairs without ruling the Soudan. As long before as the year 1880, in one of my letters to Downing Street, I had said:

I cannot conceive why Egypt should charge itself with governing the Nile beyond the First Cataract, its old boundary.

And this was the idea of most of the Nationalists of 1882. It will therefore easily be understood that, if Mr. Gladstone had had the courage to insist on a restoration of the National Party after Tel-el-Kebir, one of the first Nationalist reforms would have been in the direction of coming to terms with the Mahdi and retiring from the Upper Nile provinces. That this was in fact so, even before the defeat of Hicks, is proved by a pronouncement made through me by the exiled leaders of the party when I visited them in Ceylon in the autumn of 1883. Writing from Colombo on November 5th, after giving their programme of the reforms needed by Egypt, the following passage occurs:

Although he (Arabi) is of opinion that a certain connection will always be necessary between the lower and upper waters of the Nile, he holds that in the present military and financial position of Egypt it is unwise to attempt the reconquest of all or, perhaps, of any of the lost provinces. He believes that the movement of the so-called Mahdi is not one merely of fanaticism, or that it is only a revolt of the slave-dealers. He thinks that Mohamed Ahmed commands the goodwill of the inhabitants, and that it would be far wiser for the Egyptian Government to come to terms with him than to continue their military operations against him. The Soudan brings nothing into the Cairo treasury, and if Egypt is to enjoy liberty at home she should avoid ideas of conquest abroad. The terms that could be made with the Mahdi Arabi has been too long out of Egypt to judge; but from the communications which reached him while in power he does not believe a friendly arrangement admitting Egypt's suzerainty impossible. The suzerainty of Egypt the Soudanese would probably be glad to admit, for it would protect them against European aggression.

Now this was written three weeks before the news of Hicks's disaster reached Cairo, or before Lord Cromer had given his first note of alarm to the Foreign Office about the Soudan. Also its publication in the Times on the morning of December 13th coincides exactly with Lord Granville's decision of that same day ordering the abandonment of Khartoum—a coincidence which can hardly have been fortuitous. It may, therefore, be taken as certain not only that Lord Cromer would have met with no difficulty on the part of the Nationalists in his resolve to withdraw the garrisons, but that, had a Nationalist Ministry been in power during the summer, Hicks would never have been sent to his death, the Upper Nile provinces would have been long ago evacuated, and as soon as the necessity arose a retirement to Assouan would have been their programme. Yet we find Lord Cromer in his book complaining that he was quite unable to find an Egyptian Minister willing, even two months after the disaster, to withdraw. None of the reactionary Court party he was maintaining in power would hear of it, and he could suggest nothing better than to threaten the Khedive with forming a Ministry of Englishmen, thereby undertaking for England new responsibilities which bound her with a stronger tie than ever to Egypt. Lord Cromer, of course, does not mention the Times pronouncement in his book; and his silence is only another instance of his unwillingness to admit the truth—namely, that every reform of importance introduced by him was borrowed originally from Nationalist suggestions. On the contrary, he would have us believe that the Soudan imbroglio was one out of which there was no exit but a violent one, and that the whole fault of the seriousness of the situation lay with the Egyptians.

It was in India that the news reached me of Gordon's mission to Khartoum. I learned it by a public telegram without any precise statement of its object, though rumours had preceded it, founded no doubt on his Pall Mall utterances. The year before I had discussed this very matter of the Soudan with Gordon, and had found him obstinate as to the necessity of retaining Khartoum under all circumstances for Egypt. I was consequently alarmed lest he should make the mistake of trying now to hold it, knowing better than he did how all-powerful the influence of the Mahdi had become; and I wrote to warn him:

Delhi, January 24th, 1884.

My dear General—I feel obliged to write to you about your mission to the Soudan. I see it announced to-day by telegraph without explanation of the object, but I cannot wait till more definite news arrives, and I desire to warn you. It may be you are going there to make peace between the Mahdi and our troops in Egypt, to acknowledge his sovereignty in the Soudan, and arrange terms for the evacuation of Khartoum. If so, I can only wish you God-speed. It is a good work, and you will accomplish it. But if, as I fear it may be from the tradition of some of those in power, the object of your mission is to divide the tribes with a view to retaining any part of the country for the Khedive, to raise men for him and scatter money, it is a bad work, and you will fail. Neither your courage, nor your honest purpose, nor the inspiration which has hitherto guided you will bring success. I know enough to be able to assure you that every honest Mohamedan in Egypt and North Africa and Arabia sympathises with the Mahdi's cause, not necessarily believing him to have a Divine mission, but as representing ideas of liberty and justice and religious government which they acknowledge to be Divine. For this reason you will only have the men of Belial on your side, and these will betray you.

I beg you be cautious. Do not trust to the old sympathy which united Englishmen with the Arabs. I fear it is a thing of the past and that even your great name will not protect you with them. Also consider what your death will mean—the certainty of a cry for vengeance in England, and an excuse with those who ask no better than a war of conquest. I wish I could be sure that all those who are sending you on your mission do not foresee this end. Forgive me if I am wrong in my fears, and believe me yours very gratefully in memory of last year,

WILFRID SCAWEN BLUNT.

This letter reached Gordon—if, indeed, it reached him—too late to hinder the mistakes he made. These were, first, his misunderstanding of the Mahdi's immense moral power in the Soudan; secondly, his acceptance of service under Tewfik; and thirdly, what Lord Cromer has well pointed out, his fighting instinct, which overbore all other feeling when it came to a doubtful choice between peace and war. I find in my diary of 1884 a number of interesting entries bearing upon all these points. I will quote here only one, written on my return to London:

April 23rd, 1884.—Met Brocklehurst, Gordon's chief friend and correspondent, and had a long talk with him about Gordon. It appears that Gordon asked repeatedly for me when he was starting for Egypt, and it is a thousand pities I did not see him (being away in India), as I could have prevented his making the mistake of going to Tewfik and not going to the Mahdi. Brocklehurst declares that Gordon from first to last has refused to believe in the Mahdi's influence, and does not believe in it now. He says that, if he had done so, he would certainly have made friends with him.

I have never ceased regretting that I was not at hand to argue these points personally with him before he started on an adventure so perilous, or that I did not telegraph my message instead of writing, for he would have received it just when he was making up his mind at Cairo. I could have warned him how useless would be any attempt such as he had in his head of setting up any government at Khartoum in opposition to the Mahdi; that his sole chance of withdrawing the garrisons lay in his putting himself at once into friendly communication with him, and that all idea of more than this was useless. I could have warned him how little respect the Khedive's name any longer inspired, and how he would have had a better chance of treating for the abandonment without than with Tewfik's firman. I could even, perhaps, have helped him in the matter of credentials if he went only as a messenger of peace. Lastly, I could have warned him against those who in England were making use of him to force Gladstone's hand into a new venture as they had forced it into bombarding Alexandria. Unfortunately, however, I lost this opportunity, and in another week he was committed to a line of policy which had not the smallest possibility of success. What I believe was in his secret heart was that it would be possible for him to what the Pall-Mall Gazette called "Sarawak" the Soudan. It was an ignis fatuus that led him to his death.

Lord Cromer's sketch of Gordon's character, though he is unjust with charging him with a dereliction of duty, is not otherwise than a true one. Gordon and Baring were in temperament the antipodes of each other. Baring, born in the financial purple, prudent, businesslike, persistent of purpose, intolerant of sentiment and of all untidiness of thought; Gordon imaginative, changeable, sympathetic to new ideas, venturesome to rashness, a man of genius in action, something of a mystic, something of a fanatic, untamably self-willed. It is no wonder that they did not agree. They had already had official words together in 1878, and had parted not friends. Gordon's explanation of the quarrel with him is on record:

Baring (he writes to his brother in that year) is in the Royal Artillery, while I am in the Royal Engineers. Baring was in the nursery when I was in the Crimea. He has a pretentious, grand, patronising way with him. . . . When oil mixes with water we will mix together.

It is not surprising, then, that Lord Cromer, while recommending the despatch of a British officer of high rank to Khartoum, twice refused Gordon's services for evacuating the Soudan when they were offered him by the Foreign Office. I do not say that from his point of view he was not right. Gordon irritated him. He knew that he would prove an insubordinate subordinate, and Lord Cromer has been always intolerant of independence in men serving under him. When he left London Gordon had a commission pretty free of Lord Cromer. He was to go to Suakim without passing through Cairo. Lord Cromer says that he would have failed to reach Khartoum by that road. Possibly it would have depended on how he was accompanied. Anyhow he did not let him pass. He was resolved to harness him. Gordon was waylaid by military friends at Port Said and brought to head-quarters. Lord Cromer made him see Nubar, the Prime Minister, and took him next morning to present him to the Khedive. Gordon was only too easily persuaded by them to accept a new mandate, and go to Khartoum as Tewfik's Governor-General of the Soudan. I cannot see how it is possible for Lord Cromer to evade his responsibility for the change of plan. He says it was suggested by Gordon, and approved by Granville. But it is clear that he himself concurred in it, stipulating only that Gordon was to be not solely in the Khedive's service, but dependent also on himself. The change of plan anyhow was vital.

Lord Cromer in his book skilfully avoids giving the text of the firman of appointment issued to Gordon at Cairo naming him Governor-General, and dwells instead upon a memorandum drawn up by himself restricting Gordon's duty in the Soudan within comparatively narrow limits under his own direction. The firman, however, is by far the more important document. It is of the widest latitude, by no means confining Gordon's duty to evacuation:

You will take the necessary steps (it says) for establishing an organised government in the different provinces of the Soudan for the maintenance of order and the cessation of all disasters and incitements to revolt.

It is absurd to pretend that Lord Cromer, who consented to such words in Gordon's commission, thought only, or even perhaps principally, of a withdrawal of the garrisons. My own belief on this important point—and it is all-important in view of Lord Cromer's contention that Gordon failed to do his duty—is that there is still something undisclosed in the intention of those who drafted the firman. What I read in it is this—and I heard on my return to England that it was so. The sending of Gordon to Khartoum was, so to say, a political gamble. Besides his ostensible first duty of withdrawing the Egyptian garrisons, Gordon was to be given his chance of "Sarawaking" the Soudan. If he succeeded, well and good. The British Government would profit by it in public opinion at home, and was freed from an embarrassment in Egypt. If he failed, he would either be killed, or could be ordered back, or in the minds of some—I will not here say whom—Mr. Gladstone's hand could be forced into supporting him with British or Indian troops. Mr. Gladstone, of course, was not made acquainted with this part of the plan. On the contrary, Gordon's first commission "to report" was in all probability a blind to get the Prime Minister's acquiescence. I doubt if Mr. Gladstone ever read the text of the firman till he saw it printed in the Blue Book. Hence his anger with Gordon, his unwillingness to send troops, the repeated delays. It is difficult to understand that Lord Cromer, who was concerned in drafting the firman, was blind to its only possible meaning. Or why is the text of it absent from his book? If Gordon was to "establish an organised government in the different provinces" how can Lord Cromer pretend with any logic that Gordon, whom he forbade to treat with the Mahdi, was not to fight with him? Also, is it possible that he did not all along foresee that he must be supported, if in difficulties, with a British army? He says he would sooner for this reason have sent an Egyptian General who would not have necessitated English help. Quite right. Yet it was he who had first suggested an English officer being sent. Failing this, he says, he would have liked to send Stewart, a plain Scotch soldier, cautious, imaginative, without Oriental sympathy, a man after Lord Cromer's own heart. But Stewart ran precisely the same risk and more, except that he could be depended on, which Gordon could not, to return when recalled, and to accept the blame of failure when he failed.

All that Lord Cromer succeeds in showing in his book is that he blundered a little less badly than the Government at home. It is clear that, in spite of his better knowledge of the situation, he allowed Gordon to persuade him that things at Khartoum were less than desperate; that some sort of Government could be established there in opposition to the Mahdi by "dividing the tribes and scattering money," or why should he have allowed the insertion of that clause in the firman? It was Lord Cromer who took Gordon to the Khedive and got him named Governor-General. After this initial blunder, both he and Gordon seem to have made, even on his own showing, every conceivable mistake. Gordon's one reasonable idea at Cairo was to take Zebehr with him, and to take him at once. But Lord Cromer opposed and delayed. Zebehr was a man of the most distinguished Soudanese Arab type, perfectly acquainted by the whole situation in the Soudan. Though he could not have established himself as the Mahdi's rival, nor would he have attempted it, he could have put Gordon into communication with him, and negotiated a withdrawal of the garrisons, probably a modus vivendi with Egypt. At any rate he would have prevented Gordon from embarking on his desperate enterprise without any reliable advice. As it was, with no one near him to explain the truth, Gordon was as a blind man at Khartoum, and became the tool of his Greek dragomans, who betrayed him in interpretation and stuffed him with tales about the Mahdi. Zebehr would at least have hindered that last crowning folly of offering the Mahdi a tarboosh and a Sultanate—a childish insult which sealed Gordon's doom, leaving him no resource but the blind fighting instinct of his soldier-courage.

I will not follow the whole tragic history here. Much as I honoured Gordon, my sympathies during the heroic siege were not with him; and, though I grieved for his death, I rejoiced with all Egypt when Wolseley was baffled at Metemneh and Khartoum fell. Gordon had put himself, towards the Soudanese he once loved, too wholly in the wrong for me to feel otherwise. His love had turned to bitterness, and the Soudanese were "rightly struggling to be free" of him. Nevertheless, I resent Lord Cromer's attitude to-day towards the dead hero. He has not my excuse. He loved neither the Soudanese nor freedom, nor did he love Gordon. I cannot find, though I have carefully read and re-read his book, just cause for his complaint that Gordon "failed to do his duty." Gordon was given an impossible task to do, and was not allowed to do it in the only not quite impossible way. Lord Cromer subscribed to the conditions imposed, and did not insist upon his being allowed the means. If Lord Cromer could say that at any point of the affair he had distinctly ordered Gordon back to Cairo, he might have reason to complain of disobedience. But he admits that he did not do so. Short of this, Gordon alone could decide how best he was to fulfil his mission. The firman includes and justifies everything Gordon did, or failed to do, at Khartoum. While it remained uncanceled, no man can affirm, least of all Lord Cromer, that he exceeded his instructions, even when he included in it his wild resolve to "smash the Mahdi." If their heroic missioner had succeeded in doing so, we may be quite sure that both Lord Cromer and the Government at home would have taken credit to themselves for having ordered the "smashing."

WILFRID SCAWEN BLUNT.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Saint Catherine of Siena. By EDMUND G. GARDNER, M.A. (J. M. Dent and Co., 16s. net.)

MR. GARDNER describes this work as "a study in the religion, literature, and history of the fourteenth century in Italy." It is, indeed, far more of a historical study than a biography. Many hitherto unpublished letters of the saint have been included in these pages, and the progress of historical research in Italy during recent years has placed at Mr. Gardner's disposal a considerable amount of information inaccessible to his predecessors in the same field. All this is of immense importance, and the student of Italian history must acknowledge a deep debt of gratitude to Mr. Gardner for his painstaking labours. But this amplification of background has one serious defect: it tends to throw into obscurity the central figure. One is conscious, as one turns the pages of this volume of vast, anarchic forces at work in a semi-barbarous society, of a welter of chaotic conditions through which emerges at rare and fitful intervals the radiant face of the holiest woman that ever even Italy gave to the world.

And it is, after all, with the saint herself that our interest mainly lies. The long, dreary story of the Papal schism and of the unhappy exile at Avignon has been told before a thousand times, nor does Mr. Gardner help us much towards a completer realisation of the facts. But no age can wither nor custom stale the infinite variety of such a character as Catherine of Siena. The daughter of an artisan, she held in her hand the destinies of Europe. In the midst of a world of strife and rapine she held aloft the standard of peace and justice. Her perfect meekness was more than a match for the warring passions of angry multitudes. In virtue of her marvellous sanctity she became the friend and counsellor of Popes and Bishops, the guide of the Church, the saviour of the Papacy.

One may be sure that it was with a great reluctance that she entered the troubled world of politics. It was in the silence and solitude of her cell that the sweetest visions came to her. It was there that she beheld the Christ Himself, Who instructed her, poor ignorant peasant that she was, in the secret mysteries of the Divinity. Those years of self-communing and ceaseless prayer were to bear rich fruit in her wonderful writings:

The soul that already sees her own nothingness and knows that all her good is in her Creator, entirely abandons herself with all her powers and all creatures, and immerses herself utterly in her Creator, in such wise that she directs all her operations primarily and entirely towards Him; nor would she in any wise go out of Him, in Whom she perceives she has found every good and all perfection of felicity; and from the vision of love, which daily increases in her, she is in a manner so transformed into God that she cannot think, nor understand, nor love, nor remember aught save God, and what concerns God.

It is inevitable that to the majority of twentieth-century readers the life of St. Catherine should appear something of an enigma. Gibbon dismisses her with a characteristic sneer. Her legend, in the opinion of the sapient historian of the Roman Empire, "might furnish some amusing stories." The stories of her flagellations, her divine espousals, and her ecstasies are alike meaningless to such a witness. "For the salvation of others," writes Mr. Gardner, "Catherine was prepared to endure the very pains of hell." This, too, has, doubtless, its "amusing" aspect! Modern medical science would in all probability describe her as a neurotic cataleptic, of somewhat more than average interest from a purely pathological point of view. We are apt to judge the past from the standpoint of "educated" America. But it is worth while to reverse the process, to apply the tests of the fourteenth century to the religious and social life of our own time. Arraigned before that pure and awful tribunal, it might well seem that we, with our boasted industrial system and New Theology, had given hostages to hell.

The Year's Work in Classical Studies, 1908. Edited by W. H. D. ROUSE, M.A., Litt.D. (John Murray, 2s. 6d. net.)

THE second year's issue of this invaluable year-book fully bears out the promise of the first. The several summaries of the various departments of classical progress are compressed into narrow limits, but form, none the less, a rapid and reliable guide to the literature of their subjects. Especially we would note Mr. S. L. Myres's article (IV.) on Prehistoric Archaeology, whose wealth of footnotes forms an indispensable bibliography of the ever-increasing mass of writings upon this fascinating development of archaeology. The chapter "Literature," by Dr. Sandys, is of the utmost value, and the footnotes with the names of publishers and prices will come as a boon to every one who knows the misery of seeking for a book with incomplete data. In the section on Roman Britain, by Mr. Haverfield, the most interesting work noted is that by Mr. Curle at Newstead. But of the whole book it is not too much to say that those seriously interested in the progress of classical study cannot do without it.

The Tinker's Wedding. A Comedy in Two Acts. By J. M. SYNGE. (Dublin : Maunsell and Co., Ltd., 2s. net.)

IRELAND, free from the irritating restrictions of a stage censorship, appears to be the one country in the British Empire where a serious national drama is being created. Mr. W. B. Yeats, Lady Gregory, Mr. Padraic Colum, and Mr. Synge have all done excellent work in the development of Irish drama. Mr. Synge, indeed, occupies an unique position, since he draws his material from the common life of the peasantry. Unlike Mr. Yeats, who has sought to revive the splendour of an immemorial past, Mr. Synge has gone straight to the life around him. He has achieved in his plays the union of realism with poetry. "The Playboy of the Western World" revealed him as a dramatist of an intense imaginative sympathy, with a keen appreciation of that poetry of dialect which still survives in Ireland. There is not a phrase in "The Tinker's Wedding" which might not have been overheard by some casual stranger passing through the villages of Ireland. There is not a phrase which is not instinct with a subtle beauty of expression. Mr. Synge has not been content with seeking for romance in the highways and hedges of his native land. He has rescued it from the very ditches.

"The Tinker's Wedding" is an episode in the life of a couple of itinerant tinkers, who, after having lived together for many years, seek to obtain for their union the sanction of the Church. The experiment does not prove successful, but it is hardly with the story that the interest of the play lives. Conceived in a spirit of the broadest and most reckless farce, "The Tinker's Wedding" is yet a faithful and subtly-executed presentation of Irish character. Mary Byrne, an old drunken hag, who succeeds, unwittingly, in frustrating the wedding, is a triumph of portraiture, and it is quite in keeping with her character that her speech should assume the measured cadences of great poetry :

I wouldn't have you lying down and you lonesome to sleep this night in a dark ditch when the spring is coming in the trees, so let you sit down by the big bough, and I'd be telling you the finest story you'd hear any place from Dundalk to Ballinacree, with great queens in it, making themselves matches from the start to the end, and they with shiny silks on them the length of the day and white shifts for the night.

Mr. Synge's work, with its freshness of outlook and spontaneity of expression, affords a refreshing contrast to the cramping conventions of English drama. He has provided an admirable substitute for what he has only too felicitously described as "the absinthe and vermouth of the last musical comedy."

Marshal Turenne. By the Author of "A Life of Sir Kenelm Digby." (Longmans, Green, 12s. 6d. net.)

"If a literary landmark should be required," writes the author of this interesting and elaborate résumé of the life of Marshal Turenne, "we may observe that we start five years before the death of Shakespeare." So much for the period of European history with which the author deals. In illustration of his style and method of portraiture he supplies another landmark—that of twentieth-century biography—in the fifth chapter of his book :

Condé (he says) was neglectful of his dress and personal appearance ; and he allowed his hair to grow long and to hang as it would, unkempt. Judging from his picture, Turenne also never had his hair cut ; and another celebrated contemporary warrior, Count Schomberg, was notorious for his long, uneven, and flowing locks. In those times it seems to have been considered the mark of a valiant soldier to waste no time at the hairdresser's, in contrast to the custom at present prevailing among many officers of having their heads shorn like those of felons undergoing penal servitude.

This gratuitous piece of "cheek" addressed to military men of the present day must, we imagine, have given something of a shock to Brigadier-General Francis Lloyd, C.B., D.S.O., who supplies an interesting Introduction to this Life of the great French commander. It is on all-fours with the following passage from the author's Preface :

To the obvious retort, "Then why did you write the book ?" the author can only reply by saying, "Why do most of us do many things which we ought not to ?" and by expressing the hope that any ludicrous blunders to be found in the following pages may amuse his military readers as much as it has amused him to make them.

This is not very encouraging, though we presume it is very modern ; but, on the whole, the book is better than might have been expected from the above excerpts. A writer who thinks that there was anything singular in a French nobleman wearing his hair long at a period which began five years after the death of Shakespeare cannot be expected to give a recognisable picture of Turenne as a man and a courtier, in his social and political surroundings, for he evidently has not taken the pains to imagine life in France, or in any part of Europe, as it then was. But he relates the soldier career of Turenne clearly and fairly enough. It is a pity that an occasional lack of "high seriousness," without which the historian will always fail to convince, should have marred his work. He is quite right to blame Ramsay for denying imagination to Turenne :

Would it not (he says) be almost impossible for a successful commander-in-chief to be wanting in this quality ? Could the strategist succeed unless he vividly imagined every movement which his adversary would be likely to make, in a given locality, under given circumstances ?

That Turenne had the imaginative temperament necessary for a successful strategist, as for a successful chess-player, his campaigns amply prove, but nevertheless it was really as a tactician that he showed genius. General Lloyd says, very justly, in his Introduction :

Turenne's march to effect a junction with Wrangel at Friedburg is one that has rarely, if ever, been surpassed in the annals of war, be it taken either as an exemplification of endurance on the part of an army, organisation on the part of a staff, or moral courage on the part of a leader.

This march, however, belongs, strictly speaking, to the domain of tactics rather than of strategy, for, as General Lloyd himself admits a few sentences further on :

In the modern sense of the term Turenne's staff was non-existent.

And he adds :

What shall we say of the decision and moral power which enabled Turenne to make up his mind to enter upon so hazardous an undertaking ? Certain it is that, if the modern soldier learns nothing else from the study of the campaigns of Turenne, it will be borne in upon him more than ever that all practices and all principles may pass away from the conduct of war save one—the moral. Of this Turenne was as great an exponent as the Corsican himself. It won them both many a battle, as much later it enabled Lee, aided by his great lieutenant, to keep at bay for so long the concentrated might of the Federal cause, and as it will decide many an action of the future, be it fought with the quick-firing guns and far-reaching rifles of to-day or the boundless possibilities of the future, such as airships, armed with unknown weapons, of which we see only faint indications in the present.

It was certainly the tactics, rather than the strategy, of Turenne which earned the admiration of Napoleon.

The Mammoth-Hunters. By ALFRED E. CAREY. (Greening, 6s.)

MR. CAREY, doubtless, wrote this book for children, and doubtless also children will find it a storehouse of fascinating lore. But if they leave the book about, the grown-ups will certainly appropriate it, and will not render it up to its rightful owners till they have read it from cover to cover. Profound students of Stone Age man may, and will, find much with which to disagree, and Mr. Carey's views concerning Stonehenge would certainly arouse the wrath of Mr. Rice-Holmes, and we ourselves are rather irritated from time to time by such passages as the following :

Is it too wide a field for the mind's eye to traverse, to picture how, when the floods had begun to shrink and the seasons to grow more tolerable, and the little Neolith workmen were busy piling up Stonehenge, some hoary old mammoth may have come down, in the gloaming or at dawn, and wondered what it all meant, and pondered on the changes since he used to trot, as a calf, by his mother's side ?

But none the less there is a haunting fascination in the idea. And if the youngsters learn, as any intelligent youngster should, to think about the wonderful old days, from reading this book, the seed of a more scientific interest will have been sown, and it will be time enough to weed out the romance when the crop is ripening.

The Epilogue, put into the mouth of a cockroach, is a delightful bit of writing, of the vivid, easy kind, that carries big ideas and tales of millennia as if they were feather-weight. And the language throughout is of a simplicity which might well be imitated by writers who appeal to a more mature public.

FICTION

The Virgin Widow. By RANDAL CHARLTON. (Methuen, 6s.)

IN many ways this is a remarkable book—in fact, so remarkable that it is with regret that we find ourselves unable to praise it unreservedly. But if it is necessary to point out its faults, it must also be understood that it stands on a higher plane than the majority of the books that are reviewed in this column. After reading but a little way into "The Virgin Widow," it becomes apparent that the method here is much the same as that of "The Master of Ballantrae;" there is the same sense of gloom that cannot be shaken off, and tragedy is in the air from the very first page. Here is a passage from the fourth chapter, which, even taken from its context, will show how Mr. Charlton is able to suggest the doom that is to come so swiftly and surely:

It was Friday evening, and so early that Francine, who had fallen asleep with her head on Ann's lap, had not yet gone to bed. Not a wind stirred, but the cold was like a blight. In this way it was without movement and intangible, yet severer than I can possibly describe. The air seemed to bite into my very bones when I crossed the garden in answer to the summons at the outer bell. A visitor at such a time was so unusual an event that for once I remembered Edward's injunctions, and peered through the grille, or peep-hole, before opening the door. I was speedily reassured. Looking through the grille, I beheld the rotund figure of a heavily-built man, who was bent half double over a stout wooden staff. A cumbersome pack, angular, and at first sight indescribable, was strapped upon his shoulders, and he appeared to be almost falling beneath its burden. Seen for that moment in the bleak darkness, silent and motionless, he first suggested to my mind an ancient pilgrim who had strayed from the direction of his shrine. I held my lantern up to the strange man's face and inquired his business.

The period of the story must be somewhere about the time of William IV., though it would be hard to give a date until p. 161 has been reached; and it professes to be told by one of the principal characters of the book, John Bulmer, a middle-aged man, "short in the left leg." To this defect is traced the aloofness from his neighbours of the narrator, which enables him to observe without himself being observed. He tells of his brother's death, and how Ann, his widow—she had been but a wife in name—falls in love with a young man, Bramwell Moore, and thinks that her love is reciprocated, while all the time it is Francine, her adopted daughter, who is the object of his affections; how Ann is blackmailed by an Italian named Garianni; how Garianni is murdered just outside their little farm, and how Moore is accused of the murder and tried; how Moore is acquitted through Ann coming into the court and swearing away her own honour, and then how she discovers that it is not she but Francine who is to reap the reward of her sacrifice; and then, finally, how Ann dies. Then, and then only, do we find out that John all the time had had a secret, passionate love for Ann, and that it was he who had murdered Garianni.

There are many wonderful scenes in the book, but perhaps the most impressive descriptions are those of the murder trial and of Ann's death, when the wretched narrator throws himself on the dead body of the woman whom he has always worshipped, and to whom he can only attain by her death:

Yet am I glad to have her dead,
Here in this wretched, wattle house,
Where I can kiss her eyes and head.

It is a very powerful story, but to us it seems to be marred by the deception of the narrator, who is deliberately misleading as to his actions on the night of the murder. In chapter xiv. there is a definite account of how he spent the night, which entirely precludes the possibility of his having killed Garianni, and yet there is little room for doubt that in the last chapter of all he confesses that he did it. It is curious that so accomplished a craftsman as Mr. Randal Charlton shows himself to be should have allowed himself to be a party to such a fraud on the sympathetic and unsuspecting reader. Otherwise the characters are well-drawn. Ann especially is a very real creation, and one gets a very vivid impression of John, the narrator.

The writing for the most part is of a high order of merit, but it is extremely mannered, and perhaps to this the story owes a great deal of its charm and interest. At times, however, the author's desire to set down nothing that is commonplace runs away with him and leads to a certain preciosity, as in the following passage:

That Bramwell would so far forswear his passion for her as to house such a proposition as marriage with another woman in the tenement of a transitory thought, evidenced to her, in a moment charged with human tumult, that his former professions were of undurable quality.

And we cannot help thinking that "crops were demolished by the dozen" is not a very happy expression. Apart from these faults that we have pointed out, Mr. Charlton seems to us to have written a book which should appreciably raise the reputation he has already obtained with "Mave;" and we look forward to his next novel with a feeling of real interest and pleasure.

The Scourge. By WARRINGTON DAWSON. (Methuen, 6s.)

MR. DAWSON belongs to that small but distinguished band of novelists who deal with the great problems that arise from distinctive social and national conditions. There is something more than mere fiction in what he writes. He has keen gifts of observation and analysis. He has a thesis. He is a prophet preaching from a text. And he talks of what he knows. He is a novelist with a purpose, as every novelist must in some measure be who is a conscientious student of life; and in "The Scourge" his purpose has been to show the effect upon life and character in the Southern parts of the United States caused by the clash of the old social elements with the new, of the invasion by the Yankee, the German, and the Jew of that once exclusive territory, which was the paradise of the old-world planter and slave-owner. This elder type of American had many first-class qualities, which are all the more noticeable when contrasted with the coarse-grained characteristics of certain modern types. It is the Southerner, the legendary Virginian, that the Englishman still has in mind when he figures to himself the ideal American gentleman. The Southerner, as painted by Mr. Dawson, has a pride of race and ancestry which his own cousins of the same stock in England would hardly share in like degree, or would certainly not express in the same way for fear of making themselves ridiculous. But in its native simplicity this is none the less an admirable trait. The Southerner was, and presumably is still, a fine specimen of manhood, and to his noble traditions of living and high example the United States undoubtedly owes a not-sufficiently-appreciated debt. This Mr. Dawson convincingly points out, but his task has also been to show that the South must modify its outlook upon life in face of the new state of affairs, or resign itself to subordination or ruin. It is the invasion of the South by the North which constitutes the scourge. The author has contrasted very cleverly the characters of Alfred Elkins, the pushing, self-made tobacco-manufacturer from the North, who revolutionises the Southern town of Paulsville, and Major Melville, the Southerner, his gentlemanly, refined factotum, whom Elkins both bullies and envies. Elkins' adopted son, "Bloke," is an exceedingly clever creation, even more in contrast with his surroundings, and, therefore, more of a psychological revelation than Elkins himself. The story is quite engrossing, but it is as a study of transitional national attributes that it has enduring value.

Beatrice of Clare. By JOHN REED SCOTT. (E. Grant Richards, 6s.)

THE hero of Mr. Scott's new novel is a young knight in the service of the Duke of Gloucester, and, consequently,

Richard III. is adorned with many virtues which the historians have not seen fit to allow him. Sir Aymer de Lacy, however, is his enthusiastic follower from the moment he is tended by Beatrix, Countess of Clare, to the end of a story which conveniently stops a short time before the battle of Bosworth Field. Historical novels are written very glibly nowadays, and it is seldom that a writer can avoid the use of the well-known ingredients. "Beatrix of Clare" begins with a highway robbery, Sir Aymer being the victim, and the scene is conducted with a chivalry that does credit to all concerned. Beatrix, the richest heiress in England, meets the wounded knight, and the result is love at first sight. Of course, there is the bold, bad rival; and when the heiress is kidnapped by the wicked Lord Darby, Sir Aymer proceeds to rescue her by a series of daring exploits. Space is found, however, for such historical incidents as the crowning of Richard, the executions of Hastings and the Duke of Buckingham, and the deaths of the Princes in the Tower. On the whole the book is interesting, mainly because it makes no great tax on the imagination; and Mr. Scott writes forcibly, and with an enthusiasm for the mediæval that suggests an American origin. In this connection the reviewer is tempted to point out the incongruity of a spelling which, though for the most part American, occasionally drops into the employment of the obsolete. Words like "traveler" and "favor" are followed by "gayety" and "gayly." This is a fault that will irritate the observant reader. However, "Beatrix of Clare" can be recommended to those in search of a readable novel. There is almost as much colour in the prose as there is in the illustrations of Mr. Clarence Underwood.

The Vision of the Foam. By JOHN MCENERY. (Greening, 6s.)

It can be said in favour of "The Vision of the Foam" that many worse books have been published; but that is about all. The story of Dr. Mowbray's romantic meeting with Edith Busch and the events following her tragic death are not told with any great skill. There is too much of the conventional phraseology of the melodramatic writer to please the critical taste, and the book bears internal evidence of having been originally intended for serial publication. The trial of Rial Greton, however, is described very well, and the examinations and cross-examinations of the various witnesses give one the impression that Mr. McEnery is thoroughly acquainted with criminal procedure. If the book had been written in the same manner throughout, one could award unstinted praise to the author. As it is, "The Vision of the Foam" is unlikely to give him an auspicious start as a novelist, because he puts all his poorest work into the first half of the book.

The Place Taker. By PETER EARLSTON. (Greening, 6s.)

THE "Place Taker" is Theodore Wright, alias Thomas Caldwell, who is acting as secretary to James Hickson, Australian millionaire, when his employer comes to an untimely end mountaineering in Switzerland. Caldwell trades on his likeness to the dead man, and impersonates him, using his fortune to carry on a scheme for the foundation of scholarships all over Europe, in which the millionaire has been deeply interested. The first half of the story deals with the efforts of two would-be murderers, a hired agent from America and an Italian workman bent on revenge to compass the death of the unfortunate Hickson. After several clumsy attempts the American agent, by dint of "doctoring" a rope, succeeds in precipitating his victim down a crevasse, and the rest of the story is given up to the career and ultimate discovery of the "Place-Taker" Caldwell. The details of the plot are ingenious, and Mr. Earlston makes good use of an evidently intimate acquaintance with the German University towns.

St. David of the Dust. By MRS. FRED REYNOLDS. (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.)

MRS. REYNOLDS is an experienced writer, with a fondness for poetic description, which finds the fullest scope in the subject of her latest book. The "St. David" of the somewhat fanciful title is a dreamy, visionary youth, living in a Welsh mountain village. Of unknown, nameless parentage, and adopted by a childless old quarryman and his wife, the lad's moody aloofness, passionate love of Nature, and habit of expressing strange thoughts earn for him among the country-people the name of "St. David." From half regarding him as moonstruck or an imbecile, the impressionable and yet keenly practical inhabitants of this Welsh village come to look upon him as one on whom the spirit of the bards had descended. There is thus much idealistic writing, dropping often into unconscious blank verse—pages devoted to the rhapsodies and day-dreams of this village mystic, who, despite all Mrs. Reynolds's efforts, remains an unreal and shadowy figure. She is more successful in her less-studied pictures of the life of the ordinary inhabitants of this quarry village. In particular she has caught that deep-rooted suspicion, if not hatred, which the Welsh peasant entertains for all things English. A too persistent sentimentalism however is the predominant note of the book.

MISS MAUD ALLAN'S SALOME DANCE

WE have the largest Eastern Empire the world has ever seen, and yet we not only neglect to study Eastern thought and custom, we even shrink with horror, which is instinctive, but which we like to believe virtuous, from anything Eastern. That is the real reason why such dancing as that now being exhibited by Miss Maud Allan at the Palace has never before been received with even lukewarm sentiment in England. Racial instinct, island prejudice, and national conceit have kept our eyes closed to a whole garden of beauties, and have condemned to flow in a narrow channel an art which should spread its beneficent charm over all the fields of life. Posture-dancing is not a Western growth. In the earliest days we may imagine that the men and maidens who danced at the coming of spring or the mid-winter feast were content to "foot it," clumsily enough no doubt. Long before Puritanism dawned on the world, even before Christianity came to hallow the common sacraments of life, we may believe that in the West the dancing was essentially "proper." Out of that coarse and scanty seed we have evolved the type of dancing of which Mdlle. Adeline Genée is the supreme exponent. In its strict conventions, its complicated laws of practice, its minute and delicately-finished beauties, it is as different as could be from its rude, bucolic origins. But meanwhile the East has been evolving its own type of dancing. Out of the mere provocative posturing of the body, upon which a more matter-of-fact moral code than ours has always looked as legitimate entertainment, there has grown, possibly under Western influence—the influence of the Roman pantomimist, for instance, who, though provocative enough, was provocative in a different way—the totally different art up to which Miss Allan is now educating the London public.

This art has rules less strict, and conventions fewer and less imperative, than the corresponding art of the West. In European dancing everything is wrapped in a cloud and done by implication. Certain movements of the fingers over and round the face, for instance, imply admiration for the beauty of the person at whom they are aimed. How does the Salome at the Palace express admiration for the head of St. John? By no conventional movements, by no movements at all that can be noted and written down. It is done by attitude, by the flow of rhythm in the moving limbs, by the expression of the face, by the transformation of the whole body into a musical instrument striking that one note. And so with other passions—the fear, the horror, the exultation which are so vividly expressed. The rudiments of the Western art can be mastered by any agile young body; such dancing as Miss Allan's is only possible to an imaginative artist, who can create, without conventions or symbols to save trouble, the poetic impression desired. It is not possible to dance in the Western manner like Mdlle. Genée, unless, like Mdlle. Genée, you are a great artist. It is not possible to dance in the Eastern manner at all unless, like Miss Allan, you are a great artist. Your posturings may be pretty, but they will mean nothing; and the chances are that you will slip back into the old and gross appeal from which the flower sprang.

For the essence of this art—which is Eastern, though Miss Allen has never been to the East—is that it is dramatic. Much of Western dancing (we exclude from this term the peculiar Spanish dancing, which doubtless owes much to Moorish influence, and has never progressed far) is not dramatic; there is no drama in a pirouette, whatever pleasure may be gained from it when perfectly performed. Drama is the soul of the other art, and it cannot be doubted that it has been from very early ages dramatic. What was the "dance of the two armies" which the Shulamite danced in the "Song of Songs," and which led to the outburst of "How beautiful are thy feet with shoes, O prince's daughter!" and the glowing imagery which follows? It was a dance, clearly, with some sort of story in it. All Miss Allan's dances that we have seen are dramatic; most of all the wonderful "Salome." We know now how Salome danced; not loule nue, as in some mediæval illustrations, nor "tumbling," standing on her head, as in others; but clothed in jewels and with these marvellously beautiful sinuous movements in which the dancer's will and emotions play upon the lovely instrument of her body to produce what music she will. The beauty of these movements there is no describing.

Did Miss Allan realise when she came to London how bold a thing she was doing? It was nothing less than beginning our education in a branch of art which we have persistently neglected, and mainly through our uncomfortable suspicion of its "propriety." Courage is usually rewarded, and Miss Allan has conquered. Night after night crowds flock to see this princess of the East first win the head of her victim and, having won it, go through a torrent of mingled passions over it, all sublimated by art into things of beauty. And so far, we believe, there has been no whisper of ribaldry or prudery. Not all the visitors to the Palace, we suspect, have read Browning's "The Lady and the Painter," but it looks as if all had realised its message—the "absolution," in Browning's mistaken phrase, won by artist's model and dancer alike.

J. C. F.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE LIMIT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I must thank you for vindicating Magdalen, the most romantic if not the most distinguished College in Oxford. I have been appalled at reading Mr. Warren's verses. Their publication seem to me particularly sad and discouraging in regard to the future of my old College, which nurtured Prince Arthur, Prince Henry, Prince Rupert, Grocyn, John Colet, Reginald Pole, Wolsey, Hampden, Addison, Sacheverell, Gibbon, Oscar Wilde, and Charles Reade. Less known to the outside world was Dr. Routh, of whom some one significantly said, "He was a scholar, and what he published was good, but he published very little." His successor might have done worse than follow his example.

M. B.

March 18, 1908.

THE SICILIAN PLAYERS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—When shall we learn to distrust the intellect and the reason? If Mr. Morant wishes me to surrender both, the assumption is that I shall be honest. Well, I shall try to retain both of these useful qualities, and trust I may not be considered dishonest in doing so.

What is magnificent art? According to your correspondent's estimate its effect is to carry one out of himself. Because certain of our critics have not been so affected, I suppose he would argue they are devoid of feeling. On the other hand, it is possible he may regard them as persons so cultured that they have no passions left. Against that I can only point out that they have been strangely moved at times by various actors and actresses, as their testimony, printed and signed, witnesseth. Why they have not been moved by Aguglia and her comrades is because the passions they exhibit are so crude as to take them back to the childhood of the race. They are elemental because they pertain to the simple and elementary as exhibited, say, in the savage. I have seen in various East-end quarters certain little incidents in which crude passions—passions exhibited in this crude manner—such as joy, grief, fear, anger, hatred, jealousy, and love, have been exhibited, but I cannot say I have been moved, except by the fact that it was pitiable to realise how little removed these people were from the savage races. A love affair in a sordid street, with costers kicking and biting each other, is sheer animalism. "Sheer animalism" is the state of being actuated by sensual appetites only. The spectacle of Lazzaro grovelling on the floor of the cave before the cowering, gibbering form of Mila is sheer animalism.

